Mr. SPEAKER.—I think it my duty to draw the attention of the House to the amendments made in this Bill, because they appear, to my mind, to be an infringement of the privileges of the House. The amendments are: In clause 25 the amendment takes away the power of the State to advance money on urban or suburban land, which is further affected by the amendment in section 43. Clause 25 enlarges the field for advances by including the Westland and Nelson reserves land, and the thermal-springs land. Part III., relating to the raising of money by means of land-bonds, has been wholly struck out, and consequential amendments are made throughout the Bill. Clause 42 reduces the amount that may be advanced from £5,000 to £1,000. Clause 43, as amended, only allows advances to be made up to one-half of the value of the security, instead of two-thirds as permitted by this House. Now, in drawing attention to these amendments, which I believe to be an infringement of the privileges of the House, I wish to state that I am, in doing so, starting no new principle,—that I am merely following the example set by previous Houses, by previous Speakers. As formerly, so now an attempt has been made by the Legislative Council to limit the special privileges of this House, as regards its financial measures, to Bills of supply and Bills of taxation. In the Payments to Provinces Bill of 1871 the Legislative Council struck out a clause—No. 28—which amendment this House regarded as an infringement of the privileges of this House, and it appointed a Committee of its leading members—Messrs. Fox, Stafford, and Vogel of those days—and that Committee took care not to limit its objections to the matter of Bills of supply and Bills of taxation, but it laid its reason for objecting on these broad grounds: "That it is beyond the power of the Legislative Council to vary or alter the management or distribution of any money as provided by the House of Representatives"; and the point was conceded conditionally by the Legislative Council in these words:—

"The Council recognises, however, that the Bill is a portion of the general financial policy of the Government, and that its rejection at this stage might be attended with great public inconvenience. While, therefore, still maintaining its constitutional right to make the amendments in question, it consents to abstain from exercising this right on the House of Representatives engaging—first, to amend the Bill so as to restrict its operation to the present financial year; secondly, to refer the point in dispute between the two Houses to the Law Officers of the Crown in England, upon a case to be prepared by Managers appointed by each House."

The case was prepared, and submitted to the Crown Law Officers. The Law Officers of the Crown at the time were the late Chief Justice Coleridge and Sir George Jessel, and this was their decision:—

"We are of opinion that, independently of 'The Parliamentary Privileges Act, 1865,' the Legislative Council was not constitutionally justified in amending the Payment to Provinces Bill, 1871, by striking out the disputed clause 28. We think the Bill was a money Bill, and such a Bill as the House of Commons in this country would not have allowed to be amended by the House of Lords; and that the limitation proposed to be placed by the Legislative Council on Bills of aid or supply is too narrow, and would not be recognised by the House of Commons in England. . . . We think that the claims of the House of Representatives contained in their message to the Legislative Council are well founded,—subject, of course, to the limitation that the Legislative Council have a perfect right to reject any Bill passed by the House of Representatives having for its object to vary the management or appropriation of money prescribed by an Act of the previous session."

On which opinion the well-known writer, the late Mr. Todd, comments thus:—

"This opinion is a direct and unimpeachable settlement of the point at issue. The relative rights of both Houses in matters of aid and supply must be determined in every British colony by the ascertained rules of British constitutional practice. The local Act upon the subject must be construed in conformity with that practice wherever the Imperial policy is the accepted guide. A claim on the part of a colonial Upper Chamber to the possession of equal rights with the Assembly to amend a money Bill would be inconsistent with the ancient and undeniable control which is exercised by the Imperial House of Commons over all financial measures."

Having stated so far, I think it will be the duty of the Government to now make such a proposition as they think most advisable under the circumstances. I can only say, for myself, that I have not recklessly taken up the position which I have done, but that I am following the example set me by my predecessors; and that my only desire is, in the conduct of the business of this House, to do what will best secure harmony between both branches of the Legislature, and that harmony can only be maintained by each body acting within its own constitutionally-defined privileges.

Mr. WARD.—In rising to move, That the amendment made by the Legislative Council in the Advances to Settlers Bill be disagreed with, I will ask the House to appoint as Managers for drawing up reasons for disagreement the Premier, the honourable member for Waitaki, the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), and the mover. I think, after the authorities you, Sir, have quoted and the statement you have made in the House, that honourable members will agree with me in the opinion that a distinct interference with the privileges of this House has been caused by the alterations which have been made in another place in this important Bill; and I trust that still there may be a chance of the good which the country is likely to derive from the passing of this Bill being effected as a result of the Conference of the Managers which I now desire should be appointed.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think it is as well that I should explain to the House that the same members have been moved as Managers on this Bill as were appointed Managers in respect of the Consols Bill. It is the desire of the Government, and I believe it is acquiesced in by the representatives of the Council, that the whole of these Bills which have, and I think have properly, been ruled to be money Bills should be taken together; and, if the Council does not agree to the reasons that we send up, and adheres to its amendments, a further Conference will be held, and if we had two or three sets of Managers that might lead to confusion. Therefore I desire to make this explanation to the House. Otherwise the House might think the Government were slighting members who are quite capable, I know, of conducting business on behalf of the House at such a Conference, or of drawing up reasons why we should disagree with the Council's amendments.

Captain RUSSELL.—Will it be the duty of the gentlemen appointed to discuss the question as to whether there is a breach of the privileges of this House, or do you, Sir, rule absolutely beyond dispute that a breach has been committed?

Mr. SEDDON.—No doubt the first reason that will be submitted presently will be that there has been a breach of the privileges of this House. The House will be asked to concur in that before it goes to the Legislative Council at all.

Captain RUSSELL.—As you quoted authorities, Sir, it seemed to me they were not quite analogous to the case before us, inasmuch as in the Payments to Provinces Bill there was a distinct appropriation of money from the Consolidated Fund, I presume for a definite purpose; whereas this is a question of policy for the expenditure of money hereafter to be raised, but not involving an expenditure of money at the present time. It does not affect the Consolidated Fund at all. I am not prepared to argue the point, having only just heard the authorities read at this moment, but that is the impression made on my mind as you read them—that the cases are not analogous, inasmuch as the one is a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and the other a question of policy for the country to consider—the expenditure to be made hereafter out of money not yet raised. The policy of raising that money is one that might fairly come within the purview of the Legislative Council.

Sir R. STOUT.—Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word or two, in case my silence might be misconstrued. I have not yet heard what amendments the Council has made in the Bill, nor had I the pleasure of hearing all your remarks; I therefore do not wish to express any opinion on the subject, until I have seen the amendments and perhaps had the opportunity of hearing your ruling.

Mr. Speaker

Mr. WARD.—Perhaps it is rather interesting to the House to hear the leader of the Opposition now say the proposals of the Bill do not affect the Consolidated Fund. During the course of the Bill through the House very opposite reasons to that were put forth as a justification for the opposition to the Bill. The honourable gentleman now announces that this is a policy Bill, and that on the ground of its being a policy Bill the Upper House is justified in the amendments it has made, and that he deems it is not an interference with the privileges of the House. I can only say that the view put forward by the leader of the Opposition is that, in an important policy Bill which the Government advocated throughout the length and breadth of the land—

Captain RUSSELL.—Particularly at Winton.

Mr. WARD.—Yes; throughout the length and breadth of the land, and Winton is an important portion of the land. We now find quite different reasons adduced by my honourable friend for maintaining the important alterations another place has thought proper to make in the Bill. I can only say it is very interesting to honourable members. I am surprised to hear this expression of opinion from the honourable member, because one of the first functions of the leader of the Opposition—I think the honourable member will not disagree with me in saying so—is that, where the Speaker of the House maintains that the privileges of the House have been interfered with, he should—and precedents, I think, are established for it—uphold the Speaker in maintaining the dignity and privileges of the House. I can only express regret at the position he has thought it within his province to take up, to attempt to uphold another place as against the maintenance of the privileges of the House, and the ruling of the Speaker upon such an important matter as this.

Captain RUSSELL.—The honourable gentleman has entirely misrepresented what I said, Sir.

Amendments disagreed with, and Managers appointed.

On the question of the amendment made by the Legislative Council in the Harbours Bill,

Mr. SPEAKER said,—The amendment made in the Harbours Act Amendment Bill is by striking out the clause as passed enabling rates to be levied. It was held, a few years ago, and the point was conceded by the Legislative Council, that any interference with rating powers this House gives is an infringement of the privileges of the House. The Bill itself is not a money Bill, and it would be competent, if the House thought proper, to waive its privilege with regard to the amendment made; but I think, probably, it would be best to allow this Bill to go to the Managers that have just been appointed, for them to report upon.

Mr. SEDDON.—I move, That this amendment be also disagreed with, and referred to the same Managers.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. SEDDON, the amendments made in the Land for Settlements Bill were referred to the same Managers, and the name of the Hon. the Minister of Lands was added to the Managers.

MINISTERIAL RESIDENCES SALE BILL.

Mr. SEDDON said, in moving the second reading of this Bill, it was not necessary for him to say anything in respect to the measure, but it was generally conceded that it was desirable that the Ministerial residences should be sold. The mode of sale was by public auction, and, pending the sale, power was given to lease the residences. These residences were a source of continuous expense to the colony in the way of caretaking, gardeners, and so on, and if disposed of there would be a saving.

Captain RUSSELL said the Premier had really given no reason why the Ministerial residences should be sold. He only said they required a gardener to be kept to keep the lawn mown; but there were other points which he thought were worthy of consideration. Surely every person must admit it was desirable that Ministers should have some official residence.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Captain RUSSELL said honourable members might say "No," but he considered that they should have official residences. He thought it was essential that a man who was a Minister of the Crown should have some place which might fairly be called a house of his own. His own feeling was that in his

10.0. official capacity a man who sacrificed his private business to come up to Wellington to take part in the Government of the country was fairly entitled to have provided for him some place of residence where he could live in the comfort in which he was accustomed to live before. He was far from thinking that a man by living in a grand house could add to the dignity of his name or to the lustre of his occupation, but it was only consonant with the dignity of a Minister that he should have some private place of abode, and he did not see how any one could disagree with that. It was impossible, when a Minister came to Wellington, for him to find a suitable house, if he had a good-sized family, because, although there were many houses in Wellington that would be suitable for any Minister of the Crown, still these houses were occupied by the owners; and the class of house which it was necessary a Minister should have, if he had an average-sized family, was not obtainable, and the consequence was that Ministers were obliged to submit themselves to the great discomfort of living in hotels. He did not think it was convenient or proper that a Minister should be, for a period of three years, during which he was likely to hold office, put to the inconvenience of living in a hotel, nor did he think it was desirable from any point of view that a Minister should be permanently resident in a hotel. As he had just said, he did not think a man by living in a fine house could add to his dignity or usefulness: on the other hand, he might add that he did not think that by living in a hotel a man would detract from the dignity of his position. But it seemed to him that, with the business a Minister was obliged to perform, he would not have the necessary privacy in a hotel. He was receiving people, and performing private and semi-official business, at all times of the day when he was not in his office, because they knew, as a matter of fact, that as a Minister he was subject to the incursions of all and sundry. He should therefore have some proper place where he could receive people. Then, coming to the question of expense, he did not think the question of expense should be taken very much into consideration in this case, inasmuch as Ministers had a right to, and were paid, such allowances as would enable them to get a house instead of having one provided for them to live in, and he thought the saving of expense would be very small indeed. Ministers received, he believed, £200 a year lodging-allowance, and if they capitalised the sum of £200 a year it would be evident that a house could be provided for the Minister without inflicting any greater charge on the country than was charged in the £200 a year which was provided for in the lodging-allowance. He thought the comfort in residing in a private house must be infinitely greater than in living in a boardinghouse or in a hotel, and he thought no good reason had been shown why these Ministerial residences should be disposed of. There had been a statement made about the garden being an expense too great for the colony to bear, but that in itself seemed to him a paltry reason to put forward. The question resolved itself into this, then: Did the colony desire that the men who were placed in the foremost position in the colony should live in publichouses? That was what it came to. He could not believe, himself, that it was consonant with the dignity of a Minister that he should have no place of abode other than the small hotels which they had in New Zealand, where there could not be the proper amount of privacy or comfort. He was afraid the House would agree to the selling of these residences, and they would possibly have some vague intimation about not wishing magnificent establishments for the giving of dances, and so forth. He did not think a Minister need have a house of that description, but he asserted it was essential that each Minister should be provided with such accommodation as would enable him to come and live in Wellington during the time he was in office without the sacrifice of his comfort. He would, at any rate, divide the House on the second reading of the Bill.

Sir R. STOUT did not believe in the Government selling this land, and if the present Ministers did not wish to live in these houses they could allow them to be leased for a term of years. He did not think that the Government ought to part with this property. The property might have to be rebought, or other lands bought, and it was always undesirable for a Government to part with lands in a growing city. The Government had already far too little land in the City of Wellington, and perhaps in other cities. That was seen a short time ago, when it was found necessary to arrange to get a part of the reclaimed land. And, as there were now only three residences left, and they did not know what requirements they might have in the future, he did not think it wise for the Government to dispose of the residences. He did not say that a Minister should be forced to live in one of these residences if he did not wish to do so: that was altogether a different question. He cordially agreed with the honourable gentleman who had last spoken, that it was undesirable that a Minister should live in a publichouse. It was only in recent years that this had been done, and he thought it was to be regretted. However, if the House wished to dispose of the property, then he had given notice of an amendment on the Supplementary Order Paper that the Tinakori Road residence should be handed over for the new university, as it seemed to him that that would be one of the best means of obtaining a site for a university when a grant was asked for from the House to support higher education in Wellington. Of course, the House had got to face that question in the future, because it was hardly right that the middle district of New Zealand should be without university education, whilst university education was provided in Auckland, Canterbury, and Otago. He thought, however, that the residences should be retained by the Crown; but, if the House did not assent to that, he hoped the suggestion he had made would be agreed to. He did not wish to take up any more time on the question, but he did ask the House to consider well the effect and nature of this Bill; and he also asked those who thought that the State should not part with the freehold of this land not to consent to the State selling this small area of land in the City of Wellington, and not to agree to this Bill being passed.

Captain Russell

Mr. DUTHIE said there was one point he would like to urge upon the Premier. If the House had resolved upon parting with these residences, he would remind the Premier that when a deputation waited upon the late Sir Harry Atkinson to ask that the Tinakori Road residence should be set apart for a university he replied promising that their request should receive favourable consideration. Of course, the Premier might say that he was under no obligation to keep the promise of his predecessor; but he thought the fact he had stated should be some indication to the Government that Wellington had a claim to this land for a university site. He hoped the Government would accept the amendment of his honourable colleague (Sir R. Stout). They knew that the area of land still available in the City of Wellington was very limited, and that the demand and price for suitable sites must advance very considerably. There were now but very few acres still available in the city for residence purposes, and in the market, and if at some future time the colony required to purchase residences it would certainly have to pay very high prices for them. He thought it would be a great mistake to part with these residences; honourable members must recognise that, with the swing of the pendulum, others might succeed the Ministers now in office who might require those residences.

Mr. SEDDON said there had been no good reasons advanced to show why this Bill should not be read a second time. The remarks of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay as to the necessity of Ministers having official residences might apply to the past with some force, but under the new order of things these residences would not be required. Ever since he had been in the House these Ministerial residences had been an expense to the country, and had also been the subject of dispute in the House. There had been returns asked for showing the number of glasses in the house. They had heard about a Minister's wife ordering new curtains, and getting a new carpet when the old one was not worn out; and then, when inventories were being taken, a Minister had to show that a saucepan, perhaps, at the back of the house was unfit for use. He said, when it came to that, it was altogether undesirable. Then, there were the four gardeners, which meant an expense of about £100 a year each.

Captain RUSSELL.—There are not four gardeners for the four residences.

Mr. SEDDON said there were six gardeners altogether. Two were employed constantly at Government House. In addition to that, there were constant repairs needed to the buildings, and if honourable members looked at the estimate they would find that a considerable sum was annually required for repairs. These sums, added to the gardeners' wages, would be saved under the proposed arrangement. There was another matter which had not been referred to—namely, as to the suitability of the residences. He questioned very much whether any of the Ministers would care to go into the Tinakori Road house. It was a huge pile of buildings, and was a most expensive residence; and yet it was not a comfortable residence. It was not a well-selected spot for a Ministerial residence in Wellington. He did not want to decry its value, but he would say that the building was not at all in a good position. It might happen that Ministers who were men of means might be able to keep up such a house as that, but, as for comfort, it was one of the most uncomfortable places that ever a man went into. It had a great barn of a drawing-room, and, for a man with a family, who wanted some nice, comfortable rooms, there were none in that house. Then, as to the residence in Molesworth Street, that was not a proper place for a residence at all. It was right in the heart of a business street: that street would, one day, be a whole line of shops. There was very little land there, the land at the back having been leased for gardening purposes. The building was very old, and required a lot of repairs. Not only that, but the refurnishing and the recarpeting would take a lot of money. It was very convenient to the House and the Government Buildings: that was the only advantage it had. But for a Ministerial or private residence, or a residence for any one in an official position, it was not at all well suited. Then they came to the question of Ministers living in hotels. There was something in that contention, he admitted; but there was something to be said on the other side, too. When any Minister did his work and attended to his duty he would find, as all Ministers had found, that they were most irregular in going to their meals. One could not fix any time, because just as it came to lunch- or dinner-time deputations of members or others came and saw the Minister. Then there was, perhaps, correspondence and telegrams to send off, and the Minister had to remain behind; and the result was that it was almost impossible to have a regular meal-hour. He was rather surprised to hear the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) make the objection which he did, because when he first knew the honourable gentleman as a Minister, in 1877 or 1878, he met him at the Empire Hotel.

Sir R. STOUT said he was not a Minister in 1877. When he was a Minister he never stayed in any hotel.

Mr. SEDDON said he first met the honourable gentleman at the hotel he had referred to, but probably he was mistaken as to the honourable gentleman being a Minister at the time. The next question was as regarded the promise made by Sir Harry Atkinson to hand over the Tinakori land for university purposes for Wellington. It was a valuable estate, and the question was, whether or not it should be granted for university purposes. Wellington had been well able to look after itself. Two years ago it was granted a very fine endowment. He referred to the Botanic Garden.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It is a recreation endowment.

Mr. SEDDON said it was now, practically, an endowment for the citizens of Wellington. Ministers had been twitted all along for not living in these houses. He might point out that when Ministers did live in the residences returns were constantly being asked for as to the expenditure upon them. When the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) was Premier he must have felt very much hurt indeed at the returns asked for, and at the attacks which the Opposition made on Ministers when Ministers did what they were bound to do for themselves and their families—namely, make themselves comfortable. He had never lived in one of the residences. Any Minister doing so ran the risk of having his private affairs dragged up as he had seen done in other cases. These residences were not suitable. Wellington was growing, and there was sufficient enterprise in the place to meet all the requirements as regarded residences. The Government had promised to bring this matter forward, and they had now done so. He trusted the Bill would be carried.

The House divided.

AYES, 44.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Morrison
Button	Kelly, W.	Parata
Carnell	Lang	Pinkerton
Collins	Larnach	Pirani
Crowther	Lawry	Russell, G. W.
Duncan	Mackintosh	Saunders
Earnshaw	Maslin	Seddon
Flatman	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Graham	McGuire	Stevens
Guinness	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Hall-Jones	McNab	Ward
Harris	Meredith	Willis.
Hogg	Millar	Tellers.
Houston	Mills	Buick
Joyce	Montgomery	Tanner.

NOES, 11.

Buchanan	Heke	Stout.
Duthie	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Fraser	Massey	Newman
Green	Russell, W. R.	Wilson.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carroll.	Allen.

Majority for, 33.

Bill read a second time.

Bill committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 2.—Governor may sell lands in First Schedule.

Mr. MILLAR moved, That the words "sold or" be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 20.

Buddo	Lawry	Seddon
Carnell	McGowan	Stevens
Hall	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Harris	McLachlan	Willis.
Hogg	Meredith	Tellers.
Houston	Parata	Graham
Kelly, W.	Reeves	Mills.

NOES, 17.

Buick	Massey	Pirani
Collins	McNab	Russell, G. W.
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Stout.
Fraser	Morrison	Tellers.
Heke	Newman	Lang
Maslin	O'Regan	Millar.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Hutchison, G.
Carncross	Te Ao
Duncan	Wilson
Flatman	Green
Hall-Jones	Mackenzie, T.
Joyce	Russell, W. R.
Mackintosh	Duthie
Pinkerton	Buchanan
Smith, E. M.	McGuire
Ward.	Allen.

Majority for, 3.

Amendment negatived.

Sir R. STOUT moved the following new clause:—

"The lands described in the Third Schedule are hereby vested in the Middle District of New Zealand University College for university purposes."

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the Chairman leave the chair.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 6.

	Tellers.
Bell	Heke
Earnshaw	Massey.
	Fraser
	Stout.

NOES, 24.

Buddo	McKenzie, J.	Pirani
Carnell	McLachlan	Russell, G. W.
Collins	McNab	Seddon
Graham	Millar	Stevens
Hall	Morrison	Willis.
Harris	O'Regan	Tellers.
Kelly, W.	O'Rorke	Lawry
Lang	Parata	Mills.
McGowan

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Ward
Buchanan	Pinkerton
Duthie	Mackintosh
Green	Flatman
Mackenzie, T.	Hall-Jones
Mitchelson	Cadman
Newman	Reeves
Russell, W. R.	Joyce
Smith, E. M.	McGuire
Te Ao	Carncross
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 18.

Motion negatived.

First Schedule.

Sir R. STOUT moved to strike out the first paragraph.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the paragraph proposed to be omitted stand part of the schedule."

AYES, 20.

Buddo	McGowan	Pirani
Carnell	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Collins	McLachlan	Stevens
Graham	Meredith	Willis.
Harris	Morrison	Tellers.
Hogg	O'Regan	Lawry
Kelly, W.	Parata	Mills.

NOES, 10.

	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Lang
Fraser	Massey
Heke	McNab
Hutchison, G.	O'Rorke.
	Bell
	Stout.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Te Ao
Duncan	Newman
Flatman	Green
Hall-Jones	Mackenzie, T.
Joyce	Russell, W. R.

Mackintosh
McGuire
Pinkerton
Ward.

Duthie
Smith, E. M.
Buchanan
Allen.

Majority for, 10.

Paragraph retained.

Bill reported.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

11.0. The following reasons were brought up for disagreeing with the Council's amendments in the Government Advances to Settlers Bill:—

"REASONS for disagreeing with the Amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Government Advances to Settlers Bill.

"(1.) That the amendments made by the Legislative Council in sections 25, 42, and 43, and the expunging of Part II., are an invasion of the undoubted privileges of this House.

"(2.) That the action of the Council is inconsistent with the exclusive control which has ever been exercised by the House of Commons over all financial measures, and this House maintains its right to the like exclusive control.

"(3.) That it is as much beyond the power of the Legislative Council to vary or alter clauses prescribed by the House of Representatives for the management or distribution of money as it is beyond the power of the Council to vary provisions of aid and supply."

Reasons agreed to, and ordered to be transmitted.

HARBOURS BILL.

The following reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill were brought up, and agreed to:—

"Clause 2: It is submitted that the reduction of the right of overdraft, as made by the Council's amendment, will unduly restrict the financial operations of Harbour Boards, and that the clause has been rendered unnecessarily stringent.

"Clause 4: The expunging of this clause is an infringement of the privileges of the House.

"Clause 6: This clause introduces an innovation in account, as it authorises the Harbour Fund to be applied to purposes foreign to harbour management.

"Clause 9: This unnecessarily increases the representation of County Councils on Harbour Boards.

"Clause 10 is not regarded as necessary, because provided for already under the principal Act."

TRAMWAYS BILL.

Mr. SEDDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was a consolidation Bill, and also an improvement on the present law in reference to tramways. The measure had been very carefully drawn up. It was moulded upon the Victorian legislation. Originally the law was that the promoters of tramways had to deal directly with the Government, and incidentally the Government consulted the local authorities. This was changed now, and the local authorities would have to be consulted in the first instance by the promoters of tramways, and the Government only dealt with the local authorities. The local authorities, having charge of the streets, were best fitted to see where tramways should go, and how they would best meet the convenience of the public with due safety. It was a matter for the local bodies to deal with direct, and not for the Government as had been formerly the case. He might also say the Bill was necessary because of the change that had taken place in regard to the working of tramways since electric motors were now working satisfactorily, and since there was no legislation to meet the case of an electric tramway: it was therefore necessary that the Bill should pass. It had already passed the Legislative Council, and in its present form, he thought, was an improvement upon existing legislation, and would give satisfaction.

Mr. DUTHIE said this Bill might throw a very great liability on the local bodies in respect to damage that might occur to the waterworks plant. In the City of Wellington they had a high-pressure water-supply, and electric tramways, he was given to understand, might prove injurious to the pipes.

Mr. SEDDON said that if the local authorities objected the Act could not come into force. Formerly the Government used to deal with promoters of the tramway companies, and the local authorities had no control: now it was to be a matter simply between the local authorities and the Government.

Mr. DUTHIE thought it was a very important matter, and that they should take care to see that the waterworks plant was not deteriorated in any way. This point could be dealt with in Committee, but he thought it was only right at this stage of the Bill to direct attention to the objection taken by the local authorities.

Sir R. STOUT said there was another point in connection with tramways that he wished to draw attention to—that was, the following question: Supposing a local authority purchased a tramway, what would it be paying for? In one clause of the Bill it seemed that they would have to pay practically for the good-will, and that, surely, could not be intended. He might say that the City Corporations of Wellington and Dunedin had both drawn attention to that provision in the Bill; and he did not think that if a local body did purchase the tramways it ought to have to pay anything for the good-will. Section 3 said, "'Undertaking' includes the tramway, and all works, cars, rolling-stock, equipment, material and plant, rights, powers, and privileges connected with the tramway." It would appear from that that the good-will was included, and it would be seen that the Corporation had to pay for the undertaking. That being so, it meant they had to pay practically for the good-will, and he did not think that was right. In section 29 of the schedule there was the following provision:—

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any existing lease, the local authority (not being the promoters) may, by notice in writing given to the promoters, require them to sell to the local authority the undertaking; and thereupon the promoters shall sell the undertaking to the local authority. But the following provisions shall apply:—"

And it then went on to provide what were to be the terms, especially if the two parties did not agree. It said,—

"The terms of the sale and purchase of the undertaking shall be such as may be agreed upon between the local authority and the promoters, or, if there be no agreement, or in so far as any agreement, if made, may not extend, the terms shall be the payment of the value of the undertaking."

That would include privileges, and would include good-will, and he therefore desired to point out that this was a Bill which should not be hastily hurried through, as it might, if passed in its present shape, cast upon the local authorities a very great responsibility. He had received letters on the subject from the local authorities, but he had not put any amendment on the Order Paper, as he did not know the Bill was coming on. He thought, however, the Bill should be amended, and provision made to meet the objections he had just mentioned.

Mr. SEDDON said that when the Bill was in Committee he would postpone it if there was any desire to do so.

Mr. MILLAR desired to say that in regard to this measure there was one thing he thought the House should know—that was, that primarily the object of the Bill, he believed, was to allow the Dunedin Tramway Company to get rid of their property. This information had been kept back, and he thought it was well that the House should know something in regard to it before they passed this measure. Under the present arrangements the Dunedin Tramway was the property of the Bank of New Zealand, or virtually so. The bank held a promissory note, payable on demand, for £36,000, upon which the Tramway Company were paying 8 per cent.; and there was also an overdraft of £2,000, for which they paid 9 per cent. Under these conditions it was impossible for that company to pay, and, instead of calling up the uncalled capital of 17s. per share and paying off the bank, thereby enabling the company to pay dividends to its shareholders, it had continued paying the 8 per cent. to the bank; and he supposed the bank would not now wish to get rid of this asset if they were not in want of cash. He was given to understand that a company was being formed in London, and they were going to give £41,000 for the whole concern, and the result of that would be that the Bank of New Zealand would get back £36,000 and the £2,000 overdraft, while the balance of the £41,000 which would be given for the line would go in commissions to the promoters of this new company, the original shareholders not getting anything at all. The only benefit the people would receive would be the benefit of sending Home some £4,000 or £5,000 in interest to this foreign syndicate. Under the present conditions the Dunedin people were perfectly satisfied with the tramway service, but if this new scheme was allowed to go on it would mean the withdrawal of £10,000 per annum from the town and district. That was the amount spent at present in wages, horse-feed, and horses. Primarily the object of the Bill was to allow the Bank of New Zealand to get rid of this property, and it had been arranged to introduce the measure first of all as a local Bill, but he presumed it had been concluded that it would not get through, and now the result was that it came up as a public Bill. He did not think he would be doing his duty unless he drew attention to the facts of the case, and when in Committee he would move certain amendments.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. SEDDON said he would be perfectly willing, when the Bill was in Committee, to postpone it, and every opportunity would be given to members to make it a good Bill. He might say he had not been aware of what the honourable member for Chalmers had stated, but last session a Bill was introduced because it was impossible, as the law then stood, to allow a tramway company to construct a line without the Government being responsible, and, that being the case, the Government could not give any consent to the scheme asked for in Dunedin. As to the point raised by Sir Robert Stout, in regard to the question of good-will, he thought there was something in it, and that they should make it very clear what a local authority had to pay for if they bought a property. He was quite prepared to make that amendment in Committee. It was necessary that the Bill should be passed, because the electric motors were now the order of the day, and they should study the interests of the travelling public, as well as of the promoters, by giving them every facility in this direction. He did not know that the Bank of New Zealand were the promoters in Dunedin, or what the financial position of the Dunedin Tramway Company was, but they should endeavour to frame the Bill on modern lines, in order to meet the demands and wants of the public.

Bill read a second time.

TONGARIRO NATIONAL PARK BILL.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said those honourable members who had been in the House during the last five or six years would recollect that this Bill had been before the House on various occasions, and two other Ministers of Lands in office previous to himself had tried to get it made law, but there was always some obstacle interposed by the Natives interested in the land of which it was proposed to make a national park. Last year he had introduced a Bill for the second time, and he had made full arrangements with the Natives in the matter, but at the last moment he could not get the Bill through, owing to the session coming to an end. Since then the Government had purchased the interests of several of those Natives who were interested in the block, and the interests of the remaining Native owners were now very small indeed. The chief who originally gave a portion of the mountains to the colony as a present had now given a certain area of land; the Government had bought another area; and out of the 62,000 acres which comprised the area proposed to be set aside for a park there was very little left indeed. There were only a few shares belonging to the Natives, and the latter would very soon sell their interests to the Government, and, if they did not sell, the Bill contained full provision to enable the Government to ascertain the value of their interests in the land, and the owners would be compensated by the colony to the full value of any interest they might have. With regard to the desirability of setting aside this land as a national park, he was sure that any one who had seen that portion of the country, and who had seen those mountains, would come to one conclusion as to the advisability of setting aside this area of country,—which he might say was almost useless so far as grazing was concerned, and would admit that it should be set aside as a national park for New Zealand. The beauties of that portion of the country would be preserved for all time to come for the benefit of the people of New Zealand, and they would be thought a good deal of in time to come. This matter was pretty well known to every member of the House, and he therefore moved the second reading, feeling sure honourable members were now satisfied that it should pass.

Mr. HEKE said he had been interviewed by several Natives who claimed to be interested in the lands about Tongariro, and also by the young chief Te Heuheu, in reference to this Bill, and he had informed him that the Minister in charge of the Bill should introduce a preamble setting forth the tract of land that was to be handed over to the Queen.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said that was provided for in Supplementary Order Paper No. 54.

Mr. HEKE would like to call attention to another matter—that was, in reference to the pension which old Te Heuheu was entitled to. He had been given to understand that the desire of young Te Heuheu, who was now living, and who had succeeded his father, was to have his father's pension paid to him. He thought it was only fair that if such a pension did exist in the father's time it should be paid to the young man now.

Mr. SEDDON said if the honourable member would put himself in communication with him he would look into the matter.

Mr. HEKE would take the assurance of the Native Minister in this matter; but he wished also to mention that, in regard to the interests which were held by some of the Natives at the present time, he did not at all like the idea of the Government obtaining those interests by force from the Natives by having a valuation made, and taking away their land altogether.

11.30. When the Natives did not wish to dispose of their interests they should have the opportunity of making a bargain with the Native Minister or the Minister of Lands in reference to their interests. He believed the Natives who still had interests in the land about there were willing to dispose of them for a certain price. To provide for taking the land away from the Natives under the clauses set forth in the Bill was a monstrous piece of legislation. He did not believe in taking Native land at a valuation, especially if the Natives did not agree to such valuation. Legislation of this nature was entirely inconsistent with the Treaty of Waitangi.

Sir R. STOUT said it did not appear to him that the last paragraph of section 2 was clear enough as to the payment of compensation. The provision made in the Bill was that any land which had not been sold to the Crown the Governor might take possession of under the Public Works Act. This could be amended in Committee, and a provision could be put into the Bill that compensation was to be paid under the Public Works Act of 1894. But there ought to be some clearer provision that when the compensation-money had been fixed the amount should be given to the Natives. The provision was that the Native Land Court should inquire into the rights of the owners and assess the value of their interests; but that would hardly be sufficient, because under the Public Works Act the person who made a claim had the right to appoint an Assessor, and the Crown appointed another Assessor, and they came to a decision. He did not see why the value should not be determined under the Public Works Act of 1894. Then, let the Native Land Court determine what was to become of the money. He would suggest, therefore, that the Bill should not be committed until the following day, and that provision should be made for the two things he mentioned: first, that compensation should be fixed under the Public Works Act of 1894; and second, that the Native Land Court should determine who were entitled to it. He quite agreed with what had been said as to the necessity for the colony to acquire this land as a public park, and he was exceedingly glad that the purchase had been gone on with; but they must see justice done to the Natives, and justice would not be done except in the way he pointed out.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said there was no desire whatever to do anything wrong to any Natives who had an interest in the country. The object in putting the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court in the Bill was, as the honourable gentleman stated, to find out who was the right owner, and who was entitled to be paid compensation for the land. The Government thought the Chief Judge was the proper person for that purpose. He (Mr. McKenzie) had no objection whatever to amending the Bill in the direction the honourable gentleman suggested, so as to facilitate its passage. In regard to the question raised by the honourable member for the Northern Maori District, that honourable member would see that on the Supplementary Order Paper he had provided a preamble which the honourable gentleman would no doubt find satisfactory.

Bill read a second time.

LITTLE BARRIER ISLAND PURCHASE BILL.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it gave the Government power to complete the purchase of Little Barrier Island. They had already purchased a portion, but a few interests were still left belonging to Natives, and it was desired to provide that the owners should get paid for whatever interests they might have. Negotiations were going on at the present time for the purchase of the remaining portion of the land. The Bill was to facilitate their getting possession of any share they might not be able to buy under the ordinary system of obtaining land from the Natives until next year.

Mr. HEKE thought the provisions of the Bill were altogether out of reason, and were very unfair to the Natives who still held their interest and did not wish to dispose of it at the price offered by the Government. The preamble of the Bill set forth that a certain document had been signed by three owners on behalf of their fellow-owners. He understood, by a telegram which he had received from one of the leading chiefs, that he was deceived when he was called upon to sign that document. He understood, when the document was placed before him to sign, that he was to receive £3,000 for his interest alone. He now found out that he was to assign all the interests of his fellow-owners for the £3,000. The chief informed him that he had a copy of that document, and he (Mr. Heke) had wired to the Native to forward him all the documents he had with reference to the purchase of the Little Barrier. He would move, That after the Bill is read a second time it be referred to the Native Affairs Committee.

Sir R. STOUT said he had also received a communication from Tenetahi to the same effect the honourable gentleman had spoken of. He said the signature to the conveyance was obtained from him by the Government on the distinct understanding in writing that he was to have the whole of the purchase-money paid to him. He did not know, of course, what the agreement was between the Land Purchase Office and the Native, but he felt there must be some misunderstanding, as he did not think any such officer would wish to do an injustice. The Native, however, said if the Bill passed as at present it would do him considerable injury. He thought, therefore, the Bill might be referred to the Native Affairs Committee, and if the documents were not received from the Native they might obtain a copy from the department. As to the island itself, he quite agreed that it ought, if possible, to be secured by the Government. He believed it was of very little use to the Natives, and it should be secured for the purpose of preserving native birds from molestation by Europeans.

Mr. CARROLL was understood to say that it was a most important thing for the colony that the island should be acquired. He hardly thought it was fair that Tenetahi should insist on the whole of the purchase-money being given to him, as the others who had interests in the land should get their shares. He thought, under the circumstances, that the suggestion made by the honourable member for the Northern Maori District and the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) was a good one—namely, that the Bill should be referred to the Native Affairs Committee.

Mr. J. McKensie

Mr. MITCHELSON said that last year he presented a petition in connection with this very island, and the petitioner then asked that the Government should either purchase the island from Tenetahi and his co-owners, or allow the Native Land Court to cut off the shares of those who declined to sell. He (Mr. Mitchelson) himself disagreed entirely with that request. This island the Government ought to acquire; but he thought, at the same time, if the whole of the Native owners had signed an agreement to accept £3,000 in full compensation for the whole of the island, they should be compelled to abide by that agreement. The only question was, what the value of the interest of Tenetahi and those who declined to receive their share of the £3,000 amounted to, and if these Natives had only an equal right with those who had received their share of the money. If that was so, then those Natives who now objected to the passage of the Bill had no case. He quite agreed with the suggestion that the Bill should be referred to the Native Affairs Committee.

Bill read a second time.

WATER-SUPPLY BILL.

This Bill was read a second time and committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. BELL moved to insert the following new clause:—

"A certificate under the seal of the County Council or Water-supply Board of the amount of the preliminary expenses and liabilities incurred, as mentioned in the last-preceding section, shall be conclusive evidence that such amount has been so incurred."

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

STAMP BILL.

This Bill was read a second time and committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 5.—Stamp duty on certain deeds of assignment.

Mr. WARD moved, That the words "five pounds" be struck out, with a view of inserting "two pounds ten shillings."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause."

AYES, 6.

McGowan
Millar

Montgomery
Morrison.

Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.
Pirani.

NOES, 38.

Allen	Hogg	O'Regan
Bell	Kelly, W.	Parata
Buddo	Lang	Reeves
Buick	Larnach	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Carroll	Maslin	Stevens
Collins	Massey	Stout
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Graham	McLachlan	Ward
Hall	McNab	Willis.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Mitchelson	Lawry
Heke	Newman	Mills.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Buchanan	Pinkerton
Duthie	Mackintosh
Green	Flatman
Russell, W. R.	Joyce
Te Ao	Carncross
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 32.

Words struck out.

Words "two pounds ten shillings" inserted.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

The House adjourned at five minutes to two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Friday, 12th October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Privileges of the Council—Government Railways Bill—Rating on Unimproved Value Bill—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock p.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Trustees Bill, Stamp Bill, Water-supply Bill, Abattoirs and Slaughterhouses Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Mining Companies Bill, Dairy Industry Bill.

PRIVILEGES OF THE COUNCIL.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. BOWEN, the following gentlemen were appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for the Council adhering to its amendments in the Advances to Settlers Bill: The Hon. Mr. Stewart, the Hon. Mr. MacGregor, the Hon. Mr. Ormond, the Hon. Mr. Bonar, and the mover.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY moved, formally, That the Council do not insist on its amendments in the Harbours Bill; but might say that there was a question of privilege in this case also, and that it should be referred to the same Committee as that on the previous Bill.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said it was beyond his comprehension how the amendment made by the Council in clause 4 of this Bill could be regarded as a breach of the privileges of the other Chamber; nor did he see that this case stood on the same level as the question involved in the other three Bills amended by the Council. This was a separate clause introduced into the Bill, and it had been the intention of the Council to expunge the clause for the purpose of having a local Bill introduced to meet the case of the Otago Harbour Board. That it was now to be considered an invasion of the privileges of the House of Representatives was really more than they should be called upon to believe. What the Council had done was entirely in the interests of the Otago Harbour Board, and to enable them to retain possession of their own finances and administration. He should strongly deprecate this being brought into the same category as the three other Bills which were supposed to be the subject of a Conference at the present time.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said clause 4, to which allusion had been made, simply permitted all the Harbour Boards to charge such tonnage rates as they might think fit without any limitation whatever, and the Council very properly took exception to granting such unlimited power to the whole of the Harbour Boards in the colony. How this could be construed into a breach of the privileges of another branch of the Legislature it was difficult to imagine. He thought the Council should resolutely insist on its power. He thought the Bill should be sacrificed rather than they should give way.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said the language used in the reason that had been assigned for dissenting from the amendment made by the Legislative Council in this Bill was certainly such as to cause the Council to very carefully guard against any attempt to encroach upon its power. The contention now set up with regard to clause 4 was certainly very remarkable, and it was an encroachment on the power of the Council which he was sure the Council would very firmly resist. The clause, as it stood in the Bill, was entirely distinct from the other clauses in that Bill. It was, in fact, an entirely separate and distinct enactment. Very little importance might be attached to the clause as it stood; but the principle involved, as to the power of the Council, was certainly as important as that involved in any of the other Bills. The principle seemed to be this on the part of the House of Representatives: that, inasmuch as this clause dealt in some sense with rates, taxes, and dues, therefore the Council had no power to touch it; and the position seemed to him to be that, this clause being an entirely distinct and separate enactment, there could be no question that the Council had constitutional power, if not to amend it, at all events to strike it out. To give way on this point would be an admission on the part of the Council that it had not that power. He thought there could be no question as to the power of the Council to strike out a clause of this character, though it might be open to question whether the Council had power to amend it. There could be no question that, if the clause was in the proper sense a money clause, then it should not appear in a Bill which was not a money Bill. If it were held that the Council could not strike it out, then he apprehended there would be no alternative but to lay aside the Bill altogether. However, the principle involved was so important that he was quite sure the Council would take a firm stand upon it.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY was bound to say that he agreed with what had fallen from his honourable friend the last speaker, and he could not help thinking that the reason given by the House of Representatives was a childish and frivolous one. It seemed to him that the proper and constitutional course would be to bring this matter to a Conference. This reminded him very much of some dissertation he had read some time ago about the reason why a witness should not be allowed to be called against the Crown. The reason was that, by directing a witness to be brought to give evidence against the Crown, the Crown was insulted. It seemed to him that if every question like this was to be considered a question of the privileges of the other House the sooner the position of the Council was defined the better; and the sooner all these matters went to a Conference, upon which they would probably have some of their most experienced men, the better. No doubt they would meet some of the most experienced men in the House of Representatives; and the sooner the matter was threshed out the better. He thought, if the Council negatived this motion, his honourable friend could then move that the matter be referred to a Conference.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY entirely agreed with what had fallen from his honourable friend and colleague. When he formally made the motion, he expected that it would be rejected, and he would have been disappointed if it had not been. He thought the best way to decide the question would be for this Committee of very experienced men to meet with a similar Committee of also experienced men from the other Chamber at a Conference. That would probably settle this question of privilege. Therefore he hoped that his honourable friend would move that the Council adhere to the Bill, and disagree with the other Chamber, and that Managers would be appointed. He hoped no time would be lost.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR hoped the Council would negative the motion before it, and that every member of the Council would see that this was so important a matter that it should be dealt with at once. It simply amounted to this: that they had to ascertain now where they were, and whether the Council was a constituent part of the Government of the country or not.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY had no doubt that the proper way to settle the matter was by a Conference; but the larger question of the privileges of the Council with respect to amending money clauses opened a very much wider question, which a Conference would not settle. Such questions he thought could best be settled by a Joint Committee of both Houses, to decide what were the privileges of the Council, and to make their own precedents, instead of having to look up the precedents of England and other places in these matters when the questions at issue were not exactly parallel. A Committee of that sort could fix the relative positions of both Chambers at the beginning of a session, when people were more inclined to view matters in a judicial spirit, and any agreement come to could then be embodied in a Bill, with the view of narrowing these privilege disputes with the House.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

Motion, "That the Council do not insist on its amendments," negatived.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved, That the same members be appointed to draw up reasons for insisting on the amendments of the Council as were appointed in connection with the Advances to Settlers Bill.

Agreed to.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. BOWEN, the same five members were appointed Managers of a Conference on the Land for Settlements Bill.

Subsequently, the Hon. Mr. BOWEN brought up the following reasons assigned by the Legislative Council for insisting on its amendments in the Government Advances to Settlers Bill:—

"That the Council does not admit that the sections in which amendments have been made deal with supply, aid, or appropriation; and that therefore the Council has not exceeded the legitimate limits of its action."

Reasons agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN also brought up the following reasons assigned by the Legislative Council for insisting on its amendments in the Harbours Bill:—

"Clause 2: That it is not advisable to allow an overdraft over one-half of the ordinary annual income.

"Clause 4: That the striking-out of this clause does not exceed the legitimate functions of the Council.

"Clause 8: That this clause is necessary in the interests of the Harbour Board.

"Clause 9: That this clause is not intended to increase the number of members of the Board.

"Clause 10: That the necessity for this clause is open for discussion."

Reasons agreed to.

Subsequently, a message was received from the House of Representatives requesting a Conference with the House of Representatives on the Harbours Bill and the Government Advances to Settlers Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN moved, That the same honourable members be appointed Managers at the Conference on behalf of the Council as were appointed to draw up the reasons.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I would ask the consent of my honourable and learned friend Mr. MacGregor, and the leave of the Council, to make an explanation with regard to this matter which will probably settle the question. I stated yesterday that any hostile action on the part of this Council would tend to kill this Bill. I thought there was authority for that, but I could not lay my hands on it at the time. In 1892 some similar course to that suggested yesterday took place. I find, on reference to the Journals of the Council, that on the Mining Companies Bill the Council proceeded to the consideration of this amendment proposed by His Excellency the Governor:—

“Notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act, any company now or hereafter incorporated under the said Act may at any time sell all or any part of its property without winding up such company: Provided always that no such sale shall be valid which has not been previously sanctioned by resolution adopted by a majority in number and value of the shareholders of the company present at an extraordinary meeting of the company specially convened for the purpose of considering such resolution: Provided further that no such sale shall take place unless previously authorised by the Warden of the district after such notice to creditors has been given as he shall prescribe, and the objections, if any, to such sale, if any, have been considered by such Warden.”

This was ordered to be considered presently, and on the same date—the 8th October—the Council proceeded to the further consideration of the amendment, with regard to which the following record appears in the Journals:—

“And the question being put, That the said amendment be agreed to, it passed in the negative.”

Then, on the 11th of October, the question was again brought under the consideration of the Council; and on my own motion the Council agreed to an inspection of the Journals of the Council by a Committee appointed by the House of Representatives. The position is this: that, inasmuch as we disagreed with the amendment of the House of Representatives, the Bill was practically laid aside here, and the House sent a Search Committee to examine the Journals of the Council, which, I believe, is the proper course to take. Thereupon the House sent up the Bill in the manner in which it was amended by the Council, and that practically killed the first Bill. So that I was perfectly right in what I stated yesterday. By the amendment which is proposed now it is not intended—and I do not think any one who has read the Bill carefully can say otherwise—in any way to affect the rights of any person other than the rights which he had when he entered the service of the Commissioners. I believe that will be the opinion of every one who carefully reads the Bill. That is all that is asked for in the Bill as it is amended. When it came down first it would rather have tended to injure these people. I am afraid, if this amendment is insisted upon, at least, if it is not intended to agree to this amendment of the Government, that the Bill will practically be lost; and after all the trouble and labour which we have had in the matter it would be a pity to take such a course as that. I say that for this reason: that the usual course would be in another place to send up this Bill by carrying it through all its stages in one day, but in the present state of the House, and the desire there is to get on with other business, I very much question whether this Bill would ever see this Chamber again during the present session. Then we should be probably in a state of great confusion. The notion has got into the minds of some honourable members that justice has not been done to two members of the Railway Commission, whose names have been mentioned from time to time. I have in my hand vouchers and receipts as follow: Mr. Hannay, £715; Mr. Maxwell, £1,246. These are vouchers showing payment in full of all claims against the railway service.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—What is the date?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—The date of the vouchers is the 23rd January, 1894. The audit itself has settled this question, and there are the vouchers. With this explanation I hope the Council will agree to the amendments which the Governor has forwarded to the House of Representatives.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—There seems good reason for thinking that the Attorney-General was correct in the statement which he made yesterday as to the effect that any amendment made by the Council in the Governor's message would have upon the Bill. Apparently the effect would be that the Bill would, as it were, fall between two stools, and that the whole process would have to be gone over again of introducing a new Bill into the House of Representatives with such amendments as might be supposed to meet the views of the Council. The position seems to be this: The Bill as it was passed by the Council was, no doubt, intended to place the servants of the Railway Commissioners in the same position as if they had all along been Civil servants—that is, during the period in which they have been servants of the Commissioners. As was pointed out yesterday by the Hon. Mr. Whyte, the words used are not sufficient to carry out that intention. And the position would be this: that if the Bill were allowed to remain as it now is these servants would be held to be in the same position that they were in before they entered the service of the Commissioners—not the position they are in now after they have served the Commissioners for five or six years. The amendment proposed in the Governor's message is undoubtedly calculated to do these Civil servants more justice than the words of subclause (3), clause 4, would do. But, on the other hand, it seems to me, and, I think, to many other members of the Council, that this amendment does not do such a measure of justice to these servants as should be done for them. Since, however, there seems very good reason for thinking that any amendments to the Governor's message would have the effect, as the Attorney-General says, of killing the Bill, perhaps the best course for the Council to adopt at this late stage of the session would be to accept the Governor's message as it stands. I am bound to say, however, that to my mind the amendment of the Governor does not do justice to these servants, such as they have a right to expect, and, if there is a possibility of a new Bill being brought up from the other House and being passed this session, carrying out the views of the Council in this respect, then I am inclined to think that that would be the best course to adopt; but if that cannot be done there is no doubt that it would be better for the officers themselves that we should accept the amendments of the Governor than to allow the Bill to remain as it now stands.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I think the honourable gentleman might very fairly pledge himself on behalf of the Government that, in the event of its being found in the future that an injustice had been done to these persons, the matter would be rectified next session.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I think that might set at rest the difficulty which there is in reference to the questions. I shall be perfectly satisfied myself if the honourable gentleman will agree to that.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.—I was just about to make the very suggestion which has been made by the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn. As far as I understood the course of debate yesterday, the reference to injustice to certain officers was not as to the claims of two of the Railway Commissioners, but as to some few of the junior officers of the department who were in the Public Works Department, and who were transferred to the Railway Department, and now are going back to the Government. If the honourable gentleman will give such a pledge as has been indicated I think the Council might accept the amendments.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—There is a necessity for an alteration in the Governor's message, and not all on one side. I quite admit that it would be awkward to lay the Bill aside; but it seems to me there is an easy way out of the difficulty by getting a pledge from the Attorney-General that he will bring down another Governor's message amending this if we can decide on what we want, and then we can let the amendment go. The grievances complained of should, in the interests of the railway service, be adjusted. There was an Act passed here which gave compensation of a month's payment for every year's service; but up to the present time I have always been under the idea that this was only given up to twelve months. That was taken from a resolution passed by the Otago Provincial Council. I find, however, on further consideration, it does not stop at twelve months. It is another month's pay for every year's service, no matter how long the service may be.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Is that in the Civil Service Act?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—In the Act of 1887 I find that somehow it slipped through that a man can retire from the service when he pleases, and claim his compensation. I do not think that is a right thing to have in it, and it needs amendment. It would be a good thing if we could come to an agreement as to how to amend the Governor's message, and the Attorney-General could say whether we could let this one pass. I believe, so far as the message is concerned, that it does as much harm as it does good, and it continues that very thing I spoke of, which is not desirable—namely, that every man can resign from the service and claim compensation. I do not think that is a right provision at all. One side desires that we should do justice, and put these men all on the same footing as they were on before the Commissioners were appointed. That is quite right. We are also anxious to get the other point agreed to. I would suggest that we should consider this in Committee, and try to come to a conclusion satisfactory to both sides. This message can only affect, I believe, some three men; and there is a way of getting out of that difficulty, by amending the Bill by striking out subsection (5). That would remove the difficulty with regard to those specially privileged by the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—There is no information before us of the effect of the proposal to amend the Governor's message. I do not think it desirable to delay the Bill. What does the Council know about this case? We do not know how many men are affected. The Government appear to be doing the best they possibly can for those officers who were formerly members of the Civil Service. We do not know who these men are, or the special nature of their alleged grievances. I think, in the meantime, if there are any cases of hardship involved in the change in the management of the railways, they should be remedied by a special measure next session. Justice should be done where required, but we should not give privileges to people not entitled to them.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—Those who were Civil servants before the Railways Act was passed in 1887 came under the Railway Commissioners, and it is now proposed to continue them, but there is no provision for those who entered the service after the railways went into the hands of the Commissioners. If we amended the amendments, and the House agreed to our amendments, the Bill would be carried through. There would be no difficulty about that; but if the Council's amendments are sent down again by the Governor we can have a Conference upon them. We can send down the message with our amendments. I should like to know whether I am right in my contention that we can send down to the House a message with amendments.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—Certainly we can. There is a case in point in an Act passed in 1872, when amendments proposed in a Governor's message were amended in the House, and sent on here. Consequently it can be done, vice versa.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—It was not amended here. The position was that, after amendment was made, a search was made by the other Chamber to find out what became of the Bill. The Bill was practically laid aside here, and they sent up another Bill. That is an entirely different thing from the House amending a Governor's message. Supposing a message came here for the first time, I have no doubt it could be amended, but, it having been sent down to the House, the case was different. I have been asked to give a pledge to honourable members with regard to this matter. I can only say that the Government have every desire to be just, and no desire to do anything but justice, and this section has been framed specially for the purpose of placing these people in a fair position. If there is any expression of opinion to the effect that any injustice has been done to them, I shall urge upon my colleagues that justice should be done, and I am quite sure that it will be. I cannot make any other pledge than that. The Act does not come into operation until next year, and in the meantime things will go on as they are now, so that there is not likely to be any injustice done. If we have any expression to the contrary here, I should be one of the first to remedy the injustice as quickly as possible. I hope the Council will now allow the Bill to pass.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

The Hon. W. DOWDIE STEWART.—We can send a message down to the House, and they can agree to the amendments.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—We cannot amend it.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The Council can amend the Governor's message, and the House can amend it again. Standing Order 319 leaves no doubt about the power of the Council.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—The point was this: After having amended the Bill here, after the assurance I have given to the Council that no injustice shall happen in the meantime, I think the Bill should be allowed to proceed.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I think it would be far better to get the Bill into such a condition as to do justice to those who think they may suffer injustice, and also to look at the other side of the matter. I suggest that we should let the amendment proposed in the message go to Committee. Evidently the amendment proposed in the message does not carry out the object the Government intend. Let it go to Committee, and let them agree, and then let another message be brought down.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—Before putting the question I should like to say this: I think we generally understand that the clause as it now stands does an injustice to a number of men, and that if it does pass it is with the understanding that legislation shall take place next year to remedy that. I have received telegrams from people affected who feel that it would be doing great injustice, and I think we should have a clear understanding that the Bill shall be amended at some future time.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—It is provided that an amendment proposed by a Governor's message should be read a first time, and also a second time. If amended by the Council it is to be forwarded to the House for its concurrence.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I move, That the debate be adjourned, in order to enable honourable members to come to a decision. I have had telegrams from influential people complaining of the injustice done in the department, and I think we should adjourn the debate, and take it up again on Monday.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I trust the adjournment will not take place. I shall not be a party to any such thing. I know there is no intention on the part of the Government to do any injustice. If there is anything required to be done by way of legislation for these people I will do all that I can to set it right.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I do not think we should adjourn the debate. We shall not get any clearer about it. I have sought information from those people best able to give it, and I think the best and fairest thing to do would be to pass the Governor's amendment as it comes to us. The Bill contains far more important matters than a few possible acts of injustice to some of these people, and we have the assurance of the Attorney-General that if any injustice is done the earliest opportunity will be taken to remedy it. I am sure we could not do better than accept the Governor's message.

Motion agreed to.

RATING ON UNIMPROVED VALUE BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I am not going to detain the Council long. I say, theoretically, this Bill is a splendid Bill, but practically I do not think it is wanted in New Zealand. Without saying anything further, I will say I am inclined to vote against it.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—Without following the other arguments in connection with the theories propounded recently, I think from a practical point of view this Bill is not desirable. Let us take the figures given by both sides. There are something like a hundred and twenty-two millions' worth of property which now pays taxation. If this Bill is carried into effect it relieves forty-six and a half millions from paying taxation, and that taxation would be bound to fall on the seventy-six millions: that is looking at the thing from a pounds-shillings-and-pence point of view, which is a very just way to look at it—that is, from the point of view of the ratepayer. I do not think it is desirable that the rates from a hundred and twenty-two millions should fall on the reduced amount of seventy-six and a half millions, especially as the rates on forty-six and a half millions are passed on to those people who are least able to make improvements, and who receive less revenue from improvements. I say, if we are going to relieve these people from taxation, we are imposing a heavy burden upon those men who have not the money to make improvements. We are told that this is to affect unimproved sections. I reply that if these sections were worth the money to induce the people to improve them it would be different. Therefore I shall oppose the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The object of this Bill was to impose what the Government thought fair and reasonable rating. In towns and suburbs the unimproved land has escaped without paying its due share of rates. Take an instance where a man has bought a section worth £100, and has put a building upon it, and another man has bought a section adjoining worth £100, but has spent nothing upon it—very probably is not living in the country, and has not paid anything to the general taxation. Under present circumstances the latter's property, through the improvements made by those who have occupied their sections beneficially for themselves and for the country, has risen to be worth perhaps £2,000. I myself have known instances of that. The question is, Should this land which has been held for speculative purposes escape necessary taxation? It is held that this man should either have occupied this land himself or sold it to others who would have improved it. It is very evident that men who bought land many years ago are now absentees, and have no right to escape fair taxation. It has been said that this Bill would force these men either to improve or to sell their land. That is not the object of the Bill, but if this result flows from it I think it would be a good one. If those people who own land unoccupied in towns and suburbs would either sell it or improve it they would be doing good. Honourable members will remember what action I took on a similar Bill to this last year. My honourable friend Mr. McLean said, I think, last year that the Bill then before the Council obliged the rates to be levied on unimproved lands, and he added, "Why not allow the people in the localities to decide themselves?" Well, this Bill exactly does that. It does not say that they must rate on the unimproved value and in no other way, but it says that the matter shall be left to the ratepayers. And I would draw the attention of the Council to the fact that it does not give power to a mere majority of the ratepayers in town districts to alone settle the question. I trust the Council will allow this Bill to go into Committee, and will not reject the second reading. With these remarks, I say again, I think the Bill is a good and necessary one, as it allows the people themselves to decide the matter of rating, and I think it is an injustice that they should not be allowed to do so.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question."

AYES, 12.

Barnicoat	Kelly	Montgomery
Bolt	Kerr	Rigg
Buckley	MacGregor	Stewart
Feldwick	McCullough	Whitmore.

NOES, 14.

Acland	Oliver	Stevens
Bonar	Ormond	Swanson
Bowen	Peacock	Walker, L.
Dignan	Pharazyn	Williams.
McLean	Richardson

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Jenkinson	Reynolds
Jennings.	Shrimski.

Majority against, 2.

Amendment, "That the Bill be read the second time this day six months," agreed to.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. FELDWICK wished to explain that in Hansard of the 25th September he was represented as having paired with the Hon. Mr. McLean against the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill, whereas he had paired in favour of it.

The Council adjourned at ten minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 12th October, 1894.

First Reading—Ballance Monument—San Francisco Mail-service—Railway Bridges—Harbours Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Unclaimed Lands Bill—Sea-fisheries Bill—Workmen's Wages Bill—Public Works Statement—Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Post and Telegraph Department Bill.

BALLANCE MONUMENT.

Mr. SEDDON said a request had been made to the Government by the Ballance Memorial Committee that their monument to the memory of the late Hon. J. Ballance might be placed in the parliamentary grounds. While, personally, he was desirous of paying every honour that could be paid to the memory of his late chief—and he felt that in saying this he was also speaking for members of both branches of the Legislature, who desired to do his memory that honour which was its due—he could not take upon himself the responsibility of saying that the monument should be placed in the parliamentary grounds. It was a matter which should be decided by the House Committee, which was representative of both Chambers. That was the best Committee to deal with the matter, and he therefore moved the resolution.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the request of the Ballance Memorial Committee, with reference to the erection of the Ballance monument in the Parliamentary grounds, be referred for consideration by the Joint House Committee."—(Mr. Seddon.)

Mr. REEVES had only one word to say on this matter, and he most sincerely trusted that the House Committee, when it considered the question, would take the advice of some competent artistic critic or critics as to the character of the monument that it was proposed to erect, before deciding whether it should be placed in the parliamentary grounds. He was not prepared to give a description of the monument, but he might say it was not a statue. If a well-deserved honour was to be paid to any of our statesmen by a monument to their memory being placed in the grounds of the Parliament Buildings for ever, the Committee should, before granting permission, see that the work was one which would satisfy the artistic sense of all beholders. He did not think the matter was at all an unimportant one, and he sincerely trusted the House Committee would accept the suggestion he had made.

Captain RUSSELL cordially agreed with everything the Minister of Education had said upon this matter. It was one of very great importance, and they should see to it that only a statue or monument of a remarkable character should be placed in the parliamentary grounds; and unless they knew what the monument was to be they would be very unwise to give their consent to place it in any position in which it might not do credit to its surroundings.

Sir R. STOUT thought it would have been far better to have a resolution come to by the House, without referring it to the House Committee, as he did not know what qualification the Joint Committee had with regard to judging as to the artistic character of a monument. It also seemed to him that it was not likely the design, having been accepted, could now be altered. It seemed to him like an indication to the House Committee to throw the resolution out, and he therefore regretted that a motion had not been moved that the permission of this House should be given to the monument being erected, a similar motion to be made in the Legislative Council.

Mr. SEDDON said his only object in putting the motion was that both branches of the Legislature might have an opportunity of obtaining evidence on the matter, and when the report came down both Houses would have an opportunity of passing a resolution in accordance with the nature of the report. His desire was that they should obtain evidence as to the nature of the monument, and that they should see that it was such a one as would do honour to all concerned.

Motion agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO MAIL-SERVICE.

12.0. The House went into Committee of the whole to consider resolutions relating to the San Francisco mail-service.

Mr. WARD moved the following resolutions:—

1. That this House empowers the Government to arrange for a renewal of the San Francisco mail-service for a period of three years.

2. That the basis of the payment for conveyance of mails from New Zealand shall be at a rate of 11s. per pound on the net weight of the letters conveyed.

3. That all payments or contributions from Great Britain or other countries shall be receivable by the contractors, the colony's direct liability to be for payment of its outward letters only.

4. That at least one New Zealand steamer in three shall be employed.

5. That the time between San Francisco and New Zealand shall not exceed twenty days. The port of call in the colony to be Auckland or Wellington, at the option of the contractors. No bonus to be paid for early arrival, and penalties, at the rate of £4 an hour, to be enforced only when late delivery exceeds forty-eight hours.

6. That all the provisions of the existing agreement, where not at variance with the foregoing provisions, shall be applicable to any new contract made under this authority.

He would like to inform the House what the position of this matter was. The proposals now submitted were almost identical with the resolutions passed by the House in 1891. The only difference was that in the present case the contractors were not fixed. In the last case the resolutions were to the effect that arrangements should be entered into with the existing contractors for the renewal of the service on the terms named in the resolutions; but, as he had said, in the present case no contractors were named. He might say that negotiations would be opened up with the existing contractors, but it was thought desirable that no contractors should be named in the resolutions. He merely wished to point out to the House that of late the service had been conducted on entirely different lines from what it formerly obtained. Payments were now made upon the actual mail-matter carried. He might inform the House that the total net cost to the colony last year of the service between San Francisco and New Zealand was £7,929. The contribution by the United States amounted to £12,000, and that was the highest amount they were permitted by law to pay. The average time by the service from Auckland to London last year was 33-15 days, and from London 33-28 days. It was the fastest service, both ways, that the colony was able to obtain. The service was being conducted, so far as this colony was concerned, strictly on business lines. They paid only on what was carried. If the amount of matter carried happened to fall off, the amount of payment would be reduced accordingly. The Intercolonial Postal Conference, which recently met at Wellington, passed a resolution unanimously, stating that it was desirable to continue this service. In the ordinary course the other colonies would contribute to the service, as they had done formerly, for the mail-matter carried on their behalf—except New South Wales, which made a fixed payment of £4,000 a year. There was no bonus allowed for early delivery of mails, and it was provided that a fine of £4 per hour should be imposed in the case of the boats being forty-eight hours or more beyond contract time. He might state that the service could be materially hastened provided that a better class of steamers was put on between San Francisco and New Zealand. But, from information which he had obtained, he would further add that a factor service could only be obtained by making a contract for a much longer period than that proposed in these resolutions, and increasing the amount now proposed to be paid. It was improbable, therefore, that a better class of steamers would be obtained for some time to come. If there was any point in regard to which the House required further information he would be very glad to furnish it. He begged to move the resolutions standing in his name.

Mr. DUTHIE said the proposals were fairly satisfactory, except in regard to one point, and that was as to the allowance of forty-eight hours before a fine could be imposed. It appeared to him that that was the weak point of this service. Our mails were despatched from here, and they occasionally reached San Francisco a day late, and thereby missed the fast steamers running across the Atlantic, and were transmitted from the United States to England by slower steamers, thus causing a delay of three or four days. He regarded it as important that the time allowed, of forty-eight hours, should be reduced to, say, twenty-four. Some set-off might probably be offered, but he felt sure that forty-eight hours was too long. He hoped the Postmaster-General would consider that, as it was important that our mails should reach England with regularity; and he did not think it would add to the cost of the service if his suggestion were adopted.

Dr. NEWMAN said that by this system of having a private contract with one particular firm all other firms were excluded from competing. In the past, from time to time, the old contract had been renewed on practically the same conditions. In regard to obtaining faster and better steamers, he might point out that all over the world new steamers and faster arrangements were being made. Faster services were being run between New York and England, and also the mails were now carried faster across the American continent. Was no effort to be made to improve the speed on this side? The ocean-going steamers were now travelling quicker and quicker, but here for some years to come they were to have just the same arrangements as to speed continued. That seemed to him to be an utterly stagnant position, and one which the House ought not to tolerate. If the honourable gentleman was sure that no contract for a faster time could be taken up on a three-years' contract, then they should lengthen the time to, say, five years, if necessary, in order to get a good service. Constant complaints were made that the run between here and San Francisco was slow, and that the boats were second-class. Surely, with the amount of subscription given by the different colonies, and the large amount of trade there was, they ought to be able to secure a better service. He might point out that, if the United States put wool on the free list, in all probability a larger amount of cargo would be taken from New Zealand, and therefore there would be a greater encouragement to put on new boats. There was a further point which he thought was very unsatisfactory. There were various ocean-going companies who were willing to compete, but they could not compete under the conditions now proposed. It was practically making an arrangement with one firm, and one firm only, and renewing that arrangement from time to time. They should consider the rival companies running between New Zealand and England, and arrange for the cheapening of the fares and the quickening of the time. This had been produced by allowing the different companies to compete. Then, there had been a cheapening of the fares along the New Zealand coast, and from here to Australia, owing to the same reason. Why should not these other companies have a chance of competing for the Frisco service? The resolutions which had been brought down were old-fashioned and unbusinesslike, and the honourable gentleman ought to take them back and amend them. While this question was before the House—and he supposed this was the only chance he would have of asking the question—he would like to ask the Minister whether there was any chance of this colony sharing in any contract between here and Vancouver. It seemed to him to be very important that there should be some communication between here and Vancouver, and that an opening should be made for our produce in the Canadian market.

Mr. Ward

Captain RUSSELL said the last part of the honourable gentleman's speech seemed to him to be the really important part. He could not help asking himself why we should enter into a new contract for three years in face of the possibility of a great change in the mail-services between Great Britain and the colonies owing to the opening of the Vancouver route. Why should not we continue the old arrangement of renewing the present service from year to year? For his own part, he attached no importance to the trade of Canada or the United States by way of the Pacific route. They ought to have, it seemed to him, a faster mail-service than they had got. It was useless to suppose, notwithstanding a change in the American tariff, that there would be a considerable increase in the amount of wool and other articles sent by the Pacific route and carried across the continent to the Eastern States, where the manufacturers were. He would like to see this mail-service renewed for a year only, with the express object of trying to enter into an arrangement for a Vancouver service, and with the object of trying to materially quicken the service which we had at present. It appeared to him that to tie ourselves up for three years to the old arrangements was not so satisfactory as it ought to be.

Mr. PIRANI would like to ask the Treasurer whether he would accept an amendment to make Wellington the port of call.

Mr. WARD said he was in favour of adhering to the resolutions as they were framed, leaving the option to the contractors.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought the Government were not justified in entering into a three years' contract to carry on the service as it stood at present. He had travelled several times by the San Francisco route, and had a thorough knowledge of all the surrounding circumstances; and he said emphatically that, as to the comfort of the passengers, as to the speed of the service, and as to the class of boats, they were not what we had a right to expect for the money asked. He therefore thoroughly indorsed the opinion of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, that the contract should not exceed one year. The colony was entitled to a much better return for its money than was made under the present contract. He had no hesitation in saying that just complaints had been made as to the accommodation provided for steerage passengers. He himself had been a witness to the lack of accommodation for and the treatment of steerage passengers on board these boats—a condition of affairs which would not be tolerated on any of our direct services. It was not at all a creditable condition of affairs, and the Government should look into this matter. He therefore thought they should curtail the period of the contract to one year, and in the meantime make arrangements under which they could get a much better passenger- and mail-service.

Mr. MILLAR would like to call the Minister's attention to two clauses which he thought ought to be introduced into the contract. The first was that we ought to make provision that the successful contractor should employ none but European labour on these vessels. At one time Chinese firemen were carried, and the same thing might occur again unless a clause was put in the contract compelling them to carry none but European labour.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They are not doing that now.

Mr. MILLAR said, Yes; there was a dispute over that, and a similar thing might occur again, unless provision was made against its occurring. There was another suggestion which he would make—namely, whether a clause should not be placed in the contract compelling the contractors to pay the ruling rate of wages existing in New Zealand. The system of placing such a condition in contracts had been adopted by the London County Council and other important public bodies, and he thought it would be well to put a similar clause in this contract. That ought to be specified, at least in the case of the New Zealand steamer employed in the trade. That steamer was the one of the three which paid the lowest rate of wages. The other two steamers were paying £2 per month more than the New Zealand company was paying their men; but, in justice to the New Zealand company, he would add that they kept on their men when the boat was at San Francisco, while the other boats discharged theirs. He thought the rate of wages—whatever that might be—existing in New Zealand ought to be the rate of wages paid by the contractors. He would ask the Colonial Treasurer whether he would not put clauses in the contract to meet the objections he had raised.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said that if the service was going to be a success the accommodation would have to be very considerably improved, as the accommodation on some of the boats was much inferior to that on the coastal service in this colony. As regarded the suggestion by the honourable member for Chalmers with reference to wages, he did not think that we could very well insist on the contractors for the service paying a similar rate of wages to that existing in this colony. He supposed the Spreckels Company must have a very large fleet of boats, and it was hardly likely that they could make an exception in regard to the two vessels engaged in the New Zealand trade. The honourable member who had just spoken appeared to think that the Union Company paid less than the American company, and, if that were the case, it would appear that his suggestion went in the direction of asking that the wages paid on the American boats should be reduced to the level of those paid in New Zealand. He did not think that they could very well insist on an arrangement of this kind.

Mr. WILSON asked the Postmaster-General if he could not improve the direct service considerably. At present mail-steamers came in sometimes two or three a week, and then there was no arrival for two or three weeks. It was a great pity that some other arrangement could not be made by which they could have a fortnightly service. In Melbourne they had a mail every week now.

Sir R. STOUT thought the resolution should be amended so as to give the Government a free hand in dealing with the mail-services, and he did not think San Francisco should be fixed as the terminus. He thought, if possible, they should arrange to have a service to Vancouver. They should encourage trade to Canada. There was no chance whatever of any trade with the United States, but we could export considerably to Canada, and receive considerable imports from there, and create some trade between the two countries. At all events, as far as creating a trade with America was concerned, there was no chance of that; but on the contrary, we were injuring our trade by this subsidised service, for we were thereby allowing San Francisco to take away a great deal of our island trade. The boats called at Samoa, and by doing so the Americans got a Samoan trade, through our subsidy. He suggested that the honourable member should strike out the words "a renewal of the San Francisco mail-service," and insert instead the words "a mail-service with North America." If this were attained the Government would have a free hand, and they could open up a connection with Canada. He understood, from what took place at the Intercolonial Postal Conference, that encouragement was to be given to the Canadian service; and he thought tenders should be invited, to see what could be arranged between Canada and New Zealand. He always had held that a mail-service should be maintained between Canada and New Zealand, and he still held that very strongly, as it would be the means of establishing a trade with Canada, which would be very much better than having a service by the United States, which did nothing to encourage a trade with us. He had only one remark more, and that was with regard to the steamers at present employed. They might not be swift steamers, but he had made the passage part of the way by the "Mariposa," and everything that could be done for the passengers was done. He had also travelled in the "Monowai," which was also a good boat; and he did not think any person could wish for better accommodation than was offered in the present service. He might say that nine years ago he had been in communication with the Premier of Canada, the late Sir John Macdonald, in reference to encouraging trade with Canada. Nothing came of it then: and they had not yet had the official report of what had taken place in the recent Conference at Ottawa. The mere fact of this colony sending a delegate to that Conference showed that they were desirous of establishing some trade relations with Canada, and here there was a chance of showing their sincerity. If they really wished to open up such a trade, why not see if they could get steam-communication with Canada? It seemed a waste of money to send a representative to Ottawa, and now, when the opportunity arose, do nothing to foster and encourage trade relations. He believed, so far as Canada was concerned, there was a very strong and warm feeling towards the Australasian Colonies in Canada, and from letters he had received he knew there was a very strong feeling for a closer alliance between the Australasian Colonies and the North American Colonies of the Empire, and he did hope the House would do everything it could to encourage it. That was really the way to lead up to a federation between the various colonies of the Empire. He had no wish to discourage the employment of New Zealand steamers. He thought, if they had steamers owned in New Zealand able to take any part of the service, it was their duty to protect their own steamers and encourage their employment. The matter could easily be arranged, in all probability, between the owners of the Union Company and the directors of a Canadian service. He asked the honourable gentleman to agree to his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the honourable the senior member for Wellington City had stated that he had travelled by the "Mariposa," and the accommodation and the treatment of the passengers apparently met with his approval. He would, however, recollect that the saloon cabins extended nearly to the stern of the vessel, and that the second- and third-class passengers were cooped up in a very small deck-area over the screw, with scant room or shelter. He agreed with the honourable gentleman that something should be done with regard to encouraging trade with Vancouver; but the honourable gentleman did not refer to the difficulty of getting that communication except by branch boat. He, for one, would be totally opposed to any contract which involved that.

Mr. WARD wished to point out to the
Sir R. Stout

House what was the position of this matter. Honourable members appeared to overlook the circumstances in which they were placed, and he wished the House to understand what the effect of their vote would be. If this colony were the only party to the contract, as far as the contract to San Francisco was concerned, the proposal of the senior member for Wellington City would be all right. But New Zealand only contributed about a quarter of the cost of the service—in fact, not a quarter—and that being so he would see they could not control the whole of the conditions of contract, nor say how the service was to be carried on, without having the assistance and assent of the other parties to the contract. New South Wales contributed £4,000, and Great Britain in round numbers £5,000, the United States £12,000, and New Zealand contributed last year £7,814. The position was this: Honourable members appeared to overlook the fact that New South Wales was a party to the San Francisco contract, as well as New Zealand. That colony had also entered into a contract for three years for a service between New South Wales and Vancouver. The Government had offered, on behalf of this colony, to give a contribution of £10,000 a year for a service viâ Vancouver, and the delegate who represented the colony at Ottawa was authorised to offer, if necessary, more than 12.30. that in order to obtain such a service. He wished to point out that they were not going to obtain the Vancouver service by knocking the San Francisco service on the head. The object of the colony ought to be, instead of having merely a monthly service viâ San Francisco, to have a fortnightly alternative service between New Zealand and Vancouver and San Francisco; and, instead of destroying the San Francisco service, the object ought rather to be to add another string to our bow and have a fortnightly service alternating with San Francisco and Vancouver. The amendment of the honourable member, he was sure, would not do what he wanted; it would not improve the matter at all. In the first place, it would be impossible to do what the honourable member suggested. There was now only eighteen days to run before the contract for the San Francisco service expired. They had to renew the contract for the service, and, if the amendment were carried, it would be impossible to obtain a service viâ Vancouver in one month or two months. Under these circumstances, the colony would not be justified in relinquishing the service with the United States of America, more especially when, owing to the remission of the duty on wool in that country, there never was a time when it was more essential to encourage this service than now. Formerly, when the high tariffs of the United States were against us, in his opinion the system that obtained of fixed payment of a very large subsidy for the maintenance of the San Francisco service was quite unnecessary; but the system of payment had now been entirely changed, and he thought the connection should, on the moderate payments now made, be maintained. And, while honourable members were anxious to obtain a better service, he wished to point out to the honourable member for Otaki especially that there was now a weekly service between this colony and England by the Federal route.

Mr. WILSON said it was intermittent.

Mr. WARD admitted it was intermittent. And if they were to subsidise a service by the eastern route which was not to be intermittent, the colony would have to contribute £25,000 a year more at the very lowest estimate. They had an estimate of the full position. It would cost over £19,000 a year from Australia to London and from London to Australia, and the cost of the service between here and Australia would be about £8,000, making £27,000; so that it would, at the lowest, cost not less than £25,000 a year. Our difficulty was this: If we wanted to maintain this San Francisco service it would only cost us about £8,000 a year, but we must have the co-operation of the United States, with its contribution of £12,000 a year, and the co-operation of New South Wales and the other colonies. Well, if we now decided to abandon the service and afterwards wished to resume it, seeing that the other colonies had already got the Vancouver service, New Zealand would have to maintain the San Francisco service alone. He asked the House to remember that when considering the matter. There was another point raised by the honourable member for Chalmers, about European crews being carried on mail-steamers. He agreed with the honourable gentleman, but our difficulty was—the Union Company's steamers, of course, did not carry any but European crews—that by the terms of the contract such a condition as the honourable gentleman desired could not be imposed, as the other party carrying on the contract was outside the colony, and our contribution to the service was not large enough to justify more than the provision that at least one New Zealand steamer in three should be employed. Consequently, while the Government were anxious to put in such a desirable condition, we had to fully recognise the peculiar circumstances in which we were placed. He disagreed with the opinion of the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs. He (Mr. Ward) said that, if they were going to enter into the service for the first time, he himself would be very sorry to agree to any subsidy being paid except to steamers that were locally owned. If they were going to pay large sums of money, it was surely bad policy that outside liners should receive heavy subsidies from the colony. He would prefer to pay these moneys to steamers that were locally owned.

An Hon. MEMBER.—None of these steamers is locally owned.

Mr. WARD said he meant by "locally owned" those that were employing local people, and steamers that spent the bulk of their money in the colony, as was the case with the Union Company. He thought this was calculated to do more good than to allow the money to go out of the colony. He held that the service should only be obtained by a reasonable contribution being paid, and having got a service for a subsidy which, calculated at the weight of the mail-matter carried, amounted to less than £8,000 a year, he considered it was a very cheap service. He was sorry that he could not meet the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) in his suggestion for the reduction of the limit of forty-eight hours after which the penalties for late delivery were to be enforced. The steamers were sometimes thirty-six hours over the time now, and, as the colony allowed nothing in the way of bonus for arriving before contract date, it would not be fair, when they were not giving this bonus, to mulct them for being a little over the time. Unavoidable accidents sometimes happened. One of the steamers recently broke down and was consequently late; but the risks of missing the steamers, to which the honourable gentleman referred, were very few. In the case of a breakdown it was unavoidable. The object of arriving at San Francisco on the fixed date was, of course, to enable connection to be made with the fast steamers between New York and Liverpool, and they generally were caught. Unless we were prepared to offer some inducement for the steamers to arrive before their due time we must allow them some latitude when they arrived late.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the resolution."

AYES, 47.

Buddo	Lang	Morrison
Buick	Larnach	O'Regan
Button	Lawry	O'Rorke
Cadman	Mackenzie, T.	Parata
Carnocross	Mackintosh	Reeves
Carnell	Maslin	Saunders
Carroll	Massey	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGuire	Stevens
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Duthie	McKenzie, R.	Thompson
Graham	McLachlan	Ward
Hall-Jones	McNab	Willis.
Harris	Meredith	Tellers.
Houston	Millar	Mills
Kelly, W.	Mitchelson	Pinkerton.

NOES, 16.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Russell, W. R.
Bell	Joyce	Wilson.
Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.
Flatman	Newman	Tellers.
Green	Pirani	Earnshaw
Hutchison, G.	Russell, G. W.	Stout.
Majority for 31.

Words retained.

Captain RUSSELL moved, That the word "three," in the first resolution, be struck out, with the view of substituting "one." He did not do this in a spirit of factious opposition, but they knew perfectly well that the service would go on quite as well whether they entered into arrangements for one or for three years. There could be no doubt that the competition between the San Francisco and Vancouver services would increase, and it stood to reason that the colony was likely to get better terms at the end of a year than it could get now, and the San Francisco service would go on in identically the same way whether the term was for one or for three years. Therefore he moved that the "three" be struck out.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked whether or not, seeing the present arrangement expired in eighteen days, the Postmaster-General had not virtually made this contract and was now asking the House to formally ratify it.

Mr. WARD, in reply to the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, said that honourable gentleman, when he spoke of better terms being arranged for at the end of a year, had overlooked the fact that the colony was not now paying a subsidy at all. It was simply paying 11s. a pound on the mail-matter carried. The colony could not enter into a contract for a year. Spreckels and the Union Company held that the contribution was too low now, and they asked for a contract extending over a greater number of years than was specified in the resolutions. If one year's contract was stipulated for, the probability was there would be no service at all.

Dr. NEWMAN said it was generally the case with contractors that if a contract was offered to them, and they were asked to take it or leave it, they generally took it, and he believed that would be the case if the contract were limited to one year.

Mr. WARD said, if the honourable member for Patea inferred that he had entered into an arrangement, and now wanted Parliament simply to ratify it, he might say that there was no such arrangement in existence, either implied or otherwise.

Mr. DUTHIE thought an arrangement for one year would be sufficient. The time-table arrangements of the San Francisco service were very bad indeed, and in the case of Wellington it took nearly three weeks before replies could be sent to letters received by that service. It was not advisable for the colony to tie itself up by a three years' engagement, and he hoped the amendment to reduce the term to one year would be carried.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON would point out how unbusinesslike the Postmaster-General had been in this matter in leaving it over until within eighteen days of the expiration of the contract. He could not suppose that even if they refused to give a three years' contract the steamers would cease running, but, so as not to bind the colony to a contract for three years if a lesser period could be arranged, he would suggest that the clause should read as giving the Government discretion to arrange for a period not exceeding three years. The service was highly unsatisfactory. It was the worst in the world. In fact, one might say it was not up to date in any one particular.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman's ideas of business and his own were different. The House might depend upon it that the whole business would be carried out in a businesslike way, and next year, if it were found that he had not carried it out in a businesslike way, he of course would have to stand the consequences. The eighteen days were quite ample to settle this or many other important matters. It did not take a year to do these things, because nowadays they went on faster than formerly. He might say that the contractors absolutely refused before to enter into a three years' contract. They wanted a longer time, and they had asked for a longer term now. He was not quite sure that they would agree even for three years. As to the statement of the honourable member for Patea that the service was not quite up to date, the honourable gentleman overlooked the fact that this service was a very cheap one. The services to the Australian Colonies cost £170,000 a year, and in New Zealand they only paid £7,900 for last year's. Originally the colony paid by year a fixed subsidy of £57,000, when really there was no justification for it.

Mr. BUCHANAN pointed out that the Peninsular and Oriental service to Australia was a weekly one, and their steamers ran 370 miles a day, whilst the "Mariposa" ran only 313.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman was incorrect. The Peninsula and Oriental service was a fortnightly one. If they liked to have a service such as that, and steamers running 370 miles a day, then the colony would have to pay at least £100,000 a year for it.

Sir R. STOUT said he would vote for the one year, in the hope that something would be done for the Canadian service. He strongly urged that this service ought to be encouraged. A branch service from Honolulu would be quite ample for those who wished to go from here to San Francisco. There were steamers running fortnightly between Honolulu and San Francisco, and he did not see why an effort should not be made to connect New Zealand with the Vancouver service. If the Vancouver steamers were timed to arrive at Honolulu at the same time as the San Francisco steamers, then those who chose to go via Canada instead of San Francisco could do so.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON was afraid the amendment of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay would not be carried, and he therefore begged to move, as an antecedent amendment, That the words "not exceeding" be inserted before "three years." Possibly the Postmaster-General would be able to make arrangements for a less extensive period than three years.

Mr. WARD said he would accept the honourable gentleman's amendment.

Words "not exceeding" inserted.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words 'three years' stand part of the resolution."

AYES, 42.

Buddo	Carroll	Graham
Button	Collins	Harris
Cadman	Crowther	Hogg
Carncross	Duncan	Houston
Carnell	Earnshaw	Kelly, W.

Captain Russell

Lang	Meredith	Saunders
Larnach	Millar	Seddon
Lawry	Mitchelson	Tanner
Mackintosh	Montgomery	Thompson
Massey	Morrison	Ward
McGowan	O'Rorke	Willis.
McGuire	Pinkerton	Tellers.
McKenzie, J.	Pirani	Mills
McKenzie, R.	Reeves	Smith, E. M.
McLachlan

NOES, 17.

Allen	Hutchison, G.	Russell, W. R.
Bell	Hutchison, W.	Stout
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Wilson.
Duthie	McNab	Tellers.
Fraser	Newman	Buchanan
Green	Russell, G. W.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 25.

Words retained, and resolution as amended agreed to.

2.80. Resolutions 2 and 3 agreed to.

On the question, That Resolution 4 be agreed to,

Captain RUSSELL said he should like to know why they should be compelled to effect an arrangement with a New Zealand steamer. He could not see any reason for it, and would move that Resolution 4 be struck out.

Mr. WARD said the American law was that a subsidy was not to be given unless it was to American vessels. Here the proposal was that one of the three vessels should be New-Zealand-owned. Unless the £12,000 a year paid by the United States was continued the service would drop.

Captain RUSSELL said he understood that quite clearly, but the assumption seemed to be, in reading this resolution, that there was going to be some benefit. Seeing that New Zealand was only a port of call, that the termini were in San Francisco and Australia, and that we had no New-Zealand-owned steamers in this business, he could not see any necessity for the clause at all. They would derive no real benefit from it, and were hampering themselves in a negotiation they wished to enter into.

The Committee divided on the question, "That Resolution 4 be agreed to."

AYES, 37.

Buddo	Larnach	Pinkerton
Carnell	Maslin	Pirani
Crowther	McGowan	Russell, G. W.
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Flatman	McLachlan	Steward
Graham	McNab	Tanner
Heke	Meredith	Thompson
Hogg	Mitchelson	Ward
Houston	Montgomery	Willis.
Joyce	Morrison
Kelly, J. W.	O'Regan	Tellers.
Kelly, W.	O'Rorke	Lawry
Lang	Parata	Mills.

NOES, 10.

Bell	Hutchison, G.	Tellers.
Buchanan	Massey	Newman
Button	McGuire	Wilson.
Green	Russell, W. R.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Hall	Te Ao
Seddon	Duthie
Smith, E. M.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 27.

Resolution agreed to.

On the question, That Resolution 5 be agreed to,

Mr. PIRANI proposed to amend this by striking out the words "Auckland or" and the words "at the option of the contractor," with the view of having Wellington as the port of call.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON would like to refer to the undue length of time allowed for the passage between Auckland and San Francisco—eighteen days. It was monstrous that they should be bound to the same time as under the old contract made three years ago, seeing that every other service was advancing in speed. The last contract entered into by New South Wales with reference to the Pacific service, via Vancouver,—a much longer route,—was for twenty days from Sydney, including a day's detention at Honolulu. He was rather surprised at the moderation of this contract, in allowing an alternative between Auckland and Wellington as the port of call in the colony: he wondered that Dunedin was not insisted on, that being the head-quarters of the Union Company.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked if it was within the knowledge of the Treasurer that the so-called New Zealand steamer to be employed was one that was now being built for the Union Company, and that the "Monowai," being too slow, was to be put into the New Zealand trade. With the new steamer they could easily give the increased speed which was so much required, and the present slow time was therefore to be retained for the benefit of the American steamers.

Mr. WARD could assure the honourable gentleman that he had heard nothing of this. He understood that the "Monowai" was the steamer that was to continue running.

Captain RUSSELL did not suppose the Auckland members would feel aggrieved at the amendment. The matter was one for the consideration of the whole colony, and not a mere question of Auckland versus Wellington. The fact remained that, unfortunately, Auckland was cut off, so far as railway-communication was concerned, from the rest of the colony, and he was afraid would remain so for the next five years—at any rate, for the next three. The San Francisco mail arrived at Auckland on the previous day, and was due in Wellington at ten o'clock p.m. that day, but that was dependent entirely upon the winds and waves affecting the Manukau bar, and the difficulties of coastal navigation; whereas if the mail came to Wellington direct, which was not much further than Auckland, there could be steamers here which would deliver the mail in the South Island, on both east and west coasts, within a few hours of its arrival, and, by means of railway-communication, the whole of the southern portion of the North Island would receive their mail about thirty-six hours before they received it after delivery of the mail at Auckland. It might be said that the company was very anxious to go to Auckland; but they need not consider that. What they ought to look at was, how they could most easily distribute the letters in the least possible time after their arrival in the North Island. For years and years they had suffered from the fact of the mail being delivered at Auckland, and the great bulk of the population of the colony had not received its mail in consequence for at least twenty-four or thirty-six hours later than it should have been after the arrival of the mail in the colony. It was not a question as between the two places, but what was best for the whole colony, and there could be no doubt that a central port, from which letters could be distributed north, south, east, and west, was the proper place for the mail to arrive at. That being the case, Wellington was the proper place for the first port of arrival.

Mr. LAWRY thought the honourable member for Hawke's Bay had made a most illogical speech, as he ignored the fact that time was the essence in a contract, and why had he not told the Committee that it would take nearly twenty-four hours longer for steamers to come to Wellington than to go to Auckland from Frisco?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. LAWRY.—Well, the honourable gentleman was illogical in the statement he made that the steamers might be detained by wind and weather on the voyage to Auckland, when that might apply to Wellington also. The centralisation of everything in Wellington had been, in his opinion, a curse to the whole colony, and ever since he had occupied a seat in the House he had opposed it; and he also considered that if the City of Wellington were disfranchised, as was the case with regard to Washington, United States, and if not a single Wellington member held a seat in the House, it would be very much better in the interests of the colony.

The CHAIRMAN said the honourable gentleman was travelling wide of the question.

Mr. LAWRY understood that there were a section of members of that House who were opposed to the Union Company, and he had heard it stated in the lobbies that every man who voted against the proposal of the Colonial Treasurer was voting against a gentleman who held a seat in another place. With regard to the question of mail-services, he was prepared to support any proposal that would give New Zealand the best mail-service available, and that could only be accomplished by making Auckland the port of call. He had on many occasions voted against the interests of his constituents, believing certain proposals were prejudicial to the interests of the whole colony, and he took the same view in connection with the mail-services. Every time this question of the mail-service cropped up there was a phalanx of Wellington members, supported by the leader of the Opposition, who were opposed to making Auckland the port of call; and he would like the whole country to know the position the leader of the Opposition had taken up in the matter, and, so far as Auckland was concerned, he would like it to remember the attitude taken up by the honourable gentleman who aspired to occupy the position of Premier of the colony. He did not think that Auckland was likely to overlook or to forget it.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE would like to ask if the honourable member for Parnell wished to make this a fight of Auckland versus the rest of the colony, because the honourable gentleman had made a speech calculated to do that, and calculated to cause his (Mr. Mackenzie's) side of the House to resent his remarks against the leader of the Opposition. He himself would not be a party to giving a block vote against Auckland in this matter. They had feelings of liberty and justice on this side of the House, and were not going to be cajoled by one man or browbeaten and intimidated by another. They intended to be very open on the matter, and would not allow the speech of the honourable gentleman to influence their votes.

Mr. BELL said he proposed to vote against the amendment of the honourable member for Palmerston, but he had been almost persuaded to vote for it by the speech of the honourable member for Parnell.

Sir R. STOUT thought the resolution should stand as it appeared on the Order Paper, and he considered it a great pity that this wretched feeling of Auckland versus Wellington should be introduced into the discussion. He did not think that any change should be made in the resolution, as the contractors, if they thought it best, could select Wellington as the port of call.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words 'Auckland or' stand part of the resolution."

AYES, 51.

Allen	Hogg	Montgomery
Bell	Houston	Morrison
Buddo	Hutchison, G.	O'Regan
Buick	Joyce	O'Rorke
Button	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Cadman	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carnell	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carroll	Maslin	Steward
Crowther	Massey	Stout
Duncan	McGowan	Tanner
Earnshaw	McGuire	Thompson
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Ward
Fraser	McKenzie, R.	Willis.
Graham	McNab	Tellers.
Green	Meredith	Lawry
Harris	Mitchelson	Mills.
Heke

NOES, 10.

Buchanan	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Newman	Pirani
Kelly, J. W.	Parata	Wilson.
Larnach	Russell, W. R.

Captain Russell

PAIRS.
For.	Against.
Hall	Duthie
Smith, E. M.	Te Ao.

Majority for, 41.

Words retained, and amendment negatived.

3.0. Captain RUSSELL moved to strike out "forty-eight hours," in paragraph 5, with a view of inserting "twenty-four hours." He thought the House should consent to that, because, if the steamers were allowed to arrive forty-eight hours late without a penalty, it would be a distinct inducement to them to come at a slower pace, and if there were no penalty there would be no incentive to a speedy delivery of the mails. As it was objected, quite rightly, that it took so long to distribute the mails throughout the colony, it was important that the steamers should arrive punctually, to enable people to answer their letters as quickly as possible. He would also, if that amendment were carried, propose to add at the end of the paragraph, "but hours for arrival prior to contract time on any voyage out, not exceeding twelve, may be allowed as a set-off at the same rate against penalties for late arrival."

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman for whom the leader of the Opposition had moved this amendment had spoken to him about it, and he had replied that he regretted he could not see his way to accept it, for this reason: that the conditions of the contract provided that no bonus for early arrival should be paid to the steamer. There had formerly been such a bonus, but this had been abolished, and the allowance of forty-eight hours in the case of late arrival was therefore only fair and reasonable. He had mentioned before that the average time for twelve months was 33-15 days from London to Auckland, and 33-38 days from Auckland to London. It was only in the case of accident or other unavoidable cause that the steamer was late. There was a very heavy penalty for arrival over the forty-eight hours. The whole service was based on a low scale; if it were on a higher scale, on which there was a larger margin, he might be prepared to agree to less time being allowed.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the time taken by the steamer was much too long. The service between Liverpool and New York, which was more than half the distance between San Francisco and the colony, was completed in six days, and it was surely unreasonable to allow twenty-two days for less than double the distance, and that was what was provided by the contract. His experience of the route was that the steamers took too much time. On one occasion when he had been on board they had slowed down to half- and quarter-speed for several days.

Mr. LAWRY said that when he had been addressing the Committee previously he had been most unfairly accused of trying to get up a fight between Auckland and Wellington. Nothing could be further from his thoughts; but he would like to point out to the country that an insidious attack had been made upon the San Francisco service by the senior member for Wellington City, with the idea of killing it in order to have a direct service between Vancouver and Wellington. He had now made it appear to the Committee, and, he believed, to the country, what these honourable gentlemen were prepared to do if they had the power, and, having done that, he was perfectly satisfied.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked if he rightly understood the Postmaster-General to say that forty-eight hours was the overtime specified in the contract.

Mr. WARD said there was no contract. It was proposed that forty-eight hours should be inserted in the event of a contract being entered into.

Sir R. STOUT asked, what was the term in the contract now? Was it twenty-four hours? Mr. WARD.—Forty-eight hours.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said, then the Postmaster-General was incorrect. The time allowed for the trip was eighteen days, and the margin was forty-eight hours.

Mr. WARD understood the honourable gentleman to refer to a contract not in existence.

Mr. DUTHIE would point out to the Committee that these steamers were occasionally, as was admitted by the Postmaster-General, late in arrival at San Francisco, and consequently missed the fast steamers that ran across the Atlantic. This was very awkward for those business people in the colony who expected to receive replies by cable to correspondence which was despatched in order to catch those fast steamers. The present San Francisco service was not a fast service, but the best ought to be made of it, and he thought, if twenty-four hours was stated as the margin for late arrival, that was a reasonable time considering the shortness of the voyage to San Francisco. Then they would have steamers in good repair, and not have these breakdowns taking place. The suggestion was a fair one, and he was sorry the Postmaster-General did not agree to it. He hoped the Committee would agree to it.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word 'forty-eight' stand part of the question."

AYES, 46.

Buddo	Joyce	Pirani
Buick	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Button	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Cadman	Larnach	Saunders
Carnell	Macintosh	Seddon
Collins	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	Massey	Stevens
Duncan	McGowan	Steward
Earnshaw	McGuire	Tanner
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Graham	McNab	Ward
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Willis.
Harris	Morrison
Hogg	O'Regan	Tellers.
Houston	O'Rorke	Lawry
Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton	Mills.

NOES, 15.

Allen	Hutchison, G.	Stout
Bell	Kelly, J. W.	Wilson.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Fraser	Newman	Buchanan
Green	Russell, W. R.	Duthie.
Heke

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Hall.	Te Ao.

Majority for, 31.

Words retained, and resolution agreed to.

Resolution 6 agreed to.

Resolutions reported.

On the question, That the resolutions be agreed to by the House,

Mr. G. HUTCHISON desired to record his protest against this contract, which was, in literal terms, the contract that was authorised three years ago. In the interval every other service had been accelerated, but there was to be no change in respect of their communication with England vid San Francisco. Although the world was moving, and although the "all-red line" was the line for us, they were about to renew the Union Company-Spreckels contract for another three years at the same old rate of payment and the same old rate of time. He thought they had a right to expect that the Postmaster-General would have something better to propose to them this session than a repetition of the old terms. It suggested that this colony was in the grip of a monopoly, and was unable to shake itself free from it—under present conditions at any rate. He thought they ought to be able to emancipate themselves by this time. He had suggested in Committee that it was unbusinesslike to ask this Parliament eighteen days from the expiration of the present contract to submit terms to this monopoly for a new contract. The Treasurer asserted that there had been no arrangement made with the view of continuing this service, and quite seriously he (Mr. Hutchison) had proposed, in view of that fact, that it might be desirable to add a few words to the clause as to the rate of payment at 11s. the pound weight, providing for the payment of such other amount as the chairman of the Union Company might demand on behalf of himself and Spreckels. Although almost absurd, such a proposition indicated pretty correctly the position of the colony with regard to this mail-service. He (Mr. Hutchison) took it that the whole of this matter had practically been arranged. They had already, weeks ago, on passing the estimates for the year, voted an increase for this very service, and they did this to allow this service to remain stationary as to speed, and backward as to accommodation. It would follow in the ordinary course of events that there would be an increase in the cost of this service to the colony from the fact that some of the other colonies that formerly contributed were now sending their letters by another route—the Sydney and Vancouver route. The increase in the estimates alone for this year was over £2,000, and probably would be more from the cause he had just mentioned. It was much to be deplored that this colony should be in the position of having to renew the existing contract under the conditions he had mentioned.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE indorsed the opinions expressed by the last speaker. This San Francisco service was the favourite child of the Colonial Treasurer at one time.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He tried to strangle it.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said that was the explanation, because from the time he moved those important resolutions in the House until now there had been no improvement whatever in the service. From the time the honourable gentleman made that speech until this there had been a gradual increase of profit. At any rate, there was a lessened expenditure to the colony, owing to outside assistance, since the honourable gentleman came into office, but the improvements which they were justified in expecting from his previous statements had ended in thin air; and now they were to be committed for three years to a slow-going service which was long behind the times. If the service were to be subsidised, not more than fifteen or sixteen days should be allowed between San Francisco and Auckland. The San Francisco service ought to be a great agency towards bringing tourists to this colony; but if it were to be continued at no greater speed they could not expect any assistance to their tourist traffic from this source. It had not opened up trade with America, and there was very little chance of its doing anything in that direction. There was absolutely no reason to continue this expensive service at the present slow rate of speed.

Dr. NEWMAN would like to point out that three years ago the contract was renewed on existing lines, therefore the contract had been in existence for six years at the present slow rate of speed; and now it was renewed for three years longer. It might be said that the service would be going on for nine years altogether at the present slow rate; and, when one looked to the way in which the mails were expedited from Vancouver to New York it was extraordinary that the Postmaster-General could bring down proposals like these. Three years ago he drew attention to the fact that the contractors would do what they liked—that they would fix up all this contract beforehand, and the House would simply be asked to ratify it. It was simply a case of what the contractors wanted, and not what was in the interests of the colony. If the Postmaster-General had advertised the service, and made proper conditions other than those contained in these proposals, he would have got a service three or four days shorter than the time at present stipulated for. The worst thing about the whole matter was that this arrangement was made not by public tender or contract, but by private arrangement between the Government and a private company.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought nothing could be more significant than the fact that some of the steamers running on this mail-service were little better than some of the local steamers running round the coasts of New Zealand and Australia.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Not so good.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the honourable gentleman could not deny that the accommodation on board these steamers for second-class passengers was not what it should be, and he could not deny that the accommodation generally was such as would not encourage the tourist traffic to which the honourable member for Clutha very rightly alluded. The question of monopoly had been raised. They had indications of the same disposition on the part of the Government in other directions as well as this, and he feared that before this session was brought to a close they would have to suffer still further from Government action in a similarly injurious direction. He was not permitted to allude more particularly to what he meant, but honourable members would very readily understand what he was referring to; and it was a very unfortunate thing indeed to have the interests of the colony committed to honourable gentlemen on those benches who took so little trouble to protect them. The honourable gentleman should have agreed to a twelve months' contract, and then he would have been in a position to conclude an improved one later on. He would, therefore, oppose what was now before the House.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member for Patea was very cool, he thought, in some respects in making assertions in the House, and the thinness of the notion he had of endeavouring to make out that the Government was bolstering up a monopoly in this matter was too transparent. If he imagined that by such insinuations he was going to prevent him (Mr. Ward) from doing what he considered was right the honourable gentleman was under a serious mistake. He would like to point out how far these strictures were justified by looking into the facts. The honourable gentleman, in his desire to politically injure the Government, had endeavoured to make statements of a damaging character which could be construed or misconstrued by those desiring to do the Government an injury into a charge of favouritism. If the honourable gentleman took the trouble to inquire into the matter he would find that he had made very unreliable statements, which he was not justified in making, as the facts did not bear out his assertions. Let him deal with the service on its merits. The honourable member said that the Government had practically arranged for the service. He stated so in Committee.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—No doubt about that.

Mr. WARD had only to repeat that there was no arrangement of any kind whatever. The honourable gentleman knew very little of the way this contract was fixed up or arranged, and he ought to have been more particular and guarded in the remarks he made. As a matter of fact, the honourable gentleman stated that the chairman of the Union Company and the Spreckels Company ought to be included in this contract. It was a great pity the honourable gentleman did not suggest that the United States Government should be included, because, as a matter of fact, this colony contributed only a fourth of the amount. The United States Government contributed £12,000, and one of the conditions of their contribution to the subsidising of the service was that the mails were to be carried in American-owned bottoms. In his desire to injure the Government, and to say nasty things, the honourable gentleman said this was in the interests of the Union Company. The special concession which the United States Government gave was that one New Zealand steamer should be employed, and that that steamer should receive one-fourth less than the American-owned vessels. In his desire to do very disagreeable and unpleasant things, the honourable gentleman attempted to twist a legitimate business transaction into a charge of favouritism against the Government. It was very much to be regretted that the honourable gentleman's ideas suggested that he (Mr. Ward) was actuated by these improper motives. The honourable gentleman himself required very careful watching, in his opinion. He never knew people capable of suggesting improper motives who did not want careful watching, and the honourable gentleman would have to be placed in that category. He (Mr. Ward) was prepared to defend his own acts, and if the honourable gentleman thought these insinuations against him were going to do him (Mr. G. Hutchison) any good he was quite welcome to make them, and he (Mr. Ward) was prepared to meet him in any way. When they found the legitimate business of the colony thus referred to, these insinuations were very much to be deprecated. What did the honourable gentleman say about the increase of the cost of the service as shown by the estimates? He said there was an increase of £2,000. Why was the honourable gentleman not just to himself? Why did he twist and warp the position? Why did he not tell the House, in regard to the estimated recoveries in the very estimates to which he was speaking, that last year these recoveries were £9,350, and that this year they were £10,856? Why was the honourable gentleman not fair? Why did he put himself in the position of being bowled out—doing tricky little things to gain a temporary advantage? It was unworthy of the honourable gentleman, and he (Mr. Ward) was surprised at his attempting to do anything of the kind. The honourable gentleman did not like what he was now telling him. Of course he did not: he knew he did not. The honourable gentleman said nasty things, and then complained that he had not an opportunity of replying when it was shown that what he had said had no foundation. The honourable member, in referring to the increase in the estimates, entirely ignored the amount of credits. The net increase, as a matter of fact, was only £1,176. That was a material difference from £2,000. But what was the cause of the increase? The cause of the increase was the additional mail-matter carried. If the steamers carried more mail-matter, of course a greater amount was paid; but, on the other hand, the colony obtained a greater amount in the way of postages. The honourable member found it inconvenient to quote the facts; he left out such parts of figures and statements as did not suit his argument. The honourable gentleman knew this was not a fixed subsidy. It was a payment on the basis of mail-matter carried at the rate of 11s. per pound, and the more there was carried the greater the cost; but the more mail-matter carried the more postages accrued to the colony. The honourable gentleman should be fair. He (Mr. Ward) said that compared with the former system of fixed subsidy the present arrangement was a very good one. The honourable member said there was an increase of £2,000 on this year's estimates, but the honourable member entirely ignored the recoveries, and in addition to them he knew perfectly well—and if he did not he ought to know—he knew perfectly well that the mails were carried upon the basis of so much per pound, and the greater the amount to be paid the greater the postages to be received by the colony. Then, again, the honourable member said this was practically a repetition of the terms of the contract of three years ago. Why was the honourable gentleman again not fair? He (Mr. Ward) had stated to the House, when introducing these proposals, that there was one alteration he had specially to remark upon, and that was that the words "present contractors" were omitted from the proposed agreement. Perhaps the honourable gentleman was not in the House at the time, and if he was he ought not to have made the uncalculated remarks he did. Now, in the former proposals, which the honourable gentleman said were almost identical with the present proposals, the present contractors were fixed as the people with whom the renewal should be made. In these proposals it was not stated that a contract was to be renewed with the existing contractors, and he again assured the honourable gentleman that the resolutions were not identical in this respect.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The terms are practically identical: see Volume 74 of Hansard. You will there find they are the same.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member for Patea and the honourable member for Wellington City said this was the same as the contract of last year. The honourable members were incorrect, because they were not the same, and it was a great pity the honourable member for Patea was not more correct in the statements he made. He was continually making incorrect statements, and it appeared to be a matter of indifference to the honourable gentleman whether he made correct statements or not. In last year's contract there was the following stipulation: ". . . this House empowers the Government to arrange with the contractors for the renewal of the San Francisco service, . . ." That was not in the present resolutions, and he (Mr. Ward) could not see how the honourable member for Wellington City could say it was in these proposals.

Sir R. STOUT.—It amounts to the same thing, because you know there is no other contractor.

Mr. WARD.—That is quibbling.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said they amounted to the same thing, because you know there is no other contractor to compete.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member said the terms were the same.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I rise to a point of order. Is the word "quibbling" in order?

Mr. SPEAKER said that personally he did not like such a term to be applied to honourable members. He was not prepared to say that it was absolutely unparliamentary.

Mr. WARD said if there was a more suitable term to apply he would use it, but he did not know of any other; because the honourable member for Patea said the terms of the contract were the same as last year, and the honourable member for Wellington City confirmed the statement.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said they amounted to the same thing.

Mr. WARD said they were not the same. As already stated, the resolutions of 1891 contained the following words: ". . . this House empowers the Government to arrange with the present contractors . . ." And, as he said, there was no such statement in the present resolutions, and in introducing the resolutions that day he said that the words "present contractors" were left out. And yet they had the honourable member for Patea getting up and making statements that were not correct. The honourable member was in the habit of making these indelicate and foolish insinuations in the House. He had, when a former Administration was in office, seen the honourable gentleman occupy such a position as he hoped no other honourable member would ever take up in the House. He thought the honourable member should be really more careful. Then, the honourable member for Wairarapa, who was so sensitive, and the honourable member for Clutha were doing—what? Every time the San Francisco service was brought up they told the House that they had travelled in the San Francisco steamers, as though they were the only people who had ever travelled in those steamers. They told the House the length of the steamer's poop, and talked about the accommodation provided on the steamers. They seemed very anxious to let the world know that they had actually travelled in the San Francisco steamers. He must say it was very gratifying to the House to know that those honourable gentlemen had travelled by them, and he thought it should be gratifying to the honourable gentlemen to know that they would be given an opportunity to travel by them again. The honourable gentlemen said everything they could against the service;—he was surprised they had travelled by it. Why did they not go via Melbourne and take a better steamer? There was no better available on the San Francisco route; and when people got the best they could get they ought to be content. Now, the honourable member for Wairarapa, of course, must, under the circumstances, be accepted as an authority as to the accommodation provided by the steamers. He (Mr. Ward) had never travelled by the San Francisco steamers, and knew nothing about the accommodation; but, as against the statements of the honourable member, there was the assertion of the honourable the senior member for Wellington City, who said he had travelled in one of the steamers—the “Mariposa”—and had given his opinion as to the accommodation and attention.

Mr. Ward

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Will the honourable gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. WARD said No, he would not give way. He had only a few minutes in which to speak, and the honourable gentleman had already made half a dozen speeches on the subject. Members had the statement of the senior member for Wellington City that the accommodation was good, and they were quite justified in accepting that opinion as against the opinion of the honourable member for Wairarapa. They found the honourable member for Clutha telling them that these steamers were in the habit of anchoring under an island in order to waste time. He had not told them why that was done. It was done when the honourable gentleman travelled by them. Probably it was because the passengers were enjoying themselves so much that they asked for delay. There must have been some reason for it. All he could say about the matter was that the present contractors for the mail-service had refused before to enter into a three years' contract—had refused absolutely, because the amount provided by the colony they held to be inadequate for the service. As a matter of fact this colony was only paying a small portion of the subsidy. The United States contributed £12,000, New South Wales £4,000, Great Britain £4,800, and this colony £7,800 towards the service. When honourable members talked about what they ought to do they should remember that when they entered into a contract where there were half a dozen other interests to be considered the colony could not do exactly as it would do if it entered into a contract entirely upon its own account. He said this advisedly. While honourable members were talking about a better contract, why did they not suggest a better one, and show how it could be carried out without increase of cost? That would be the legitimate line to take.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You would not take our suggestion.

Mr. WARD said that was because they never got a sound suggestion from the honourable gentleman. Any one could find fault, but to show how a thing could be better done was a different matter. It was the easiest thing in the world to say that things should be better done. It was very easy to say that, but it was a far more difficult thing to build up than to pull down, at which some honourable members showed such fitness. The honourable member for Patea made half a dozen incorrect statements, and looked very mild when bowled out. He could only say the honourable gentleman had his sincere sympathy under the circumstances, for he was to be consoled with. He could only hope the honourable gentleman, the next time he attacked the service, would not be met with majorities of forty to ten, forty to twelve, and forty to seven, as he had been upon this occasion. Surely the honourable gentleman could see that the House considered the proposals reasonable and fair, and his persistence seemed like a reflection upon the majority. He was surprised at the honourable gentleman, and could only compliment the majority on the judgment they had displayed, and the forbearance they had shown against the uncalled-for and improper attacks from the other side.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON did not usually claim to explain, but he had been so misrepresented by his honourable friend, who had boisterously refused to accept a correction during his speech, that he desired to repeat what he had said, that the terms were the same: and to that he adhered. As to the proposed contract not being with the same company, that was obviously a quibble, because the first paragraph of the resolutions now before the House expressed that the proposed arrangement was for the “renewal” of the San Francisco service.

Mr. BUCHANAN might explain that his reference to the accommodation on board the steamers was to that of the second- and third-class passengers. He had stated so, and the honourable the senior member for Wellington City had not in any way contradicted his assertions.

Resolutions agreed to.

RAILWAY BRIDGES.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL brought up the following report of the Railways Committee:—

“The petitioners allege that ‘many of the railway-bridges on the Hurunui-Bluff Section of the New Zealand railways are in such a condition as to require immediate repair, and, in many instances, renewal.’ They pray that such steps may be taken as are required to insure the safety of the travelling public.

“1. The Committee have exhaustively inquired into the petition, and have taken all the evidence available.

“2. The only witnesses in support of the statements contained in the petition were E. Norton Taylor (the chief petitioner) and Thomas McGarva, Foreman of Works on the Dunedin Section, who was summoned at the request of E. Norton Taylor.

“3. The evidence showed that Thomas McGarva was, in February, 1893, transferred to the Dunedin Section from Christchurch, and felt aggrieved in consequence. It is also clear that from the date of taking up his duties on that section he adopted a hypercritical attitude towards the Railway Department, especially regarding the bridges.

“4. It was elicited during the inquiry that, when McGarva was transferred to the Dunedin

Section, some of the bridges were below that complete standard of efficiency which it is desirable should be maintained. The department, however, promptly entered upon the work of strengthening and improving the bridges, and the work has regularly and steadily progressed ever since, and is still being proceeded with. No evidence was offered to the Committee to prove that any request made by McGarva for either labour or material for raising the standard of the efficiency of the bridges under his control was ever refused by the department.

"5. McGarva denied having supplied information to the petitioner Taylor on which the statements in the petition were based; but Taylor categorically declared that McGarva had not only supplied him with information verbally, but had also placed at his disposal certain railway papers of an official character, copies of which he produced to the Committee. McGarva's evidence must therefore be considerably discredited by his having falsely informed the Committee that he had not supplied the information to Taylor on which the petitioner's statements were based.

"The Committee has therefore to report,—

"1. That no evidence has been laid before the Committee which would justify them in believing that the bridges on the Hurunui-Bluff Section either are now or ever were in a 'dangerous state,' as alleged by the petitioners.

"2. The Committee is, however, of opinion that the system of bridge-inspection on the Dunedin Section was not properly carried out, and that the whole system of bridge-inspection in the colony should be so arranged that each officer's work should be sufficiently checked by his superior."

He moved, That the report be laid on the table, and be referred to the Government for consideration. In doing this, it became his duty to make a few remarks as to the position of this inquiry. The subject, no doubt, was an extremely important one, because upon the confidence of the people in the security and safety of the bridges and structures in connection with the railways must depend, to a very large extent, the railway revenue, and that feeling of confidence which was absolutely necessary in the administration of the Railway Department. He was very glad to be able to congratulate the country and the House that, after a long and exhaustive inquiry, the Committee had arrived at the conclusion that there never had been, nor was there now, the slightest reason for questioning the safety and security of the bridges. This agitation had begun in the early part of last year. The man Thomas McGarva, who had been for some twenty-three years stationed in Canterbury as Foreman of Works, was, for certain reasons of the department which the Committee had not inquired into, transferred against his wish to Dunedin. The Dunedin Foreman of Works, J. G. Smith, was transferred to Christchurch. There was a great deal of evidence to show that McGarva, on starting as Foreman of Works in Dunedin, exercised what the Committee had described as a hypercritical spirit; and it was clear that, on account of having been removed against his will, he tried, as far as possible, to create a feeling of dissatisfaction, not to put it more strongly, in connection with the department. It was also clear that when these reports became circulated, and reached the ears of the higher officers of the department, they considered there was some ground for McGarva's statement. He would call the attention of the House to some remarks made by the Resident Engineer at Dunedin, in which he admitted in plain terms that many of the bridges were in a more backward state of repair than he himself had known. He blamed himself also for not having exercised a closer supervision in connection with the bridges of the district. The result was a departmental inquiry conducted by Mr. Grant, Traffic Manager, and the Chief Engineer, Mr. Lowe; and it was clear that the higher officers of the department were convinced that, so far as the supervision on the Dunedin Section was concerned, it had not been what it should have been, and that the bridges were in a backward state of repair. That was all that could be said. The facts were clear, as stated by the Committee. No sooner had these conclusions been arrived at than the officers of the department set about endeavouring to have the bridges strengthened and repaired. Although they were "below par," to use a colloquial term, they were immediately strengthened and brought up to a comparatively efficient condition, at which they stood at the present time. With regard to the position of McGarva, throughout the inquiry during his examination he gave the Committee the impression of being a man who was doing his duty; yet when they came to the question as to whether, being a railway officer, he had allowed the information to leak out, or had even placed it at the disposal of Taylor, he distinctly denied the accusation. Yet when the witness Taylor was brought before the Committee, and was told that he would have to answer the question, he then stated that the information upon which he had acted had been supplied by McGarva. He also declared that McGarva had placed at his disposal timber-lists and other private documents he (Taylor) had used in writing to the papers, and he produced copies of them to the Committee. That was why the Committee had so strongly characterized the action of McGarva in connection with the matter. He wished to say one word with regard to the finding of the Committee. The Committee found, in the first place, that there was no need nor any reason for saying that the bridges were ever in a dangerous state; but they also said, clearly and distinctly, that the system of bridge-inspection was not properly carried out, and that the system of bridge-inspection should be so arranged that each officer should be practically checked by his superior. It was perfectly clear throughout the inquiry that there had not been, in the inspection of the railway bridges of the colony, anything like a proper and careful system of supervision. He would point out to the House how the matter stood. The system might be regarded as a chain, the bottom link of which was the Bridge Inspector. He reported direct to his superior, the Foreman of Works, the next officer was the Resident Engineer, next the Chief Engineer, and then the Commissioners. The Committee very closely tested every witness who came before them as to whether there was any system of supervision, and they found that there was no regular system of checking the subordinate officers. That was why the Committee, after careful consideration, said there was a necessity for better supervision in connection with the bridges, and he could only say that, from the observations he had made in connection with the matter, it appeared to him that ever since the Railway Commissioners took office there had been something narrowly approaching starvation of the bridges of the colony. There had been a desire on the part of the Commissioners to conserve revenue, and they had, in pursuing a policy of economy, allowed efficiency to be so nearly impaired as to run perilously close to a dangerous state. He would read the statements of Foreman of Works Smith.

Mr. G. W. Russell

Mr. SPEAKER desired to observe that it was unusual to bring up a report, and to raise a debate with regard to the evidence on which that report was based, before any other member had had the opportunity of perusing it. He had never known such an instance before. He had not been aware that the honourable member when he rose had intended to start this debate, and other honourable members were placed at a great disadvantage by the Chairman of the Committee discussing evidence which had not been laid on the table of the House.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL would bow to the ruling of Mr. Speaker, and leave the motion as it stood, That the report do lie on the table, and be referred to the Government.

Mr. TANNER said that, as a member of the Committee, he wished to enter a protest, and to put on record an expression of dissent from the report that had been adopted by the Committee. As whatever he had to say must be based upon the evidence in the possession of the Committee, but which was not in the possession of the members of the House, he wished to know whether what he was about to say would come under the decision Mr. Speaker had just given. He would like to say that he dissented in a large measure from the finding of the Committee, but he would like to know his position in regard to referring to the evidence placed before the Committee, for he had no wish to take any advantage.

Mr. SPEAKER said that, under the circumstances, he thought the House, having heard so much from the Chairman of the Committee on the subject of its inquiry, would grant the honourable member indulgence to express his reasons for dissenting from the report.

Mr. SEDDON was about to say that there would be an opportunity of discussing this matter when they were discussing the railway estimates, and honourable members would then be able to judge whether the honourable member's dissent was well founded.

Mr. TANNER said that his protest against the finding of the Committee was not in any way based on the railway estimates, or upon any question of material or expenditure. He disagreed entirely with the conduct of the Committee, and the finding that it had arrived at, and he could see no possible connection between what he had to say and the suggestion of the Premier. He would be brief; he never wished to unduly trespass on the time of the House; but, as a member of the Committee, and one of those virtually sentenced to three weeks' hard-labour by the decision of the House in sending this matter to the Committee for its consideration, he would like to say that, after the fullest, most patient, and comprehensive investigation, he was unable to coincide with the majority of the Committee in the decision they had arrived at, and which decision had been reported to the House. He took it that, when a Committee had a subject referred to it for consideration, no question of liking or disliking, and no preconceived opinions, should be allowed to weigh with it, but the Committee should enter upon its task entirely divested of everything of the kind, and its decision should be based solely upon the evidence tendered for its consideration. He did not say for one moment that this had not been the case with the Committee; but he considered the duty of the Committee, unless he was mistaken, involved something further. The Committee was bound to weigh every portion of the evidence submitted to it, giving due prominence to whatever might be found material to the question at issue; and he held that in this the Committee had grievously failed, when drawing up their report. In one very important particular the Committee had exercised a most mistaken generosity, to use no stronger term. When it was charged with the duty of inquiring into the question of the safety or otherwise of the southern bridges, it followed as a matter of course that it was bound to ascertain in whose charge those bridges had been placed, what the conduct of the officer had been as to safeguarding them, what steps he had taken to keep them in a proper state of repair or otherwise, and whether they had been attended to or neglected: in fact, he thought this was so obviously the duty of the Committee that it might be regarded as outside the limits of the discussion on this occasion. He was justified in stating, without quoting from the printed evidence which had been intrusted to the Committee as confidential, that the Committee had received an overwhelming amount of evidence on this head, and there had been nothing to rebut it. It reflected strongly upon one person who had had charge of the Dunedin Section of the railways, but whose conduct the Committee in its wisdom had thought proper to pass over in silence. It was in evidence that Mr. Smith, whose name the Chairman of the Committee had mentioned, and who was the Foreman of Works, had been lacking in vigilance, lax in the discharge of his duties, and negligent in enforcing the regulations; that he had disregarded and ignored the reports from his subordinates, and that he was so heedless of responsibility as not to communicate with his superior officers; and that when timber had been sent to bridges for repairs he had ordered its removal while countermanding the work. He had rarely visited the bridges, even when it was reported that they were in need of attention, either to examine their condition or to inspect the alleged defects; whilst his subordinates had been in a state of trepidation and discouragement, and the proper authorities were allowed to remain in ignorance. He was not for a moment blaming the Railway Commissioners, but he was only indicating what appeared to be a defective link in the chain which the Chairman of the Committee had pointed out, upon which everything depended. It was impossible to foreshadow what consequences might have arisen if this state of things had continued; and, if such had arisen, there could have been no question that it would have been the result of the inattention—he was about to say the criminal neglect—of the officer in question. It was due to his conduct that alarmist reports had been circulated through the colony as to the state in which the work was left when he was transferred from the district, and which had given just ground for complaint, and had resulted in an expensive parliamentary inquiry. But that conduct, which had been vital to the question, was passed over in silence by the Committee in their report. There was no member of the Committee who denied the statement he had made, and which he had made deliberately to the Committee that morning before entering his protest against the report just presented. Every member of the Committee admitted it, and yet the majority of the Committee shrunk from what was their duty in expressing their disapprobation of what had been revealed.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. TANNER said that, in consequence of the final adoption of the report, he had deemed it his duty to protest in writing against the decision the Committee had arrived at. One witness, as stated by the Chairman, had paltered with the truth, and was justly stigmatized for his conduct; another witness stood condemned for negligence and inefficiency in the discharge of his duties, but the Committee had passed over his derelictions. He was speaking under what he considered a grave sense of duty, and he dissented from the report on the ground stated. He had entered his protest; and if anything arose in the future which could be attributed to the negligence, inefficiency, laxity, or idleness on the part of this particular officer in question it would not be because the House was not aware of the circumstances of the present case.

Mr. CROWTHER said, as a member of the Committee, he desired to say a word or two as to the report. It would be noticed by the House that the statement was made in the report that the bridges had always been in a good state of repair, and safe. It was also stated in the report that the Commissioners at all times had invariably supplied men and material in connection with those bridges whenever it had been made known to them that repairs were required. That being so, he failed to see what foundation there was for the other statement made by the Chairman of the Committee that the action of the Commissioners had been one of cheeseparing. The report stated that they had never denied either men or material.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL said that, in regard to the statement of the honourable member that there was no proof of the assertion contained in the report, he had not been allowed to refer to it, as the Speaker had ruled him out of order.

Mr. CROWTHER said that the statement had been made. They had had the evidence of the Bridge Inspector, and of all those concerned, to the effect that the railway bridges, like every other structure, needed occasionally to be repaired, but that as soon as it had been pointed out that any bridge was out of repair it had been repaired without let or hindrance; the men and materials had been supplied at once. That was the essence of the report. And, further than that, there was one bridge pointed out as being less secure than the rest—a bridge of several spans. It was part of the arrangement that this bridge was to be put on one side, and another put in its place; but it was to be allowed to remain as it was so long as it was safe. At the time when it was carried as far as it ought to be allowed to go the lowest point was a shrinkage of $\frac{1}{2}$ in., clearly indicating that all necessary precautions had been taken, and that the Commissioners, beyond all doubt, kept the railways in a fair state of repair. All that was contained in the report was that the railways might occasionally need mending and looking after, and it set out that that had been done.

Mr. MORRISON said, as a member of the Committee, he regretted very much having to refute some of the statements made by the Chairman. The evidence before them was of a confidential nature, and, without the Committee being consulted, the Chairman had taken it upon himself to make statements reflecting on some of the witnesses who had been examined, which he (Mr. Morrison) thought was very unfair and entirely uncalled for. He was supported by another member of the Committee, who had voted with the minority, and against the report submitted to the House. He did not think the Chairman of a confidential Committee of this description should come and make public statements on evidence which had not yet been considered by the Government.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—The Government have nothing to do with it.

Mr. MORRISON said the duty of the Committee was to report to the Government, and it was the duty of the Government to consider whether the evidence should be printed and published broadcast. A great quantity of the evidence was of a confidential character, and the Chairman should not have made statements without asking the leave of the Committee before doing so. He regretted very much to have to make such remarks, and hoped it would be the last time, in a case of that sort, that such statements would be made public. As to the statements that had been made with regard to Mr. Smith, he did not know that he was there as an apologist for Mr. Smith or Mr. McGarva; he only wished to see fair-play. The department was in possession of all the necessary evidence. It was a departmental matter, and they would be judged by the departmental officers, and it was not desirable for the House to bring their names so prominently forward. The honourable member for Avon said that the duty of the Committee was to approach these questions unbiassed, which appeared to imply that some honourable members had approached it from a biassed or party point of view. So far as he was personally concerned, he could answer that he did not know any of the gentlemen concerned, and approached the question not at all biassed, and he was sure that three-fourths of the members had approached it in the same spirit.

Mr. Tanner

Mr. EARNSHAW, as a member of the Committee, regretted that the report was brought down before the Committee had come to a determination with regard to the publication of the evidence. If the evidence had been kept back till that was done they would not have had the statements they had had that day. The finding of the Committee was practically unanimous.

Mr. WILSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Debate adjourned.

HARBOURS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council insisting on its amendments in this Bill, and submitting reasons.

On the motion of Mr. SEDDON, a Conference was requested, and Mr. J. McKenzie, Mr. Ward, Mr. Bell, Major Steward, and the mover were appointed Managers.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council insisting on its amendments in this Bill, and submitting reasons.

Mr. J. McKenzie, Mr. Ward, Mr. Bell, Major Steward, and Mr. Seddon were appointed Managers of the Conference on the matter.

UNCLAIMED LANDS BILL.

4.30. Mr. WARD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the present Act dealing with unclaimed lands was found to be in some respects unworkable. Under the law as it stood the Public Trustee could take unclaimed lands and lease them. First of all, however, he must advertise in the Gazette and in one or more of the local newspapers his intention to take the land, and if within a certain time the owner did not establish his right the Public Trustee could take the steps prescribed by "The Unclaimed Lands Act, 1892," to be registered as the owner of the land under the Land Transfer Act of 1885. It was obvious that very little land unclaimed would be under the Land Transfer Act, and the land could not, consequently, be dealt with. In the great majority of cases the sections that would come under the operation of this law had to be leased, and power was taken to enable this to be done under more satisfactory conditions. Power was also taken in the Bill to enable the Public Trustee to sell the land, in order that the Act might be applied to unclaimed lands of so small a value that they would not pay to lease. If any other explanations were required they could be better made in Committee.

Mr. HEKE asked the Minister, Did this Bill refer to Native lands which were disputed by the Natives as not being Crown lands? He had had several petitions before the Native Affairs Committee in which Natives complained that their lands had been taken by the Crown and placed on the maps of the colony as Crown lands.

Mr. WARD said, No; it did not affect Native land. If the honourable member looked at subsection (2) of clause 2 he would find that it did not affect land owned by Natives according to their own customs or usages.

Mr. HEKE said that was not the point. He referred to certain lands which the Crown had taken as Crown land, but as to which the Natives disputed the claims of the Crown.

Mr. WARD said the Bill did not include them.

Sir R. STOUT asked if the Minister had any objection to refer the Bill to the Statutes Revision Committee.

Mr. WARD had no objection to do that, but there was very little time this session to do it.

Sir R. STOUT said it was a very important Bill, and it would really further the Bill to have it referred to that Committee. Some of the clauses he approved of, but there were some things that required consideration.

Mr. WARD said, very well, he would refer it to the Statutes Revision Committee.

Captain RUSSELL said the Minister, in introducing this Bill, had followed a course which seemed to him (Captain Russell) to have become customary with Ministers. They thought they had no need to explain their Bills, and they gave no reason for them. They simply brought them down as if honourable members were perfectly conscious of what was working in the minds of Ministers, and as if it were quite unreasonable to expect that any explanation should be given. As far as his (Captain Russell's) alleged old-fashioned Conservative opinions went, they should be very careful how they dispossessed a man of his property without every proper legal surrounding, and yet in this Bill they were asked to say that the Public Trustee was to be allowed practically to resume land without taking the trouble to inquire who was the owner, or anything about it. Under clause 4 of the Bill power was taken to have an advertisement inserted in the Gazette, which, no doubt, was a very interesting periodical, but it was one that not one person in a hundred ever saw, and those few who looked into it were those whose duty it was simply to hunt up Government advertisements, and not matters connected with land. He might be told that, in addition, there was provision that the advertisement should be inserted in a local paper. One knew that any person approaching the character of an absentee owner was characterized as injurious to the State; but surely a man might be allowed to own property in more than one locality, and yet a man might own land in a particular district, and if the advertisement intimating the intention to take his property was published in a small local journal,—which, ten to one, he would not see,—then, if he did not see it, he was likely to have his land confiscated under this Bill. There were plenty of means of dealing fairly in such a question as this under the provisions of the local government Acts. There was power to take land for unpaid rates, but in this Bill they had a power far exceeding that. If the land happened to have passed under the Land Transfer Act, all the Public Trustee had to do was to request that the title which was vested in the name of somebody else should be transferred from the original grantee to himself, without any protection or inquiry whatever. Surely it was an extraordinary proceeding! And then after twelve years that land would pass absolutely from the possession of the owner,—who might have been so unfortunate as to have been temporarily away from New Zealand, and not to have seen the advertisement in the Government Gazette, or in the small local newspaper in which it was published; and without even knowing that his title was in dispute he might have had his land taken away from him and vested in the Public Trustee. All his rights in his own property would thus disappear. For what reason? The Minister had given them none. Surely there was no great hardship now from any piece of land in this position remaining undisturbed, even although the Public Trustee might not know who was the owner. He wished to say that, when they had Bills of so important a character as this brought before them, some reason for them should be alleged—that the House should be told why, for instance, it was necessary to thus confiscate private property. The fact that they were undermining, almost by every statute, the rights of private property was not beneficial to the colony. He hoped the House would agree to allow a Bill so important to stand over until next year. There could be no urgent necessity for passing it. At any rate, he entered his protest against the system of bringing down Bills at such hours that they were absolutely unable to master the details of them, when they were so overworked that there was no hope of understanding the measures laid before them. And yet, without one word of explanation from the Minister, they were asked to blindly accept a

Captain Russell

Bill, the honourable gentleman even objecting, as he at first did, to let it go before the Statutes Revision Committee—a Bill, too, which materially interfered with the rights of private property!

Mr. BELL said that with regard to a good deal of what his honourable friend had said he agreed, but he had forgotten one important matter—namely, that the confiscation was effected by the Act of 1892, and that this Bill was only an extension of the confiscatory principle which his honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer had already got well under weigh. Therefore he did not think that the honourable member for Hawke's Bay's objection applied to its full extent, and he was not at all sure that the Bill would do any great injustice. He thought it would be well to refer it to the Statutes Revision Committee to see whether any arrangement could be made under which the confiscation would not be so drastic. He believed there was a good deal of protection for private interests, and that was the intention of the framers of the measure. There seemed to him to be indications throughout it in the direction of enabling the State to seize private property, but, as far as he could judge, the original intention was not that at all. He thought they could arrange with the Colonial Treasurer that the provisions of the Act of 1892 which were objectionable might be so amended in this Bill as to make this a workable Bill for the protection, and not the confiscation, of private property; and therefore, for his part, he was prepared to see the Bill go on.

Major STEWARD said it was quite true, as stated by the last speaker, that the principle of confiscation was introduced in the Act of 1892, but he submitted that, when they had an amending Bill before them, they ought not to refuse to consider whether or not that principle should be carried out to the full extent. He was prepared to admit that it was contrary to public policy that any land in the colony should be allowed to lie unadministered by any person whatsoever. If they could not find the owner, then, from the point of view of the State, it was desirable that the State should step in and administer the land; but he did not see why the rights of the owner should be confiscated thereby. Let the revenue from the land come to the State in the meantime, and let the administration vest in the State. Surely it could not be said that the cost of the administration of the estate would eat up the whole value of the freehold. Clause 15 provided that if within twelve years proof of ownership were not established the land absolutely reverted to the State. If that clause were amended to the effect that all charges as against the land should be defrayed by the State, and that all the profits derived from the land should go to the State, it would suffice. He did not mean that the entire profits should accrue to the State, but that the land should be administered by the State, and all charges against it met out of the rental. He thought that justice would be satisfied by what he had indicated, and then, if so amended, the Act would secure the interest of the owner; but to say that the land should be confiscated because twelve years had elapsed since the owner had been heard from was not right, just, or expedient. Although he would vote for the second reading, he would support any honourable member in Committee in endeavouring to do away with unnecessary confiscation of private interests.

Mr. PIRANI would like to say that he was very much surprised indeed at the attitude taken up by some honourable members in reference to this Bill. Any one would think it had just been circulated, and that no member had read it, whereas it had been in the pigeon-holes for months past, and every possible opportunity that could be desired had been given to study it. They knew as well as could be that the principle of the Bill was law at the present time; but, at the same time, although it was law, the law was defective: it was not worth the paper it was printed on; and unless some such measure as this was put on the statute-book they might as well do without the law which had been passed. They knew, also, that many sections of land were in such a position that it was impossible to administer them in any way except by selling them. They were a block to settlement, and a stumbling-block in the way of anything being done in the towns. The law at present provided that those persons obtaining possession of such land could confiscate it to their own use if they held it for a certain number of years. The honourable member for New Plymouth said that a private person could not get the land without getting permission from the authorities. If the honourable gentleman would study the law a little he would know that, if a private person had undisputed possession of land, before the principal Act this was amending was passed, for a certain number of years, he had a full title to it as against anybody else.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. PIRANI said that was so, except as against the original Crown grantees. He thought the State should be put in a better position even than a private individual; and those people who neglected their own property, who neglected to pay their rates upon it, should forfeit their right to that property if they failed to carry out their proper functions as owners of the land within a certain time.

Mr. WARD said the speech of the leader of the Opposition somewhat amused him. The honourable gentleman found fault with Ministers for not explaining their Bills. This Bill had been circulated for weeks. The honourable gentleman was not like Rip Van Winkle, because there was this very material difference between them—

Captain RUSSELL.—He was a very good character.

Mr. WARD said that Rip Van Winkle, after an interval of twenty-five years, remembered all that had taken place before the interval, but the honourable member did not recollect what had taken place only two years ago. The honourable gentleman had forgotten that the main proposals in this Bill were the law at the present time. The honourable member had not before complained of the system proposed under this Bill. This was the present law.

Captain RUSSELL.—It is bad.

Mr. WARD said, if it was bad, why did not the honourable gentleman take exception to it when the Bill of 1892 was being passed?

Captain RUSSELL.—I have no doubt I did.

Mr. WARD said he explained the material alterations in this Bill in moving the second reading. The honourable member went on to say that the Government brought down Bills for the purpose of confiscating land.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It does.

Mr. WARD said this Bill did not alter the law of 1892 in this respect. The honourable gentleman had evidently overlooked the Act of 1892.

Mr. McGUIRE.—Who brought down the Bill of 1892?

Mr. WARD.—Mr. Ballance.

Mr. McGUIRE.—Who passed it?

Mr. WARD.—The House; and I think the honourable gentleman supported it upon that occasion;—he certainly was supporting Mr. Ballance at that time. He just wished to say that the Government had no desire in this matter to do anything in the shape of confiscating property. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay referred to that word so often that he apparently dreamed of it. Hardly a proposal could be made but the honourable gentleman suggested that it meant confiscation. As to the term of twelve years, he would be quite prepared in Committee to extend the term to twenty years. This Bill was wanted in order to make the existing law workable. There was no desire on the part of the Government or the Public Trustees to do anything in the way of confiscating people's property.

Bill read a second time.

SEA-FISHERIES BILL.

Mr. WARD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was a consolidation measure. The new provisions were as follow: Clauses 18 to 20 provided that when a person discovered a new oyster-bed the Minister might grant him an exclusive license to use it, or a part of it, for a period not exceeding five years. Clauses 21 and 22 empowered the issue of licenses for the exclusive right of taking oysters from natural oyster-beds. No license was to include more than five acres below high-water mark, or a frontage to the sea of more than 110 yards. The Manukau beds had been kept closed pending this power being obtained. If the beds were leased under proper regulations it would prevent the indiscriminate taking of oysters and the depletion of the beds. Clause 28, subsection (2), and clause 29 would enable lessees to take oysters for the sake of replenishing beds, and to make and maintain beds. Clauses 40 to 43 provided for the granting of licenses to take and kill seals. The licenses were to be disposed of by public auction or tender, and were not to be for more than fourteen years, with provisions for renewal on valuation for a further period of seven years.

He might say that it had been found that the system of having a close season in connection with sealing had not worked to the advantage of the people who were carrying on this class of business. It had worked to the advantage of outsiders, who very often came to our sealeries and killed seals during the close season. It was believed that by establishing a system of leasing the fisheries by public competition the lessees would then live on the islands and conserve and guard the seals. Subsection (2) of clause 46 was another new provision, enacting that every person would be guilty of an offence who bought, sold, exposed for sale, or had in his possession any fish taken outside the limits of the colony which were not, as regarded size, et cetera, in accordance with the law. Last year a person was prosecuted and fined for possessing fish below the regulation size; but on appeal the conviction was quashed, on the ground that the part of Hawke's Bay in which the fish were caught was outside the limits of the colony. Unless the law was amended as proposed it would be difficult to secure a conviction for a breach of the law if the person charged stated that the fish were not taken in New Zealand waters.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about the Natives?

Mr. WARD said clause 70 provided that the authority of the Native Minister was necessary to prosecute any Native for a breach of the Act. With the exception of the clauses he had mentioned, the Bill was a consolidating measure.

Mr. J. W. KELLY would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to an application made by one of his constituents who was exceedingly desirous of going in for oyster cultivation. He applied for a piece of the foreshore at Waituna lagoon, but the Government refused to grant his application.

Mr. WARD said he might inform the honourable gentleman that a different reply had been sent to the applicant that day.

Mr. J. W. KELLY said in that case he had nothing further to say.

Dr. NEWMAN said that he and the honourable member for Otaki recently introduced a deputation to the Minister in reference to the oyster-fishery.

Mr. WARD said he had attended to that matter.

Dr. NEWMAN said that was very satisfactory. He would like to ask the Minister if he did not think that five acres was far too small an area for an oyster-bed. It seemed to him that it would not be worth anybody's while to take up such a small area. He thought the area should be increased. Such areas in England were considerably more than five acres.

Mr. WARD said he was prepared to amend the clause so that the Governor in Council might fix the area.

Dr. NEWMAN said that, so far as seals were concerned, some of the varieties were becoming extinct, and the question was, whether it would not be desirable to close up the season for a few years.

Mr. PARATA would like to ask the Colonial Treasurer how the Bill now before the House would affect the Natives and half-castes in Stewart Island. It seemed to him that it must be injurious to them, as it might prevent them from having the same privileges as they enjoyed in the past, for if the foreshore were let to other people they would be debarred from fishing. It seemed to him to be very much like a Bill that Mr. Hatch strongly advocated some years ago. If that were so, he should oppose the measure until the Minister assured him it would not take away any of the Native rights.

Sir R. STOUT asked if the honourable member said that clause 8 of this Bill was the existing law.

Mr. WARD.—Yes.

Sir R. STOUT was not aware there was such a law as this.

Mr. WARD said he did not think it was altered at all.

Sir R. STOUT was not aware there was a license-fee of £1 for fishermen's boats. Would the honourable gentleman tell him under what Act the license-fee was charged, and who collected it? He was never aware that fishing-boats had to pay a license-fee. He did not think it was right that fishermen should be asked to pay £1 a year. They were poor men, and should not be asked to pay anything whatever. As to larger craft, it was a very different thing, but small fishermen's boats should not be charged at all. The main parts of the Bill were those referring to oyster- and seal-fisheries. So far as the seal-fisheries were concerned, he thought this system might be tried in the case of the Auckland and Campbell Islands. If licenses were given for a sufficient number of years it might have the effect of providing that the seals should not be wantonly destroyed, as they knew had been the case. If this destruction were continued, the result would be that in a few years all fur-seals would be practically unknown. It would need very careful provision to be made with regard to that. As to promoting the propagation of oysters, he thought the leasing of foreshores should be encouraged. If that were done, there would be a very large increase of oyster-fisheries, and a great number of men would be employed. Another thing that ought to be encouraged still more was the canning of fish. A great number of the fish here were as good as, and even better than, those imported, and it was a pity greater encouragement was not given to the industry.

Mr. WARD said that in Committee he was prepared to consider any proposals to make this Bill more workable. He believed clause 8 was the law at the present time, but he would not say so definitely until he looked up the original law. In reply to the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs as to the area of oyster-beds, he would be prepared to consider that in Committee, with a view to having it improved. He thought it would be better to say that the Governor in Council could from time to time fix such areas as were considered desirable. In reply to the honourable member for the Southern Maori District, he might say the Bill provided that the areas should be put up to auction in the ordinary way. For some time past seals had been utterly destroyed by outsiders going to the islands and killing them. It was just as much in the interest of the Natives as of the Europeans to protect the seals. Of course, any one who obtained a lease of the islands for sealing purposes would doubtless recognise the skill of the Natives, and, in his own interest, would no doubt give them employment. This Bill was chiefly a consolidating Bill, but such amendments of the Fisheries Act were intended to remove anomalies existing in different parts of the colony.

Mr. Ward

Bill read a second time.

WORKMEN'S WAGES BILL.

Mr. REEVES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was an exceedingly short one, containing only three clauses, one of which was the operative clause. It was introduced in consequence of a debate which took place in the House some weeks ago. There had been, and probably always would be, a difference of opinion in that House as to the policy of passing a measure designed to increase wages or to keep them from getting lower, but there never would be any difference of opinion as to making every effort to secure to a workman the wages he had actually earned by hard work. The whole intention of the Act last year was to do that. That Bill was brought in to prevent workmen, by fair means or foul, from being done out of the wages they earned; but, unfortunately, a loophole was left in it. Workmen could contract themselves out of the Bill. This Bill was to prevent contracting out of the Act. It was to prevent workmen from contracting with their employers in such a way that under certain circumstances their wages would be forfeited. This Bill was to prevent any contract involving forfeiture having force save to the extent of one-fifth of the wages: in other words, if a man had been working on a station nearly throughout the shearing, and then, owing to some dispute, struck, the whole of his wages up to date was not to be forfeited, but only one-fifth. He thought the justice of that would be apparent to the House, and he had much pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

Sir R. STOUT might say he understood the object of this clause was to provide this: that, if a man had entered into a contract and had undertaken to come under a penalty for not doing something, the penalty was not to exceed one-fifth of the wages coming to him. Well, that would not carry out or meet the case the honourable gentleman referred to. He would suppose a man had agreed to shear ten thousand sheep, and he sheared nine thousand. If it was a condition that he was not to be paid until the ten thousand sheep were shorn, he would get no wages, although he had shorn nine thousand. According to the law laid down in the case of Cutter versus Powell, supposing a man agreed to paint a man's portrait and left out the nose, he would get nothing, because he did not finish the portrait. His contract was to paint the portrait, and leaving out the nose he had not finished his contract. That was the principle of law that underlay this class of cases.

Mr. REEVES said this clause was so drawn that it would prevent that.

Sir R. STOUT said that, if a man agreed to do a certain work and did not perform it, he was to earn wages for the amount of work he had done, although he did not complete his contract. If the honourable gentleman did that, he would alter the whole law of contracts. He did not think the honourable gentleman wanted to do that. Supposing a man were a seaman, and undertook to go from Auckland to Wellington, and from Wellington to Dunedin, and from Dunedin back to Auckland: the law was that that man did not earn his wages until he got back to Auckland. He could not leave at Wellington, but had to perform his contract. That was not the meaning of this Bill, and he did not see what the honourable gentleman meant. He could understand a measure providing for this class of case: that, if a man was paid a weekly wage in a factory, his factory fines in a factory should not exceed a fifth of his wages. That one could understand.

Mr. REEVES.—That is not in this Bill.

Sir R. STOUT said that, if the honourable gentleman was going to get round the law of contract in the case of a man who undertook a job, the best test would be bushfelling. Suppose a man undertook to fell one hundred acres, and he did ninety acres, perhaps, of the easiest bush, and was paid at so much per acre, was he to leave the ten acres undone, and throw up his contract when he had done ninety acres?

Mr. REEVES.—No.

Sir R. STOUT said he could not understand the Bill, unless it was to allow the workman to recover in all cases. What was the meaning of this?—

"No condition or agreement whatsoever between a workman and his employer for the retention, forfeiture, or non-payment of any wages for any cause whatsoever is binding against such workman, save to the extent of one-fifth of the sum to which he would be entitled if no such condition or agreement existed."

Now, the wages were not earned until the contract was finished; and the illustration that the honourable gentleman gave about shearing would not help him, because the wages were not earned until the whole contract was finished, and until then he was not entitled to wages. Therefore the whole of the money was forfeited, for he had not done his work until he had finished it.

Mr. REEVES said he would have done a great deal.

Sir R. STOUT said, then the honourable member admitted what he had said about a portrait that was painted all but the nose.

Mr. REEVES said a man was not paid wages for painting a portrait.

Sir R. STOUT said he might be paid wages. What he wanted to know was, Did this Bill mean that, in every contract between an employer and a workman, the workman was entitled to claim, as they called it in law, on a quantum meruit, independently of the completion of the contract? That would not work. The honourable member, a little time ago, said that was not what was meant, and now he said it was what was meant.

Mr. REEVES.—It is something different.

Sir R. STOUT said he had given an illustration, and stated what was decided in Cutter versus Powell, and the honourable gentleman had said it did not apply.

Mr. REEVES.—Painting a portrait is quite a different thing from shearing sheep. You were talking about leaving out the nose, so that the portrait would be absolutely useless and ridiculous.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable member was changing his ground. He had given an illustration, and quoted Cutter versus Powell; and the honourable gentleman had said that class of cases had nothing to do with it. He was now driven from that, and said that it came within the case of recovering on a quantum meruit whatever happened. He put it to the House, if they allowed that between a workman and an employer, they must allow it between a manufacturer and the purchaser of his manufactures. He would suppose a case. If they applied this doctrine, then they must apply it all round, and it was entirely altering the whole law of contract, which had not only been in existence since Britain was a civilised community, but was the law of contract according to the Roman Civil Law. He did not think it was workable in this way. He could understand the honourable member saying that if wages had accrued—that was, if a man was entitled to them—a penalty should not exceed so much; but if the wages had not accrued, and the contract was not completed, then to make this provision was to cast them adrift on a sea of litigation. If the honourable member wanted this to apply to shearing contracts only, then he ought to have the courage of his opinions, and come down and say that at the end of every hundred sheep a man was entitled to demand his wages and to leave. If he would say that, one could understand it, and it would be to say that there should be no contract for shearing more than one hundred sheep. That was perfectly understandable. If the honourable member introduced such a Bill to deal with shearers they should understand what it meant. Suppose a small farmer had five hundred sheep, and wanted men to shear them, and said he would give £1 a hundred to shear the five hundred sheep. At the end of the first hundred the man could say that he wanted his pound, and that he would not shear the balance; that his employer must get another shearer—that he had done a part of his work and wanted his pound. That was what might happen. He submitted that if this Bill applied generally it would be unworkable. Shearing might require special legislation—he would not say it did or did not—and, if it did, let them consider it on its merits. If shearers had been unfairly treated, he, for one, did not want to defend the pastoralists at all; and if it could be shown that they were treating their men unfairly, and allowing things to be done which ought not to be done, by all means let a law be brought in to deal with them; but he would point out that this was altering the whole law, and where the thing was to end he did not know.

Mr. J. W. KELLY said that no doubt the Bill was brought in to prevent the pastoralists who engaged men to shear sheep during the shearing season from doing such things as had occurred in the Benmore case. These men lost the whole of their wages because of a dispute about wet sheep, and not because they refused to fulfil their part of the bargain. The sheep were unfit to shear; and, having refused to shear the sheep when ordered to do so by the manager of the station, the men were immediately discharged, and the manager refused to pay them any part of their wages earned up to the time of dismissal. This Bill was meant to protect the wages of shearers earned up to the time of any dispute occurring; that was, he understood, what was desired; but whether the Bill brought in would have that effect or not he could not say. He hoped it would, for there was no doubt that that was its intention, and there could be just as little doubt of the necessity for the measure. During the coming season there might happen what had happened in the past. The senior member for Wellington City, said it would not have that effect. Well, he hoped the honourable gentleman would assist them in putting the Bill in such a shape that it would have the desired effect. He had much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill, in the hope of getting it improved in Committee.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said they were all desirous that some clause should be inserted that would meet cases like the Benmore one; but the question was, whether this clause would meet them or not. The point raised by the senior member for Wellington City was, he thought, a point that should commend itself to the attention of the Minister of Labour. The point was, Would it be possible for an employer to make a contract of this sort?—"I hereby agree that, if X shall shear at my shed until all the sheep on the station are cut out, I will pay 16s. per hundred." Was it possible to make that contract under this Bill? Because, if it was possible, then the Bill would have no effect whatever. He thought such a contract could be made, and that the clause would not prevent it, and therefore would not prevent an employer from contracting out. That was just the point he wished the Minister to consider.

Captain RUSSELL was as sincerely anxious as any one to protect any rightful wages earned; but surely it would be wrong to pass a clause, without fairly considering it, which would destroy the system of contracting that now existed. It was not as if this Bill was only to apply to shearers. As he understood it, it would apply to work of every kind. To take an illustration: Supposing a farmer was anxious to have a job of fencing done, and employed men to do it, and it was arranged between the employer and the men that, say, two miles, of fencing should be done, at so much per mile for erecting the fence. For the first mile and a half the ground might be an alluvial plain where it was very easy to sink the post-holes, and where, the land being level, it would be easy to strain the fence; but the last half-mile of country might be stony and hilly, where sinking would be very hard, and there would have to be continually footed posts and all these varieties understood by the practical farmer. The last half-mile practically might cost as much in labour as the preceding mile. Would it be possible under the Bill—and it seemed to him it would—for the men who had taken the contract at a definite price per mile to say they had done the first mile and a half, and to tell the employer that he must pay them for that and they would not complete the contract? Surely that would not be right. And then, in the matter of shearing, they should not consider the question merely from one point of view. Let them take a large shed, where three-fourths of the sheep were shorn, and another shed somewhere else commencing shearing, whither the gang of men might wish to go, and leave their employer to finish his sheep as best he could. Surely no one would wish for that. He would be happy to support the Minister in providing that a shearer who carried out his part of the contract should receive his wages in full, without deduction of any kind whatsoever; but he believed the right of contract should be maintained, and should bear equally upon employer and employed. If they entered into a job to shear sheep, to make a drain, or to construct a fence it should be incumbent upon them to carry out fully the agreement entered into.

Mr. BUTTON wished to call attention to the fact that the Bill was to be read with the Workman's Wages Act of 1893, and the interpretation of the word "wages" in that Act included "any money or thing had or contracted to be paid, delivered, or given as recompense, reward, remuneration, or consideration for any service, work, or labour rendered or done, or to be rendered or done, whether within a certain time or to a certain amount, or for a time or an amount uncertain, and whether payable daily, weekly, or monthly." That included every contract in which workmen could be engaged. And now here they found a clause introduced, to be read in connection with that Act, that any condition or agreement whatsoever between a workman and an employer for the retention, or forfeiture, or non-payment of any charge, in any case whatsoever, was not to be binding, and so on. "Wages" having reference to the interpretation in the Act, the effect, he thought, was much wider than the honourable member intended.

Mr. REEVES said he would explain if they would give him a chance.

Mr. THOMPSON said it was a matter of too much importance to be passed over in that way. He really did not think the honourable gentleman knew what the Bill meant.

Mr. REEVES.—You will not give me an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. THOMPSON said the point was this: If this Bill were passed it would be an end to contracting altogether. Was that what the honourable gentleman desired? It was quite evident he knew very little about the system of working carried on throughout the colony or he would not introduce such a Bill. How were all the roads made? How did the local bodies all get their works done? Was it not by contract? Then, if a person took a contract, and terminated it at any moment, he could claim to be paid for less than the contract. He could not understand what the honourable gentleman meant by this. If he wished to introduce a Bill to deal specially with shearers, then let it be confined to them—make a provision in the Bill so that a shearer could demand payment for every hundred sheep as he sheared them, in the event of a dispute. There would be no objection to that whatever; but this did not stop at that at all. It struck at the foundation of the whole system of carrying on work throughout the colony. He might tell the honourable gentleman if he looked seriously at it he would see that it would not work well at all.

Mr. GUINNESS said the honourable member must not think that he was at all annoyed with him for introducing this Bill.

Mr. REEVES said he could remove the opposition if given an opportunity to explain. He was quite prepared to meet the House on the matter if given the opportunity.

Mr. GUINNESS said he must enter his protest against this Bill. It was one of the class of Bills brought in by the Minister of Labour he had always objected to. It interfered in the most improper way with the liberty of the subject. This Bill, as stated by the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), had a most wide application. Of course these might be only Committee objections, and the Bill might be modified in Committee; but the principle was wrong, and the Bill ought not to be allowed to pass. He thought this was a most objectionable measure, because it attempted to legislate in the direction of authorising any contract entered into between private individuals to be broken. Where such a contract was entered into, the State, by this legislation, would authorise a breach of that contract, and honourable members would see that the Bill was legislating in the direction of violating a fundamental principle of the common-law of the country. It was a Bill which ought not to be passed by the House, as its effect would be that, instead of attempting to encourage the investment of capital, and thereby give employment to the workmen of the country, it would have the opposite effect entirely, and would tighten the purse-strings of capitalists and the employers of labour, and make it uncertain for holders of property and capital to invest in any undertaking where it was necessary to employ labour. They would not enter into any of those contracts, simply because this Bill would render any contract they might enter into with their workmen liable to be broken, and no sufficient remedy would be given for the breach of that contract. He understood that the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) had dealt exhaustively with the provisions of this Bill, and its general effects upon employers and workmen. Unfortunately he did not hear the honourable member's speech, but, as he had dealt with that part of the question, he would not refer to it. But he did say, as a strong supporter of the Government, that the Government had acted hastily in allowing a measure of this sort to be brought up at this period of the session, especially when they had been told that it was simply legislation to meet a particular case—that was, a dispute that had occurred between a shearer and the owner of a sheep-station. It was wrong to legislate in the direction of trying to remedy a particular grievance that might have occurred in one or two isolated cases. When they legislated in the direction of allowing contracts entered into for the employment of labour to be broken they should legislate so that that legislation would fall evenly—not only upon employers, but upon employed. This legislation was entirely one-sided, and should not be allowed to pass. In order to test the feeling of the House, he would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Debate adjourned.

PUBLIC WORKS STATEMENT.

On the question, That the House go into Committee of Supply to consider the public-works estimates,

Mr. MITCHELSON said,—Sir, when we, on this side of the House, last night, after the Premier had laid the Public Works Statement upon the table, agreed to take the debate upon it this evening we did not contemplate that we were going to be kept here until two o'clock this morning, neither did we think that we should be called upon to attend Committees at ten o'clock, and also to be in our places here in the House at half-past eleven o'clock this morning. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay, on behalf of those on this side of the House, this morning asked the Premier whether he would be willing to postpone this debate in order to take it on Monday night, but he declined to do so, and said that the sooner it was out of the way the better it would be.

Mr. SEDDON.—The sooner you will get home.

Mr. MITCHELSON. — Well, honourable members will see that the Public Works Statement was laid on the table about nine o'clock last night, that it is a very important document, and that it would take honourable members a very considerable time to make themselves acquainted with the details contained in it. There are a large number of paragraphs in it which should result in a considerable amount of debate, if only we debated them as they ought to be discussed by this House. Therefore I consider it would be impossible to deal with the proposals contained in this Statement as it ought to be dealt with in the very short time we have at our disposal this evening. At the same time, on account of the time-limit it is necessary to be brief, and in making the few remarks that I intend to make upon the proposals of the Minister for Public Works I shall, in leading off the debate, endeavour to be as short as I possibly can. I myself think that it would be almost useless to attempt to discuss this question at very great length, seeing the whole thing is really a foregone conclusion, and that honourable members have made up their minds how they are going to vote upon every one of the items. I believe the Government have such a large majority at their back, and the team they lead has been so well nobbled by the votes that appear on the public-works estimates being so fairly well distributed throughout their constituencies, that there is very little chance of our succeeding in reducing any vote upon it. At the same time, we on this side of the House have a duty to perform to those who sent us here, and it will be necessary for us to sound a note of warning against the scattering and squandering policy that has again been initiated by the Government of this country. The Government have determined upon asking the House to vote a very large sum of money for appropriation during this year, and that in the face of the command from the country to cease borrowing, and to reduce our public-works expenditure to reasonable limits, such as will not necessitate the imposing of heavy burdens upon the shoulders of the people. The pace at which we are now travelling will, I feel convinced, unless the country rises to the occasion, soon lead the colony into very serious difficulties, inasmuch as the rapid rate at which our public debt is now increasing must necessitate either the country being prepared to face heavy deficits or being prepared to face a very large increase of taxation, in order that we may be enabled to pay the interest upon our increased indebtedness. Before proceeding to criticize the proposals of the Minister for Public Works I desire to enter my most emphatic protest against the delay which ensued before the House was placed in possession of the Public Works Statement. We have now been in session a hundred and thirteen days, and the Premier has adopted his usual policy of delaying the publication of the Public Works Statement to almost the last day of the session, in order that he might not only succeed in ending the debate upon the one evening, but also in forcing the whole of the estimates, amounting to £940,000, through the House the same night upon which the debate is taken, as he did last year, without giving members an opportunity of fairly considering the proposals set forth in the public-works estimates. On page 4 of the Public Works Statement honourable members will see by the table prepared by the Minister that he has at his disposal for the carrying-out of public works throughout the colony the sum of £1,147,616, out of which he proposes to ask the House to appropriate for expenditure during the present financial year no less a sum than £946,169. This, of course, must, I think, be considered alarming in the face of the fact that the country has been led by the present Government to believe that they are a self-reliant and non-borrowing one, and that it has been their practice to carry on the public works of the colony out of revenue and not out of loan. The amount asked for, to be appropriated during the present year, is far in excess of what the country can at the present time afford; and if the whole amount that is asked to be appropriated during the present year is expended during the financial year there will be to the credit of Part I. on the 31st March next only £7,458 available for carrying on the public works of the colony. It is true that there will be £100,000 under the Lands Improvement Bill, and also £100,000 for the purchase of Native lands, but neither of these two sums can be considered moneys out of which the ordinary public works can be carried on. Then, if such is the case, honourable members may well ask, Where is the money to come from next year to carry on the public works of the colony? It certainly cannot come out of revenue, as we are told by the Government that the revenue is falling, and, if the present policy initiated by the Government in the proposals now under discussion is to be continued during the current financial year and the following year, it certainly must mean that the Government will come down and ask the House to authorise the raising of a loan in order that the public works may be continued at the rate the House is being asked to continue them during the present year. Coming to Part II.—that is, the fund out of which the North Island Main Trunk Railway line is to be constructed—we find that on the 31st March last there was to credit of this fund the sum of £79,000, and the Minister proposes this year to expend upon the north end of the line upon construction-works a sum of £25,000, and upon the south end £25,278. He also proposes to expend out of this railway loan a sum of £20,005 on the construction of certain roads mentioned in another portion of the Statement, £2,500 for surveys, and £600 upon payment of “thirds” to local bodies, making a total of £78,868; leaving a balance of somewhere about £5,000 to the credit of this fund on the 31st March next. Now, the manner in which this railway loan has been treated is most unfair. It is very unfair that moneys should be continually taken from it for the purpose of constructing roads and bridges, and for surveys and other works which are of no real benefit to the railway itself; while the railway works are making little or no progress. And what is more surprising to me is the fact that, notwithstanding our having passed a Bill authorising the Government to raise a sum of £250,000 for the purpose of roading Crown lands, and after having given them power to expend a further £250,000 for Native-land purchases and also for roading, they are still taking from the North Island Railway Loan large sums of money for the purpose of roading those lands. This does seem to me exceedingly strange, in face of the fact that the Government have this year taken from the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan £20,005 for the construction of roads in the North Island, which ought to have been provided for out of the loan authorised the other day; and when this House, in 1886, passed an Act authorising the Government to appropriate moneys from this loan for the acquisition of Native lands it never was contemplated that the land-laws of the colony would be so changed that the proceeds from such lands would be as small as they are now, or that “thirds” and “fourths” would be paid to local bodies. The lease-in-perpetuity system coming into force prevented the railway fund from receiving the amount of money that it ought to have received annually from the sale of lands that were purchased out of the railway fund. Now, returning to the item on page 4 of the Public Works Statement, this shows that upon the construction of this railway, although £1,000,000 has been raised for the purpose of constructing it, only £548,911 has been expended, and that £348,000 out of the loan has been expended upon other works—namely, upon roads, upon the acquisition of Native lands, for surveys, snagging the Wanganui River, et cetera. I think it is unfair, both to this end of the North Island and to the other end, that the Government have continued to deprive this fund of so large a sum annually in order to carry on road-works, one or two of which are practically of no use, or of no real benefit to the settlement of the land along the line of railway. Now, I wish to draw honourable members' attention to the item sinking fund, which is shown on page 4, and which I have already alluded to, where it is shown that moneys of various amounts which total £1,007,580 are available for Parts I. and II. this year. It will be found that since the 31st of March last the Government have seized from the sinking fund a sum of £54,681, and if honourable members will turn to the Financial Statement and look up the public-debt table there they will find that the very first item, “New Zealand Loan Act, 1856,” shows that the balance outstanding of that loan of £50,000 had an accrued sinking fund attached to it of no less a sum than £55,000, or £5,000 more than the amount of the debt. The debt was due in July last, and, although the Government had an opportunity of paying off that debt and still having £5,000, which they could pass to the credit of the Public Works Fund, they, instead of adopting that course, which was the honest and open course to have adopted, seized the whole of the sinking fund attached to it, and issued debentures renewing the debt. It will not be renewed for £50,000, judging from the price at which our 3½-percents are sold, as indicated in the Financial Statement. We cannot hope that these debentures will realise more than 97, and if that is the case this renewed debt will now amount to £51,500, and be added to the permanent debt of the colony. Now, I do not at all agree with the pernicious practice adopted by the present Government of seizing the sinking funds in the manner they have done. There is no doubt the law permits them to do so, but I, myself, think that the proper course would have been to pay all the debts for which these sinking funds were created when they became due. And I do not think the system of seizing the sinking funds in the way I have described can be called anything more or less than sly borrowing, for it must be understood that as these amounts are taken from the sinking fund so is our net debt increased by the amount so taken. Now, the Premier, in his statement, takes a good deal of credit for Parliament having agreed that the State should resume the control of our railways, and he goes on, in paragraph 2, to state that a great deal of good has already resulted from the change; but he carefully proceeds to sound a note of warning to honourable members, showing clearly that he has some conception of the troubles which are already surrounding him, and which will be considerably intensified before many months are over. He says,— “Firmness in resisting unreasonable demands for reductions in the tariff will be essential, and fairness and tact in dealing with the employees imperative. It has been urged that concessions can be made in respect to promoting local industries and in the carriage of lime and manures, so as to increase the natural products, and that the reduction made will be more than compensated for by the increased freights.

Mr. Guinness

“The lesson taught in the past must be borne in mind, and those who have worked to restore to the people the control of the railways should not forget what led to the Railways Act of 1887 being passed, and under which for six years the Parliament and the people have been subordinated to these irresponsible Commissioners.

“It has been further urged that by a reduction in excursion-rates and passenger-fares the increased number travelling will enlarge the revenue, and that without entailing any material augmentation in the working-expenses. Great responsibility will devolve upon the Minister for Railways, and the greatest caution will require to be exercised, for, whilst it is necessary to bear in mind that the railways have been constructed for the convenience of the travelling public and the promotion of settlement, yet at the same time the question of revenue must not be overlooked, for a serious reduction in the railway revenue would mean additional burdens on the people generally.”

I am glad that the honourable gentleman has come to that conclusion, and I feel certain that, as he proceeds with the working of the railways of the colony, unless he is prepared to ask the people of this colony to augment the revenue by a large increase of taxation he will not be able to make large reductions in railway rates and freights; and, Sir, I regret to see that the honourable gentleman, in his Public Works Statement, is holding out hopes to various parts of the colony for the further extension of existing railways and branch lines. He has practically promised that during the recess the Government will consider the question of extending the Riversdale-Switzers line, the Wai-pahi-Heriot, and the Gore-Kelso Railway. He must know that the extension of these lines cannot possibly be undertaken unless the country is prepared to raise further loans. He also proposes, in the Statement, to acquire the Mokihinui Company's railway, at a cost of £18,000, which he does not ask the colony to contribute. He proposes to take it from the funds of the Westport Harbour Board. As regards the proposal for the extension of the Helsenville Northwards line, here I think the Minister has behaved most unfairly to that part of the colony. Last year he proposed to ask the House for £12,000 for the extension of this line. Out of that sum, only £300 was expended during the year, and the contractors have made little or no progress during last year owing to serious difficulties met with in piercing the tunnel; but this year the Minister only asks the House to vote a sum of £7,000, and it is shown in the Statement that the liabilities already existing amount to £8,995. Why he has not asked for an amount to cover the liabilities I do not know. During this year he has filched another £5,000 from the amount originally set apart for the extension of this line, making a total of £15,000 taken from this line since the Government came into office in 1891. As I have already remarked, it is of no use going into details, either as regards railways or roads, as honourable members have practically made up their minds to vote for the estimates as they stand, and they will therefore be carried accordingly. It is not my intention to move to strike out a single item, or to attempt to make any reduction in any of them; but before concluding I should like to state that I consider the large amount of money the Government has put down for expenditure upon the development of goldfields is far in excess of what it should be in any one year. The amount asked for is £90,000, and I think the colony cannot afford so large a sum for that purpose. There is another item of £3,500 under the heading of “Harbours.” This item will require a considerable amount of explanation as to the causes which have induced the Government to place this amount on the estimates. When speaking upon the second reading of the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill, I stated that I feared one of the causes why the Minister for Public Works did not bring down the Public Works Statement at an earlier date was that he might use a portion of the money named in the Bill for other purposes than that for which it was proposed—namely, for roads to open up Crown lands and to give access to such—and I regret to see there are several items under the heading of "Lands Improvement" which cannot be in any way considered to be for roads either to open up Crown or Native lands or to give access to such; but I dare say those honourable members in whose districts the money is to be expended will agree to them all, whether right or wrong. They will, however, find that some of the roads to be constructed in the Auckland District are not such as should have been charged to the land-improvement accounts, and in other districts no doubt the same will be found. I do not, Sir, intend to move to alter any of these items, nor shall I debate the question any further, because my past experience has been sufficient to warn me not to do so, for every time I have attempted to reduce any item in the public-works estimates, or have moved to reject them, I have always been defeated by a large majority.

Mr. Mitchellson

8.0. Dr. NEWMAN.—Sir, I think it is only right that everybody at this time of the session should talk as far as possible in shorthand. This is a very important subject, and I should like to say a few words on it. The House is very much in the condition, from the Premier's constant driving, of the horses broken in by the Sydney horse-trainers. They yard up a number of wild horses called "brumbies," get on their backs, and ride them from day to day until they cannot crawl, and then turn them out as tamed. I take it, that is very much the condition of the House at the present time. Members have been driven so hard day and night that they are utterly exhausted,—are too tired to rebel. But there are so many new things connected with this Statement that it shows a complete change of front on the part of the honourable gentlemen on those benches. The Premier, when Public Works Minister, two or three years ago said the policy of the Government was one of tapering off, and he brought down a statement which showed that he was tapering off in many directions, and that the public-works policy was to be one of tapering off. I think on this occasion he has thrown all this to the winds, and he has gone in for a policy which is largely bulging out. In no Statement has he flung about so much money in all directions as in this one, and the way in which it is distributed all over the colony is the way in which snow falls on the ground. There is hardly any place that is not covered more or less by the honourable gentleman's votes. In glancing at what the honourable gentleman said at the end of his last Statement, one cannot help thinking that he must have felt his former policy was entirely wrong. He said, at the end of that Statement,—

"The outlook, on the whole, is cheering. The producing-power of the colony is increasing. Our colonists are in good heart and confident. But in our prosperity we must not fail to remember that careful administration, prudence, and the strictest economy are absolutely necessary if the hardy-won recovery of the last few years is to be maintained and improved upon."

The first thing the honourable gentleman does in his next Statement is to say that he will vote £940,000 for expenditure—almost a million. The honourable gentleman has adopted a policy that is, no doubt, very pleasing at first to constituencies, but which palls after a little time. He takes very large votes every year, but he spends very little of the money. The result is, when he delivers his Statement all the representatives in this House are highly delighted at getting so much for their districts; but, when they tot it up at the end of the financial year, they find that uncommonly little has been spent in those districts. The honourable gentleman votes £940,000, and will spend about £450,000. This pleases every one, and at the same time leaves him £450,000 to go on with next year. The result of this is extremely gratifying to a number until they find it out. This has been the way with the Otago Central. Enough money has been voted year after year to have completely finished it years ago; but through not letting a single contract till the end of December this line drags along as other lines have done. Take the most important gap—the most important line in a small way to be finished in this colony—the gap between Eketahuna and Woodville. There are twenty-seven miles of it over practically level country. The honourable gentleman began it three and a half years ago, and has allocated money for it year after year, but has spent very little, and at the present time it is some two or three years from completion. He has had nothing to do beyond making the line over a dead-level country. There are no tunnels, and no cuttings. The Awapurua Bridge over the Manawatu was made about seventeen years ago, and a notice put up, "Look out for the train," and trains will not go over it for at least another couple of years. This is characteristic of a great deal of our public-works policy. That was the only large work in the whole of the twenty-seven miles, and it was done seventeen years ago. I am glad to see one thing: that is, a pet work I have been urging upon the Government—the Makohine Gorge Viaduct, on the North Island Main Trunk Railway—is at last to be gone on with. This one item redeems, to my mind, the whole of the rest of the Statement. It is not much, but it is my one ewe-lamb. It is very much what the £1,500 is to the honourable member for Franklin: and his neighbour the honourable member for Ellesmere has got his little picking too. In fact, they are all round the House, and in this way most of the members are fairly comfortable. But I want to draw the attention of the House to another fact. Curiously enough, twenty-four years ago it was said in this House that roads and bridges were no more to be heard of in the House, and that nothing but railways would exist. In the honourable gentleman's Statement this year we see that he has almost ignored railway-making, and that our policy is now nothing but roads—roads from start to finish. They are scattered all over the estimates, and railways are not to be made. But I should like the Premier to explain this: If he has spent several hundreds of thousands of pounds on roads, which do not return a penny interest, how is he going to pay the interest next year without very considerable taxation? If the honourable gentleman spent more in railway-construction the railways would have been reproductive—at all events, would pay 3 per cent. Then, I think it is a very remarkable thing that, although we have had all through the Financial Statement no end of allegations that we are not borrowing, and not doing this, that, and the other, one of the first items shown on page 3 is that the honourable gentleman borrows £150,000 for roads, and £150,000 for the Native Land Purchase Fund, in all making £300,000. The honourable gentleman will have a little money to go on with next year, because, of all the £940,000, he will take care to spend only £400,000 or £500,000. But, like the honourable member who last spoke, I am amazed that the honourable gentleman should have dealt with the New Zealand loan of 1856 as he has done. This loan was paid off by the accumulated sinking funds, some £55,000: these are taken, and the loan is reissued. This is a kind of policy we have never had in this colony. I suppose that during the recess we shall see the honourable gentleman converting all these loans with sinking funds, and then he will be happy. There is one omission from the Statement, and had this been filled all parties in Wellington would have been satisfied—that is, the extension of the railway from Thorndon to Newtown and the adjacent suburbs. That no effort has been made in this direction seems to me unwise. Here is a railway going through the centre of a town, which would have paid if it had gone on a bit further, and I may say the compensation for land that will have to be taken will be very much higher every year. I am glad to find by the Statement that the surveys in connection with the North Island Main Trunk line tell against the Stratford and in favour of the central route. I do not intend to detain the House longer. I only wish to express a hope that the Minister will not delay the letting of contracts for these works.

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, I deeply regret, with the honourable member for Eden, that this Statement has been so long delayed in being brought before the House. Last year, when the time was not nearly so long, I made the same complaint. I do not think it is anything but playing with Parliament to ask us to discuss the expenditure of public money when the Statement is not brought down earlier, and no opportunity is given for consideration or discussion of the important questions in the Statement. There has never been in the history of the colony such a long delay in bringing the Statement before the House. The longest time previously was in 1888, when the tariff was being considered, and that was ninety-nine days. This has been delayed up to 112 days, and there is no excuse whatever for it. There were no policy Bills to keep the Statement back.

Dr. Newman

Only one Bill has any reference to it—one loan Bill of half a million—and that was settled more than a fortnight ago. And, besides, it is not usual in other Parliaments to wait to see the fate of a loan Bill before bringing down estimates for expenditure. The opposite course has always been followed. The policy Bills of the Government were long delayed in being brought down; and the reason is obvious: none of the Government policy measures were ready when the House met. They had to be thought out; they had not been prepared or discussed; and this delayed the business of the House, and prevented anything like legislative control of public expenditure. I wish to say one or two words on this Statement, and I do not intend to deal with it in detail, but from what may be called a broad point of view. The first thing that must strike every one on looking at it is that the policy inaugurated when Mr. Ballance took office, and which was continued by him during the time he was Premier, has been entirely abandoned. If one took the trouble to read a paragraph in the Statement of 1892, it would be seen the Minister for Public Works was indulging in some little self-laudation that he was able not only to avoid the evil, as he called it, of a borrowing policy, but to show that a new policy had been inaugurated. I will cite one or two sentences. On page 14 of that Statement it says,—

“For the purpose of showing how the ‘tapering-off’ policy, succeeded by the self-reliant, non-borrowing policy, has affected our public-works expenditure during the last few years, I give the following figures, . . . which bear eloquent testimony to the self-sacrificing spirit exhibited by our colonists in accepting with thorough good-will the decreased expenditure which that policy has entailed, and which also afford the fullest evidence of the resources and capabilities of the colony, seeing that, notwithstanding this enormous diminution in our loan-expenditure, the country is becoming year by year more prosperous and its financial position steadily improving.”

The figures given for 1885–86 are £1,475,386; 1886–87, £1,833,484; 1887–88, £966,159; 1888–89, £613,939; 1889–90, £482,464; 1890–91, £334,756; 1891–92, £392,501. That was the policy which the colony understood that the present Ministry were determined to carry out. It was to be a self-reliant, non-borrowing, tapering-off policy. So far as this Statement is concerned, every statement made in the public-works speech of 1892 has been abandoned. It is not tapering off, it is not non-borrowing, it is not self-reliant, it is not self-sacrificing. Do honourable members see what is involved in this Statement? Honourable members have said that there is an increase, and the total asked for amounts to £940,000. As a fact, it amounts to £990,000. They have omitted £50,000, which honourable members will see is borrowed under a distinct Act; so that what we are asked now to vote is, in round numbers, a million of borrowed money for public-works expenditure. I say the colony cannot stand that, and I say if we are going on like this there are nothing but difficulties before us. And it is not only that; but when we expended money before for railways we always got some interest from them in return, but, so far as the road expenditure is concerned, there is no direct interest received at all except in the case of votes for roads that are charged on blocks, which are returning to the Government under that system only a very small amount of the vote. Do honourable members know exactly the amount we are asked to vote for roads? It is no less a sum for next year than £366,060.

Mr. HOGG.—Too little.

Sir R. STOUT.—The honourable member says it is too little. I suppose the honourable member would like to have a million, and even then would ask for more.

Mr. HOGG.—Yes.

Sir R. STOUT.—I thought so. The honourable member is insatiable. That shows the danger of only looking at the immediate future, instead of far ahead. I say no colony in the world can stand such an enormous expenditure for roads as £366,000 a year of borrowed money. Of this amount, as I have said, very little will come back to the colonial chest—in fact, only what is practically charged on blocks—and then it will take years before these amounts are returned to the public Exchequer. How can the colony stand that public-works expenditure? If we spent the money on railways we should get, at all events, some amount of interest, varying from 2 to 3 per cent., and that would go a good way towards helping to pay the interest if we borrowed the money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But, so far as road expenditure is concerned, you only get what might be termed an indirect benefit; and I say again, the colony cannot stand the expenditure of this enormous amount of money on roads. For railways the amounts we are asked to vote are £313,000; and then we have, outside the roads and railways, about, in round numbers, £351,000 for other expenditure. I say the expenditure is entirely too large. No colony could stand this enormous expenditure; because I ask honourable members to see what it means. It means our having to raise—after deducting perhaps the amount the railways will return—£25,000 or £30,000 for additional interest, which will have to be found by the taxpayers. How can they do it? What is happening now? There is a falling revenue as compared with that of last year. Next year we shall be called upon to face increased taxation. How will it affect the farmers and the producers? How can they stand it? We have already been warned by the Colonial Treasurer that increased taxation is before us. We have been told that we shall have to alter the tariff—that you must increase the Customs revenue. What will happen then? If you increase the Customs revenue you are injuring every producer in the colony, because he will have less money to expend upon improvements and less to expend upon labour, and you have got to send money back all this time to the London money-lender in the way of interest.

Were members sent here to approve of a principle opposite to that which was laid down in the Public Works Statements and the policy Statements from 1890 to 1893? Can it be said for one moment that this was the policy which was announced to the country at the general elections? It is not tapering-off, it is not self-reliant, it is not non-borrowing. If it had been known that we were going wildly into borrowing,—even so far as some honourable members advocate of voting a million for roads,—I ask, would the electors of the colony have sent the present House to represent them here? I venture to say, if honourable members had stood up on the public platforms and told the people that they were prepared to vote for the policy disclosed in this Statement, they would not have been elected, except by very few of the constituencies. I am not going into the details of the Statement to point out how this particular district will be benefited, or how that other particular district will be injured. I can only say that I notice in what is termed the "Lands Improvement Account" various roads are put down here which will no more improve the land in the proper sense of the term than making any main road anywhere. A road of that kind cannot possibly be termed a lands-improvement road. As I understand a lands-improvement road it is a road specially made to open up land, or specially made through a block of land prior to its disposal by sale or lease.

Mr. SEDDON.—Leading up to a block?

Sir R. STOUT.—Yes; leading up to a block. And that term might be applied even if you make a road at Island Bay and say it leads to Pahiatua. That is as near the character of some of the roads in this list as you can have it. Take the Hokitika South Road. Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that that is a road leading to a block? It is a main road for Westland.

Mr. SEDDON.—There are sixteen million acres of Crown land there.

Sir R. STOUT.—Well, this land in many parts, except for the purposes of bush, is of no value, and could not maintain a rabbit. It is utterly absurd to say that it is a road leading to a block.

Mr. GUINNESS.—It is the best land in New Zealand.

Sir R. STOUT.—"The best land in New Zealand"! Nothing could be more utterly absurd. It has been open for sale and settlement for years and years. Since the Midland Railway Proclamation was put over it, of course, it has not been open for settlement; but it is absurd to call a main road going through Westland a land-improvement road. Since the honourable gentleman wishes to refer to the roads, he will find that in the roads and railway expenditure Westland certainly stands pre-eminent. For these purposes it gets more than any other electoral district in the colony: and I do not say it is not entitled to more consideration. I admit at once that the West Coast counties are entitled to more consideration, because it is a country covered with bush, and where, practically, there is no rateable area to tax or rate, because it is not an agricultural country. It is a mining country, and the poorest of country, and you cannot expect the small number of ratepayers there to be able to furnish the rates to make or maintain the county roads. But if honourable members will take Westland and the west side of Nelson together they will see that, compared with population, they get about double the amount of money for roads than any other district in the colony gets—over £50,000. However, I am not going into that question at all. I should not have referred to it if the honourable gentleman had not interrupted me. Now, Sir, I wish, however, to point out that we cannot afford, in the present state of the colony, to expend this large sum on roads. I can hardly think the honourable member for Eden can be correct in his statement that the Minister intends us to go into Committee of Supply and vote these sums to-night—I do not think the honourable gentleman can have been properly informed on that point. If it be so it will make a burlesque of parliamentary government. We got this Statement down last night. We got the estimates down last night too. I suppose most of the honourable members did not see them until ten or eleven o'clock to-day; and it can hardly be possible that we should be asked to vote a million of money without any consideration or any chance of dealing with the question, for we should have to vote the whole amount without consideration or debate. I hope the honourable member is inaccurate in that statement, and that it is not proposed to deal with the votes this evening. Now, I wish to say one or two words about railway construction. I believe the railways that are incomplete—some of them, at all events—should be completed. I have always said that the Eketahuna-Woodville line ought to have been completed long ago. It is a necessary connecting-link, passing through a fertile, richly-grassed, and limestone district, and it ought to have been pushed on by the Government in order to connect the Napier and Wanganui Sections with the line leading up to the capital. I think the honourable gentleman might have pushed it on, and have had it sooner completed. It would at once have given, I believe, interest on the money expended. It is not like a road on which no interest is obtained. We are simply allowing thousands and thousands of pounds to lie waste without any return whatever, whereas if we completed this link we should not only get interest on the money we spend in aiding its completion, but interest upon the money which is now lying waste, and not returning interest to the colony at all. As to the North Island Trunk loan, I can only say that I agree with what the honourable member for Eden has said: that it is entirely unfair that the Government should seek to take £20,000 out of that loan for roads, seeing that there has been such a large sum voted for making roads—namely, £150,000—and for opening up Native lands. Honourable members will see from the estimates that there is to be appropriated for roads for Native lands acquired £24,100, and for roads for lands partially acquired £10,550, and for new purchases £5,850: altogether, £40,000 voted for roads leading to Native lands, and for Native lands that have been acquired or will be acquired. That money should have been used for the purposes for which moneys are taken for roads from Part II. of the Public Works Fund, and nothing should have been taken for that purpose from Part I. of the Public Works Fund. To show, however, how misleading is the Statement, I would refer honourable members to that part of the Statement dealing with the Otago Central Railway, and I may say that I certainly was amused at the table to be found on page 11 of the Statement. That is entirely inaccurate, and I will point out where it is inaccurate. This is what is said:—

Sir R. Stout

“As a great deal of misconception seems to exist in some quarters on the subject of the amounts specifically borrowed for and allocated to this railway, I have thought it desirable to have the following statement prepared, showing the amounts specially borrowed for the Otago Central Railway, and the amount expended thereon up to the 31st March last.”

Then it goes on to show that, of the amount specifically borrowed, £605,000 has been expended upon construction and rolling-stock. Would honourable members believe that statement is entirely inaccurate? I will show how. The honourable member has forgotten, or the gentleman who prepared the table has forgotten, that before the first loan in 1882 there had been expended £125,312 7s. 1d. So large a sum as that was expended out of the loan previously borrowed, and which was voted for the Otago Central. He has not taken credit for that on the credit side of the account, but he has charged the amount of the expenditure that took place before the Loan Act of 1882, leading the House to believe that all this expenditure which came out of loan had been specifically appropriated, and showing a deficit. That is not fair or correct, and it is not at all creditable to the Minister that he should mislead the public by such an inaccurate table. Leaving out the expenditure on rolling-stock, and assuming the table to be correct in other respects, there is standing now to the credit of the Otago Central no less a sum than £93,039, which has been specifically appropriated to that line, and which had not been expended up to the 31st of March last.

Mr. FRASER.—How about the £700,000 allocated to railways out of the Loan Act of 1884? There is no reference to that allocation in the Statement.

Sir R. STOUT.—I am assuming the other figures in the table are correct, and have left out of the question the £11,000 of liabilities. I did not mention the amount referred to by the honourable member for Wakatipu, because it was not specifically appropriated; but if it is taken into account it makes, of course, the disparity even worse—£165,000. But, without stretching the thing at all, there is without doubt £93,039 to credit; and, if the amount voted in 1886 be added, there is to credit £258,089. And yet the Statement says it is to debit! I am not going to say more on the Public Works Statement. I am not going to deal with the details of the roads. There are many of them, I know, that we ought not to take a vote for at all. Many of them can only be called little political jobs. Many of them are roads in counties that are well able to maintain the county roads. Some of them

890. are practically main county roads, which have no more right to have money voted for them than any main roads or streets in a borough. If the colony is to have road-money for expenditure, and is to have it allocated on some system, you must have local-government control of that expenditure. This House is unable to do that work. I venture to say that unless a road is in a particular member's district, or perhaps in an adjoining district, or in a district which he has visited, no member will be able to say whether the votes on the estimates are correct or not. It was quite a different thing in the old provincial days. When estimates were before the Council almost every member knew something of the various works. But we do not know whether a vote is a right or a wrong vote. The only way I know, if we want economy and fair-play in connection with our road-votes, is to set up a special Committee to deal entirely with these estimates,—to get evidence, and to say whether the votes are proper votes. But we are asked to vote this enormous sum of £360,000 without control, without criticism, and without discussion. As I have said, that is making a burlesque and a farce of our parliamentary institutions. I have said all along that it was a huge mistake that the provinces were abolished. I have said all along that if you deal with this road system in this House you make it a huge board of works, and there is not efficient control over the Public Works Fund. I am not accusing the Minister of having put any vote on the estimates which he does not think a proper vote; but what I say is this: There is not a member here who would not like to see more votes on the estimates for his district. That means that the Minister may make a selection, and political bias is apt to come in. The only way, I again repeat, is to have some system such as I have indicated. We should not expect that this House can deal with these vast sums of money. I again warn the House, also, that this colony cannot afford to go on as it has been doing, spending such enormous sums on public works. No colony, with our population, can hope to expend a million a year on such purposes. If a proposal was brought down in the House of Commons—because we may take it that our population is about a fifty-fourth that of the United Kingdom—to spend fifty-four millions a year on public works, any Chancellor of the Exchequer proposing such a thing would be deemed a lunatic in England. When England borrowed twenty millions to spend on the navy she spread it over five years. Is it expected that the colony can stand such an enormous strain? And what will necessarily follow? Increased taxation. Increased taxation, I repeat, is near to us. I venture to say that we shall not possibly be able to set aside another £250,000 out of the Consolidated Fund next year for public works unless our Customs revenue is increased. We see by the revenue returns up to the present that there has been a decrease this year as compared with last year and the year before. And during the next three or four months the decrease will be very much more, because I hear from commercial men all over the colony that their orders will not be so large as they have been. So far as the grain farmers are concerned, they have been severely pinched, and so also have cattle- and sheep-breeders; and honourable members will have regretted to see that even the butter-makers cannot expect the same prices which they got a year ago. In the old provincial days, even if a vote of £50,000 was proposed for roads and other works, the Council spent three or four nights over the votes. Every vote was discussed and talked about. I venture to say that in the case of the expenditure of this million of money there will not be half a dozen members who will be able to say whether the votes are right or wrong.

Mr. HOGG.—The honourable member reminds me very much of the story told by a celebrated historian about an individual who, previous to a great catastrophe in history, travelled round the walls of an ancient city exclaiming, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem!" The honourable member, since the commencement of the present session, has been howling, "Woe, woe" to the Liberal party and the present Ministry. And now he is howling, "Woe, woe" to the colony, and is predicting all sorts of disasters. I do not believe in people who are continually predicting disaster. I do not think they do any good to the country, or to those people who are helping to build up the country. I am sorry the honourable gentleman has gone away, because I intended to give him a little of my mind. I intended to refer to his political antecedents in this House, but they are known to honourable members. You have only to look at his past career as a leader and you will find that as a leader he has been a failure. And if New Zealand owes to any one statesman more than another her present position of indebtedness it is to the honourable gentleman who has just been declaiming against borrowing. His virtues are very much like some infantile diseases—measles, for instance—which when contracted late in life are most virulent. The honourable gentleman has been very virulent. Not many years ago he was associated in office as Premier of this colony with a gentleman who, I believe, possesses far greater ability than he possesses with regard to finance—the champion borrower of the age; and to make such a speech as he has made to-night is simply discarding his past associations. He kept his Ministry in office by a policy of borrowing. He rails against roads; he talks about jobbery. But what sort of policy did he bring down? To whom is due that monstrous job the Midland Railway, if not to the honourable gentleman and those with whom he was connected? It is perfectly true what the honourable member says as to railways returning a certain percentage. But they do not return anything like a fair and reasonable amount of interest on the money expended on their construction and maintenance. Let us take another class of expenditure which his Government indulged in very heavily. I refer to expensive public buildings which were erected in various parts of the colony. Was not something like a quarter of a million lavished, chiefly through the advocacy of the honourable gentleman, on a lunatic asylum near Dunedin? The honourable gentleman believes in universities and lunatic asylums, but he does not believe in roads and bridges. He does not believe in roads and bridges because he knows they are going to help settlement. I admit that in one respect he is consistent. He prefers the city to the country, and he does not believe in helping settlers. The honourable gentleman believes in usury, but he does not believe in the people of New Zealand having cheap money whereby they may improve their homesteads. He does not believe in Consols, because he does not believe in capital which is at present lying idle being employed in useful and reproductive works. The honourable member said that the railways return a certain amount of interest but that the roads do not. I say the honourable member does not know what he is talking about. We know positively that a large amount of this money which it is proposed to spend on roads will return not 3 per cent., but 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. on the expenditure. The money which is borrowed under the Loans to Local Bodies Act for roads and bridges—which are absolutely necessary if settlement is to go on—gives a return of 5 per cent. That money is used for the purpose of enabling our settlers to get upon their sections, and to have access to markets for their produce. I ask if that is not a fair return, compared with the returns received from our railways. If you want the country to prosper you must assist the country settlers. They are building up and making the country. Do those settlers not help the labour-market? Is not every settler an employer? I maintain that even the settler who does not pay anything in wages is an employer of the very best description, because, if he employs nobody else, he employs himself and his family. They are maintaining themselves honestly, and helping to maintain the country. But, Sir, it is impossible to do anything to please the honourable member. As I have often said, his mind is taken up with universities, high schools, lunatic asylums, insurance buildings, and “fads” of that character. He wants to build cities, and to go in for all kinds of unproductive works, and the kind of works he would construct if he had the power would be works that would not return a single penny, but would be a source of continual expenditure to the colony. I am very much pleased to see that the Government are able to afford something like a million of money for not only public works such as roads and bridges, but for railways, public buildings, purchase of Native lands, and a variety of things which the honourable gentleman has not referred to. With regard to our railways, we know very well that some of these railways only require a reasonable amount of additional expenditure to make them more reproductive than they are at the present time. These remarks apply to the North Island Trunk Railway. Every mile of that railway that is constructed will assist the settlers in that part of the colony. I do not begrudge the amount of money that is going to be expended upon that line, because it is necessary it should be prosecuted, and the same remarks in a modified sense may possibly be applied to the Otago Central. But when I come to refer to the line which more particularly concerns me, the Eketahuna-Woodville line, no money could be better expended than the amount voted to assist in the completion of that railway. Every inch of that line is going to pay, and if any part of New Zealand is going to be assisted by that line more than another it is the place represented by the honourable gentleman, the senior member for Wellington City. It will bring down to this city the whole of the rich agricultural and pastoral wealth of the Forty-mile Bush; it will tap the splendid lands in Hawke's Bay; it will bring the produce of the beautiful lands there to the Port of Wellington; and if there is anything that will tend more than another to build up the city, and make it far more prosperous than it is at the present time, it is the construction and completion of that line. And yet we hear the honourable gentleman declaiming against the proposed expenditure because the present Government are recognising the demands of the country and the wants of the settlers, by spending an amount of money upon roads similar to the amount they are spending on railways. He says, because the Government is doing this, it is entering on a borrowing policy, and bringing the country to ruin. If any man can bring the country to ruin it is the honourable gentleman, who has been declaiming against the policy of progress. What has that honourable gentleman done since he has been in this House? He has set his face against the Liberal party and everything of a Liberal character. I remember some years ago, when he was one of the leading politicians in Otago, he held different views; but he has jumped a Jim-Crow somersault, and has become a different man from what he was in those days. He has performed the feat of climbing to a lofty position, and then he has kicked from under his feet the ladder by which he was elevated. Now, Sir, dealing with this question of roads, I say this: that, if New Zealand is to prosper at all, the Government must continue the policy they have entered upon, and from year to year, instead of diminishing, we must increase that expenditure. A large amount of the bush-country is still in its original condition. It is still a wilderness, and many of the settlers who are endeavouring to make homes for themselves in portions of the country at the present time are simply in this position: that they are unable to pay their way, and will be unable to make homes on their sections unless they have the assistance the Government proposes. To illustrate what I am saying I may point out the fact that only to-day I accompanied one of the settlers in my district to the Under-Secretary for Lands, in order that he might represent his position. That young man hailed from Canterbury. Three or four years ago he settled on a portion of the Mount Baker Block. Up to the present time there is not even a good pack-track to that section. For 37 chains every bag of flour, every bag of sugar—in fact, everything he requires—he has to hump upon his back in order to bring them to his little cottage. Quite recently he told me he introduced his father and mother to his bush home. The other day his mother was taken ill; and in what position did he find himself? She might have died, but it was impossible to find medical aid for her. In order to get her out of that position he would have had to carry her on his back for a distance of half a mile over fallen logs and timber. All he wanted was a pack-track—a work that would cost about £100. Yet he was unable to get it. Sir, the Government of the day, and especially the Minister of Lands, deserve every credit for spending all the money they possibly can to assist settlers of that character. Wherever I go—speaking for my own district, the Forty-mile Bush—wherever I go, the cry of the settler is, “Roads! roads! The grain on our sections is rotting; there is no chance of getting in any stock, or of finding our way to market, because we have not got roads to our sections.” They may make improvements, they may fell the bush, they may get their lands under grass, but of what use is that land to them if they have no roads? The first essentials in order to make sections reproductive are roads and bridges. These men may make a living; but how are they to pay their way? They are required by the Government to pay rent; they are required by the local bodies to pay taxes; they are required by their neighbours to erect fences. They need money for fencing-wire, and various other things; but it is impossible for them to make money unless they have means of access to their sections, and are able to feed their sheep and cattle, and to drive them out to market. Roads are absolutely essential to successful settlement. These roads and bridges are the highways of civilisation; they are avenues for profitable employment; they will give employment to the settlers themselves, as well as to the unemployed; they will save such gentlemen as the honourable member for Wairarapa from having to cry out in this House about the poor swaggers travelling about from station to station. If anything will relieve the present state of the labour-market it is the introduction of a policy of this kind. Because what has our railway policy done in the past? No doubt, with the money borrowed for railways, we have been able to introduce locomotives, and a great deal of iron from other parts of the world, and that is where the principal portion of our money has gone. A comparatively small portion of it has gone in labour, and what has been spent has not been spent in a proper direction, because it has failed to settle people on the land. But the policy of the Government is providing work for the unemployed, and providing them with money during the time they are bringing their lands into cultivation. I am astonished that any member in this House should be heard declaiming against a policy of this character, because I maintain that if a new country like this is to be made prosperous, if our large centres are to be made prosperous, we must have something else besides higher education. We must have education of a very different kind. We must have physical education; and, more than that, we do not want merely to stuff their brains. We want something to clothe and feed them; and it is the settlers who will produce the material for food and clothing. But the honourable gentleman has the inflated notions which, I am sorry to say, too many who reckon they possess a very superior amount of learning seem to enjoy. The honourable gentleman is carried away with the idea that the perfect man or woman must be somebody who is turned out of a university. The son of the settler enjoys what I may call the best of technical instruction. He is taught how to fell bush, how to cultivate the land, how to manage stock. Those men or women who are producers are the best friends a new country can possibly have. They are feeding our exports; they are assisting the colony to pay its way; and if the colony is to thrive at all, if we are to get out of debt, if we are to make our great national swag rest easily upon our shoulders, it is by prosecuting a policy of this character and enabling the settlers to make money from the lands of the colony. That is the only way it can be done. Universities will not enable the country to pay its way. We cannot make the country pay its way by turning out briefless barristers who find great difficulty in making their way through life. We have had recent illustrations of that in Wellington, where barristers have been brought up and threatened to be struck off the rolls because they cannot pay their fees to the Law Society. You do not see the settlers trotted up before the Courts because they cannot pay their way. It is very rare in New Zealand to see a settler dragged up for old debts. The backbone of the country are the men and women who in the wildest part of the country are endeavouring to make homes for themselves. These are the men and women in whom the hope of the country lies. The hope of the country's future does not lie in barristers, or in men who come into this House to take away hope from the breasts of the people by declaiming against the policy of the present Government and against progress. I say this: that the present Public Works Statement is, I believe, one of the most gratifying Statements ever issued from a Parliament in this country. I believe it will be hailed with almost universal delight throughout New Zealand, because it specifies for the first time since the borrowing policy and the public-works policy commenced,—for the first time in many years,—that the amount to be expended on roads is more than equal to the amount to be expended on railways. It is what the settlers in my district have been clamouring for for years. They have been continually bringing this matter under my attention: that too much money has been thrown away on railways, and far too little spent on roads. And roads are superior to railways in a young country. Railways may benefit a few; they may be used for heavy traffic; but if you have a road you have something that everybody can use—men, women and children—a means by which every child can get to school, and every farmer can reach the nearest market; and if our railways are going to be reproductive it must be by extending our system of roads—by making main roads to every part of the country. And now, with regard to main roads, are they not necessary? They are just as necessary as by-roads. One must be dovetailed into the other. You must also have pack-tracks, and whatever you do you must give settlers—and especially young settlers—access to their sections. I say at once that we ought to support the Government, and, if we support the Government with regard to anything at all, it ought to be in the line of policy they are now adopting, because through that line of policy New Zealand will be able to come to the front as a country in which public works are thoroughly reproductive. I believe, by prosecuting this policy of roads and bridges, we shall not only help on the good work of civilisation, but we shall help forward the work of settlement; we shall add to our exports; and if we are not able to gradually extinguish the indebtedness of the country we shall make the indebtedness that New Zealand is now labouring under sit very lightly indeed on the shoulders of a thriving population.

Mr. Hogg

Captain RUSSELL.—I do not intend following the honourable gentleman through the whole course of his speech, but I was surprised to find he felt it a public duty, in criticising the Public Works Statement, to vent his private spleen on the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). The arguments of the honourable member for Masterton upon the Statement itself were, to a certain extent, right. At any rate, I join with him in believing that the construction of roads is more desirable than the further construction of railways. But I was unable to agree with some of the other arguments he used. He told us that year by year, instead of diminishing, the Government

90. must increase, expenditure. "Hear, hear," says the honourable gentleman; and shortly afterwards he says, "If we are to get out of debt it is only by pursuing a policy of this kind." Well, Sir, if the honourable gentleman were an Irishman I might perhaps appreciate the joke, but, seeing that he is a Scotchman, I do not see how it is possible for any system of logic to explain how going further into debt, and year by year increasing the expenditure, is to reduce the public debt of the colony.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Increase the population.

Captain RUSSELL.—Yes, Sir, it is perfectly true we must increase the population; but how are we to increase the population? By the provisions of the Undesirable Immigrants Bill possibly?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—By putting the young boys and girls of New Zealand on the land.

Captain RUSSELL.—I cannot see that. The young boys and girls of New Zealand will not increase the population, I should imagine. I have no cause to laugh over the statement at all. I am also one of the Jeremiahs—I forget the name of the prophet who marched round Jerusalem; it was not Jeremiah, but I have often been classed as a Jeremiah, though most undeservedly. I endeavour to look the facts fairly in the face, and, having looked them fairly in the face, to state what one sees there, and what is likely to arise from the policy proposed. It is an axiom, or hitherto has been termed an axiom, that the first duty of the House of Representatives is to take care of the purse. Unfortunately that axiom has ceased to have any effect whatsoever in New Zealand.

Mr. SEDDON.—We have got a pretty tight hold.

Captain RUSSELL.—Yes, the Premier and the Colonial Treasurer have a pretty tight hold, but of the bottom of the purse, which they have turned upside down, and they are scattering sovereigns in every direction. But we, the representatives of the people of the country, the members of the House of Representatives, whose principal duty should be to guard the public interest, are allowed no voice whatsoever in the expenditure of that money. Why, what is our position? Last night this Public Works Statement was brought down—I forget exactly at what hour; but the estimates were not placed in my hands till half-past ten. The House sat till two o'clock in the morning. Some of us reassembled on Committees at ten o'clock a.m.; and, speaking for myself, except during such time as the House adjourned, I have not been outside the House to-day, and have had my attention carefully fixed upon the business brought before us, and though I rise to say a few words, and unfortunately only a few words, on the Public Works Statement, I confess frankly to the House I have had no opportunity of studying that document. It has been perfectly impossible that one should read the whole of the Public Works Statement and compare it with the other Statements and tables bearing on the public expenditure in an intelligible manner since it was placed in our hands; and yet to-night we are being forced, whether we like it or not, to discuss the expenditure of one million of money, when it is no exaggeration to say that no member in the House, excepting the Premier, and possibly some of his colleagues, have had an opportunity of studying or at all understanding the Public Works Statement put before us, and so of discharging the duty which our position imposes upon us. Sir, it is a most unfortunate and extraordinary circumstance that the House of Representatives should be forced to do this. And not only that, but we know full well that the Premier does not intend, if he can help it, to allow us to leave this Chamber until we have voted the expenditure of one million of money, of which the great bulk of us have no knowledge whatsoever.

Mr. Hogg

Mr. SEDDON.—I have not said anything of the kind.

Captain RUSSELL.—The Hon. the Premier has not said anything of the kind, I know, but my experience of him has lasted under fairly happy circumstances for nearly twenty years, and the Ethiopian does not change his skin nor the leopard his spots. There is one short paragraph in the speech of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that I should like to take exception to, though the honourable gentleman is not here; but I do not think he will object. He spoke of the tapering-off policy as a policy inaugurated by the late Mr. Ballance. Now, I give the late Mr. Ballance all credit for having had a strong and sincere desire to continue the tapering-off policy inaugurated by Sir Harry Atkinson in 1887, but it was he who commenced the good work: and this is no assertion, but the facts prove it to be the case. I am speaking now only from memory, but I think the amount of the public-works expenditure when Sir Harry Atkinson took office was—my honourable friend on my left (Mr. Mitchelson), who is able to give reliable information, says it was over a million—I was going to say it was £967,000; it was some such sum, and the year the Atkinson Government was turned out of office the expenditure was reduced to £334,251.

Mr. SEDDON.—Last year it was £320,000.

Captain RUSSELL.—No; the honourable gentleman is wrong. I will give him the exact figures presently of his own expenditure last year. I give all credit to the late Mr. Ballance for having carried on the policy which was inaugurated by the late Sir Harry Atkinson, and I only mention the matter now, because honour should be given where honour is due. The fact remains that Sir Harry Atkinson was the first public man who had the courage to bring about a systematic reduction in the public-works expenditure of the colony. Now, it has been said that there is to be an increase of taxation next year. I think it is possible the Government may be compelled to endeavour to impose fresh taxation on the colony next year, but, unless I am very much mistaken indeed, they will find it impossible to raise further revenue. I do not by that mean to lead the House to suppose it is my belief this Parliament will not consent to the imposition of further taxation. I am sorry to say the axiom that it is the duty of members of the House of Representatives to guard the people's purse has no effect here, and therefore honourable members will be prepared, in all probability, to impose fresh taxation; but, unless I am much mistaken, the Government will find it impossible to raise further revenue, however much they may propose it. I believe so for this reason: that with a falling revenue you may increase taxation through the Customs, but the inevitable result will be that, as the people have come to the extreme limit of their spending-power, they will diminish their expenditure to pay the increased taxation, but that will not increase the revenue; and so, though a further taxation may be imposed upon land, I believe the same effect will take place, seeing that the land is already taxed to the utmost limit it can stand.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Captain RUSSELL.—Honourable members know nothing about the difficulties of land-owners when they say "No." The effect of imposing additional taxation on the land will be this: There will be a very serious fall in the value of land, proportionate to the increased charges imposed upon it, and, consequently, the amount levied in excess of the amount that is already raised by taxation on land must in reality be taken from the moneys now paid as wages, and therefore the expenditure of the people will be further diminished, with the result that further taxation will not give increased revenue, but will intensify the distress and prevent the ordinary amount of Customs duties from being paid which otherwise might be levied. There are two or three points I wish to touch upon in connection with the Statement, but I repeat again that I have been unable to study it. What we have to bear in mind is this: that it is impossible to go on borrowing money without paying interest; that, if we spend money, in some way or other we have to pay the interest for the money we get. Though the Premier told us just now that the expenditure of his Government last year was less by £14,000 than the Atkinson expenditure for 1890-91, I chanced to have the exact figures for both years in my possession, and I shall quote them. They show that the expenditure of this Government last year was considerably in excess of the expenditure of the Atkinson Government in 1890-91. Their expenditure in 1890-91 was £334,251; while last year—and there is no use in talking about Part I. and Part II., because Part I. and Part II. were all one in the days of Sir Harry Atkinson—the expenditure last year was £409,474. These are the exact figures, which I give believing them to be absolutely correct. I have taken them out to the best of my ability, and they are open to any honourable gentleman who thinks he can prove that I am wrong. Now, I wish to draw a comparison between this self-reliant, non-borrowing, tapering-off Government and the Government of Sir Harry Atkinson, which they have been continually taunting with not having done its best to make reductions. I quote again the figures: £334,251 was the gross expenditure of the Atkinson Government during the last year of office; £940,168 is to be expended this year, unless we are to be told—which I hope the Premier will not tell us—that these public-works estimates are all humbug. Assuming they are correct, he is to expend £940,168 and the additional £50,000 which was pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) just now, making in round numbers one million of money, as against one-third of a million of money spent by the Atkinson Government. It is all very well for honourable members to say it is desirable to spend the money. I agree that it is desirable, so far as our means allow, to go on with roading the country; but to tell me it is possible to sanction additional expenditure to the extent of a million of money in this unfortunate colony year after year, as a means of lifting it out of its difficulties, is to ask me to believe something that is contrary to all experience and to the dictates of common-sense. I cannot believe such a thing will come about. Now, I do not by any means wish to find fault with the amount of the votes put upon the estimates for my particular electoral district. It is quite out of my power to find any fault with them whatsoever. There are none to find fault with. No road or bridge, nothing of the sort, is allowed to the district I have the honour to represent, and therefore it is impossible to find fault with anything that is being done in my district. Oh! you may look, but you will not find it, because there is not one single penny.

Mr. SEDDON.—“Hawke's Bay, £9,293.”

Captain RUSSELL.—Oh! Hawke's Bay is not my electorate. Do not try to draw a red-herring across the scent. The Hawke's Bay Land District includes a portion, I believe, of the Province of Auckland. At any rate, it has no more to do with my part of the country than the Province of Wellington. I have some cause to find fault with that; and I have serious fault to find with the utter neglect of the east coast of the North Island. There is a district which should be made a highly reproductive district. It is a district we have heard to-night about—namely, the East Coast—and it deserves to be well considered, on account of the configuration of the country there. Probably in few portions of New Zealand is the country more broken than on the East Coast. Well, we have, I think, the sum of £1,000, which is to be expended on the Wairoa Road. The Premier, after his notable passage across Lake Waikaremoana, interviewed the settlers at the Township of Clyde, in the district of Wairoa, and there, after he had, no doubt, dined well, after the fasting of the few days previous, in the most generous way he promised that he would expend £5,000 or £6,000 in making and repairing their roads; and here we have the lamentable result. It seems to me most hard—and I am not speaking of my own district or in my own interests, but I know well that there is a district, extending from a few miles north of the Town of Napier right up to Tauranga, which has not received any appreciable benefit from public-works expenditure.

Captain Russell

The whole of the roads in that district have been made out of the settlers' own rates by the people themselves, and there has been scarcely any expenditure there of any kind; and yet, when we get the large expenditure of a million of money again, that district is absolutely neglected. I may be told that there is not much Crown land and not much Native land in that district; but the Government again is mistaken, as there is a considerable area of Crown land and a considerable area of Native land which the Government are negotiating for. I notice, in looking over the estimates, that under the Lands Improvement Account there is money being expended in every possible locality, and that money is to be voted for expenditure on roads upon the most flimsy pretexts, nominally in order to open up country for settlement, and I say it is a hardship that the whole of the East Coast district should be completely debarr'd from settlement, and be left without a chance of any better development, simply because the Minister does not choose to do anything for it. I notice one interesting little passage in the Public Works Statement—that referring to the men employed on the co-operative system; and I would draw the attention of the House to this fact: that the number of men under the co-operative system swelled considerably during the month of the election, and remained so till the month afterwards; in October, just before, they numbered 1,889, and in December, just after, they had risen to 2,122; but as soon as the excitement of the election was over again they dwindled down. I will not mention anything further in regard to it, but I would simply ask honourable members to draw their own conclusions. It is no doubt a proper thing to give the co-operative men an opportunity of employment at election-time, because unless men are profitably employed during such times they are apt to get a little rowdy, and to crowd into places where it is not desirable that they should be; but it is desirable that they should be in places where support is required.

An Hon. MEMBER.—How can they get on the roads to vote?

Captain RUSSELL.—Oh! that is very easily managed: polling-places were opened adjacent to the works; and if the honourable gentleman who asked the question had fought as many elections as the Hon. the Premier he would know how that could be done. Then, there is another point I should like to draw the attention of the House to. The honourable member for Masterton commented on the desirableness of expending money on roads rather than on railways, and he took a wise course. I agree with him in such a proposition; but no other one thing can better be adduced to intensify the want of roads than what has been done on the North Island Trunk Railway. There is to be a sum of £25,000 expended in the completion of the line of railway to the Poro-o-tarao Tunnel. Well, some honourable members say that there will be 2 per cent., 2½ per cent., or even up to 3 per cent. earned by the extension of the railway; but I have travelled through that country myself, and can assure the House that there is no possibility of the proverbial grease for the wheels being earned by the extension of the railway to the Poro-o-tarao Tunnel. It is land almost as poor as any part of New Zealand, absolutely unpopulated and unfit for small settlement, and it will remain unoccupied by small settlers for fifty or a hundred years hence. The Poro-o-tarao Tunnel stands a monument of folly, and yet the Government have made a railway to convey people to it, and that monument of folly is a greater piece of folly than the tunnel itself. How long are we to continue to hold this mad theory that pushing railways into the wilderness is going to improve the position of the colony? How long are we going to delude ourselves with the idea that railways are going to be pushed forward to a paying-point, wherever that may be? Who is to say what is the paying-point? The honourable gentleman may go on for ever pushing railways into the wilderness, but he must go on for ever and ever if he does not stop until they come to the paying-point. There are just two passages in the Statement bearing upon this which we have to notice, inasmuch as they go to prove exactly the opposite of what is put in the Statement. One paragraph says,—

“The policy of the Government since its advent to office has been to complete the unfinished lines so as to turn unproductive expenditure to profitable account. In pursuance of this policy, no less than 135 miles of railway have been completed and opened for traffic during the three and three-quarter years that the Government has been in office. Of this total length, 61 miles 7 chains were opened during the late financial year.”

Is this the paying-point?—that is to say, by opening 135 miles of railway are we progressing to this paying-point? And, having turned the point, what do we find from the next paragraph? These words: that we have at last come to the paying-point, or have got 61 miles nearer to it? No; the result is a diminution of earnings, and an actual increase in the cost of working the railways. The next paragraph says, “The total receipts during 1892–93 amounted to £1,181,521, against £1,172,792 for 1893–94.” So that the truth is that the opening of that 61 miles of railway has not brought any increase, but really, as honourable members will see, it has brought about a proportionate increase in the management-cost, and actually had further diminished the net earnings of the railways. The paragraph states,—

“... and the net profit, after deducting working-expenses, amounted to £437,434 in the latter year [that is, 1893–94], against £449,380 in the former [1892–93], a deficiency of £11,946. This, in the face of an increased capital expenditure of over £400,000, and an increase of 61 miles in the length of line worked, cannot be regarded as a very satisfactory result.”

In the face of such a statement, how can the honourable member say that it is desirable to go on pushing railways on in the country, when we know we are so far taxing the people, and heaping new burdens on them which they can scarcely carry? Is this the way by which prosperity can be brought back to the country? And we have now come to such a pass in the history of this colony that the further making of railways through unproductive country can only result in further taxation upon the people. Although it may be said that that taxation will be borne by the rich, and not by the poor, I hold it to be axiomatic that you cannot impose a burden upon any class of the community without further affecting the poorer classes of the community. You may impose the taxation apparently on the richer classes of the community, but the inevitable result is that the poor must suffer; and I repeat now what I have said for ten years, that the day of prosperity will never dawn in New Zealand until we are not able to borrow any money to spend in the way we are doing, and until we are really self-reliant. Then we shall develop new industries, and the country will progress, and every kind of business will be established on a sound basis, because the people themselves will be self-reliant. But if you continue as proposed here, spending about a million of borrowed money every year, the result will be to cause the people to lean upon the Government, which must be prejudicial not only to their material welfare, but to every moral consideration.

Mr. REEVES.—Sir, either the speeches to which we have listened this evening have not been of a very rousing character, or else I cannot help thinking that the overpowering eagerness for the Public Works Statement of which we have heard so much to-night, and the indignation at the delay in bringing it down, have been a little exaggerated. Because, if we were to take as absolutely correct the statements made in speeches, one would, I think, have expected to see an intensely exciting debate, an exceedingly full House, and members eager to attack the Government for not having brought down the Statement before. Instead of that, looking around us, what do we see? A House fully one-third of the members of which are not here, and of the remainder a number of gentlemen employed in reading and writing, certain others engaged in a subdued but agreeable conversation, and several who appear so perfectly satisfied with and trustful of the Government that they have abandoned themselves to the sweets of slumber. However, although the speeches seem scarcely to have had any very exciting effect, they have, at any rate, been of a most agreeable and gentlemanly character. So in what I shall say in reply I shall try to refer to the speeches and not to the speakers, and to meet their fair arguments with as fair arguments as I can bring forward. We have to apologize to the other side for not having followed their first speaker with a Minister. I believe that it is usual in the public-works debate that some leading speaker of the Government side should reply to the first speaker on the Opposition side; but the fact is that we hardly know where we are when dealing with the leaders of the Opposition. We look at that bench and see daily two gentlemen sitting there. But we do not know whether either of them is leader, or whether neither of them is leader, or whether both are leaders. We never are quite able to understand whether, like the Consuls of old Rome, each commands on alternate days, or whether they share the leadership, and we are to look upon that bench as upon the title of a well-known brilliant novel and see before us a pair of "Heavenly Twins." But, as a Government in the habit of pursuing a prudent policy, we wish to be on the safe side, and we waited until both those honourable gentlemen had spoken. Now we are quite safe in lumping them into one, and replying to the collective leader of the Opposition. I myself am obstinate enough to insist on taking the honourable member for Hawke's Bay as the leader of the Opposition, and I shall go on doing so until I am prevented. He did not, however, speak first to-night, but the debate was opened by my honourable friend the member for Eden. I presume he was chosen to lead in this debate on the principle of "an old horse for a hard road," and I am bound to say that he seemed to have found the road an exceedingly hard and thankless one to travel. I listened, Sir, very carefully to his speech, and, upon my word, thinking it over, I cannot find one argument which I think would call for reply. The honourable gentleman complained, of course, of our reckless and extravagant proposals, and stated that we were exceedingly lavish in scattering money all over the country in one way or another. But when he came to his own district we were not spending too much money there—we were not spending enough; we had treated the unfortunate Helensville Railway in a most outrageous manner. Then, my honourable friend the senior member for Wellington City also complained of our extravagance; but at the same time he complained that we had not been liberal enough towards the Otago Central Railway, and we had not put down enough for the Eketahuna line. Again, my honourable friend the member for Hawke's Bay denounced the reckless, plunging, borrowing policy of the Government; but when he came to his own district we heard the bitter cry of poor Hawke's Bay, which was to get nothing at all. It is the old story—these honourable gentlemen preach economy for somewhere else. They are prepared to shed the last drop of their brother's blood, but when they come to their own districts they never get enough. One and all of the Opposition speakers to-night joined in complaining of the shameful delay of the Government in bringing down the public-works policy. "Never, never," said the honourable member for Wellington City, "had a Government treated the House so shamefully in the matter of delaying the public-works policy." "Why," said the honourable gentleman, "were not the Bills of the Government ready?" We had nothing ready, said he. We kept the House waiting week after week: the House had to wait three months and a half before it could learn what the public-works policy of the Government was. But, so far from not having any policy Bills ready, and not having anything for the House to do, why, there never was a Government that came down with such a shoal of Bills all ready, and called upon the House to plunge into such a sea of work at so short a notice. The great complaint then was not that we had not work for honourable members to do, but that we had such an enormous quantity of work prepared for them that they got no peace and no rest. It was said that we were giving them three years' work to do in one session. What are the facts and figures? In the first fortnight of the session forty-four Government Bills were introduced, twenty-two passed their second reading, nine passed into law. I ask honourable members to look back at the records of past sessions and say what session they can find that can show such figures as that. You may complain that we are asking you to do too much, or that we have brought down too many Bills, or that we are trying to rush the work through, and that we are prepared to overwork the House; but you cannot complain that our measures were not ready, and that no work was placed before the House when the session began. Our policy Bills, Sir, were ready. More than that, the earlier part of the session was taken up by a necessary reform of the Standing Orders. Then came the invasion of the Bank of New Zealand trouble, which brought with it a host of work and a certain amount of unavoidable delay. Our labour Bills were ready, and passed at once; our Railways Bill was ready directly the House was ready to discuss it. The Land for Settlements Bill was ready, and was put through without the slightest delay; and our financial policy was not delayed. Nor were we responsible for the debates on that policy occupying long weeks. Quite the contrary. Honourable gentlemen exercised their liberty in debating our financial policy, and certain honourable gentlemen, I think, stretched that liberty into license. But it was not our fault that those honourable gentlemen consumed an inordinate amount of time in discussing our policy Bills; and I am bound to say that the very men whom we heard night after night, and hour after hour, and day after day, dragging out to an interminable length the discussion of our policy Bills are the very men who get up and denounce us because that delay has prevented the Public Works Statement from coming down until a late period of the session. Then, we are told that we ought to have brought down the Public Works Statement with the estimates appended before our financial Bills passed into law. Could anything be more ridiculous or humiliating than for a Government to place itself in such a position? What would be the result if we were to be called upon to bring down the estimates of expenditure, and to put forward arguments to sustain that scheme, before we knew whether we were to have the money to carry that scheme out? It simply means that if we did not get the money we should have to withdraw the Public Works Statement, and withdraw all the arguments put forward—to withdraw our scheme and policy, to withdraw the whole of the estimates and recast them. Sir, it is a mere matter of business that before we can put forward a public-works policy we must know that we are to have sufficient money provided to enable us to carry it out. Last week the half-million loan Bill passed into law. Since then one measure delayed the bringing-down of this Statement for a few days. That was the Licensing Bill, and I can hardly sympathize with certain honourable gentlemen who are blaming us now for wrongly postponing the Public Works Statement for four days in order to bring down the Licensing Bill. I say, whoever ought to reproach us, it is not some of the honourable gentlemen who have to-night criticized our policy. I think I need not dwell upon my honourable friend the member for Wellington Suburbs, who, having had his say, has betaken himself from the Chamber. The honourable member was, of course, most impressive in condemning our rash borrowing policy; but, when one remembers what his borrowing policy was,—which he was incautious enough to put into print only three months ago,—I think the honourable member's opinions on our policy can be taken with a considerable amount of discount. I think an honourable gentleman who wanted to borrow two millions in a lump to be spent on railways can hardly blame us for a proposal to expend £900,000, the greater part of that to be spent on roads and in land-purchase. However, passing from that honourable gentleman to the more serious criticism of the evening, great stress was laid on the fact that we were asking for too much money to be spent on roads. Very well; let me endeavour to deal with that. First of all, I think that is rather inconsistent on the Opposition's part. You have only to look up Hansard to see that only two years ago, and, in fact, less than that, the cry of the Opposition and their then leader, the Hon. Mr. Rolleston, was that the expenditure of money on railways ought to cease, and that the money ought to be expended on roads for settlement. They pointed out that the railways of the colony were, on the whole, rather ahead of settlement than behind it, and they pointed out that, as we lengthened out our railways, inevitably the paying-power would diminish, and the returns of the lines decrease. Therefore they said, "Stop that railway expenditure for the present, and spend your money on roads." "You cannot spend too much money on roads" was the cry we heard again and again. "The roads are the arteries, the veins which carry the lifeblood of the country; and unless you make roads and bridges, unless you open up the waste lands of New Zealand, unless you put people on the land and give them communication to it by road, you never will stimulate the productive powers of the colony, and you will never enable New Zealand to carry lightly the burden of her public and private debt." Sir, that is what we are doing at the present time, because what we heard from nearly all those honourable gentlemen then was true. We ask, is it not absolutely necessary to carry on the settlement of New Zealand? That is the question honourable members should put to themselves. It is all very well to pick holes in this policy. It is all very well to say, "Here is a road and there is a bridge which we might possibly have done without." It is all very well to say borrowing means interest, and that we have a large public debt, which is growing larger. But the question for honourable members to ask themselves is, whether the progress of the colony shall stop, whether the work of settlement shall cease, whether we shall enable our population to find homes for themselves on the soil, or whether we shall drive our young people out of the colony to find homes for themselves across the sea. You cannot carry on the work of settlement in this country without money. It is a terrible fact, and a hard fact, but you cannot get away from it. There are now waste lands which must lie useless until they are opened up, surveyed, and roaded, and until people are placed upon them. Very well: can you do that without money? I say you cannot; and, no matter what financial means you may employ, it all comes down to this: that you must spend money on this land, and in order to spend money you have got to raise it. We take the responsibility for that, for we must carry on the work of settlement in New Zealand. We must get money for that purpose, and spend it prudently. That is our policy; and, so far from that policy being inconsistent with anything that we said at the general election, it is the policy upon which we went to the country and the policy upon which we were returned.

Mr. Reeves

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. REEVES.—Will honourable members dare to say that we were not carrying on the very same policy during the last Parliament? I say that we were buying large areas of land, that we were roading and bridging them, and that we were raising money by debentures, and by other means, in order to carry that work on; also, that we were adding to the public debt, and that we never denied that we were adding to the public debt for those purposes. We could not buy lands, and make roads and bridges to those lands, out of consolidated revenue. Therefore a great deal of that money had to be raised by means of debentures and other means, which must add to the debt. And, Sir, our people, instead of condemning us for that, cried "Bravo!" and instead of telling us to cease that policy they insisted that we should go on as we had been doing before. Did they condemn the purchase of the Cheviot Estate, or the roading and bridging of it? Did they condemn the purchase of the Pomahaka, and other purchases in the South Island? Did they condemn the purchase of Native lands during the last two or three years in the North Island, or the sums spent in roading and bridging them? Did they condemn the sums raised under the Loans to Local Bodies Act—raised under that very scheme condemned now in toto by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout)? That was the policy which the people of the colony indorsed at the last general election. If you do not raise money to put people on the land, if you do not raise money to make roads and bridges and to carry on the work of settlement, if you do not raise it by means of debentures, how are you going to get it? One of the plans in the past was to sell large areas of land for cash, and to sacrifice it in that way for revenue. Not much roading had to be done for the owners of large areas. They did not require money for roads; some of them were satisfied to have a road merely to their woolshed. They did not want the land cut up into small blocks, and they did not want to see people there at all. They would rather keep the people out of the country if they could. But will honourable members say that that was a satisfactory system? I say, Sir, the good sense of the people revolted against it, and caused us to sweep it away. Instead of that sale of land in large areas for cash, which they put a stop to, they have demanded that land shall be cut up into small areas and opened by roads, and, as we cannot now get cash by the sale of land, we have to raise money by other means to carry on the work of land-settlement. Now, if my honourable friend the senior member for Wellington City were a man who, like the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, was in favour of selling land for cash—parting with it to anybody who would buy, and thus raising revenue for roads and bridges—I should say his criticisms of our policy might have some reason. But he absolutely condemns the selling of land for cash; he is willing to go even further than the Government in restricting the sale of land. Very well; if we are not to sell land for cash, and if we are not to stop the public works of the country, if we are to carry on the Eketahuna-Woodville line, if we are to treat the Otago Central fairly, if we are to push on the North Island Main Trunk line, and if we are to open up areas of land everywhere by roads and bridges, we must have money. If we are not to sell land for cash, so as to get money, and if we are not to borrow money either in London or in the colony, how, in Heaven's name, are we to get the money at all? I leave the honourable gentleman and his friends to untie that Gordian knot as best they can. It is all very well to indulge in theoretical condemnation of the practice of borrowing. If the world could get on without borrowing it would perhaps be a very magnificent thing, but, unfortunately, practical politicians who are discharging the functions of government, and who are returned by the country to carry on the work of settlement for its good, are obliged to borrow money in order to carry on this work. But there is a plain distinction between borrowing money in the way we are doing and the old-fashioned public-works policy. I shall proceed to draw this distinction, and show what it is. In the first place, we are told that this Statement has disclosed enormous and extravagant expenditure—enormous expenditure by comparison with that of Mr. Ballance, and extravagant by comparison with that of the late Sir Harry Atkinson. We are particularly told that it compares very badly indeed with the tapering-off policy of the Atkinson Government, of which the leader of the Opposition was a member for a time. What are the facts? Our public-works expenditure this year is £640,000: that is, the appropriations are to that amount. What the expenditure will be, of course, you will see next year. It will certainly not be more than the appropriations, and, judging from the experience of the past, it will be very considerably less. So that we must not compare our appropriations with the expenditure of the Atkinson Government in any one year; we must compare them fairly with the appropriations of the Atkinson Government. So also with those of the Ballance Government. Now, this is the first year of a new Parliament, when we are sketching out a policy for three years; and if honourable members will look at the records of previous Parliaments they will see that the amount of appropriations is always largest in the first year of a new Parliament, because in its first year the policy of that Parliament is indicated. Therefore I will take the first year of the Parliament of 1891-92. What were the appropriations then? £744,000. This year they are £640,000; so that instead of there being an enormous increase there is a substantial decrease. It is quite true that there is another £800,000, but that does not come fairly at all under the head of public-works expenditure. It may fairly be called lands expenditure, and, inasmuch as the selling of lands for cash has been stopped, and therefore we can no longer raise revenue in that way—as the country has, with its eyes open, stopped that bad old system—we are obliged to raise money to carry on this policy of the opening-up of land for settlement. And we are therefore raising the sum of £300,000, and appropriating it for this year to buy land and open it up. Need I try to justify the policy of the purchase of Native lands or private lands? Were honourable members prepared to resist that? If they had said that buying Native lands was wrong, and had done their best to block it, I should have said they were consistent. But they did not. The North Island Opposition members did not dare to say that the policy of purchasing and opening up Native lands was wrong. On the contrary, the only fault found by a number of them was that we did not spend enough in this way, and they would have liked us to spend more. And the Opposition members from the South Island—did they dare to oppose the policy of the repurchase and opening-up of private lands? On the contrary, they said it was a good thing, although they said that that terrible fellow the Minister of Lands must be carefully watched to see that he did not purchase any more Pomahaka Blocks. But as for the theory of the thing, they said they were the real persons who originated it; that their old leader, the member for Halswell, believed in that sort of thing; that we were thieves and robbers who had stolen their bathing-clothes and used them to attire ourselves. Very well; if they agree with our principles, and if the getting of money to carry these principles into practice is absolutely necessary, on what grounds do these honourable gentlemen accuse us of wasteful extravagance? Who ever heard of such illogical inconsistency? If the honourable member for Inangahua stood up and condemned this policy to-night I should say he had a right to do so, because from the first he has set his face against the buying of lands for cash.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. O'REGAN.—And I shall do so again.

Mr. REEVES.—I say, let the honourable gentleman do so. He has a right to do so, because he has consistently done it. But those honourable gentlemen who do nothing of the kind have no right to condemn our policy as one of borrowing and extravagance, and to taunt us with being improvident and with dragging the colony into the gulf of bankruptcy. Now let us discuss the question of roads versus railways. The senior member for Wellington City tells us that railways pay and that roads do not. Well, of course, there are two ways of paying: there is the paying of direct interest, and there are the indirect returns to the country. We have to look at both, and we are of opinion that, for the present at any rate, the making of roads to open up Crown and Native lands is more likely to pay in the truest sense than the spending of double the amount in pushing on railways into the wilderness, because, if you push on railways ahead of settlement, they will not pay. There is nothing clearer than that. You can easily push on railways until they get to a non-paying point, whereas you cannot waste the money you spend in opening up Crown and Native lands for settlement. In fact, the senior member for Wellington City fairly admitted this; he fairly admitted that the opening-up of good lands was a legitimate thing; but he ventured to say that only a small portion of the £367,000 we are spending on roads was to be laid out in bonâ fide development and improvement of lands for settlement. Those were his words—that only a small portion of this money was to be laid out in the improvement of our estate. Now, I will follow him figure by figure. £367,000: Will honourable gentlemen believe that, with the exception of the £60,000 for main and miscellaneous roads—which is not borrowed at all, but which comes out of consolidated revenue—and with the exception of a portion of the £47,000 for goldfields, the whole of the money goes in the development of our estate? £20,000 is for roads in the North Island Trunk area to open up our estate there; £150,000 for opening up, surveying, roading, and bridging Crown lands; £50,000 under the Loans to Local Bodies Act, every item of which is ear-marked for a specific block of land; £40,000 to road and open up Native lands. So that out of the whole £367,000 there are only two sums—of £60,000, and part of £47,000, for main and miscellaneous roads and roads on goldfields—which are not directly expended in improving and opening the public estate. And let me remind honourable gentlemen that this £60,000 is not borrowed, but comes out of consolidated revenue. I have not time, unfortunately, to follow the honourable gentleman figure by figure, but I think, in taking this one charge, which was the greatest and most weighty hurled against us, and in demonstrating to the House that it was so monstrously incorrect that one wonders how honourable gentlemen of experience—because it was not one, but several that made it—could stand up and deliberately make it,—I say I think I have shown what value the House can attach to the arguments of the Opposition generally to-night. To sum up my argument, I say the development of the country, the opening-up of its estate, the placing of people on the soil and establishing and increasing of its producing-power, the developing of its power of bearing the burden of taxation, is the great work of colonisation, which no Government dare allow to stand still. We were returned to carry on that work. We have no other means as business men of carrying it on except the means we have adopted. I feel confident that time will show that the money is not being wasted, but will lead to direct return in rent, and to indirect returns more valuable still. I believe the people expected us to carry out this policy, and that the people, when we have carried it out, will indorse it in the most emphatic way during the currency of this Parliament and at the next general elections.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Sir, my honourable friend the Minister of Education commenced his speech with his usual modesty by admitting that it was not worth his while to follow one gentleman on the front bench of the Opposition, but that he had to wait for two before he found material enough to justify his replying to the criticisms on the Public Works Statement. He followed that remark by proceeding to justify, as I understood, the course of business during the present session, with the view of explaining why it was that the Public Works Statement had been delayed so long this session, and why it was now being pushed through. If the argument of the honourable gentleman is right, that it is necessary to wait for the policy Bills to be affirmed before coming down with the proposals as to public works, then I reply that the same reason exists for not bringing down any Statement at all, because none of the policy Bills has yet become law. The Land for Settlements Bill and the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Purchase Bill are measures yet unfinished. They are all stuck up, if I may use the term, in another place. We may anticipate that they will probably pass into law in some shape, so as to admit of moneys being raised under them during the present financial year; but this might have been said a month ago just as well as to-night, and this long-delayed Statement might, for all that appears to the contrary, have been down in time to have been properly discussed and considered. It is mere nonsense to suggest that any due consideration can be given, or any proper criticism addressed, to a Public Works Statement brought down with voluminous estimates and laid on the table one evening, to be put through on the succeeding night. That is, as some one said, a mere burlesque of legislation. The honourable gentleman, the Minister of Education, referring to the conduct of business during the session, attempted to justify the conduct of the Government in conducting the business of the House by pointing to the number of measures the Government had ready for the consideration of Parliament at the beginning of the session. I do not know how many of these measures should have taken up our time. He indicated that forty had been introduced, of which nine had passed.

Mr. REEVES.—In the first fortnight.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I do not know that more than nine are passed yet. Certainly some of the measures introduced at one time or another during this session were of a character such as should not have been introduced at all. I am going to remind my honourable friend that he forgot to refer to two or three Bills which have certainly been brought down, but the future progress of which is a little in doubt. I would remind him of the Hawkers and Pedlars Bill, the Masters and Apprentices Bill—in two editions—the Undesirable Immigrants Bill, and the Smashing of Contracts Bill. All these were introduced by the honourable gentleman himself, the last only a few hours ago. These are such as I think most people will probably consider would have been better left undrawn, and such as should not have occupied the time of Parliament. The honourable gentleman, as his wont is, has various introductions to his statements. A favourite one is such a phrase as this: "There never was such a Government" for such-and-such a thing. The phrase is a very useful one, but may aptly be applied in a direction quite opposite to that in which the honourable gentleman is in the habit of using it. There never was such a Government, I submit, for mismanaging the finances of the country, for occupying uselessly and grievously the time of Parliament, for misusing the energies of its members, and for deluding the country. The last description, I think, is the truest and saddest of all. The deception that has been practised on the people of the colony is not likely to be forgotten. My honourable friend asseverated over and over again that the policy introduced this session was the policy they submitted to the country and upon which they were returned. Will any one inside the House venture to make such a statement in the presence of a public meeting? He dare not do so. What my honourable friend has said to-night is certainly candid enough. It is a complete surrender of all he and his colleagues contended for last year and this year up to the meeting of Parliament. We have now the admission that they have been borrowing all the time, and that they are borrowing now. That is the very fact that they have never admitted before. I have just looked up one observation of my honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer when he was speaking at Oamaru shortly before the session, when he sought to justify the conversion operations, which it is quite clear were a new species of borrowing. He did not seek to justify the conversion operations as being instituted for the purpose of providing loan-money for carrying on public works. Oh, no! That was entirely out of the question. The conversion operations, he said, were undertaken with the object of reducing the amount of interest which the colony should pay! That is very pretty indeed: as if it were the object and the aim of the various conversion operations to reduce interest, instead of collaring the principal. We have had one conversion just lately—on the 1st of July—of a loan which then fell due. The sinking funds accumulated for its payment have been absorbed for the works mentioned in the present Public Works Statement. The loan will be found in the table of the public debt annexed to the Budget. That is a very handy reference—in fact, an index to the operations going on in connection with the conversion operations. Honourable members will see the amount on the top of page 18 of the Budget. In the first line of that table it will be seen that £50,000 under the New Zealand Loan Act of 1856 matured on the 1st of July of this year; that the sinking funds which had accrued were £55,000—an amount in excess of the loan itself. The accumulated sinking funds had, indeed, been in excess of the actual loan for some time, so that interest had not for some time back been payable at all. When that loan became due on the 1st of July last the Treasurer issued some Inscribed Stock—how much we are not yet told. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will tell the House in his reply how much it cost him to take up these bonds for £50,000. He has issued sufficient Inscribed Stock to raise the money on the market to pay the bonds on the 1st of July, and he then collared the sinking funds. The net amount obtained in this way for public works this year appears to have been exactly £54,681. While on this subject of the Public Works Statement to-night, I would point out the hurry—the indecent haste, if I may say so—which is evidenced by the estimates that accompany the Statement itself. These estimates, Sir, are incorrect in various figures. Possibly they will be corrected in due course. I sent for a copy not very long ago to see if there had been a second edition published, with the corrections, for it happened on one occasion before that corrections had been made and nothing said about them. I would point out to the Colonial Treasurer, and to the Premier in his capacity of Minister for Public Works if he cares to notice such things, that there are three errors on page 8, and the same on page 14, and three more on page 22. The sums are, I believe, correctly given in the summary on the 3rd page; but where the summaries of the various classes are given on the pages I have mentioned, it will be found that the figures in the first, third, and fourth columns are erroneous. That may be a trivial matter, but it shows how carelessly—almost inevitably so—these things are done under the stress and strain that has been brought to bear upon the conduct of public business this session. With reference to this Public Works Statement, for my part I do not object to the objects for which the greater part of the money is to be applied. The objects are meritorious—the opening-up and settlement of the land are objects very few will hesitate to support; but the methods for raising the money are certainly open to considerable question, and the mode of expending it is open to more than mere censure. For my part, speaking for the district which I have the honour to represent, I see no reason to cavil at the amounts proposed for roads and bridges; but that is a settlement district in which every penny that may be spent will be spent with advantage. Other districts, however, farther up the coast, are not so well treated, and I can only compare the meagre encouragement that the work of settlement of the land on the west coast of this Island receives with the profligate expenditure proposed for the west coast of the Middle Island, particularly in the matter of goldfields. These are under the control of the Minister of Mines. I do not doubt that the Premier dominates the Department of Mines as he dominates every other department.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. REEVES.—Does the honourable member say the Minister of Mines is a profligate?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I was speaking of the profligate expenditure in connection with the west coast of the Middle Island, and observing that the Minister of Mines was probably under the dominion of the Premier, who previously held that portfolio, as other departments are under his dominion; and that he proposes by these estimates for his own district an expenditure of something over £40,000. I think that contrasts very badly with the neglect which has been visited upon the settlement districts of the North Island. I would point out, in connection with the proposed public-works expenditure, the curious fact that on the 31st March, after allowing for liabilities, there was exactly £99,327 in the Public Works chest; and that, at the rate the expenditure has been going on, the whole must have been exhausted by the 1st July last. Since then we must suppose that the needs of the country in the matter of public works have been met by some species of financing, such as was indicated by the provisions in the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill, which, by one of its clauses, it will be remembered, provided that unspecified expenditure during the period from the 1st April onwards should be retrospectively ratified. That indicates a very curious and exceptional conduct of public business; but probably, under the circumstances, it was necessary. However, my point is this: On the 1st July, by all accounts, there was not any money left in the Public Works chest; but, nevertheless, public works have been going on. The sources from which moneys have probably been drawn for the purpose of paying for these works going on during the period since the 1st July, and presumably for the remainder of the financial year, are unknown. They have probably been drawn against the sinking funds which have recently been collared, £54,681; and the amount to be transferred from the Consolidated Fund, £250,000. Two sums of £150,000 each, to be raised for lands-improvement and for the purchase of Native lands—making altogether £300,000—were for the most part yet to be raised. These sums, aggregating £604,681, represented the moneys coming in this year for public works. If we include the balance which was in the chest on the 31st March—namely, £342,935, subject to a liability of £243,608—we have the whole amount which is the subject of appropriation for this year, namely, £940,163, or close upon a million of money. I have already dealt with the sinking funds, £54,681, and will now come for a minute to dwell upon the £250,000 to be taken from the Consolidated Fund during the present year for the purpose of public works. I have before taken exception to the transference of such a sum for such purposes. I say it is not dealing fairly with the people of the colony to take from the taxation of the people a quarter of a million annually for the purpose of making railways: for this is what it comes to. It is particularly wrong to do this in the face of a falling revenue, with the almost certain prospect of increased taxation being necessary to make good the void being thus created in our ordinary revenue account. I hope my honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer will not take umbrage if I point out that his estimate is not being realised with respect to the revenue of the current year. It is well the colony should know exactly how it stands. There is no advantage, surely, in suppressing facts. Over on the other side—in New South Wales—the practice now is to publish a weekly statement of revenue, and not only a weekly statement, but a statement for the year up to and inclusive of the week so separately dealt with is made the subject of such returns. And such information is given although the returns show, as does this one I have in my hand for the period ending with the 15th September, a decrease for the year up to that date, of a considerable amount.

Mr. WARD.—What is the amount?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The decrease according to this revenue return for the year to the 15th September is £81,551. The same return shows that for the week ended the 15th September there was a net increase, as compared with the corresponding week in the previous year, of £11,107. If my honourable friend would be a little more open in the matter of returns he would not suffer, nor would the Government in the long-run or the colony suffer, by giving the fullest information. The facts as to our revenue, so far as they are disclosed by the information we have received, show this: that the Customs revenue for the June quarter was less than for the corresponding quarter of the previous year by £25,463, and that for the September quarter the Customs revenue was less than for the corresponding quarter of the previous year by £10,799; making a total deficiency of £36,262 for the six months ended the 30th

September, as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year.

Mr. SEDDON.—Not less than the estimate.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Yes; it is less than the estimate in this way: The estimate of Customs revenue for the whole year is less than that of the previous year by £55,500, and, as half of the current financial year has gone, £36,232 indicates a decrease over the whole period.

Mr. SEDDON.—The worse half of the year.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I hope so; but it would be a little more comforting if I thought that not more than half of the estimate was the limit of the decrease; but it will be seen that we are already £8,482 below the ratio for the six months. The estimated decrease in the railway revenue was £5,548; but already in the June quarter there had been a fall of over £16,000 as compared with the corresponding quarter of 1893. The two four-weekly returns published since June showed a further decline of over £30,000 as compared with the corresponding periods twelve months before. It is important, also, to note that with a falling revenue there was an increasing expenditure in the Railway Department, amounting, during the eight weeks up to the 18th August, to over £20,000 as compared with the corresponding period last year. These are matters which no one should or can take any pleasure in; but they are matters for the public to know, and to weigh, and for the members of this House to bear in mind in view of the proposals which are before them, which are undoubtedly in the direction of very considerably increasing the indebtedness, and consequently increasing the annual charge for interest. There is only one other subject which I would particularly refer to in connection with this Public Works Statement, and that is the subject of the co-operative system. This was a system which, in its inception, was undoubtedly good. It was one which intended to go hand in hand with settlement. It was one by which the hand of assistance was to be extended to those who were old and decrepit, or unfitted in other respects to compete with the stronger members of the community. That the system has not been applied to or has failed in such cases is quite evident. The system was not allowed to go hand in hand with settlement, and experience of the past has shown what any one might have predicted who thought over the matter—that competition cannot be prevented from exercising sway. The system has not carried out the expectation that the old and decrepit would have their share in the work that was going on. I should like, on this subject, to read an extract from the report of one of the Road Surveyors, which appears in the Crown Lands Report for the year. It is the Road Surveyor for Auckland who says this:—

“There is a process of ‘natural selection’ going on, by which those who, owing to inexperience, physical weakness, or lack of energy, leave the work, and their places are taken by the more robust, experienced, and energetic. I do not think there is now a single second-class man on this work, after the process has been going on for nine months, and many good men have left for more work.”

And that must be the experience everywhere. We also find testimony on the other point as to the system not being applied, as first intended, in giving employment to settlers who were in the habit of getting work about their own homes. Instead of assisting them, it has increased competition. On that subject the Wellington Road Surveyor says:—

“As recommended in my report last year, I think that in a district like this, where the majority of the settlers depend on getting employment so as to obtain the necessary means of doing the improvements on their holdings, and many of whom are tenants of the Crown, employment on the co-operative works should be given to them as much as possible rather than to people outside the district.”

The experience of resident labourers in the North Island has been that unemployed have been sent from other parts, chiefly from the South, to compete, and, in many cases, to compete on terms made more favourable by the State, against the resident labourers. There is another matter connected with this co-operative system which I should like to point out to the Minister in charge, now that he seems inclined to have the matter made as widely known as possible. He indicates in his Statement that a treatise is being prepared on this subject for insertion in the Official Year-book of next year, which is intended to be circulated in America and Great Britain. The point is this: that the indications given by the returns to Parliament last session, and quoted by Ministers during the recess—amongst others, by the Colonial Treasurer at Oamaru—give no true index whatever as to the rate of payment per day received by these men. The system is not based on day-work but piece-work. The instructions under which the work is carried on—and these instructions, according to an answer the Minister of Lands gave early this session, are still in force—make it clear that the system is one of small contracts. In an official paper on the subject it is admitted that—

“For some of the data—as, for example, the number of hours and days worked each man—the Government overseers have to depend mainly upon information furnished by the head men of the parties, which they (the overseers) check as best they can.”

A number of these co-operative workmen were located in the Patea district about the time of the general election. The returns made for that work, as to the amounts earned per diem, were entirely fallacious. The men made up their own returns, and, of course, they indicated that they did not make a very large sum per diem, or, at any rate, not more than the ordinary rate earned in the district; but, as a matter of fact, they earned a great deal more. They represented that they worked long hours, and not only from daylight to dark, but from dark to daylight; and in one instance, which I had an opportunity of investigating, the amount of work alleged to have been done by moonlight meant that the moon there shone throughout the whole four weeks of one month. With reference to this co-operative system, I trust that it may be brought to be more in conformity with the objects which were set out in the first instance — namely, that it should go hand in hand with settlement, and that it should not be made the medium of political influence. That it has so been used, I think experience in the past would show. For my part, I know that the number of these “unemployed” sent, about the time of the general election, to the district which I had to canvass was something phenomenal. There were some five hundred or six hundred in that little district; and, although I believe the Minister of Lands was quite unaware of the fact, about two hundred of them were brought down on polling-day to be paid at a township where there was a polling-booth—a proceeding that had never occurred before or since. And with respect to another batch, a polling-booth was appointed at their camp. I trust that the experience of the past will teach Ministers to avoid such errors in the future. The system itself, as a matter of theory, is good; and I hope, as a matter of practice, it will be administered better than it has been in the past.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. WARD.—The speech which the honourable gentleman has made is a very fair criticism of the Public Works Statement. There are some points in his remarks which I should like to refer to. In the first place, the honourable gentleman criticized the observations of the Minister of Labour with reference to the legislation that has been passed this session; but he scarcely placed the position fairly. The honourable member facetiously commented upon several Bills which have been proposed during this session, and which have not been passed. I wish to say that if he looks at the record of what has taken place he will find that this session compares more than favourably with any record of the previous Parliament. The number of Bills which have received the Royal assent up to date this session is sixty-five, and they do not include the Advances to Settlers Bill, the Consols Bill, the Factories Bill, nor the Shop-hours Bill, nor those other Bills to which the honourable member alluded. I think the honourable gentleman ought to be proud of that, notwithstanding the fact that honourable members opposite have done their best this session to prevent any legislation from being passed at all.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member, I think, has opposed every reasonable suggestion which has emanated from the Treasury benches this session. There appears to have been a deep-laid scheme amongst some honourable members, my honourable friend amongst the number, to see that the Government did not have anything like the ordinary record at the end of the session. I believe that has been let out by accident from the other side of the House. At any rate, there has been an impression that efforts have been made to prevent legitimate legislation from being passed this session.

Mr. BELL.—By your side—the honourable member for Parnell and the honourable member for the Buller.

Mr. WARD.—I think the opposition has come chiefly from the other side. I do not wonder that honourable members on this side at last are not able to restrain themselves, in view of the continued and persistent way in which the Opposition have attacked the Government benches. I think it is a proper thing for members on our side of the House to resent, and resent in very strong terms, the way in which the Opposition have acted in this matter. The honourable member states that the Government has mismanaged affairs, and he says that we are deluding the people, and that deception has been practised. If this is so, let me ask honourable members, in what part of the country has there been any evidence on the part of the people to show that they think the Government has mismanaged the affairs of the colony? What did the general election show? A larger majority were returned to support the Government than has been returned to support any Government in this colony in the past. There has been no Government in office in this country whose actions and speeches have been given greater publicity, and who have been more misrepresented throughout the length and breadth of the country than the present Government. It is well known by honourable members on both sides that there has never been a Government more misrepresented in the Press of the colony than the present Government. But, notwithstanding that, the people believe the Government are doing what they believe to be best in the interests of the country. We may make mistakes, but the people know we are in earnest, and are trying to do the best we can for the good of the country. The honourable member says that the Minister of Education, in his remarks, made a complete surrender of all that was said by the Government last year. The honourable member referred to the question of borrowing and non-borrowing, and to conversions and non-conversions. The keynote was given by the honourable member for Eden—it was that of sly borrowing. People are getting tired of such statements. Let me point out that the honourable gentleman did not fail the other evening to vote for the £500,000 when it came to a division. He went into the lobby with the Government. He is prepared now to make some reasonable excuse for having voted for that loan of £500,000.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I never disguised my approval of necessary expenditure for roads and bridges.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman “never disguised it!” Why, the honourable gentleman said the Government are raising £250,000 for land for settlements, £250,000 for the purchase of Native land, and £250,000 for roads and bridges, and he holds up his hands in holy horror at what we are doing; but, as I have said, on the proposal to devote £500,000 to the purposes mentioned he was one of the first to walk into the lobby in support of the Government Bill. I can only suppose that the honourable gentleman thinks that other members of the House, and the bulk of the people of the colony, are not able to see his actual position in this matter. The honourable member for Eden also condemns the proposals of the Government; yet he also supported the Government proposal. Nearly every honourable gentleman upon that side of the House supported the Government. The honourable member for Eden and the honourable member for Patea condemn the Government, and the intelligent honourable member for Wairarapa now makes it quite clear that he not only voted with the Government but spoke that way too.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I will tell you presently.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member will endeavour to show why he supported the Government upon that occasion. Those honourable members opposite should not be afraid of their own utterances, and of votes when they give them in support of the Government, because we all know that under all circumstances they are anxious to oppose the Government. Our policy in this respect appears to be so good that even those honourable members who are opposed to us have supported those proposals in the interests of their constituencies and the country. I think it is the highest compliment which could possibly be paid to the Government, because we know that those honourable members opposite would not support us if they could possibly avoid it. Now let me deal with this question of the £50,000 loan. The honourable member referred to this loan, and he wanted to know what were the particulars of the conversion. That £50,000 loan fell due in July last, and, in accordance with the provisions of "The Consolidated Stock Act, 1884," it was converted, and the amount of sinking fund released by the operation was £59,935, of which £5,514 was used for the redemption of debentures issued under the Consolidated Stock Act, and the balance passed into the Public Works Fund in accordance with the ordinary operations of the law. The Government in doing that absolutely carried out what the law said was to be done.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Permitted it.

Mr. WARD.—Would the honourable gentleman have the Government break the law and stop it? I am surprised at the honourable member. Does he mean to say that if he was on these benches he would break the law? This conversion operation took place under the law. Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that the Government should break the law? We want to uphold the law, and it is quite right that we should do so. Now, just a word about the figures alleged to be incorrectly given in the public-works estimates, referred to by the honourable member for Patea. The honourable gentleman was quite right in saying that the summary was correct, but that the details do not in all cases agree with it; but if the honourable gentleman wants his own interpretation of the statements which he calls inaccuracies he is quite right in saying that they are so. But literally they are not so, and it is but just to the department that I should say this. The Lands Department issues the details in three separate parts, and these parts are subdivided on a different principle this year owing to the introduction of new accounts. As a matter of fact, in the summary the actual amount of the unexpended vote of the former year is taken and put into the column, but in the detailed statements the figures are given in the new accounts as now rearranged.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—There are three columns wrong.

Mr. WARD.—It does not affect the accuracy of the Public Works Statement at all. In connection with the Public Works Fund there are two important departments, the Lands Department and the Public Works Department. The Lands Department prepares a portion, the details showing the amount expended and the liabilities. In the summary made by the Public Works Department the figures are dealt with on a different basis, and it is not unusual or indicative of error or improper compiling of the Public Works Statement to find a difference between the summary and the details of the Lands Department; and it is not a mistake in the ordinary sense. I wish to say that in justice to the department. The honourable gentleman refers to the alleged fact that the Customs revenue for the June and September quarters was less by some £36,000 than for the corresponding period of last year, and he was quite right in saying that in the Financial Statement I estimated the revenue from this particular department as £55,503 less than the preceding year. But if the honourable gentleman looks at the Financial Statement he will see that I anticipated there was going to be a falling-off of revenue generally. He takes the Customs revenue and the railway revenue, which I admit have fallen off, but not to the extent contemplated. The honourable member should look at the general estimate made of the whole revenue in the Financial Statement; and what I said was this:—

"I prefer to err on the right side. Owing to bad harvest, low prices, and slight financial disturbances, the receipts from railways and Customs show a falling-off. If, then, there should be a disparity between the estimated and the actual results the discrepancy will place me in no financial difficulty. No Colonial Treasurer should run the risk of having to announce a 'deficit'—such a word should have no place in New Zealand Budgets. Having therefore considered that £4,235,000, or £133,538 less than last year, will be received during the current year, a few of the principal differences may be explained. In the Customs the estimated decrease is £55,503."

Now, the honourable gentleman says that the decrease which has taken place for the six months is £36,632 in the Customs revenue; but while the honourable gentleman states that is a larger decrease for the half-year than it ought to be, so far as the Customs revenue is concerned, upon the basis of £55,503, he ought to take into consideration the fact that in that estimate I reckoned the whole revenue would be £133,538 for the whole year less than last year. The honourable gentleman must take the whole revenue. I anticipated, myself,—as every honourable member must have known, for I stated it in the Financial Statement,—that this year our revenue would be £133,538 less than last year; and in order to be on the safe side I reduced the whole of the estimates, and I reduced them to such an extent—far over ordinary reductions made—that I left a margin of £133,538 to go and come upon. We have passed through the worst six months of the financial year—it has been so in the past—and, as the honourable gentleman knows, unless some extraordinary disturbing element arises for the time being, it is right to take a precedent for the purpose of comparison. We can only make comparisons as far as the revenue and expenditure are concerned; and, taking the preceding year, or the six months of the preceding year, I say it is the worst period through which we have passed, so far as revenue is concerned. That being so, the revenue, so far as my judgment and the judgment of responsible officers in the department goes, has not fallen below the amount which will bring it at the end of the year to the amount I announced in the Financial Statement. We are on the safe side of the wheel, and I have reason to believe the revenue will come up to the amount stated. Of course, honourable members are perfectly justified in criticizing the falling-off that has occurred; but it is a mistake to take a pessimistic or unhelpful view of this colony, and it is not good for the colony, and would not be good for any business, for any individual, or for any establishment of any kind to continually preach from the housetops the possibility that disaster is going to overtake them. I do not think, myself, the New South Wales system of advertising their revenue and expenditure weekly is a good one. I do not say it is bad, but it must be misleading. No large concern, such as a Government, with a large revenue and expenditure going on in the country—no large institution can fairly estimate, or take as a guide, one week out of fifty-two as to what is going to be the result for that year. A week is too short a period altogether. If there were a sudden inflation it would affect the revenue for good in a particular week; it would throw you completely out in estimating it upon that basis for a year. If the returns were weekly, and a sudden falling-off happened—

Mr. Ward

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I was urging monthly returns.

Mr. WARD.—Of course we get them monthly in the Treasury, and they are made up regularly, but it has not been the custom of this colony to publish the whole of the returns monthly. I do not believe in doing something that is misleading, and I believe the safest system is to take three months of the year for the purpose of information. Coming now to the railway revenue, to which the honourable gentleman referred, the estimates furnished provide for the reduced revenue for the year; and in addition to that the Commissioners believed that through the reduction of expenditure in different parts of the country the estimate they furnished would be a reliable one, and I have no reason to believe they were much out in their estimate furnished to the Treasury. I wish to refer to this because every honourable member—every one in the country who is anxious to see the revenue kept up—must remember that we have been passing through severe times. There is no doubt about that. We have more than held our own in comparison with the other colonies, and upon the whole, so far as its revenue is concerned, this colony is in my opinion in a first-rate position, considering everything. The views which the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) urged this evening I entirely disagree with. He stated that the business and commercial people in this colony were reducing their orders, and were generally in a despondent position. I do not believe that is the case. I believe that in all trades there are vicissitudes, and it must be so in this country. There are times when people curtail their orders. That goes on every year in every country; but I decline to believe that there is anything in the shape of fright, or to cause people to materially alter the system of trade in this colony. I believe the colony is in a very hopeful state, and, as far as the Government are concerned, we must do all we can to assist the country in maintaining its position. We cannot do impossibilities; we can only do our best; but I do not believe, myself, that this continuous decrying of the country by the leading public men of the colony is calculated to do any good. As the honourable member for Hawke's Bay said, we should look matters in the face—that is quite right; but to be continuously harping upon and decrying the country, anticipating that everything about us will result in evil, can do no good. As a matter of fact, men require large-heartedness to live in a country such as this, in the midst of such croaking; and yet we find leading public men of the colony, both in the House and in private life, preaching disaster. If we want the country to be hopeful and prosperous we must show hopefulness in ourselves. You cannot expect the colony to go ahead—

Captain RUSSELL.—I have received a letter to-day advising me to leave it.

Mr. WARD.—I am sorry the honourable gentleman should be advised to change, because there is no country to which the honourable gentleman could go where he could be in a better position or lead a happier life. My honourable friend smiled when he read the letter, and I believe it was because he concluded that his correspondent was entirely wrong—that his judgment was completely at sea. Look at the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. He has lived in this country for the last twenty or thirty years; he is a splendid specimen of a man, and if he had gone to other countries he would probably have been shrivelled up, and not be half the man he is. I hope the honourable gentleman is not going to leave us.

Captain RUSSELL.—I am going to stay.

Mr. WARD.—That, Sir, is what every honourable member likes to hear. Is the gentleman who has written to you living out of the colony? Captain RUSSELL.—Yes.

Mr. WARD.—There is a case in point. We know there are disseminated throughout England very adverse statements about this country; we know that people there sometimes make statements from interested motives. There is such a thing as a Stock Exchange in London; it is a medium by which large fortunes are made; and as long as human nature is human nature there are people who are prepared to rig the Stock Exchange, so far as this colony is concerned, in their own interests, and there have been statements published adverse to this country which are very far from being borne out by facts. It is true that the whole civilised world is suffering from reduced prices, and that there has been a disturbance in finance throughout the world; but to say that there is a better country to which to remove compared with New Zealand is to say something that I wholly decline to believe. What we are suffering from is want of population: that is one of the principal things.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Undesirable immigrants.

Mr. WARD.—There are one or two causes. We have some undesirable residents. There are a few people in the colony who are always prepared to speak against it. The gentleman who wrote that letter to the leader of the Opposition has doubtless received a communication from some one here who has made him believe that this is an undesirable country, and he will not come here and see for himself, but invites the leader of the Opposition to leave the country. I say the Public Works Statement is one that I believe to be in the general interests of the country. The roading and bridging of the country is as important to-day as it was twenty years ago, and more so. There are fresh places daily opened up, and it is humanly impossible for people to go to remote places to make a living for themselves and their families and to be able to carry on without those necessary adjuncts of settlement—roads and bridges. If you look through the Public Works Statement—an honourable gentleman says they have not had time to study it, but I am surprised at that, for if they look through it it is clear there is on the face of it what will develop the country, provide for the promotion of settlement, and assist the settlers in various parts of the colony. The general desire on the part of the Government was to see that the moneys available are distributed fairly from one end of the colony to the other. There has been no such thing—as has been suggested by the honourable member for Patea—as an attempt to give the loaves and fishes to the supporters of the Government. I say the moneys of the colony have been fairly and equitably distributed, and I can say that, in what took place when the public-works estimates were being considered, individuals were not considered at all, but simply whether the various parts of the country required the expenditure of money for the purpose of promoting settlement. That was the one consideration that actuated the Government. I say that the money has been fairly distributed to the best of our ability. Now, I can only say that, so far as the Public Works Statement is concerned, the Premier has nothing to fear from the comments made against it. Without wishing to say anything offensive, I must say that I think it is the most indifferent criticism of a Public Works Statement that I have listened to since I have been in the House. The one thing that has been borne upon my mind is the impression that honourable members have made adverse statements as though they regretted speaking against their conscience and their judgment, and that the circumstances in which they were placed compelled them to say what they do not really think.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON.—We have had so much about railways, roads, and bridges that I have determined to throw aside all that I intended to say on that subject, but I have a few words of truth and soberness to say upon a cognate question. Before doing so, however, there is a little matter somewhat personal to myself to which I may refer for half a minute. My honourable friend the member for Wanganui, in putting a question to the Premier the other day, took occasion to show that I had been misinformed in a statement I made in the House regarding the treatment of railway maintenance-men, and I understand he quoted some resolution of the men at Aramoho to prove his contention. I was not in the House at the time, but if I had been I could not have got an opportunity of referring to the subject; and I only do so now to say that I quite appreciate the public disclaimer of the men. And, while I am satisfied of the bona fides of what I stated, I am not going to adduce any proof on the subject, for a very good and sufficient reason. It has been the standing reproach of the Railway Commissioners during their official career that any one—any one, at least, in the lower grades of the service—who may make a complaint is a marked man, and he suffers accordingly. Therefore I am not going to imperil the daily bread of any man or number of men, in the circumstances; but the fact that attention has been directed to certain facts may lead to some improvement, and in that case my object will be gained. And now for the subject to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. On several occasions lately we have heard a good deal about the “unemployed” question; but it is one of more gravity than the members of the Government, or of this House, appear to suppose. I know perfectly well that the desire of the Government is to do all that occurs to them as possible in the way of finding employment for those out of work. And I do not wish to approach the question in any pessimistic spirit. I think we may look hopefully forward to improvement in the demand for labour through the important legislation we are passing. Cheap money will enable settlers to improve, and improvement means employment of labour. The purchase of land and opening it up by means of roads and bridges also spells work and wages in the near future. Present legislation, as it seems to me, is all tending in this hopeful direction. Nevertheless, I must emphasize the fact of urgency in dealing with this question of the unemployed. There is a general depression throughout the colony—no use in putting too fine a point upon it—and there is a want of hopefulness in the community, so that this question is above all others the pressing question of the day and the hour. Not only is it so here, but over a large portion of the civilised world.

11.80. Yet, with the best intentions, neither the House nor the Government appear to have arrived at any clear or definite policy regarding it. Our efforts are fitful, spasmodic, and very much from hand to mouth. Sometimes we might almost gather from Ministers that the care of labour was specially a State function; at other times there is something like an indignant denial of the duty of the State to find work for the unemployed, Ministers on these occasions speaking as if they were apostles of a moribund political economy—Carlyle's "dismal science." I am not going to discuss the sphere and duties of the State just now in this respect; it seems enough for me to say that I do not think there is a kindly and considerate or thoughtful man on either side of this House but is convinced at least in some dim and benighted way that the Government, as representing all sorts and conditions of men, is bound, either directly by the pressure of emancipating law, or by the organic adjustment of economic forces generally, to take care that there shall be at least self-sustaining employment and a living wage for every member of the community. But there is no practical application of this idea, and in consequence we go on drifting in all directions. For example: we have a notable scheme of meddling and muddling in a piece of work being just now carried out by the "unemployed" in the City of Wellington—a piece of work which will illustrate my position better than any abstract reasoning. This work has received the fullest approval of the Premier of the colony. I find a résumé in the newspapers of what my honourable friend said at the Labour Demonstration the other day. Here it is:—

"Speaking of the large number of men who had been out of work during the winter, he paid a high compliment to the citizens of Wellington for raising funds for the Queen's Drive relief-works. In that respect Wellington had set a noble example to the rest of the colony, and the Government had only been too glad to assist. He regretted, however, that, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, the money raised had not been expended in opening up the back-country."

It is not likely the Wellington people would subscribe money to open up the back-country.

Mr. SEDDON.—I said much more than that on the subject.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON.—This is a résumé, and I presume it is correct enough. It may not be, but I read a more enlarged copy in the Times this morning, and it is to the same effect.

Mr. SEDDON.—I said I should like to see these men working on roads, and alongside these roads blocks of land on which they could build homes, whither they could take their wives and children, and never again trouble the citizens for help on relief-works.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON.—That does not alter the state of things as far as I am concerned. I dare say, when the Premier is on the stump, he must not be taken too seriously. His good nature leads him to indulge in what Tennyson describes as "vacant chaff, well meant for grain." He could not, however, have well said anything more discouraging to those who are seeking to elevate labour out of the horrid grind to which capital has subjected it. Not only, however, has the Premier complimented the citizens of Wellington and praised their noble example, but this notable piece of work has also been made the text of a glowing panegyric by the Inspector of Hospitals and Charitable Institutions in his annual report recently presented to this House. I stand up for the most full and free expression of individual opinion. From his well-known ability, Dr. MacGregor is entitled to be heard on any public question; but I am not sure that a State paper—a paper for which this House is in some sense responsible—should be made the vehicle of statements which, I know, must be repudiated by a large majority of the members of this House. Let me read this panegyric:—

"Three private gentlemen in a few days raised a sum of £600, which, together with a sum of £500 contributed by the City Council, was handed over unconditionally to the Benevolent Society. These gentlemen were associated with some of the trustees as a sub-committee to look after the spending of the money. This is being done in such a vigorous and intelligent fashion that I believe there will be no more trouble with the unemployed this winter. Every man who wants work will get it. All will get enough to live on, but no loafing will be tolerated; and it is provided that no man who is able to work, and refuses, will be permitted to get charitable aid either for himself or his family. This is a new departure of the most hopeful augury that a time is coming very soon when no money will be raised by the Central Government to be expended in outdoor relief by local bodies, and when all outdoor relief will be paid for out of direct local taxation. It is, in my opinion, the only plan by which this young country can escape disaster, due to its investing a large part of the consolidated revenue in the permanent degradation of the people."

I hope the House will bear with me while I tell them a little more about this new departure which, the Premier says, is a noble example to the rest of the colony, and which Dr. MacGregor describes as of the most hopeful augury. What work are the unemployed set to do? They are employed in making a road round the hills in the neighbourhood of Wellington—a road leading nowhere in particular, but which will form a fine carriage-drive for the wealthy citizens of Wellington. Now, let there be no mistake. I am not objecting to the making of this drive; quite otherwise. I am not objecting to it, although it is made to skirt the hitherto unsaleable property of a land syndicate which has failed in a dozen different attempts to get rid of its bargain on any ordinary terms. No doubt this road is intended by its promoters to give a help to this commercial speculation. I am not sure but one or other of our banks may be interested in it. This, however, is by the way; and, as I have said, I have no objection to the making of a carriage-drive for the wealthy people of Wellington. What I do object to is the making of it largely at the public expense. Three private gentlemen, we are told, took this work in hand, and they raised £600 by voluntary contribution. Very good; no one quarrels with that result. Next they got the City Council to give them £500. I do not understand this operation; and, as a small ratepayer in the City of Wellington, I here take leave to direct the attention of the Controller and Auditor-General to this City Council grant. The work is entirely beyond the boundaries of the borough; and, although the Municipal Corporations Act does permit money to be spent in extra-borough work for the convenience or recreation of the citizens, it only does so when done in conjunction with some other municipal body. So far as I am aware, there is no other such body connected with this work; and here, in the meantime, I leave this point. The voluntary subscriptions and the Wellington City Council grant, making £1,100, were then supplemented by an equal sum from the Government—another £1,100. You may have noticed—and I am astonished at the omission—that Dr. MacGregor, in the extract I read, makes no reference to the large sum paid by the Government. Indeed, one might rather suppose there could have been no such payment, because his panacea for the country is that no money shall be raised by the Central Government to be expended in outdoor relief by local bodies, and that all outdoor relief shall be paid for out of direct local taxation. Considering the Government found the one-half of the whole of the sum expended on the work, and another fourth of it was taken from money levied for the maintenance and lighting of streets, there is not much local taxation here for outdoor relief. But I am not discussing charitable aid just now. I am speaking of the Government paying over £1,100 of public money, ostensibly through the Benevolent Society, to three private gentlemen, and to this payment, under the circumstances, I object with all the earnestness of which I am capable. Let me give my reasons for so objecting, and at the same time let me not be misunderstood. I do not object to the Government aiding local bodies in providing work for the unemployed, but I do object, and I hope the House will object, to public money being given to sweat the labour of the unemployed for the benefit of a small class in any district. This work,

Mr. W. Hutchison

Sir, is being done at a rate of wages which is a scandal to us as a community. And this is the head and front of my objection to the work done, and to the participation of the Government in the doing of it. The rate of wages paid these men is 3s., 4s., and 5s. a day, the 5s. being the exceptional rate which proves the rule of the 3s. and 4s. The "bosses," who do not work, get 6s. a day, and they execute their supervision so effectively as to obtain the commendation of Dr. MacGregor—"The supervision is vigorous and intelligent; no loafing tolerated." No; I am assured the poor men can hardly draw their breath over the work. Slavery was not a patch upon it. And, when I tell the members of this House that about three and a half days' work on an average is all that the weather has hitherto permitted the workers—meaning by such an average that able-bodied men are paid 10s., 12s., and 14s. a week—members will have some idea of what this "work for the unemployed" means. When Dr. MacGregor says in this extract that all will get enough to live on,—indicating that 10s., 12s., and 14s. a week is enough to live on, not only for single men, but for married men with wives and families,—I wonder—I shall never cease to wonder—how gentlemen like Dr. MacGregor, in the enjoyment of large salaries, which permit a good deal of loafing—there is no loafing for the unemployed—I wonder how they make their calculations. I have done. I have discharged what was to me a very unpleasant but a most imperative duty. I charge the Government—I dare say they did it unwittingly—with a gross misappropriation of the public funds to sweat the labour of unfortunate working-men, and in doing so indirectly to give a downward tendency to the rate of wages all over the colony. Furthermore, we are about to separate without any definite proposals for providing work for our large army of labourers. I submit that in this also the Government is greatly to blame. Any legislation, however important it may otherwise be, is comparatively of small account alongside of the great question of how the masses of the people are to live, and to live more abundantly. And I venture to tell the Government, and to tell the House, that this is the question that will more and more force itself upon public attention, and until it is settled other questions may come and go, and we may pass Bank Bills and Consols Bills as we please, but there can be no rest, and no real progress, until we have solved this most important of all economic questions.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Sir, the honourable gentleman who has just sat down generally succeeds in taking a line of action which this House has long ago recognised as peculiar to himself. His peculiar rôle is, by a hint or allusion capable of a double meaning, to put what men generally consider a meritorious action in a somewhat suspicious light, which would lead us to believe that those who performed such actions were working really in their own selfish interests. The honourable gentleman was at one time a citizen of Wellington, and held an honourable position, and to-night he seems to find a malicious pleasure in depreciating the laudable action of Wellington citizens to assist the unemployed. I think he could have found a better occupation than that. The Wellington people need no defence from me, but I think they have shown a good example in many things to other parts of the colony. I need only instance the Manawatu Railway as showing what Wellington enterprise and self-reliance have enabled them to do. The honourable gentleman was not at all justified in sneering at the generous people who have assisted the unemployed here, by asserting that they were a syndicate to improve their own properties; and I am glad that his remarks did not meet with any approval in this House; nor will they meet with any throughout the country. Now, I wish to make a few remarks, to begin with, on the delay in bringing down the Public Works Statement. The Statement itself says it was quite unavoidable. It says the ways and means available could not be ascertained until the money Bills in connection with the improvement of Crown lands and the purchase of Native lands were carried. Then the Statement goes on to say that many other questions of an exceptional character had to be dealt with, which could not brook delay, and that the Public Works Statement could not therefore be brought down at an earlier date. Well, I have just looked over the Order Paper, and, out of a few items, would ask the Premier whether, amongst them, there are not a good many that could very well indeed brook delay. The Noxious Weeds Bill, for instance.

Mr. SEDDON.—That never was up.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It was introduced with others. Then, there were the Masters and Apprentices Bill, the Rating on Unimproved Value Bill, the Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, the Licensing Bill, the Hawkers and Pedlars Bill, the Legitimation Bill, the Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Bill, the Land-tax Bill, the Auctioneers Bill, the Pawnbrokers Bill, the Riverton Harbour Board Empowering Bill, the Municipal Corporations Bill. The Government wasted considerable time on some of these measures, and I do not think they have the hardihood to tell the House that these are measures that would not brook delay, or for which they were justified in delaying the Public Works Statement. Then, the Hon. the Minister of Education denied that the Government had been gadding about the country and had no policy measures prepared, and he mentioned a long list of Bills that the Government had brought down on such and such a date. On looking up one of the Order Papers, dated the 22nd June, I find some of the Bills which the honourable gentleman brought down, amongst them being the Masters and Apprentices Bill. When the honourable gentleman asked leave to introduce it, was that Bill ready? No; the Bill was brought down in such a crude form that the House would have none of it, and he had to remove it from the Order Paper. Another Bill introduced on the same day was the Immigration Bill, but it is now on the Order Paper under the name of the Undesirable Immigrants Bill—the scorn and derision of the whole colony. Notice was given to introduce it on the 2nd October. Then, there is the Eight Hours Bill: has that Bill been dealt with yet?

Mr. REEVES.—Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Well, I am not aware of it. Leave was given to introduce it on the same day, and yet the House did not get possession of it until the 16th August. The first edition of the Land Assessment Bill was introduced on the 28th June, but the present edition was not brought down until the 7th September. Now, if I similarly followed the Bills introduced by other members of the Ministry, the contention of the Minister that the Government had met the House with their policy Bills prepared would vanish into thin air. Then, the Minister for Public Works tells us that he initiated a new departure when he introduced the Bill to borrow £250,000 for the improvement of Crown lands, and a similar sum for the purchase and roading of Native lands. If that was a new departure, then the Government for the first time stands self-confessed as a borrowing Government; but, as a matter of fact, legislation was passed in 1892 for exactly the same purpose—namely, to raise £50,000 annually for the roading of Crown lands, and £50,000 for the purchase of Native lands. Where, then, is the new departure? What was the honourable gentleman thinking of when he compiled the Public Works Statement?

Mr. SEDDON.—It was a new departure to the extent of £400,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It was merely an extension of a policy which the House sanctioned in a previous session—that and nothing more. Then, Sir, the Colonial Treasurer twitted me—and I am sorry he is not in his place—with voting for the Bill providing for these highly-desirable objects; but my reply to that is this:

12.0. I have always approved of the principle. I spoke in favour of it on the second reading of the Bill, and conscientiously gave my vote for it. What would the honourable gentleman have said, knowing, as he does, that I was strongly in favour of assisting any Government to push settlement, if because I happened to be on the Opposition side I had voted against the Bill simply on party grounds? I did object to the large amount the Government was empowered to raise under the Bill, but I did not in any way object to—I strongly approved of—the raising of moderate sums of money to open up Crown lands, because the greater part of the land which the Government has at its disposal cannot be profitably used by settlers unless they are assisted in making roads to get their produce to market, and more especially is that the case with regard to bush land suitable for dairying purposes. If we are to have the dairy factories made a success we must enable the settlers to get their milk to them, and their produce to the market. I did not expect any large sum for my district, and the estimates show that I was not mistaken; but I do not complain much of this, because the needs of the bush districts are much greater than of mine. Another thing the Minister might have mentioned in the Statement, that they intended to devote a much larger sum to the opening-up of roads to Crown lands, because it would give much more employment than if the money were devoted to railway purposes. If the Government had proposed a railway policy, a large proportion of the money would have been employed in the purchase of material. The Government were astute enough to see this, and that, I dare say, was one reason for this new departure. The policy of the Government since they came into office has, unfortunately for the country, been one which has largely destroyed private enterprise. Their policy has crippled the private wages-fund, and they find the tide of the "unemployed" pressure rising up around them in all directions; and their hope was that this new policy, in direct contradiction to that under which they came into office, might furnish a way by which they could save themselves. The private wages-fund, which enterprise has always furnished, has, because of Government menaces, failed the working-classes for the last two or three years, and hence Government are compelled in self-protection to resort to their present policy. This is one of the main reasons why they have turned their backs upon the policy of the late Mr. Ballance. What does the Public Works Statement say? "The distress during the winter—more particularly in the large centres—has been exceedingly great, and it devolved upon the Government to meet this unforeseen difficulty." The position, without question, is a very serious one. All over the colony we have distress amongst the unemployed. All over the colony, no matter in what enterprise business-men are engaged, whether in trade or in the occupation of lands, we have the same want of confidence exhibited. It is almost alarming to find such a free expression in this direction, not only amongst men who may be accused of a party bias, but of all classes, whether they support the Government or the Opposition side of politics; and if the Government pursue their present course there is no question that the position, serious as it is, will be much more serious as time goes on. I really hope the Government will take a lesson from their past experience, and abandon the policy they have been so steadily pursuing—namely, that of attacking those who have been foremost in enterprise since the foundation of the colony. The Minister of Labour particularly is always foremost in this direction, and has done enormous injury to the colony. The Colonial Treasurer told the House that the colony is in excellent condition—that everything is very hopeful and in a healthful condition. The experience of every thoughtful man unfortunately shows the contrary to be the case. Numbers of men are out of employment all over the colony; and if the Government are not able to borrow sufficient money they are endeavouring to do so to take up the unemployed, when private enterprise should as heretofore have done so. It would be wrong if I passed from this subject without acknowledging that the Government are not altogether to blame for this,—that the low price of produce has not been conducive to the employment of labour; that, no matter what Government was in office, we could not expect wages to be so high as they have been, or the labouring-classes to be fully employed; but there is no question whatever that the policy of the Government has intensified the difficulty. The Government complain that the leading men of the colony are denouncing them. My experience has not so much been that the leading men throughout the colony are denouncing the Government, but that they are denouncing the policy which has destroyed confidence and prevented all enterprise from reaping its reward. The Statement goes on to say that the settlement of the people on the land is the only thing to bring about permanent prosperity. There can be no doubt that is a very important part of the policy of any country. But I am afraid some of the so-called settlement will not lead to much permanent prosperity. I ask the Minister of Lands, for instance, what about the special-settlement system? He himself has acknowledged that it has not been very successful.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I never did.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Has not the honourable gentleman practically acknowledged the failure of the system by abandoning it? Then, there are other directions in which he has been endeavouring to promote settlement, and I for one am very far from contending that he has not been doing his best, but I am afraid his efforts have not been, and will not be, very successful. The Statement goes on to say that never in the history of the colony has public money been spent to such an extent on roads as compared with railways. I am not permitted, under the Standing Orders, to make more than a passing reference to a Bill on the Order Paper. I refer to the £618,000 proposed to be paid as a subsidy to the Midland Railway. It is nothing but right that the Government should have taken account of this in the comparison made between the expenditure on roads as compared with that on railways.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is mentioned in the Statement.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Very well, if this were added to the amount of money put down in the railway schedule, what would become of the position the Premier set out in the tables? The position would be altered altogether. It would mean something like the expenditure of a million on railways as against about one-third of a million on roads.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is spread over four years.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—If the Government had only taken up the Manawatu Railway, and spent a similar amount on its purchase, it would make a material difference to the prosperity of the colony. Similarly, if sufficient money had been expended to open the Eketahuna-Woodville Section, how much better that would be than frittering away money on such railways as the Grahamstown-Te Aroha and other sections I could name! The honourable gentleman always harps on the importance of getting the control of the railways for the people. Well, the Construction Branch of the Public Works Department has always been under the control of the Minister; and when we look at the allotment of money year after year, and realise that the foolish expenditure on these railway-works has meant a yearly addition to the taxation of the colony, then we can say but very little in favour of the control of the railways by the people, if this is to be an example of it. I hope the control of the working railways by the people will not result so unfavourably. I fear, myself, that the administration by the Minister will be anything but equal to that of the past under the Commissioners. One word as to the £54,681 of sinking fund which the Government has seized. The Treasurer asked me whether I would have the Government break the law by doing anything else with this amount than what they had done—namely, to pass it into the Public Works Fund for expenditure. The honourable gentleman knows very well that the Government could have used the sinking fund for paying off the loan to which it belonged, as was done under the Atkinson Government. That would not be breaking the law. But no; the Government is determined, as in the past, to increase the net debt of the colony, and go in for further borrowing. This can only result in increased taxation; and there can be no doubt at all that some friends of the Government would be glad to levy protective taxation on the colony. Now a word as to the co-operative system. The honourable gentleman tells us that the co-operative system has given satisfactory results. I have never condemned that system as a system. I believe it to be a perfectly sound one under certain conditions. Every settler in the country is accustomed to employ labour on small contracts under the co-operative system; but I have always denied that the Government could do so on a large scale, except at a great disadvantage. I defy any Minister, no matter how careful he may be, to control the system effectively, as the conditions are such that he cannot efficiently do so. We have only to look at the expenditure that has taken place during the recess in connection with these buildings. I visit Wellington occasionally to attend to business of various descriptions, and I had a look at these buildings during the time the alterations were being carried on.

Mr. SEDDON.—It was done on wages, not on the co-operative system at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I have had to do with the carrying-out of various descriptions of work in the colony during nearly forty years past, and I never witnessed such waste of labour. I do not wish to say anything further about the Public Works Statement. I suppose the Government will force it through, but I regret very much indeed that the Government has determined to borrow these large sums of money. I am certain that before long the taxpayers of the colony will feel the effect of it severely. But I can only enter my protest.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I have a considerable amount of diffidence in getting up to make anything like a fair speech at this hour of the morning, and especially after the speech we have just heard from the honourable member who has just sat down. I am sure, knowing the honourable gentleman as I do, and knowing what we are used to hearing from him on an important occasion like this, that his speech shows clearly to me and to the House that he has really very little to find fault with in the Statement we are now discussing when he confines himself to the remarks he has made to-night. I suppose it was merely to keep up his reputation that he would not allow such an important document to pass through the House without making some remarks, and this was really the reason why he got up to speak at all. First of all he referred to the bringing-down of the estimates at so late a stage of the session as we have done this year. Now, the reason was exactly stated by my colleague when he said that we did not know until our policy Bills passed the House what amount of money we were likely to have, and, if we had prepared the Public Works Statement and brought down these estimates before those Bills were through, then perhaps we should have found ourselves short by a quarter of a million of the amount we required for these estimates. We had to wait until such time as the House passed our policy Bills before we could frame the Public Works Statement or the estimates. Who is the cause of the delay in those Bills not being introduced at an earlier stage, and not being passed through the House at an earlier stage? I venture to say the honourable gentleman himself had a good deal to do with it; and when he accuses the members of the Government, and the party who support them in this House, with not being prepared to discuss measures in this House, I think I may say that from the very first day of the session we were able to find work every night for the House, until members cried out, "Let us get home." Were we not accused of driving the business too fast, of keeping members here too late at night, and of forcing measure after measure upon them without giving sufficient time to consider them? And now at this stage we are told we had not the business ready. I say we had any amount of business ready, and sufficient to keep us going until Christmas if members are prepared to stop and do it, and business, Sir, that I venture to say would be in the interest of the colony. We have arrived now at a stage of the session, as we always do, when it comes to near the sheep-shearing time, when certain honourable members are most anxious to get back to their homes and their big estates.

Mr. CROWTHER.—And little ones too.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—They all want to go home. That is quite right; and I venture to say that these honourable gentlemen—the wool-kings in the House—are most anxious to go home, because it is coming to that stage when all their preparations have to be made for the sheep-shearing, and they have to see that everything is ready, and gathered together for the harvest which they expect it to bring in to them.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I will stop until Christmas, if necessary.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—If you are prepared to stop until Christmas, and if you are prepared to get a majority of the members to stay until then, we can find you enough business to do. My colleague here suggests certain reasons which I believe would induce the honourable gentleman to stop in Wellington on the present occasion. However, I am not going to say anything about that. Let us come to the question of borrowing. I wish to say a few words upon that because several of the members who spoke on this subject to-night—and not only to-night, but on many previous occasions during the present session—have accused the Government of borrowing, and have been accusing the Government of trying to expend too much money in opening up the lands of the colony, and we are continually being told that the colony cannot afford to make this expenditure. I ask honourable members, are we going to stop the progress of colonisation in this country or are we not? If we are not going to stop the colonisation of the colony, then we must have the means of pushing on this colonisation, and, if we stop short even for one year in the progress which we think should be made in connection with the opening-up of the lands of the colony for settlement, that will be a retrograde step, and a young colony like this should never think of doing that. And I say that those honourable gentlemen who say that the colony cannot afford to borrow money to be expended in opening up its own lands for settlement purposes so as to enable the people of this colony to get homes for themselves and to become producers, thus adding to the wealth of the country, ought to be able to come to this House and show that they have a policy by which that work can be done. If their policy proved to be such that the people of the colony could approve of it, then the colony would very soon put them on these benches to carry out that policy; and when they condemn the policy the present Government are now carrying on, and have been carrying on since they came into office, then, I say, they should be prepared to substitute something better in its place. It is very easy pulling down, but it is a different matter altogether to build up, and those who are so continually preaching that the policy of the present Government is ruining the colony ought to show to the House and to the colony how they are prepared to carry on the progress of the country, and, if they can show a better policy, I have no doubt the country will take them up. I should like to know how we are to open up the country without roads and bridges. It is impossible to put people on the land without them. You may open up the country on maps and on paper—but if you do it for settlement purposes, and in order to induce people to go upon the land, and if you want to keep them there, you must give them access to the country, so as to enable them to get their produce away from it to the market, before you are able to make good settlers of them. Is the honourable member prepared to show me how he is to get land for settlement? Is it not necessary in the North Island to buy land from the Natives before you can get it for Europeans to settle upon?

Mr. J. McKenzie

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I hear “No,” Sir. Well, I suppose the honourable gentleman’s meaning is that the Natives should be asked to lease their land, and that the colony should not buy it. What would be the result? Are the Natives in this colony prepared to survey their own land, to road it, and offer it to the settlers? I know what the honourable gentleman would do. He would ask the Natives to lease their land to Europeans, and the colony would have to survey and road it and get the settlers to pay eventually for doing this. Such a policy as that is not a policy the people would stand for one moment.

Sir R. STOUT.—Who has proposed such a policy?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I say no one proposes it; but the honourable gentleman says we should not buy Native land for settlement purposes, and I am supposing the only policy in that case would be to get the Natives to lease their land. Now, I say, without fear of contradiction, that we shall have to buy Native land from year to year for the purposes of settlement in the North Island; and also in the same way we shall have to repurchase some of the estates in the South Island, which we intend to purchase and cut up under the Land for Settlements Bill, so as to be able to keep sufficient land for settlement for the young colonists of New Zealand. I heard the honourable member for Hawke’s Bay ask to-night how we were going to find the interest if we borrowed any more money. I stated then that we could do it by increasing our population. And if we are not going to keep our young population that is growing up in New Zealand, what is to become of the colony? Are we going to send them to the other colonies to get land to settle upon when we have sufficient land to give them ourselves? Not at all.

Captain RUSSELL.—Do you not know that we have more settlement here than in any other colony in Australasia?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—We should not take a pattern from the other colonies, because I venture to say that they are far behind in the way of settlement. When I was there some eight years ago they were mere wildernesses, in my opinion, in the country districts. Our people will not go there if they can help it, for there is better land in New Zealand; but if your policy were carried out you would force them to go, because they would have nothing to keep them here. I say, without fear of contradiction, we have in this colony a large number of settlers' sons growing up who are ready to go on the land, and these are the very class to place on the land, and to encourage to go on the land and carry on the work of colonisation. If we do that our producing-power will from year to year be getting better, and we shall be in a better position to pay interest on our debt. Then, the honourable member for Wairarapa stated that I had acknowledged that my special settlements were a failure. I never acknowledged anything of the sort. I never acknowledged any of the special settlements were a failure. Some years ago members of the House, when I brought down a statement of the number of special settlers for whom land was provided, because they did not find that all the men included in the return were on the land, said the whole thing was a failure—that it was a paper settlement; and we had speech after speech delivered from those benches to endeavour to show it was a failure. Where is the failure? Those honourable gentlemen repeated the thing so often that they were actually beginning to believe much of the state of things which they raised in their own imagination was true. I stated on that occasion, in my place here, that no doubt in these special-settlement associations there was a certain number of persons among them who would not be good settlers, and were not going to take up the land when the time came for them to do so; and that has turned out to be quite correct. There was a percentage of these people who were only speculators; but we have been able to weed them out; and I may tell the House this: that almost every one of these speculators in any of these associations has been weeded out, and the sections set aside for them have immediately been taken up by other

12.30. people. That being the case, I do not think it can be said that special settlements have been a failure. The honourable gentleman said that I have stopped special settlements. I have not stopped them altogether, but I have checked them, and for this reason: that I have not land to give them. I venture to say that I could get twenty special settlements if I had sufficient land to offer them. We have not got the land, and that is one reason why we want to get land for these special settlements. We were also accused of destroying confidence in this country. We have not destroyed confidence in the country. It is true there are a few people in the country—very few, I may say—who go about crying down the colony, and crying down the present Government, and saying it is destroying confidence in the country; but I think it will take a great deal more to show that that is correct. What is destroying confidence in the country is the financial institutions, and the manner in which they have conducted their business for years past. I refer to such institutions as the firm of Harper and Co., Christchurch, and the Loan and Mercantile Agency Company, and the Australian banks. These are the institutions that are destroying confidence in the country. If you go and get information from Home, is it the colony that is spoken against? Have our bonds gone down in the Home-market? Not at all. Our bonds are higher than they ever were before; but where are the shares in these financial institutions which I have referred to? What had this Government to do with the Loan and Mercantile Agency Company coming down? It was walking on the brink of a precipice before we took office. How could we destroy confidence in that firm? How could we prevent such a thing as the firm of Harper and Co. coming to grief, seeing that the losses of that firm were made long before we came into office? I might go into the question of the Australian banks, and show how they came down last year. What was the result of that? All their branches in this colony put the screw on, and commenced to pull in. We have that in evidence before a Committee of this House—that advances were called in in order to send money over to the other side to support rotten institutions over there. That is what has destroyed confidence, and that is what has reduced the wages-money used in this country; and if the Government had not come to the rescue, and assisted to find work for the people, what would have been the consequences? There would have been great trouble and distress. I dare say that might have suited some people, because they would then have got the working-people to work for starvation wages.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Yes; I can point to a case where the president of an institution in London stated that he could not hold out any hopes to his company that the company could pay more than 15 per cent. until the wages came down in New Zealand. They were not satisfied with 15 per cent., but the wages must come down in New Zealand, so that something more could be dragged out of this colony to pay speculators in the Old Country who send their money out here. I can point it out in black and white, if the honourable gentleman thinks that I am saying what is not correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It would not be fair to accuse the settlers of this colony because a single individual in London happens to say that.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I do not want to allege anything with regard to the settlers of this country—I mean such settlers as the honourable gentleman himself. I do not complain of them. The gentlemen who improve their estates, who spend their money in the country and employ people—I have no fault to find with them; but I have fault to find with those large companies which send out money here, and which get certain people here under their thumb, so that those persons become nothing more than managers of their stations: when they do that it is they who do the grinding business in New Zealand. I think, when we are accused of having a large number of unemployed in this country, we ought to look at the past as well as the present. I remember a time when we had large sums of money being spent—three times the amount of money which is being spent now—and still we had unemployed amongst us, and this House had to find large sums of money year after year for the unemployed. I venture to say that we have had fewer unemployed during the last winter than we have had on many occasions when there were very large sums of public money being spent by the Government on contracts. When we come to the question of the co-operative system of work it is said that there is a great deal of waste, and all sorts of things are brought up against the Government in connection with that system, but not one word is said about the fact that we have not such a thing as a wealthy contractor now in the colony. What has become of those contractors who made their thousands per annum in this colony? Since we stopped the contract system and started the co-operative system they have left the colony and gone to other countries where they can make big profits. If a few co-operative-works men make 6d. a day more than some people think fair wages, it is said that there is waste. How can there be waste when these co-operative works are carried out under the present system? The men are paid in accordance with the amount of work they do. Occasionally, some of these men, by working very hard, may have pay-sheets which show that they have made pretty fair wages, but it cannot be said that the system is extravagant in any way. Not one word is said about the extravagance of the system of the past, and the large profits made by the big contractors. Then, the honourable gentleman referred to the railways. He is of opinion that the control of the railways being handed back to the colony will not be satisfactory. I would ask him and other honourable members if the system of railway-management under the Commissioners has given satisfaction to the settlers of New Zealand. I venture to say that you will find many settlers in New Zealand who, if they give a straightforward opinion, will tell you that they have found fault from time to time with the Commissioners. Have not members of this House who represent country districts received letters from time to time complaining of the management of the railways? I, myself, have received hundreds of such letters since I have become a Minister. You cannot make large numbers of the settlers believe but that the Government control the Commissioners. They will insist on sending their complaints to the Government, saying that the railways are Government railways, and therefore Government has control over them. I know what I thought when the House handed over the railways to the Commissioners.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Did you not vote for it yourself?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I voted for it. I will tell the honourable gentleman why. I have stated it twice already, but will do so again. I was satisfied, myself, that the railways would never be managed to the satisfaction of the settlers so long as Mr. Maxwell was at the head of the department, and I voted to take the railways out of the hands of Mr. Maxwell. To my disgust, I found that the very gentleman whom I and others voted to get rid of was made one of the Commissioners. When that was done I lost all confidence in the railways being well managed as long as they were under his control. No doubt Mr. Maxwell is an able engineer, but he is a man quite unsuitable for the management of the railways. He has no sympathy with the settlers. He looked upon the settlers as machines to have as much money dragged out of them as possible. He did not care one straw what the results might be to the settlers themselves, so long as he could make the railways pay. I think the last election proved beyond doubt that the settlers were of that opinion. I recollect the question being brought up by a certain number of busybodies who called themselves Chambers of Commerce, and by other similar associations—by numbers of wealthy agents and the representatives of large estates. These people sent a circular round to certain people asking their opinions with regard to railway management. They sent circulars to those people who they knew perfectly well would give a reply of the kind which they desired, and they published those replies in the Press. But hundreds of settlers who had as much right to have a voice in the matter never saw that circular, and knew nothing about it. I should like to know if the Chamber of Commerce of Dunedin represents the settlers of the country. That body consists of a few people in Bond Street, who hate the present Government as much as any class of men can hate another class. And why? Because the present Government is not carrying out the administration of the country to their satisfaction—that is, to suit their pockets. I could take these gentlemen one after another and I could show that they are men whom no one has any confidence in in matters affecting the welfare of the country settlers. They simply pay their guinea and become members of the Chamber of Commerce. They meet in conclave, and anything done by the Government which is not exactly to their own liking, or which does not suit their own special business, must be wrong, in their opinion. They were prepared, of course, to approve of the railway-management of the Commissioners. Now, we are told that new taxation will be necessary. We have been told two or three times to-night that if the policy of the present Government is carried out new taxation will be necessary. There is no reason to suppose that new taxation will be necessary—none whatsoever. I have no doubt this cry is got up as one of those cries which honourable gentlemen opposite do get up occasionally for the purpose of tickling the ears of certain people. We have heard them during the last four years, from that side of the House, getting up some new cry which they think will take with the people they think they represent. But at the close of the previous three years, when we went to the people the gentlemen of that party found that their cries did not take with the people. I understand that their next cry is to be that the policy of the Government is bound to bring about increased taxation. I have no doubt that the prophecies in this case will be just about as true as the prophecies which have been made in the past by the honourable gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, one word with regard to the Cheviot Estate, referred to by the honourable member for Wairarapa. The honourable member went down there and saw the Cheviot Estate, and came to a certain conclusion.

Mr. J. McKensie

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I referred to the cooperative works there.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Now I come to the public-works estimates, and I suppose I know more about them than any other member in this House, because I had to do with putting them together. I find the honourable member for Patea made a very glaring mistake. He calculated up these estimates, and pointed out that they did not tally. The honourable gentleman is not in his place, but some honourable member may tell him how he muddled up this matter and made the mistake he did. But honourable members must see that this year we have got a new source of money, from which we have provided for roads, and that is the £150,000 taken from the £250,000 for roads and bridges and improving lands. A large number of the votes of last year had to be transferred to that vote, and carried with them the liabilities against the votes of last year out of another sum altogether, and if the honourable gentleman would only put two and two together he would find these figures would come out correct. But it is one of those catches which, no doubt, a clever, able, and astute lawyer saw gave a chance of throwing dust in the eyes of honourable members because the figures did not tally. But if any honourable member will take these new votes from the Lands Improvement Account and compare them with the votes of last year from a different source, and carry forward the liabilities on one and the other, he will find the figures will come out correct. With regard to the amount of money required for roads and bridges, I have no hesitation in saying that we can spend within the next two years twice the amount the Government have taken for the purpose, and that in the interests of the colony. But we thought, in bringing down our policy, to do with as little money as possible, and at the same time to meet what are actually the requirements of the country; and I venture to say that any honourable member who travels the country between the Wanganui River and the Rangitikei, from Pipiriki to Hunterville, will admit that during the time we have been in office even there we have opened up thousands of acres of good country by making roads and bridges, which country would be a barren wilderness for years and years to come had the Government not made that expenditure and carried out those works.

Mr. COLLINS.—I should like, first of all, briefly to refer to a statement made repeatedly to-night, and which is a repetition of statements previously made, that the policy of the present Government is a distinct departure from the policy laid down by the late Premier, Mr. Ballance. In the conclusion of the Public Works Statement of 1891 paragraphs occur to this effect:—

“After having enumerated the various railway and other works upon which we purpose to expend the moneys available, I feel certain that I have not given satisfaction, but that the dissatisfaction will have arisen not so much from the manner of the distribution as from the fact that the moneys available are so small and the wants so great.

“However, the amounts now proposed to be appropriated must be regarded as merely instalments on account; and as moneys are from time to time available, from the conversion of our loans and other sources, so our public works can be extended and completed.”

Now, Sir, the Public Works Statement before the House at the present time is in distinct accordance with the promises made in the conclusion of the Public Works Statement of 1891, which Statement was drawn up by and was the Statement of the late Premier, the Hon. Mr. Ballance. I think that reference to the Statement conclusively proves that the public-works policy of 1894 is a distinct fulfilment of the promises made and the policy foreshadowed by the late Mr. Ballance. We can dismiss, then, the statement that the policy of the present Government is not in accord with that of the previous Liberal Administration. I have listened to the opposition to the Public Works Statement to-night, and I must confess I have been somewhat amazed and somewhat amused. The tone of the Opposition is so distinctly different from what it has been on any other occasion. As a rule, one listens to the speeches of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay and the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs with a very considerable degree of pleasure, if only because of the amount of animation they manage to put into their speeches. Although one may differ from them, there is always a feeling that they are intensely in earnest, and are taking a lively interest in what they are saying. And one expects something bright, telling, and cutting from the honourable member for Patea when he rises to address the House. But the speeches of the Opposition to-night have been dreary, dismal, and doleful from beginning to end, and one could not help feeling that the honourable gentlemen themselves felt the case they had undertaken was an exceedingly hard and exceedingly bad one. They could not with any satisfaction to themselves—with any hope of success to themselves—prove what they had undertaken to show. They felt conclusively they could not possibly stir the people to the belief they desired to inspire them with—namely, that the policy was not one the Government should pursue, and that it was not in the distinct interest of the country. As I listened to their speeches that dissatisfaction was explained when a thought struck me, and if I might borrow the lines from the poet

Dryden, whom the honourable member for Hawke's Bay is very fond of quoting, I would say,—

When interest fortifies an argument,
Weak reason serves to gain the will's assent,
For minds already warped are easy bent.

I do not mean by these lines to suggest that there was any individual interest of a personal character on the part of the members of the Opposition, but I think there was a political interest they desired to serve, and that their minds were warped by political bias and interest—that they were desiring to make out a bad case simply because of that political bias, not because they had anything to gain by opposition. I think the opposition was purely political. We have been told over and over again to-night in dismal tones that the policy is a policy of disaster: indeed, we have been told that it is going to plunge the country into irretrievable disaster and ruin, and the prophet of disaster, "the prophet of lamentation," has himself been mentioned. I think the prophet of lamentation was Jeremiah, and, if that be so, there is more than one political Jeremiah in this House. I venture to paraphrase just one or two words of the prophet Jeremiah, and I would suggest to the Opposition that sometimes prophets prophesy falsely: the people suffer by their means, and the Opposition love to have it so. It appears to me these prophecies of evil are especially unjustifiable; but so repeatedly have the statements made by the Opposition been replied to there is no reason that I should do other than simply protest against this repeated declamation and detraction from the position of the country by gentlemen occupying the Opposition benches. These statements have been made, not because they are accurate, or would conduce to any good, but simply because the honourable gentlemen who make them are in opposition, and, being in opposition, they think it is their duty to say something in opposition to the policy initiated by the present Government. I think, to honourable members who listened some months ago and agreed to the policy foreshadowed in the Financial Statement, the Public Works Statement must give a considerable amount of satisfaction, and it must give that because, I feel convinced, the Public Works Statement means a continuance of that policy which will lead to the fuller, the much fuller, development of the country's resources; and, leading to that, will insure that employment to the people which will, before long, eventuate in a very considerable enlargement of the colony's resources. I look over the Public Works Statement and see matters in it which give rise to every feeling of gratification. I know, in reference to co-operative works, that they have proved a benefit and extensive blessing to the people of the country. Although one honourable member from our side of the House has referred to the comparatively small wages paid on co-operative works, still it is infinitely better that the men should be engaged in work of this character at a small wage than that they should be recipients of charity from benevolent institutions. It is infinitely better that they should be employed at a small wage than that they should supplicate benevolent institutions for the miserable dole of 1s. 9d. a week. The money that they earned on these co-operative works they got honestly, manfully, and without any loss of dignity. The Government is to be congratulated on having expended £157,980 on the co-operative works connected with the Public Works and Lands Departments. Then, Sir, I feel that another matter for congratulation is that 1,402 miles of road have been constructed and maintained during the past year. Now, nothing can be more desirable. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) pointed out that £360,000 in the public-works estimates were set aside for the making of public roads. Could anything be more desirable than that our country should be effectually opened up by public roads? As has been said over and over again to-night, if these roads are to be made the moneys must be forthcoming, and the £360,000 could be spent in no better direction than in opening up public roads. We have already determined that Native lands shall be purchased for settlement purposes; and when the House remembers that there are ten millions of acres of land in the hands of the Natives, and at least some millions of these acres that ought to be brought into cultivation, then the sooner these millions are opened up by the moneys provided in the public-works estimates the better it will be for this country. I view the co-operative works, the opening-up of public works, and the money set aside for these purposes with a very considerable degree of satisfaction. There is another point to which I should like, just very briefly, to refer. The honourable member for Wairarapa suggested that the co-operative works had really been a piece of political dodgery—that the Government had, previous to the election, very considerably augmented the number of these engaged in the co-operative works; but I would point out that it is impossible to regard it as a piece of political business. What advantage would it be to the Government to send a great number of men to the places where co-operative works were chiefly in vogue—Catlin's River, the Cheviot, and Taranaki? The greater number sent there were from the larger cities. Christchurch contributed a large number for Catlin's River and the Cheviot, and I know that some batches were sent into the Taranaki District. But how could these people assist the Government? They were practically sent away from the districts where their votes would otherwise have been available, and two out of the three districts into which they were sent returned Conservative members to this House. So the statement that it was a political dodge, or that it was done for political purposes, is a statement wide of the mark. Leaving co-operative works, there is one other matter to which I should like to refer before I sit down, and that is the question of the rail-

10. ways. The Minister says it will be necessary to insist upon firmness in resisting unreasonable demands for the reduction of tariffs and also for the reduction of railway-fares. I quite agree that it is necessary at all times to resist with firmness unreasonable demands of any kind, but I should like to suggest to the Minister that it is not unreasonable to expect that there shall be very considerable alterations in our railway tariffs. There are anomalies in our tariffs which ought to be dealt with in the interests of the country, and in the interests of the railway itself; and I am sure that there are certain anomalies with regard to passenger-fares which could be dealt with without the slightest possibility of affecting in any way the aggregate amount of railway receipts. Indeed, I believe if these anomalies were corrected it would lead to a considerable increase in the receipts of the railways, both with regard to goods- and passenger-traffic. These appear to me to be matters which might well receive the attention of the Minister, and I hope they will be dealt with. Sir, I say again that the policy of the Public Works Statement is one that will commend itself—I am positive of that—to a majority of the people of this colony. It is a policy not, as we have heard, of disaster—not a policy which threatens impending ruin, but it appears to me—and I look at the matter not as a partisan but as one wishing the country well—as one wishing in this House so to speak and so to act that the country may by every vote cast derive some benefit—I say, speaking, I hope, not as a partisan and not partially, but with an unbiassed mind, I believe the policy of this Public Works Statement is not a policy of disaster, is not a policy of impending ruin, but a policy of improvement, a policy of settlement, and a policy of development.

Mr. Collins

Mr. FRASER.—Sir, I have no desire, and certainly no intention, of wearying members by making a speech. Indeed, I had no intention of speaking on this subject at all but for the glaring inaccuracy which I find in the Public Works Statement. It has already been referred to by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). I should not be doing my duty if I did not refer to it. I mean the little balance-sheet, on page 11, about the Otago Central Railway, in which it is made to appear that the expenditure on this line has been £32,273 in excess of allocation out of loans. Well, Sir, this is contrary to fact. I am very much surprised that it should appear in this document, and I will now show how I make this out to be contrary to fact. In this balance-sheet it is asserted that £637,273 is the total expenditure,—I assume the figures to be correct,—and on the other side the total allocation to the line out of loan is set down at £605,000. But the first loan mentioned is one in 1882. Prior to that £104,168 had been spent out of the Public Works Fund. That sum ought, therefore, to be deducted from the £637,273 before you set it against the moneys allocated out of loans to the line. That would leave £508,110 of expenditure against the Loan Account. I know I am understating the case, but I prefer to do so. I will accept these figures, Sir. If the £605,000 was the only sum allocated out of loan, there would thus be a balance of £71,890 unexpended of loan-money for this railway, instead of a debit account of £32,273. But various loans have been left out. Account is taken of the New Zealand Loan Act of 1882, £300,000; the New Zealand Loan Act of 1886, £200,000; and the New Zealand Loan Act of 1888, £105,000. There is no mention whatever of the allocation from the New Zealand Loan Act of 1884. There was a loan that year of £1,500,000, and of this sum £700,000 was specially allocated for railways. There was no particular allocation to the Otago Central, but the speeches of the then Colonial Treasurer, Sir Julius Vogel, and of Sir Harry Atkinson prove that the greater portion of this £700,000 was intended to be allocated to and spent upon three railways—two in the North Island, and the Otago Central. Yet not one penny of that £700,000 is put to the credit of the allocation of loans in this case.

Mr. SEDDON.—It was not specially allocated to the Otago Central.

Mr. FRASER.—Of course it was not specially allocated in the Loan Bill, but it was borrowed for the Otago Central. There is no doubt about that. The Premier admits it by using the word “specially.” It is a mere quibble to speak so. There is no doubt that out of that £700,000 we were fairly entitled to a fifth, or £140,000; and that at least that sum was intended to be allocated to the line. This, therefore, would bring the total amount of the loans allocated to this line to £745,000. If we deduct from that sum the £538,110, it leaves £211,890 unexpended out of loan-allocation—a very different statement indeed from what we find in this Public Works Statement! It is attempted to be shown that not only have the total loan funds allocated to this railway been actually expended thereon, but a sum of £32,273 taken from other sources has been expended in addition. Well, I give that a flat contradiction, and undertake to say that my statement cannot be controverted. What I assert is that, instead of that being the case, instead of £32,273 having been taken from other sources, £211,890—and I am positive I am understating the figures—remains unexpended out of the loan-money allocated towards that line. Now, I think it was only right that I should, in the interests of the large number of people who reside in Otago, and who are interested in this railway, make this point clear this evening. It would never have done to let such a balance-sheet go forth unchallenged. There has been trouble enough in the past to get moneys voted for the line, and it has been continually thrown in our teeth that the money borrowed has been over-expended, so I thought it right to get up and challenge these figures. There is another statement with reference to the Otago Central that I desire to draw attention to—the words, “Considerable further work is now being put in hand, including the construction of the tunnel.” Well, all I can say is that I certainly hope that is correct, because, as far as the Otago members are concerned, on two occasions we as a deputation have met the Minister and could get no such information from him. He told us to wait till the Public Works Statement came down. I hope that, when the honourable gentleman is replying, he will give us a little more definite information, and will be able to tell us that this tunnel has really been started.

AN HON. MEMBER.—It is started now.

MR. FRASER.—I would rather hear from the Minister direct that the work had been started. It is not my intention to refer generally to the Public Works Statement. I wish simply to say that I am at one with the Government in their desire to see roads constructed throughout the colony. There is no doubt that any one who knows much of colonisation work in this country must be aware that it is utterly impossible for people to stay on the land after they are put there unless we give them roads.

MR. EARNSHAW.—I am not going to detain the House long; and I have only risen to speak on the Otago Central Railway question, and to challenge the statements and the figures that appear in the Statement. I think that to-night we have had a most peculiar experience in this House in connection with a Public Works Statement. The debate commenced at half-past seven, and from eleven o'clock—the last two hours—there have not been a dozen members sitting up in their seats listening to the debate, and, of that dozen, four or five have been Opposition members, although they are such a small body. That, at any rate, shows that the Government have convinced their supporters, whatever they may have done with the country, that this is a proper Statement. They have completely flattened them out; they have either driven them into the lobbies or else they have driven them to sleep. Sir, the Minister of Lands, in speaking, said that he knew more than any other man in the House with regard to the figures that were in the Statement, but, very singular to relate, he did not deal with the figures, or with a single district or road in the Statement. His remarks were of a most general character, and were simply levelled at the honourable member for Wairarapa on things in general, and not on the Public Works Statement in particular; and he made this curious statement: that members of the Opposition who owned big runs were desirous of getting home to shear their sheep. I understand that the other day about twenty-five members of the Government party waited upon the Government and asked them to "close down" next week, and I do not know that a single large run-holder was in that crowd; so that, so far as that charge is concerned, it is not in accordance with what has occurred. During the past week the pressure, I believe, has come from the Government side of the House to close down. But I think this is a lesson to the country that it is not right the Government should delay till nearly the middle of October before bringing down the Public Works Statement. In 1890 it came down in July in 1891 I think it came down in August; in 1892 and 1893 in September; and now in 1894 it is in October. Notwithstanding the remarks of the Minister of Lands, I do not know any reason why the Statement could not have been down a month ago; for their policy measures—the measure dealing with land for settlement and the measure dealing with the acquisition of Native lands and with roads and bridges—those two Bills could have been down two months ago, and the Public Works Statement could have been brought down last month. I myself charge the Government with deliberately keeping the Public Works Statement back until the end of the session. They have all through, from the commencement of the session, brought down measures of an unimportant character, and have kept back measures that were of national importance to the end of the session—measures, for instance, like the Midland Railway Bill, which, I have no doubt, they trust to get carried for them by the members who do desire to go home. If that is so, I do not think they will find it to be likely, when the time comes. The honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins) spoke of the debate as being dreary, dismal, and doleful. Well, I thought those who believed in the Statement should make the debate cheerful; but have we had anything cheerful from the Government benches? Have we had anything cheerful from the supporters of the Government? Look at them! they are all asleep. The Minister of Education came up at last, and, for the first time, has admitted that the Government have gone in for a borrowing policy. He made this remark: "We mean to spend money actively"; and that, of course, is practically saying that they intend to go in for large measures that will mean considerable sums of money being spent; and he was supported also by the Minister of Lands, who, in similar words, spoke with regard to getting our young men upon the land. He said to-day that it would require money, and that they were determined to go on rapidly with colonisation. All I have to say is that they should have said this on the hustings, and the Premier, when on the stump in the country before the election, ought to have come down and made a distinct manifesto to the people that such was to be their policy. If we are going in for this policy members should not be put in the position of having to pass measures when they have pledged themselves to their constituents that they did not mean to do any such thing, but meant to carry on on the lines, as was very well said by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, initiated by the late Sir Harry Atkinson when he shortened down the loan proposals, and which was further carried out by the late Premier, Mr. Ballance. If he had lived he would have carried out his self-reliant, non-borrowing policy. I come now to that question which more especially brought me to my feet—that is, the deliberate statement made with regard to the Otago Central Railway. This statement has been deliberately made to delude and mislead the people of Otago. I have no doubt about it. It is a most carefully and cunningly worded and concocted statement, and it is not possible for the Government to have made a mistake in this matter. They could not have got the figures out of the 1882 Appendices without seeing what had been expended before the Three-million Loan was raised. Of that Three-million Loan there was £300,000 allocated for the Otago Central, and in the Statement they ought to state that the expenditure to that year out of prior loans was £125,312 7s. 1d., and the outstanding liabilities £11,079 17s. 1d. The total expenditure, including all liabilities up to the 31st March, 1882, was £136,392 4s. 2d. The real deficiency is the sum of £257,713 16s. 5d.; and it is not possible that either the department or the Premier should not have had these particulars. This has been put together for the use of the supporters of the Government when they are speaking to their constituents in Otago, in order to show that there has been a very full appropriation of money spent on that line. That has been the real object of the Government; but there is also more than one to speak on the question: and such statements as this cannot stand the test of time. I am quite sure that the citizens of Otago are quite alive to the position, and I believe that they will see through this flaming attempt to delude them with a sham earnestness that the Government intend to carry out that line. I consider the Government are playing with the line, and I consider that the Government, for the last four years, have played with the Otago people; for the Premier, who has been Minister for Public Works, every year has brought down a flaming statement that he meant to prosecute the line most vigorously, but the amount voted has not been spent; he has not spent the money he has asked the House to give him. In 1891-92 the Government, with £3,041 18s. 6d. of liabilities, asked for £30,000, and it was authorised. They spent £14,879. In 1892-93 they asked for £36,000, and spent £20,523. In 1894 they asked for £60,000, and they spent £33,061. I think, if you add to that the permanent-way and material, it brings the amount up to £46,872, and outstanding liabilities amounting to £11,261. The amount they have asked to be authorised for expenditure these three years is £126,000; and the sum actually spent, including the incoming liabilities of £3,041 18s. 6d., is the sum of £92,275 5s. 7d., with outstanding liabilities to come out of this year's vote, £11,261. That is the difference between the statements that the Government meant to prosecute the line vigorously—the difference between the amount they asked this House to give and the amount they have spent, and it is of no use the Premier's saying, as he has said on every occasion that deputations have waited upon him,—and at which I have remained silent, because I did not believe it was of any use wasting words—it is not of any use the Premier's making any more promises, because again and again he has failed to carry out the pledges he has made to myself. Why he should make them I do not know. However, I do not think it will matter much, as it is simply a question between him and the people of Otago; but if he would not make pledges they would know what to do with him. What I object to is not that they have not given us a big sum of money, but I object to the Government coming to this House, bringing down year by year inflated proposals, and saying that they mean to spend a certain sum of money in that district, and then not spending it in any district, but coming to the House again and claiming to have made a surplus. It is not a surplus at all, and I say the Government should deal honestly with members, and with districts, and if they have only got £10,000 to spend in a district they have no right to put £15,000 on the estimates. They should only put £10,000 on, and say, "That is all the money we have, and if you want more you must go in for a loan." If they would do that, and say what they have got, and what they mean to spend in a district, members would know whether the constituencies are in favour of their policy; but double-dealing I object to. I also object to the sum the Government have put on the estimates for the Otago Central this year. They have put down £45,000, I think.

Mr. Fraser

An Hon. MEMBER.—Is that too much?

Mr. EARNSHAW.—No; the liabilities are too much. They amount to £11,261, which is to come out of the vote; and what does that leave? Only £38,000 to spend on that line next year. Therefore I say that, considering the position that Otago has held in New Zealand for years, and considering the time has come in which she is losing her distributing trade, it is more than ever necessary that she should have all her first-, second-, and third-class lands thrown open; and Central Otago must be opened up if Dunedin is going to keep its position even as a second-rate port; and, from every point of view, it is the bounden duty of all to demand that a full and fair share of money be spent on that line. I say that the sum provided this year is altogether inadequate for the requirements, and to meet the just and reasonable demands which Otago is entitled to make. I know very well it is of no use my asking for more, as the Government are determined that they will pass the estimates, be they what they may, and that they will not discuss them at all. I do not claim to have any knowledge as to these estimates regarding roads, and I say that no member of this House has discussed these estimates as to whether they are proper estimates for the different provinces. They have to take them exactly as the Government have brought them down. We have had no discussion at all as to whether they are equal or not, and as to whether the country can stand this amount being spent. That is what I object to. There has been no debate at all on this matter. The Government party are prepared to swallow without debate whatever the Government bring down to the House, and the debate is not having justice done to it. I am not making these remarks without any specially-formed purpose, as I have said during the last two or three years that, in anticipation of the policy commenced in 1891-92, I accepted the pledges of the Government that the sums of money they put on the estimates they would spend. But have they done so? They have not, and I claim that it is my duty to raise a protest against the manner in which they have carried on the same thing year by year. Otago is not having justice done to it because it is to-day, as it has always been, divided against itself. I do not intend to discuss the estimates at length or the Statement, but there is one thing which I feel very strongly on—that is, the statement with regard to the Midland Railway. I am not going to enter into it now, because that question will come down in a distinct Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Give us your reasons now.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—I will give you ample reasons if you hope to put the Bill through this session. I have taken considerable interest in this work. I think it is a national work, and it should be completed; but I altogether dissent from the manner and mode in which the Government propose to do it, as foreshadowed in this Statement. However, there will be time enough, later on, for that, and, as I know that the Government wish to get through with their estimates, and to allow all the large squatters to get back home so that they can shear their sheep, I will not take up any more time. But I must say this: that it is their supporters who have deliberately on many occasions spoken this session as to measures they did not wish passed, and that have had to be dropped; but at no time during the session has there been any debate, from those who have opposed the Government, on the policy measures of the Government simply because they were Opposition members, but right through the session the procedure of the Government with their measures has been of such a character that the main part of the session has been deliberately wasted, and the most important measures have been brought on when the House was not in that temper or condition that they could debate or deal with them as such important measures should be dealt with.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Sir, as this Statement has been very fully discussed to-night, it is not my intention to make a lengthy speech, or to deal with matters that have been disposed of by previous speakers. The debate commenced at half-past seven, and it is now half-past one, and I am perfectly sure members are pretty well tired out after the long discussion that has taken place. There are many big subjects in the Statement, such as borrowing. There is the subject of the State control of railways, which, I suppose, we may discuss at another time. I am glad to see that the Government is proposing to carry lime and other manures for farmers at such prices as will enable them to obtain those necessities at a reasonable rate.

An Hon. MEMBER.—But they are not doing that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Well, I am sorry to hear it, but the statement distinctly conveys that impression. If the people of the colony are satisfied to take the control of the railway out of the hands of a non-political Board, and the change does not result in anything better than I have already experienced, especially if they are not going to reduce the freights on manures, then I cannot say much for it. And I should also like to say that it was not this House nor was it the country generally that wanted that change, but it was required by the employes, who were stimulated by political agitators. With regard to the present debate, my honourable and learned friend the member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison) declaimed much against the good work done in connection with the Queen's Drive in Wellington, and I venture to suggest that in such a speech as that there was a good deal of humbug and sophistry running through the arguments. But, coming to matters connected with my own district, there are some important works in that locality which I should like to see the Premier give more attention to. The Premier made a promise to open up the Wai-kawa-Switters line some years ago, but the money for that, £18,000, was transferred to some other work. I am glad the Premier contemplates going on with that work in order to show repentance for past sins against that district. Then, there is the Gore-Kelso line, and the extension of the Heriot line towards Roxburgh. That it will well repay the outlay there can be no doubt. The Premier has given a promise that he will have that country surveyed, and in that connection I should like to say that, as the Government have taken authority to purchase large estates, the prosecution of that line ought to be concurrent with the purchase of the Moa Flat Estate; otherwise the expenditure will largely go to benefit the wealthy landowners at the expense of the colony. Then, with regard to the Catlin's River Railway, that is a work of very great importance, and the Premier has placed an amount on the estimates which he believes will complete it. I hope the honourable gentleman will complete it. The expenditure on the line amounts now to over £100,000, and I suppose this year £8,000 will bring that vast expenditure into utility, and I am quite sure that the Premier, with that practical experience we know he possesses, will not allow that large outlay to remain unproductive when so small a sum is required. The line should now be opened to Huat's Road, where there are saw-mills and enterprising settlers. I should like to see the completion of that line made supplementary to the completion of the Otago Central extension. The Otago Central country requires timber, and the Catlin's River country is really heavily timbered. At the present time that timber has been destroyed to make way for settlement, which is a great pity, because such timber is required in other parts, and would go to furnish an immense amount of labour for people in that neighbourhood. I am glad to see that there is a vote on the estimates for the opening-up of some of the western sounds, to bring the wild west more into touch with the interior. I think that is a work the Government ought to devote themselves more steadily to, and I think they ought to complete the road between Lake Te Anau and the head of Milford Sound, for the advantages to be derived from the tourist traffic and in other ways from doing so can hardly be overestimated. I wish also to say that there are several other important works that still remain not provided for, such as the Kelso Bridge over Pomahaka, and the Waipahi Bridge, and which have not received sufficient attention at the hands of the Government. I hope, however, the Minister will make some provision for these two most important works on the supplementary estimates. But I shall not take up the time of the House further in referring to them at this late hour.

Mr. Earnshaw

Mr. ALLEN.—Sir, there are a great many points in the Statement that call for attention, but I shall only refer to two. One of them is the Otago Central Railway and this so-called balance-sheet. I do not know why a dead set should be made at the Otago Central Railway by the Minister for Public Works, or what his reason for it may be, but if honourable members will look at the Public Works Statement they will find that, under the guise of a very peculiar balance-sheet, an utterly misleading representation has been made to the public, and to this House, as to the amount of moneys due to the Otago Central Railway. They will notice that the words "specially borrowed" are put in; and I say that the word "specially" is put in with a deliberate intention to mislead this House, and the members who come from Otago and elsewhere. Now, why were the words "specially borrowed" put in at the head of this table? For this special reason: that the Minister for Public Works knows that only out of two of the loans, as regards this railway, at any rate, were any specific allotments made at all, and he has left out other loans and amounts and means of increasing the supplies to the Public Works Fund, a proportion of which should be due to the Otago Central Railway. The Minister has allotted in this table no portion whatever of the £700,000 voted in 1884 for the Otago Central. The honourable gentleman has gone further than that: he has omitted to mention that out of the sinking funds that have been set free, and miscellaneous moneys that have been paid to the Public Works Fund, amounting to some £481,000, no proportion has been credited in this balance-sheet to the Otago Central. Further, there is also due to the Otago Central Railway its proportion of £480,000 transferred to the Public Works Fund from the Consolidated Fund; the Minister for Public Works has also omitted the sum appropriated and the sum spent for the Otago Central prior to 1882—namely, appropriated £279,800, and spent some £125,000; and the result is that the honourable gentleman brings down a table which leaves the Otago Central in debt to the Public Works Fund. The honourable gentleman must know that that is entirely misleading, and he has done this with some specific object, and that object is to deliberately mislead. What are the facts with regard to this railway? There have been appropriated from time to time under the Appropriation Acts of this Parliament no less a sum than $1,107,000 for expenditure on the Otago Central Railway. Of that amount only £637,000 has been spent. But that does not represent all the facts of the case. The case is even worse than that. If a fair share of other sums had been included in this table, the Otago Central Railway should have at its credit nearly half a million of money. The money has been filched from the Otago Central and spent elsewhere, and the honourable gentleman knows it. Why has he not brought forward a similar table to this in connection with other railways in the colony? Then it would be seen that the debit balance would be a larger one as regards other railways than with regard to the Otago Central Railway. Why is this done? There is only one other point I wish to refer to, and that is that I regret to see that this colony is going back again to the old policy of 1884 and previous years, which brought us to almost financial ruin in 1887. In 1887 Parliament had to adopt a policy decreasing its public-works expenditure, and it was decreased until it came down in 1890, or somewhere about then, to between three and four hundred thousand pounds a year. Now, since the present Ministry have been in office, that amount has been ever gradually rising again, until the amount proposed to be appropriated this year for public-works expenditure out of loan-money is close on one million. Within £60,000 of a million is to be appropriated this year for public-works expenditure. And what is the subterfuge they adopt in putting this before the country? They say we are not spending this out of loan-money as we used to do. If the money for the purchase of Native lands and the money for roads and bridges is not loan-money, I do not know what is. But the honourable gentleman has taken care this time not to place them in the actual public-works appropriations. He has set them in a special column in order that he might play this game to the country. He wants to say that this is not borrowed money. But we all know the position is exactly the same as it was in 1884. That money is being borrowed for roads, and to open up lands for settlement, and for the purchase of Native lands, which have been a direct charge up to the present time on the Public Works Fund; and this is only a subterfuge—this putting them in another column. The facts are that the public-works expenditure has risen from £300,000 or £400,000 in a few years to close on a million of money this year. Sir, if that policy is continued we shall very soon be brought into the position we were in in 1887; and those who come after—I am sorry to say it—will have greater difficulty in putting right the finances of the colony than had Sir Harry Atkinson in 1887. I regret to say it, but I think the country ought to be warned about it, and if it realised what is taking place it would rise as one man and say, "We will not be led back into the disastrous policy pursued previous to 1887, but will insist on a safe and moderate expenditure on public works which are within our means."

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, I am at a great disadvantage in replying on this occasion, for the reason that most of the speeches that have been made by those on the other side of the House who differ from the Government have been very favourable to the Statement. It is, of course, their function to differ from the Government, but with the exception of the speeches just delivered by the honourable member for Bruce and the honourable member for Wakatipu no serious fault has been found with the Statement. I wish to say to the honourable member for Eden that the usual custom was not followed of a Minister following and replying to his criticism of the speech, but I thought, myself, after his speech, which was very fair, there was so little that required replying to that I could do it myself in closing the debate. I hope the honourable gentleman will not think that any slight to him was intended. The honourable member stated that the mandate of the country was that the Government was to cease borrowing. I have said before, and repeat here, that there has been no departure whatever as far as the policy of the Government this year is concerned, and we have gone on the lines of the last four years. But, as the necessities of the country arose, we should have been doing wrong to the country did we not meet those necessities; and the course we followed was in keeping with what has been done from the first time we accepted office. We have made no difference whatever, except, as stated by another member, that the amounts this year are larger than in previous years. But what accounts for this? The reason that if you deduct from the amount required for expenditure the £300,000 which is for a purpose entirely different from what has had to be provided for in the past, the expenditure is less than last year's by £46,000, and it is also nearly £100,000 less than the amount the honourable member for Eden, when Minister for Public Works, asked for in 1890-91. The amount he asked for was £744,000, as against £646,000 asked for here, excepting the amount I said was required for the acquiring of lands, for the roading of the lands, and their improvement. Under these circumstances, I say our expenditure is in keeping with—in fact, is much less than—that asked for in 1890-91, and £40,000 less than last year's. The honourable gentleman said we were scattering favours. I say we are not scattering favours; we are simply meeting demands for roads and bridges and works that are much needed for the improvement of lands; and these wants shall be attended to as long as we are here. And, Sir, can it be said that there has been any favouritism at all? The honourable gentleman should have shown that districts that were represented by a member not a supporter of the Government had been punished; but I say he is unable to make out a case of that sort against us. Therefore he cannot say there is any favouritism whatever. The honourable gentleman boasted that the allocation in 1890-91 was £744,000, whilst the expenditure was £334,000. The honourable member said there would be a necessity for a loan next session. We have not as yet gone on the market for a loan; our statute-book has been singularly free from loans for some years. I will give him and his colleagues credit that they did not borrow, after giving their pledge in 1887. But what was the position when we took office? There was nearly a million of loan-moneys available. We have gone on from that time to this—four years. The demands of the country are increasing, and I say we have done well.

Mr. Allen

An Hon. MEMBER.—How about the sinking fund?

Mr. SEDDON.—As to the sinking fund, it is nonsense to say you must not do what the law says. It says you may convert your loans, and I say the law is there; the "may" is "shall." As long as this money, which is practically dead, can be used for colonisation purposes the "may" is absolutely "shall"; it is mandatory. Then, the honourable gentlemen complained that we were robbing the North Island Main Trunk line for roads. What a fallacy that is! As to the construction of the road from Hunterville to Tokaano, it was not robbing the line, but was simply doing what was intended. But if there was anything in it, who was it that commenced it? Why, the honourable gentleman. Before we took office the money was taken from the original purpose by our predecessors. It seems to me the commencement was when the senior member for Wellington City was Premier; consequently he commenced it, and my honourable friend, when he was Minister for Public Works, followed on the same lines. Yet now he finds fault with myself and my colleagues for doing exactly what our predecessors had done. I never found fault with what they did, believing they did right. I followed on the same lines, and, as long as the money was there, we intended to continue on the same lines. Then, in reference to the remarks as regards the control of the railways, I may say that, in what is stated here in the Statement as to impressing upon honourable members the necessity for refraining from bringing pressure to bear on the Government or making unreasonable demands for reductions in the railway rates, thereby reducing the revenue of our railways, I mentioned this advisedly, believing it to be in the interests of the colony. There is no doubt that, at the time the railways were taken from the people and handed over to three irresponsible persons, there were some grounds for the extreme step that was taken. I have always contended that that step was not warranted, though there were some grounds for a change. Now, I say it would be a great slight on the people of this country were it to be said that in the working of the railways we are not to be trusted, and that we cannot control them in the interests of the country. I shall not cast such a slight upon the people, but say to the people, and those who represent them, the proper course to adopt is to manage these railways in the same way as we are managing the other State departments, and to call on the people to support us in such management, and not to take from the people their just rights; and I feel sure the people will support any Government which remains firm and does what is right. The honourable gentleman complained as regards the Mokihinui line, and stated that it was unfair to the Helensville line, seeing that a reduction had been made in the allocation for that line as compared with the amount set down for the Mokihinui line. Now, I will show the difference as regards the two. In regard to the Mokihinui line, it is the end of a line on which the Government have spent very large sums of money—£35,000 has been spent on the Ngakawau Extension—and I say it is a wise expenditure, in my opinion. But, so that I should not be doing anything prejudicial to the colony, I submitted the matter to the Commissioners, and received from them the following reply:—

“New Zealand Government Railways:

“Head Office, Wellington,

“12th October, 1894.

“Memorandum to the Hon. the Minister for Public Works, Wellington.

“Re Purchase of Mokihinui Coal Company's Railway Line.

“In reply to memo. of the 9th instant from the Under-Secretary for Public Works, asking the Commissioners to advise as to the desirableness or otherwise of the purchase of the Mokihinui Coal Company's line by the Government, and, if in favour of the purchase, to state on what conditions it should be made, the Commissioners have to state,—

“1. That it is desirable that the line should become public property, seeing that it is a continuation of the line recently constructed between Ngakawau and Mokihinui, and that the line throughout is worked for the development of the coal-deposits in the Mokihinui Valley.

“2. But, as the line will not pay until the mines are sending out a greater output than hitherto, the deficit in cost of working should be made up to 5 per cent. on the purchase by the coal lessees, in the same manner as they are required to do on the part of the line between Ngakawau and Mokihinui (vide section 5 of ‘The Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Act, 1890’).

“3. It is very essential that Government be satisfied as to the soundness of the guarantee of 5 per cent., as this railway is solely dependent on the success of the mines. In the event of their failure the railway would be of no practical value to the colony, and it would not form part of an extension to Karamea should that ever be contemplated.

“4. The line will require considerable outlay in repairs and equipment to bring it up to a proper state of efficiency. There is also a considerable contingent future expense for removal of slips, and there is the liability in the matter of the public road.

“5. Under all the circumstances and risks, the Commissioners think that the price to be paid, in the event of purchase, should be very much less than what the line may have actually cost. As a further reason for this recommendation it may be mentioned that a branch-line to a mine has to be considered as a necessary adjunct to its development, and that in many of the coal-mines in the colony this has to be borne by the owners without any direct profit accruing therefrom.

“JAMES MCKERROW,

“Chief Commissioner.”

20. I think that supports me in saying that the Government were quite right in recommending this to be done. We have safeguarded it by saying there is to be a fair valuation, and the Commissioners further say there should be a valuation. That done, I think the proposal is a very wise one. Now I come to the provision made for the Helensville line. Honourable members will see there was only £329 spent last year. The contractors now are in a difficulty in piercing the tunnel. It is impossible, in my opinion, to spend £7,000—the amount that is on the estimates—during the present financial year. That is absolutely impossible; therefore what is the use of putting a larger sum on the estimates, when I know it will not be spent;—that it is practically impossible to spend it?

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I do not complain so much about that as taking about £15,000 from the loan for roads.

Mr. SEDDON.—As regards the loan-balances, they are absolutely not passed, and, as we are making railways in the case of the Otago Central and others to a payable point, it is quite simple to take the moneys required from the consolidated revenue; and I have said, with respect to that and other lines, that when the time comes, and the money is required and the amount is wanted, the effect of having the loan for the purpose will be accepted, and the railways will be completed to the point of extension required, notwithstanding that the moneys originally allocated had been taken away. Now, there has been a complaint made that the goldfields vote is too large. It is the one vote on the estimates more than another which is absolutely required, if we are to have any return from the development of the goldfields. We have not done sufficient in that respect. I must blame myself. We have given the preference from the commencement to promoting settlement; but the time has arrived when we must do something with respect to the deep levels. We have the report of the geologist who came here from Victoria. We know, as far as one can be satisfied, that by deep-level sinking and prospecting we may tap, and shall tap, vast mineral wealth. To allow it from year to year to lie there doing nothing would be suicidal. We are losing the population from the goldfields most rapidly. We see a less number there now than before; and they are absolutely doing nothing. I say we must make provision for prospecting. There is another difficulty, and that is in regard to the proclamation of our rivers. It is a serious difficulty now in different parts of the country where the farming interest clashes with the mining interest, to the detriment of the mining interest. I say these farms must be taken, and means must be provided for the Government dealing with that question; and the provision is here. A Bill will shortly be before the House, and under it we shall take that legislation which will prevent unfair demands being made; and, with means provided in the estimates, I say we have done well, and I am very sorry myself fault ever should be found with an amount provided for the development of our goldfields. The amount may appear large, but if you take into consideration that the produce from our goldfields is nearly a million a year, and if you take the total population on the goldfields, and the large extent of country they embrace, it is not at all too large an appropriation, and I feel sure it will be well and wisely spent. Now, I think I have met every point the honourable member made in his speech. As I have said, his criticism was not adverse, though we differ slightly on the points raised. It is only right that I should give the views of the Government upon the objections he raised. There was nothing in the remarks of the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs. He twitted the Government by saying that, instead of tapering-off, we were "bulging-out"—I think that was the term he employed. Well, if the necessities of the country demand it, why should we not do so? I say we cannot stand still, and if we stood still the country must recede, and the Government upon these benches that was not progressive and did not attend to the wants of the country would not be long here. It is simply nonsensical to quote to us the condition of affairs which existed three or four years ago when the circumstances of the colony have entirely differed. Then we were losing our population by thousands; everything was at a standstill; people would not go on the land; there was no inquiry for land. Since then a demand for settlement has sprung up, and we should not be worthy the name of representatives of intelligent people unless we were prepared and dared to come forward and say, "These are the requirements of the country; we ask you to meet these requirements"; and I say the representatives of the people have responded, and have met them: and you can give it whatever term you like—you may call it "bulging out" if you please, which was the term the honourable gentleman applied—but I say, Sir, the policy is a necessary one, and it meets with general approval. Now, the honourable member told us that last year we voted something like £900,000 and only spent £450,000. Surely there is nothing to object to in that. I should have thought the honourable member would not have disagreed with a course of that kind being followed. If we found, after three or four months of the year, that labour was plentiful, and that employment could be well found, why go on with public-works expenditure? That is the way I have done all through. Under the co-operative system, when you find that labour is plentiful and that the demand for it is great, you can decrease your expenditure in some classes of public works and allow that labour to be available for the settlers and for the local authorities, and thus ease off your expenditure; and I did this, and brought, as I say, under Part I. of the Public Works Fund, the expenditure down to the lowest point it has ever been at in the history of New Zealand: and yet some honourable members say we are a scattering Government—we are spending money lavishly. Still, there is the fact; and yet in one breath the honourable gentleman says, "You take appropriations for £900,000, and you only spend £450,000." I simply say that the honourable gentleman, in making these remarks, was extolling the administration of the Government, and proving it to be economical and deserving of every confidence. In taking the appropriation we do this year, it may not be, and will not be, that we shall require to spend the whole of it, but, if the circumstances demand it, then what is necessary to meet the demand will be spent, and well and wisely spent, and, if the necessities of the case demand it, I should not hesitate so to do; but the responsibility for that must rest with the Government, and they are responsible to the House and to the country. The most amusing part of the whole of the criticisms as regards this expenditure was this: that one speaker after another—the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), and the honourable member for Hawke's Bay—whilst adversely criticizing the Government as to the amounts asked for, in each and every case found fault ultimately with us by saying there was some particular work in their districts, and there was not sufficient provision made for it. One and all tended in exactly the same direction, although their remarks probably applied to different works.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Not in my case.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable gentleman made no complaint about any particular work in his own district, but with regard to the provincial district he did. Now, Sir, what is the position? The position to me is very plain. I have had complaints made, and it may be interesting to some of these honourable members if I simply gave them, as I shall give them from my notes, a summary of these appropriations. We find the Auckland Provincial District at the head of the list with £194,315; we find that Wellington comes next, with £169,096; Taranaki, £36,170; and then Hawke's Bay—and the honourable member complained of that—£15,165; then generally for the North Island, £11,708; making a total for the North Island of £426,454. We come next to the South Island, and you will see how badly it fares: Nelson, with £24,700; Marlborough, with £8,895; Canterbury, with £25,232; Westland, £37,544—and I wish more particularly to call attention to this, because Westland was made out by the senior member for Wellington City to be treated with special indulgence, and he said there was £50,000 for roads and for expenditure on goldfields in Westland. Now, Westland includes almost the whole of two electorates—the Grey and the Buller. Taking the whole provincial district, I find there is appropriated £15,000 for the Greymouth–Hokitika Railway line, and the total allocation is only £37,544, as against £50,000 which the honourable member said was for one road-line. That includes the Nelson goldfields. Otago cannot complain, with £159,710. Then we come to the general expenditure for the Middle Island, £11,351: or a total for the South Island of not much less than £300,000: the exact figures are £267,482. If you take the allocations made, and consider that we have to meet the demands that there must be for the purchase of Native land in the North Island, and for the roading of the land in the North Island, I think any one who desires to be fair to the Government, and who analyses this Statement and these estimates which have been submitted to the House, will agree with me that you can fairly give us the total in globo, pass the estimates, and, in the language of the member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), put your hands upon your hearts and say you have done your duty and have voted according to your consciences. Mr. Speaker, with great confidence I move, That you do now leave the chair; and I feel satisfied we shall go into the estimates, and, as I shall be able to further explain these estimates, I am equally confident that they will emerge from Committee almost as they are, and that we shall all go home satisfied.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

IN COMMITTEE.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

CLASS I.—IMMIGRATION.

Immigration, £500.

Dr. NEWMAN said that the other day a carpenter wanted his sister to come out, and he (Dr. Newman) went down to the office about the matter, and was assured that no assisted passages were now granted.

Mr. SEDDON said there was very little assisted immigration, but in connection with the shipping companies there had been one or two cases where assistance had been given.

Vote, £500, agreed to.

CLASS II.—PUBLIC WORKS, DEPARTMENTAL.

Vote, Departmental, £6,350, agreed to.

CLASS III.—RAILWAYS.

Vote, Whangarei–Kamo Extension, £12,000, agreed to.

Helensville Northwards, £7,000.

Mr. MASSEY asked if there was not a specified time for the completion of this contract.

Mr. SEDDON said Yes; the time had passed.

Vote, £7,000, agreed to.

Vote, Grahamstown–Te Aroha, £13,000, agreed to.

Vote, Putaruru–Rotorua, £17,000, agreed to.

Eketahuna–Woodville, £40,000.

Dr. NEWMAN said he could not find in the Public Works Statement how much it would cost to finish this line—about 26½ miles. Did the Premier know when the line would be opened?

Mr. SEDDON said he could not state the exact date. If he had had more money this year he would have proposed a larger vote for this line. He looked upon it as being a very necessary work.

Mr. BUCHANAN regretted that much greater progress had not been made with this line.

Mr. SEDDON said they were pushing the work on, and would continue to do so.

Vote, £40,000, agreed to.

Vote, Blenheim–Awatere, £2,500, agreed to.

Vote, Greymouth–Hokitika, £15,000, agreed to.

Otago Central, £45,000.

Mr. FRASER asked the Premier to explain the balance-sheet which he had taken exception to.

Mr. SEDDON said the statement was absolutely accurate as far as the special allocations for this line went. The department had carefully taken every allocation, and that was in the Statement before the House.

Mr. ALLEN pointed out that the amount spent on or voted for this line before 1882 was not included in the balance-sheet, which consequently did not give an accurate statement of the case.

Vote, £45,000, agreed to.

Vote, Catlin's River, £10,000, agreed to.

Seaward Bush, £15,000.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked how far this vote would take the railway.

Mr. SEDDON said the money would get the bridge over the river.

Vote, £15,000, agreed to.

Vote, Land-claims and other old liabilities on construction account: Sundry lines, £3,500, agreed to.

Vote, Surveys, new lines of railway, £250, agreed to.

Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock, £40,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN would like the Premier to take a note of the great need there was for a little additional speed on the Wellington–Eketahuna line.

Mr. SEDDON said he had made a note of it, and would ask the Commissioners if they could make an improvement in the way indicated by the honourable gentleman.

Captain RUSSELL would like to know how the money was to be expended.

Mr. SEDDON said it was to be expended on additional locomotives, carriages for dairy-produce, and additional carriages for frozen meat.

Vote, £40,000, agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART II.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS.

Vote, Public Works, Departmental, £1,800, agreed to.

CLASS II.—RAILWAYS.

Marton-Te Awamutu Railway construction works, £50,278.

Captain RUSSELL wished to enter a protest against the expenditure for the construction at the north end of the Main Trunk Railway. All the heavy goods must go by sea, and he was sure the expenditure would be useless, as very few passengers would go through.

Mr. SEDDON said there would be a good deal in the honourable gentleman's objection if it were not for the expenditure that had taken place on the tunnel and the work already done. It would be a pity, now so much had been done, not to lay the line to the junction of the road that went to Taranaki, as it would be a great boon to the Waikato farmers; and it should be remembered that there was settlement along the road, the land towards the sea-coast being good limestone country, which would soon be settled. He should have demurred to making the tunnel, but he thought it was now well to expend the money as proposed, and so finish that portion of the work.

Vote, £50,278, agreed to.

Vote, Surveys, £2,500, agreed to.

Progress reported.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes to three o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Monday, 15th October, 1894.

Second Reading—Otago Central Railway—Criminal Code Bill—Trustees Bill—Water-supply Bill—Abattoirs and Slaughterhouses Bill—Privileges of the Houses.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READING.

Stamp Bill.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS, in moving the motion standing in his name, said his object in giving notice of the motion on the Order Paper was to show how unreliable and misleading was the following paragraph, from page 11 of the Public Works Statement, referring to the Otago Central Railway:—

"As a great deal of misconception seems to exist in some quarters on the subject of the amounts specifically borrowed for and allocated to this railway, I have thought it desirable to have the following statement prepared, showing the amounts specially borrowed for the Otago Central Railway, and the amount expended thereon up to 31st March last:—

"OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

"Allocations out of Loans.

	£	s.	d.
Under 'The New Zealand Loan Act, 1882,'
Construction, permanent-way, &c. ...	300,000	0	0
Under 'The New Zealand Loan Act, 1883,'
Construction ...	£140,000	0	0
Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock	60,000	0	0
	200,000	0	0
Under 'The New Zealand Loan Act, 1883,'
Construction ...	£25,000	0	0
Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock	20,000	0	0
	105,000	0	0
	605,000	0	0
Expenditure in excess of allocation ...	32,273	0	0
Total ...	£637,273	0	0

"Expenditure.

	£	s.	d.
Total expenditure on Otago Central Railway for construction, permanent-way, and sleepers to 31st March, 1894 (as per Table 3, Public Works Statement, 1894) ...	621,769	0	0
Add rolling-stock provided, and charged to separate vote ...	15,504	0	0
Total ...	£637,273	0	0

"The amounts shown in this table as allocations for permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock were not specially allocated to this railway under any Act, but are the proportions of the total allocations for permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock in the different Acts which are fairly due to the Otago Central Railway on a mileage basis. These figures show that not only have the total funds allocated to this railway been actually expended thereon, but a sum of £32,273, taken from other sources, has been expended in addition."

It would be seen from what he had quoted that the total sum expended in construction and in permanent-way and sleepers on the line, from its first inception in 1878 up to the 31st March last, a period of sixteen years, was £621,769, and that the allocations out of loans were only £605,000, showing that the expenditure was in excess of allocation by £32,273. Now, it would be seen that the compiler of the Statement had taken the allocation for expenditure from the raising of the Three-million Loan under "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1882," only, thus ignoring altogether the allocations from loans raised prior to 1882, which were—in 1878, £55,000; in 1879, £120,800; in 1880, £68,000; in 1881, £36,000; in 1882, £50,000; or a total during these years of £329,800. This, added to the compiler's allocation of £605,000, gave a grand total of appropriation up to 1882 of £934,800. Thus, instead of showing an excess of expenditure over allocation of £32,273, it was evident that the appropriations had exceeded the expenditure by £313,031. Had this sum been honestly and judiciously expended on it the line would, by means of a further appropriation of £137,418, have been completed to its authorised termination—Lake Hawea—a distance of 144 miles, fully five or six years ago. From the report—No. 2—of a Select Committee of this Council on the New Zealand land Loan Bill of 1886, it appeared that up to the end of the preceding March £267,218 had been expended upon the Otago Central Railway, and that to complete it to Lake Hawea, the authorised terminus, a further sum of £855,000 would be required. The short time that had intervened since the Public Works Statement had been in their possession had precluded him from critically examining it in other respects. He might say, however, that if the compiler had not displayed more correctness in the compilation of his other tables than he had done in this instance very little reliance could be placed on them.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY asked if this was not a reflection upon the Colonial Treasurer, who was in another place, and therefore unable to reply. He hoped his honourable friend would refrain from making statements such as he had now made. He would not make further contention, having just simply called attention to the point.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said he was prepared to prove every word, and that he had been careful to write all the figures, so that there could be no mistake about it. Now, he must, in justice to the present Government, exonerate them from complicity in the unworthy and dishonest tactics that had been adopted by previous Governments for depriving the Otago Central of its just rights and expending the funds specially voted for it in other districts of the colony for party purposes. But, in the face of the facts he had now detailed, the present Government would richly deserve the censure of every honest member of Parliament and the condemnation of every resident in Otago if they did not push on the line to its authorised termination, thus doing a modicum of justice, so long delayed, to those who during the last sixteen years had settled along the line under the distinct promise that the work would be energetically proceeded with, and that the appropriations for it would be faithfully expended.

Motion made, and question put, "That a return be laid on the table showing the total expenditure incurred and the liabilities existing on the Otago Central Railway prior to the raising of the loan of £3,000,000 under 'The New Zealand Loan Act, 1882'; also a return of all appropriations voted for the Otago Central Railway prior to the raising of the loan under 'The New Zealand Loan Act, 1882.'" — (Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.)

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

On the consideration of the amendments made in this Bill in the House of Representatives,

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said, when he introduced the Bill into the Council the object was, practically, to do what was known as raising "the age of consent." That was done, and the Bill went down to the other Chamber. If he might be permitted to refer to what took place there he might say that in that Chamber there was another measure, having the same name, which had for its object what was contained in clause 4. It was very hard to deprive any one who might be innocent of anything to which he was entitled, but he was bound to say this was a piece of legislation which he could not approve of. As representing the legal profession, he should be wanting in his duty were he to consent to any such legislation as this. In his time he had defended a good many criminals, and he was bound to say that his experience had been that invariably juries were rather inclined to clemency than otherwise. If honourable members looked at clause 416 of the Criminal Code Act, under the heading "Appeal," they would find the following:—

"(1.) After the conviction of any person for any crime, the Court before which the trial takes place may, either during the sittings or afterwards, give leave to the person convicted to apply to the Court of Appeal for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The Court of Appeal may, upon hearing such motion, direct a new trial if it thinks fit.

"(2.) In the case of a trial before a District Court such leave may be given, during or at the end of the sitting, by the Judge who presided at the trial."

This new clause had reference specially to a prisoner who had been convicted, and whose sentence of death had been commuted to imprisonment for life. In the Criminal Code Act passed last session provision was made for appeal, and in this new clause 4 it was proposed that this criminal, who had been convicted before the Criminal Code Act came into operation, should have the privilege contained in clause 416 of "The Criminal Code Act, 1893." The new clause read as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in 'The Criminal Code Act, 1893,' the prisoner Louis Chemis, now in Her Majesty's Gaol at Lyttelton, under conviction for murder, shall have the right to apply to the Court of Appeal for a new trial, as provided in the four hundred and sixteenth section of the said Act."

The position would be this: that, assuming the prisoner got a new trial, and that a conviction took place, he might find himself in a very awkward position. His impression was that the Crown might not be so lenient with him if they found him guilty. Of course, he might not take advantage of this; but in any case it was a piece of legislation to which he (Sir P. A. Buckley) could be no party. He moved, That this Council does not agree with the amendments made by the House of Representatives in the Criminal Code Act Amendment Bill.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG would move, as an amendment, That new clause 4, inserted by the House of Representatives in the Criminal Code Act Amendment Bill, be agreed to. The Colonial Secretary had told them that it was a hard thing for an innocent man to be imprisoned; and then he had made this most extraordinary statement: that his duty to his profession would prevent him from approving of such legislation as this. He (Mr. Rigg) thought that a man's duty to his conscience and to his fellow-man ought to be superior to his duty to any profession in the world. If a man was innocent, and was wrongly imprisoned, it was their duty to see that justice was done to him. What this clause proposed to do was this: It did not propose to pardon a guilty man, it did not propose to set an innocent man free, but it proposed to give Chemis a right to apply to the Court of Appeal, and for that Court to determine whether the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and then to give him a new trial if they considered it necessary. He did not think anything could be more just or proper than that. As regarded the case itself, the circumstances were no doubt well known to honourable members; but he was absent from the colony at the time the crime was committed, and therefore, he believed, he was free from the prejudice which was likely to arise in the minds of many owing to the excitement which existed at the time of the trial. Lately he had given the matter some attention, and had read the evidence on which Chemis was convicted, and also the evidence taken before the Select Committee in another place.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Where did you get the evidence?

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—From the Evening Post, and another portion from a parliamentary paper. He had come to two conclusions: First, that the evidence on which the man was convicted was not sufficient—and he was surprised to think that there should have been found twelve intelligent men who could have brought in a verdict of Guilty on a capital charge on such evidence. He thought the summing-up of the Judge was very clear. He told the jury the principal evidence was that afforded by some pieces of paper that were found near the scene of the murder, and some more pieces that were said to be discovered in Chemis's house, and that these formed a complete portion of a newspaper. But it was suggested that there might be an error in the evidence of those who collected the papers; and their evidence was most unsatisfactory. The papers might have been mixed, and so, in that case, the evidence would not count for so much. The Judge himself had admitted that, in regard to this evidence, there was a possibility of error. He (Mr. Rigg) wanted to put this view to the Council: Supposing there was a certain portion of the newspaper picked up at the scene of the murder, and another piece of paper taken from Chemis's house, and that which was taken from the house was lost or destroyed, and the one portion taken from the scene of the murder was marked as having come from the house, what evidence was there then against the man? Yet on this paper evidence he was convicted. There was no motive shown for the crime, and the Judge himself said that there was no motive proved. In murder cases motive, he always understood, was a most essential thing to secure conviction. Then, the only person who could have proved where

Hon. Mr. Rigg

Chemis was at the time the murder was said to have been committed was his wife, but she, under the then-existing law, was debarred from giving evidence. The law had since been altered, and in the case of a new trial it would be possible for his wife to say where he was at the time, and whether he was in his own residence or not. It was impossible that it could be shown where he was at the time the crime was committed on the occasion of the trial—if he was in his own house—because there was no one there who was competent to give evidence that he was in his house. He would ask honourable members to remember that when the petition was signed for Chemis's reprieve it was signed by 8,780 people in Wellington—nearly the whole of the male adults in the city. Writing on this matter, immediately after the verdict was given, the editor of the Evening Post said, in his leading article,—

"Intense astonishment is the prevailing feeling with which the verdict of the jury in the Kaiwara case has been received by the public"

That was the evidence of a man who watched the evidence closely, and followed the case through from beginning to end. Now let them see what sort of a man it was who was convicted of having perpetrated this most atrocious murder. He was a man who was known to have been in a good position in the Hutt district for many years. A gentleman named Mr. Bergin stated that he had known Chemis for eleven or twelve years as a sober, industrious man; and Mr. William Fitzherbert, Justice of the Peace, stated that Chemis had been employed by the Hutt County Council for some time, and that he was proved to be industrious, hard-working, and sober, and he had promoted him. It was also shown that he was a good husband and a good father, and by no means a vindictive man. On the evidence he (Mr. Rigg) would take him to be the last man who would commit a murder. A man who was about to commit a crime like that, he thought, would rather be one who would expect to have a certain amount of suspicion falling upon him, and would therefore be prepared to leave the country. As to what the result would be in this case if the man Chemis succeeded in getting a new trial—he spoke subject to correction by his legal friends—he understood that if he were found Guilty he would be hung.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No; he would be likely to be hung.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG understood Chemis was willing to take that chance; and, that being so, could any one ask anything further? It was not a question of punishing him at all. He was willing to risk his life on the chance of having an opportunity of proving his innocence. After reading the evidence, and giving the case very calm and careful consideration, he had satisfied himself that the man was innocent.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE desired to draw attention to another amendment in the Bill, which the Colonial Secretary had not alluded to: he referred to section 2. He desired to say also that he entirely coincided with the view the Attorney-General had taken in regard to Chemis; but he hoped he would not overlook the other amendment, as he (Sir G. S. Whitmore) did not agree with it.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said that regarding the first amendment—the one raising the age of consent to sixteen years—he did not see the slightest objection to that, and he did not think it was a matter that required any disagreement, as the other branch of the Legislature had, after careful consideration, fixed the age at sixteen. With regard to the Chemis case, this Bill provided further legislation for him; and his case was one of those where, no matter how guilty a man might be, by constant iteration and reiteration some people were got to believe there was something in his plea of innocence. He knew a number of cases where, by constant agitation, a feeling had been created in a prisoner's favour, to the detriment of the administration of justice. He had watched this case very closely at the time it was tried, and also when there was a further inquiry held, when the whole of the circumstances were gone into again. After very careful inquiry he believed the conclusion came to was that justice had been done. The Hon. Mr. Rigg did not refer to the fact that Chemis had been engaged in litigation with Hawkings, the man who was murdered.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—The Judge at the trial told the jury to take no notice of rumours.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said there was the fact that there was a bad feeling between them, and that a stiletto was used, and that they knew who used a stiletto. It was one of the most wilful murders ever committed in the colony, and he hoped that on account of a certain false sympathy with the accused the Council would not agree to the amendments. He was perfectly satisfied in his own mind that justice was done in the conviction, and under the circumstances he could see that any Court of Appeal must come to only one conclusion, and, that being the case, he was perfectly satisfied that the hopes of the prisoner would never be realised. When a petition was sent in for the sentence to be commuted the Governor, of course, investigated the matter, but owing to the agitation which had been kept up by a number of Chemis's friends, and which had gone on since, this matter had again come up. In a question of this kind there was always a certain amount of sympathy, no matter how strong the evidence was. He did not think any good would be done by setting up this Court of Appeal, and, besides the fact of a precedent being established, no good would be got by the passing of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR hoped the Council would not hesitate for a moment to do its duty with regard to this important amendment. The proposal was one of the most extraordinary he had ever known to be submitted to any Legislature. It amounted to this: that the Legislature was really to constitute itself a Court of Appeal. They had heard a member of that Council advocating this clause of the Bill on what ground? On the ground that he had studied the evidence carefully, calmly, deliberately, and judicially, and that he had come to the conclusion that Chemis had been wrongly convicted. That simply meant that every individual member of that Legislature was a Judge of appeal from the Supreme Court. He objected altogether to this matter being considered by them on the evidence, as it was impossible for them to judge or form an opinion of any kind whether this man was properly convicted or not. The question for them to consider was, whether he had a fair trial according to the law of the country, and if they weighed the evidence one way or another they could not say whether the jury were justified in bringing in such a verdict or not. He thought their course was to say that this man had had a fair trial before a Judge and a Court of law, and before a jury of his own countrymen. He was also ably defended—

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—They were not his countrymen.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said he was tried, he presumed, by the inhabitants of the City of Wellington and the neighbourhood, and for that purpose they were his countrymen. He thought this proposal really amounted to this: A verdict of the Supreme Court arrived at in proper form was to be set aside; and, if that was done in this case, there would be no limit nor end to such proceedings. The man had been convicted, and the judgment of capital punishment awarded him was commuted to imprisonment for life. He, for one, declined to consider whether the evidence was such as to justify the verdict or whether it was not, but he thought the Council should not interfere, as it would create a precedent of a most dangerous character, and frustrate the ends of justice; and it would create a precedent which would lay it open to any individual convicted of crime and sentenced to capital punishment to avail himself of. The proposal was a most dangerous one, and he was quite sure the Council would not entertain it.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said there was one matter he wished to refer to. A petition was presented to the Governor, and His Excellency took the trouble to go into the matter fully himself. It was a petition for the release of the prisoner, and the Governor declined to give any relief because he thought Chemis had been rightly convicted. For that reason, irrespective of other reasons given, he thought the Council should not interfere in this matter. It had been before the Supreme Court, and there was no justification for the Council agreeing to the amendment.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he was not in favour of capital punishment, and never had been. He might also say, without any breach of confidence, that he had been able to save the lives of more than two persons who had been in extremis.

An Hon. MEMBER.—When you ought not to have done it.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he thought he was right. On one occasion there was a conviction, and he was not satisfied that evidence which had been received by the Judge ought to have been received. The matter went into the Court of Appeal, and it was held there that he was right, and that the evidence was not properly received. He had brought the Judge himself, and the man was saved. The Hon. Mr. Rigg had made a violent attack upon him, and had stated that he (Sir P. A. Buckley) had said that his duty to his profession would prevent his approving of such legislation. But what he had stated had been that, as representing the profession to which he belonged, he had a duty to perform to the State he could not get away from. He had a certain duty to perform, and personally he regretted he had been obliged to do it, and he would very much rather see a guilty person escape than that an innocent person should be kept in prison one hour if he could help it. He would not go into the merits of this case, as the Hon. Mr. MacGregor had put the matter very clearly. It was not for the Council to go into the merits of the question of the man's guilt or innocence. The fact was, a fair trial in the Court of the land had taken place, and the clemency of the Crown had been exercised on Chemis's behalf, and the sentence commuted to imprisonment for life. From his own experience he knew that a great amount of agitation had taken place on behalf of the unfortunate man, and he felt this would do him more harm than good, and it would be much better if Chemis were left alone. This agitation would not do him good. He might also mention that, at the time the case was tried, he had had a chance of defending Chemis, whose solicitor prior to his death had asked him, if anything should happen, to take the case in hand. However, he did not do so, as Chemis's solicitor conducted the case himself. He was not satisfied himself whether Chemis was guilty or not guilty; therefore he thought he was just as fair a judge of the evidence as the Hon. Mr. Rigg: but the jury at the trial had found the man guilty, and after his sentence the clemency of the Crown was exercised in his behalf, and his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life. He repeated again that he was quite satisfied that this agitation would in the end do more harm to the unfortunate man than good. With regard to Chemis himself, he might say that from what he had heard he believed him to be a man of excellent character, and there were very few men in his position who bore a better character than he did. However, any interference with the law as it stood would be subversive of justice, and against the best interests of the country, and he thought the Council would not agree to it.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG, as a personal explanation, said his remarks were not intended as an attack on the Attorney-General, but upon what he (Mr. Rigg) thought to be his argument. He had taken the honourable gentleman's words down as follows: "He would be wanting in his duty to his profession if he approved of this kind of legislation." If he had taken them down wrongly he would withdraw the remarks he had made in his speech.

The Council divided on the question, "That the amendment in clause 2 be disagreed with."

AYES, 21.

Barnicoat	Mantell	Richardson
Bonar	McLean	Rigg
Buckley	Montgomery	Shrimski
Dignan	Oliver	Swanson
Feldwick	Ormond	Walker, L.
Jennings	Peacock	Whitmore
Kelly	Pharazyn	Whyte.

NOES, 9.

Acland	Jenkinson	Reynolds
Bolt	Kerr	Stewart
Bowen	MacGregor	Taiaroa.

Majority for, 12.

Motion agreed to, and amendment in clause 2 disagreed with.

The Council divided on the question, "That clause 4 be disagreed with."

AYES, 24.

Acland	MacGregor	Reynolds
Barnicoat	Mantell	Richardson
Bolt	McLean	Stewart
Bonar	Montgomery	Swanson
Bowen	Oliver	Taiaroa
Buckley	Ormond	Walker, L.
Dignan	Peacock	Whitmore
Jennings	Pharazyn	Whyte.

NOES, 5.

Feldwick	Kelly	Rigg.
Jenkinson	Kerr

Majority for, 19.

Clause 4 disagreed with.

On the motion of the Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, it was ordered, That the Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. McLean, and the mover be appointed a Committee to draw up reasons.

The Council subsequently adopted the following reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the House of Representatives in the Criminal Code Bill:—

"Clause 2: Because in this climate a female is fully matured before she is sixteen years of age, and usually before she attains the age of fifteen."

"New clause 4: Because it is undesirable that Parliament should constitute itself a Court of review of the decision and verdicts of the Supreme Court, and that in the case of the convict Chemis he was found guilty by a jury of his countrymen after an exhaustive trial and duly sentenced to death."

TRUSTEES BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said its object was to enable private trustees to invest funds intrusted to them upon what were known as perpetual leases, and leases in perpetuity, and leases held under the West Coast

Settlement Reserves Act of 1892. Before doing so all the conditions must be complied with, so that there would be no forfeiture, and trustees would be perfectly safe in making advances of that kind should they think fit to do so. The amount which was to be lent was only to be up to one-third of the lease interest in the property. As honourable members would remember, by the Government Insurance Act they were not allowed to advance more than one-half the value on real estate, and were not allowed to invest on anything but freehold security. It was proposed now that the privilege conferred by this Bill should be afforded to the Government Life Insurance Department on the same conditions.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said this was a Bill to amend the Trustees Act passed two or three years ago. There were some defects in that legislation which it was necessary to amend. He had put a notice on the Supplementary Order Paper of additional provisions to give power to trustees to lease land on terms similar to those prevailing in leases with renewal, or what were called corporation leases. At the present time trustees were greatly handicapped by having to offer terms of lease different from those that Harbour Boards, Corporations, and so forth had power to give. Many tenants preferred a lease of this kind to the ordinary form of lease that trustees had power to give, and he thought there could be no objection to the proposal he had placed on the Order Paper.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said this Bill appeared to extend the operation of the Trustees Act, so as to enable a trustee, whether a private or a public trustee, to lend money to Water-supply Boards. Under the present Act money could only be lent on stocks, funds, or Government securities, public securities, or New Zealand debentures of Corporations and County Councils; but it was extended now under section 3 to Water-supply Boards. The question, in his mind, was, whether these were a good security for trust funds. A Water-supply Board might consist of two Road Boards joined together for water-supply purposes. That was a matter for the Council's consideration. Besides that, it was proposed by section 2 to allow trust moneys to be advanced on any Native land held on lease in perpetuity under the West Coast Settlement Reserves Act. Now, the Public Trustee had no power whatever to lease land in perpetuity; he had no authority under law to do that: and he (Mr. Kelly) did not know what meaning there could be in this provision. The Public Trustee could simply let land for twenty-one years, with a right of renewal on valuation. That was the limit of his authority at present, and yet this Bill proposed that money should be advanced on such leases in perpetuity. Then, again, by subsection (8), dealing with the same subject,—the West Coast Settlements Reserves Act,—he was prohibited from making advances on any land held on lease under that Act. What the meaning of it was he could not say. So far as the Public Trustee was concerned, the Bill would be inoperative, and could have no meaning unless it was the intention of the Government to bring in power to the Public Trustee to lease for 999 years. Then, with regard to section 8, the words were retrospective. Anything done before the passing of this Bill and since the passing of the original Act in 1891, whether or not the thing was sanctioned by law, could be brought in. He thought that making laws retrospective was objectionable, and entirely opposed to the Interpretation Act, and to the Instructions to the Governor. There were some other amendments he would like to get made, but they were trifling, and it was not necessary to refer to them on the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI thought it was dangerous that a person should be enabled to advance upon leasehold property money that was perhaps held in trust for infants. That was a very serious thing, and it ought not to be allowed. They all knew what had happened respecting the values of freeholds; and how much less certain would the security of leasehold be! Under these circumstances he was prepared to vote against the Bill, as he considered it a rather dangerous proposal to make.

Bill read the second time.

WATER-SUPPLY BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said that "The Water-supply Act, 1891," provided no power by which County Councils and Water Boards could raise special loans, or pay out of loan anything in the nature of preliminary expenses. The machinery contained in this Bill was practically for that purpose; also there was provision in clause 8—the rest was of very little importance—to make regulations respecting irrigation. With the view of encouraging lessees to improve their property by causing irrigation-works to be constructed, it had been thought desirable to provide that when the leases terminated they should be taken into account, and proper compensation paid for any work of this kind. This was the object of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN thought clause 2 was in the nature of retrospective legislation, and would like to give the honourable gentleman notice that when it went into Committee he would ask for an explanation of the circumstances which made this legislation necessary. He had no desire to say anything against the Bill. It might be necessary, but one liked to see what there was underneath.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN noticed a rather singular provision in clause 6. It was provided that compensation for the land taken was not to exceed the value of such land according to the valuation thereof in force under "The Property Assessment Act, 1885." That seemed a rather singular provision. A man's land was to be taken at a value not exceeding the land-tax value. The land might have much increased in value. He did not know whether it was in accordance with the same principle as was contained in the Land for Settlements Act—that the Government or the local body was to make its own bargain. It was certainly an extraordinary clause to introduce into a public Act, and, he thought, should be carefully considered in Committee.

Bill read the second time.

ABATTOIRS AND SLAUGHTERHOUSES BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said this was a consolidation Bill, and repealed five Acts that were now in existence, and it made further necessary provision for abattoirs and slaughterhouses. Clause 16 provided for the recovery of stallage, et cetera. In clause 30 there was a great deal of new matter. The general provisions of this clause were for the inspection, from time to time, of yards and abattoirs, the prevention of cruelty, proper and efficient sanitary construction, ventilation, and so on, and for preventing the sale of meat diseased and unfit for human consumption, or the sale for consumption of meat not supplied from public abattoirs and slaughterhouses. The whole power was put in the hands of the local authorities—power to build abattoirs, and to borrow money for the purpose; power to prevent diseased meat from being slaughtered; and generally to see that the towns or districts got wholesome meat. Then, in clause 34, there was a new provision, subsection (2):—

“A report by and under the hand of the keeper of every such abattoir and slaughterhouse of all cattle slaughtered during the preceding week, and containing the particulars above stated, shall be weekly transmitted to the Inspector of the district in which such abattoir or slaughterhouse is situate.”

Then, there was another clause, clause 50:—

“Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any person or company slaughtering or causing to be slaughtered large or small cattle at or upon his or their own residence, run, or farm, for the use or consumption of persons and workpeople resident or employed thereat or thereon, and not for sale to other persons.”

And clause 53:—

“No person shall be entitled to compensation for any meat or large or small cattle destroyed pursuant to any by-law under this Act.”

Clause 37, which he had omitted to notice, was an important clause:—

“Every person who destroys the skin of any large or small cattle, or cuts out, burns, or otherwise destroys or defaces any brand upon any such skin, or every person who is in possession of any such skin from which the brand has been cut or burnt, or otherwise destroyed or defaced, without being able to give a satisfactory account thereof, is, for every such offence, liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.”

What he had mentioned was what was new in the Bill. The measure had received a great deal of attention in another place, and also when before the Select Committee. He thought it was a great improvement upon previous legislation, and he could say so, having looked carefully through the existing laws and compared them with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON was very sorry to see that in this Bill the distance was reduced so that a slaughterhouse might be erected within half a mile of the boundary of a borough. He thought it would have been better to have kept the mile limit, and to have made a proviso that, with the consent of the local authorities, in special cases abattoirs might be erected within half a mile of a borough. Though that might be allowed in some cases, where the drainage system allowed of it, he thought that generally the mile limit should have been provided. He was glad to see that extra power of inspection was given to local bodies, because at the present time he thought the great trouble that arose with regard to diseased meat was not in connection with meat that was killed at proper slaughterhouses. Under the present law, if a man bought a beast and took it to a shed and killed it nothing could be done unless the Inspector actually caught the man in the act of killing it—he could take no steps at all; but he thought subsection (11) of clause 30, referred to by the Hon. Mr. Montgomery, would meet the difficulty, for it provided “For preventing and prohibiting the sale or attempted sale or consumption of meat not supplied from abattoirs or slaughterhouses under this Act.” He was very glad that the Government had thought fit to make extra provision as to the power of the local authorities to make by-laws. With regard to clause 33, it seemed there was an alteration. It provided that the Government could appoint Inspectors of slaughterhouses, while under the present law he thought the local authorities had the appointment of Inspectors.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN did not think that the objection of the Hon. Mr. Jenkinson, as to abattoirs being placed within half a mile of the boundary of a borough, et cetera, was of very great consequence, because the whole thing depended on such places being kept in a proper state of cleanliness. On the Continent he had frequently seen abattoirs close to thickly-populated towns, but they were kept in a state of the most perfect cleanliness; and under proper restrictions no nuisance could possibly arise.

Bill read the second time.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSES.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN brought up the following report of the Managers of the Conference on the Land for Settlements Bill, the New Zealand Consols Bill, the Harbours Bill, and the Government Advances to Settlers Bill:—

“The Managers appointed by the Legislative Council to conduct the Conference on the Land for Settlements Bill, the New Zealand Consols Bill, the Harbours Act Amendment Bill, and the Government Advances to Settlers Bill, have the honour to report that they have met the Managers appointed by the House of Representatives.

“The Managers of the Council and House have been unable to agree as to the privilege claimed by the House.

"Considering the late period of the session, and the exigencies of the position, it was agreed to consider the amendments of the several Bills on their merits.

"This proceeding shall not be drawn into a precedent or held to be a waiver of the privileges claimed by the House.

"The Managers have come to the following agreement regarding the Bills, viz. :—

"The Land for Settlements Bill.—The House accepts the Council's amendments in this Bill, with the following alterations in the wording of the new clause 8: In line 45, erase 'in one block more,' and insert 'an estate comprising one or more blocks and being of a greater total area'; and in line 47, erase 'block,' and insert 'estate,' and, in the same line, erase 'contiguous.' In line 52, after 'land,' insert 'any two of such classes'; and in line 53, after 'class,' insert 'or all the classes combined.'

"The New Zealand Consols Bill.—The Government having undertaken, by message from His Excellency the Governor, to reduce the total amount of deposit from £1,000,000 to £500,000, not more than £250,000 to be raised in any one year, the Council waives its amendment in line 32, clause 4. The word 'forty' is restored. The House accepts the other amendments of the Council.

"The Harbours Act Amendment Bill.—The House accepts the amendments of the Council, except the one in line 15, clause 2, which the Council waives.

"The Government Advances to Settlers Bill.—The House accepts all the amendments of the Council except those in subsections (3) and (4) of clause 24 and subsection (1) of clause 43. The Council agrees in subsections (3) and (4) to substitute 'two thousand five hundred pounds' for 'one thousand pounds'; and in subsection (1) of clause 43 to substitute 'three-fifths' for 'one-half.' Consequential amendments to be made in the Fifth and Sixth Schedules."

On the question, That the report be agreed to,

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN said, perhaps it was right that he should state shortly the ground on which this agreement had been arrived at by the Conference. He might say that when this matter was referred to the Managers he felt it was one of considerable responsibility, as the question of privilege was far and away the most important matter in dispute; and he thought it was in the best interests of the country that it was finally agreed by both parties that the amendments in the Bills referred to should be dealt with on their merits. The House had guarded its own privileges by the statement that the course taken should not be made a precedent; and it would be observed that the Council had conceded nothing in the matter. In dealing with the question of the amendments, he thought the Council would bear in mind the necessity there was, in any arrangement agreed upon, of some concessions being made by one side as well as by the other. It would be found that a very large part of the amendments—the most important amendments—made by the Council had been accepted in all these Bills. He would take them seriatim and state what the amendments were. In the Land for Settlements Bill all the amendments of the Council had been practically accepted by the House, and a verbal amendment had been made merely to make clear the intention of the Council. This was in clause 8; it was a very trivial amendment, and it did not in any way alter the sense of the clause. In the Harbours Bill the House also accepted the amendment of the Council in striking out the clause that they thought should not be inserted in a general Bill. On the other hand, the Council waived the amendment which restricted the Harbour Board to one-half instead of a year's advance. With regard to the Consols Bill, he might say that, as the Government undertook by Governor's Message to reduce the amount of the deposits by one-half,—that was to say, the amount to be raised was to be reduced from one million to half a million, that amount to be raised at the rate of £250,000 each year,—the Council thought that under these altered conditions it was worth while to waive their amendment as to the currency of the bonds, and this had been left at forty years; but the Council insisted on its amendment as to the capital being repaid in the colony. The Bill in which the most amendments were made by the Council was the Government Advances to Settlers Bill. The House accepted the amendments of the Council to prevent the raising of money by means of land-bonds, and also the other amendments, excepting those in the two subsections of clause 42. The questions raised by the amendments in these subsections were very strongly contested, and the Council's Managers offered to raise the amount of advance from £1,000 to £2,000; but when the Managers for the House came down from their first claim, the Managers for the Council thought, when they came to the question of a very small difference, that it was not worth while breaking off the negotiations; so they agreed, subject to the approval of the Council, to recommend that £2,500 should be the limit of the investment, instead of £1,000, to which the Council had reduced the amount. They also agreed that the advances should be three-fifths of the valuation instead of one-half. They bore in mind, in agreeing to this, that, while the House of Representatives wished to bring it back to two-thirds, there had been only a majority of one in the Council against the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Peacock to make the advance three-fifths. Bearing that in mind, and considering all the circumstances of the case, the Managers agreed to a compromise, fixing it at three-fifths of the value; and with regard to all the other amendments the House waived their objections. He thought that the Council would recognise the gravity of the position; and, under the circumstances, although it was to be expected that honourable members would all take different views on different points in the discussion, they would, he hoped, recognise that, on the whole, the privileges of the Council had been completely asserted, and that a reasonable compromise had been arrived at after most careful and anxious consideration.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said, with respect to the result of this Conference, he thought, considering all the circumstances of the case, that a very fair compromise had been arrived at. He was quite satisfied himself with regard to it, and they could give the Bills a fair trial, and if next session it was found that the Government Advances to Settlers Bill was a success, of course they could then give the subject further consideration. He must, however, express some regret that the other question was not dealt with—namely, the privileges of that Council. He quite understood that, at this late period of the session, the Managers on both sides shrank from dealing with the question.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN might remind the honourable gentleman that the onus lay on the other House. The Council's privileges were untouched.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY thought it would have been more satisfactory to both Houses if they could narrow the limits of the debate in that Council to such a question, and he hoped that next session the whole subject would be dealt with in a judicial spirit, and, without trying to limit the rights of either House, that the whole question would be settled satisfactorily to both Houses, and then such an agreement incorporated in an Act.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI begged to move, That the debate be adjourned, as this was a most important matter. He thought they ought to get the amendments and the report of the Conference printed upon the Order Paper before giving an opinion on it.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said he thought that something had been gained in the matter of the maintenance of the privileges of the Council. There was a certain advance made, which probably would not be receded from afterwards. Although they had been assured that the question of privilege remained open, yet it seemed to him that they had taken up a position with regard to legislation, and had been able to maintain that position, and that a great advance had been made respecting the duties of that branch of the Legislature. He thought they had reason to be grateful to those gentlemen who represented the Council in this matter, for the manner in which they had maintained the power that the Council claimed with regard to the amendments made in the Bills under consideration. Although the Council did not quite know the nature of the settlement arrived at as to the Land for Settlements Bill, still they had been assured by the Hon. Mr. Bowen that the concessions made by the Managers on behalf of the Council were purely of a verbal character. With regard to the Consols Bill, the concession was a reversion to the currency contained in that Bill; it restored the currency to forty years, instead of twenty years as amended by the Council. He was very sorry the Council had had to accede to the extended currency, because he believed that the Consols would have a far greater chance of extensive use with a currency of forty years than with a currency of twenty years. On previous occasions he had expressed his opinion that the tendency of the market rate of money was downwards all over the world, and therefore the concession of the currency of forty years to these debentures or bonds would probably give them an advantage which otherwise they would not have. He was not in favour of extending the power of the Government to borrow money. He hoped, however, that with the extended currency they had given these bonds—namely, forty years—it would not be necessary to borrow at 4 per cent. at all, as they ought to be saleable at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. instead of 4 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bowen

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said he was very glad to hear the Attorney-General cheer that statement, and he hoped that he would endeavour to give effect to it. With regard to the Advances to Settlers Bill, he thought the concession made was not of very great importance, as it was the difference between advancing to the extent of three-fifths instead of one-half. It was only a tenth. With regard to the amendment in the amount to be lent—namely, the alteration from £1,000 to £2,500—that was very important, and he was very sorry that the extension was to be made. The restriction of the amount of the advance to £1,000 on one-half of the value of the security appeared to be in the direction of limiting the possibility of loss, and consequently he regarded the extension as the extension of that possibility.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI said, as it was not the desire of the Council to adjourn that debate, he would make a few remarks, and in so doing he would say that he deeply regretted that the Council had not shown sufficient determination to adhere to its amendments. If the Council thought that it had no right to make these amendments it should not have made them, but, having made them, it should have stuck to them, because it was playing into the hands of the outside world and of members of the other branch of the Legislature. For his part, he deeply regretted that the concessions had been agreed to by the Managers; but, at the same time, he wished to say that the Managers, no doubt, had tried to do their best, and they intended to carry out what they thought was right. It would, however, have been better if they had been more determined, and had not receded one iota from the position they had originally taken up.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE thought the Council was under an obligation to those gentlemen who had been acting on its behalf in conducting the negotiations with the other House, and he thought they had come to a very satisfactory compromise. The result of that Conference was to effect a reasonable compromise between the two Houses, and he thought they had achieved a very satisfactory result. The Hon. Mr. Oliver had just said that he felt sorry that the amount of the advances under the Advances to Settlers Bill had not been reduced to the amount the Council inserted, and he thought that there had been a mistake made. He (Sir G. S. Whitmore) did not think, however, that there was a mistake made at all, because, if the other branch of the Legislature took an idea into its head that £5,000 ought to be the amount, while the Council desired to bring it down to £1,000, surely it was not very much to fix it at £2,500: it was only as much again as the amount the Council wished to make it. It was an arrangement which he thought the Council was reasonable in offering, and which the other House was wise in accepting. He was bound to say that he thought the Council was under obligations to the honourable gentlemen who had been conducting that Conference on those Bills, as with it practically the business of the session was ended, and it was a matter for congratulation that the difficulties and the rocks between the two Houses had been avoided on the privilege question. He would have liked to see this point authoritatively settled, but he was bound to say that the arguments he had heard had convinced him at least that the representatives of the Council at the Conference had held their own, and had gained more, perhaps, than the other side.

The Hon. Mr. KERR said the last speaker had expressed his (Mr. Kerr's) sentiments; and he had nothing more to say. He thought, however, that the Council was under an obligation to its representatives on the Conference for the way they had arranged this matter. They had arranged matters so that the Bills could be made workable and useful to the country. Had they not done so, but determined to adhere to the original amendments, as desired by the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, the Bills would have been thrown out altogether, and he considered the Council was very much indebted to its Managers for the way they had managed the Conference, and for the compromise they had made. It was reasonable that the Conference should give and take, and one side could not expect to ride rough-shod over the other. In all these matters conciliation was necessary, and it was a matter for congratulation that the Bills had been brought to such a stage that they could be made of use to the country.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said there was an old saying that the minds of great men ran in the same grooves, and he had been anticipated in what he was going to say by Sir George Whitmore and the Hon. Mr. Kerr. He desired to express the thanks of the Council to its Managers for their indefatigable exertions on this occasion. In his experience in the Council for many years he had never known a more difficult task than that undertaken by the honourable gentlemen referred to. It involved questions of far greater importance than he had ever seen referred to a Conference before, and he was pleased to say that the Managers in making the concessions referred to in the report had represented the wishes of the Council. What pleased him most was that, notwithstanding everything, the privileges of the Council had not been invaded. They had safeguarded its privileges, and he was more pleased than words could express. He desired to express to those gentlemen his own thanks for the manner in which they had conducted this business, because if they had not been sensible men and men of experience the probability was that the negotiations would have fallen to the ground. Notwithstanding the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, who would, if he could, have insisted upon having all the amendments rejected, there were occasions when to give and take was a very desirable thing, and on this occasion he thought they had done very well.

Motion for adjournment of debate withdrawn.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said, as the Council had accepted the principles, especially in the Advances to Settlers Act, by a small majority—unwisely as he thought, but still, as they had been accepted by the Council, he thought the Managers could not do otherwise than agree to a compromise. If it had been a question of the whole principle being discussed, that would have been a different matter; but, the principle having been accepted, the only question was a question of detail, and he thought it was perfectly right on their part to come to the compromise they did. He agreed with what had fallen from other honourable members, and thought thanks were due to the Managers for the great trouble they had taken, and the very discreet and wise manner in which they had arrived at their decision. It appeared to him that the whole of the Bills had been so carefully considered with regard to these amendments that the Council could not do better than accept the report of the Committee. No doubt there were some somewhat complicated questions involved, and there might be some reason for adjourning the debate as proposed, and considering the matter carefully; but he thought that, after the explanation so clearly given by the Hon. Mr. Bowen, the Council was perfectly justified not only in trusting to its own judgment but to the authority of its Managers. And they must also remember, as had been referred to by the Hon. the Attorney-General, that in conducting these negotiations the Council had undoubtedly maintained its own privileges in a very determined manner—at any rate, in such a form that, if it were considered necessary, as had been suggested, that action should be taken next session, they were perfectly free to move in any direction that might seem right. That, he thought, was one of the most important points in the whole matter. He trusted that early next session they would be able to put this question of privilege into definite shape and form. That, he believed, would be the only true solution of the question. There had been a suggestion to refer the matter to England for decision, but he thought, after all, no one would be satisfied to agree to a decision of that kind, which was often arrived at without the whole of the circumstances being understood, and he thought it would be far better that they should settle the question definitely among themselves and embody that settlement in an Act.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE, while agreeing with those previous speakers who said it was a pity the question of privilege should not have been settled, thought it would be quite time enough for them to consider that when the Council was asked to concede any of its privileges. They had not been even asked to make anything in the way of concession on the question of privilege. If there had been any concession it had been from the other House. These Bills, in his opinion, had been treated precisely as if the question of privilege had not come up at all. The concessions were just the usual concessions they were accustomed to in Conferences, and he thought, so far as the Council was concerned, the question of privilege might quite safely be left at rest until they were asked to concede something. In this case the Managers had not asked the Council to concede anything, and it had conceded nothing.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said that before the question was put he would like to have seen on the Order Paper the amendments that had been agreed to, but seeing the Council did not think that necessary he would not press the point. He would also express his thanks to the members of the Conference for the arduous duties which they had performed. At the same time, he thought that on questions of such importance as these four Bills it would have been quite right that members should have had time to consider them, and, as there was not much business to do on the following day, he thought they might have taken up the debate then. Another reason why an adjournment should be made was that several members of the Council were absent on Committee-work, and it was hardly fair to them that the question should be settled in their absence.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK thought in this case they did not want the amendments put on the Order Paper. They were so very plain, and had been so thoroughly explained by the Chairman of the Conference, that he thought the Council was perfectly acquainted with the matter, and, as six o'clock was now approaching, he was of opinion that they had better agree to the amendments. The Council, he might say, was determined to preserve its privileges and rights, and, when he found the Council so judicious in the selection of a Conference, so far as he was concerned he felt perfectly satisfied the privileges of the Council would be preserved. He thought those privileges had been well maintained, and, for his part, he thanked the honourable gentlemen for the arduous work which they had undertaken, and, according to his mind, had performed so satisfactorily.

Report agreed to.

The Council adjourned at ten minutes to six o'clock p.m.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 15th October, 1894.

Third Reading—Major C. Brown—Ministerial Residences Sale Bill—Privileges of the House—Criminal Code Bill—Land for Settlements Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill—Harbours Bill—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Tongariro National Park Bill—Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Bill—Counties Vehicle-Licensing Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THIRD READING.

Tramways Bill.

MAJOR C. BROWN.

Mr. JOYCE brought up the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Major C. Brown, to the effect that they were of opinion that the petitioner was grossly careless in the Meringa case, but that he might have been requested by the Government to resign his position as interpreter and Justice of the Peace on account of advanced age and defective memory; and were further of opinion that in the case in question the petitioner was less to blame than the other persons mixed up therewith. He moved, That the report do lie on the table.

Mr. McGUIRE moved, That the report be referred back to the Committee for further consideration. The recommendation of the Committee was not in accordance with the evidence, and he was sorry to inform the House that the Committee was one-sided.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is a serious charge.

Mr. McGUIRE said it might be serious, but it was unfortunately true.

Mr. SPEAKER could not allow a term of that kind to be applied to a Committee of the House, which was tantamount to impugning the fairness of a Committee of the House which was intrusted with the performance of most important duties.

Mr. McGUIRE would withdraw it, but he was afraid, if Mr. Speaker had been present as he was, and had heard the evidence, he could have come to no other conclusion himself.

Mr. SPEAKER said, if the honourable member persisted in preferring these charges against a Committee of the House, he would be obliged to ask him to discontinue speaking.

Mr. McGUIRE said the decision had been arrived at by the Government long before Judge Kettle had sent in his memorandum. Judge Kettle stated distinctly, before the Chairman and those present, that he considered Major Brown was very harshly treated; that he had committed an error of judgment no doubt, but that he was entitled to a thorough investigation by a judicial officer. Major Brown was not an ordinary man, but if he were the humblest man in New Zealand he had the right to an impartial inquiry. Owing to the positions he had held in the colony he was deserving of consideration, and he (Mr. McGUIRE) was surprised that the Premier should bar the way, and not allow the gallant veteran an opportunity of clearing his hitherto good name. He had a letter from Mr. Bryce, which he would read to the House, with regard to Major Brown at the time when he was severing his connection with the Government, which was as follows:—

“Native Office, Wellington,
“28th September, 1880.

“SIR,—I am directed by the Hon. the Native Minister to inform you that, in consequence of the necessity which exists for reducing the cost of the Civil Service wherever it can be done, the Government are compelled to dispense with your services as Civil Commissioner of the Taranaki District from the 31st proximo.

“In making this announcement, I am at the same time to state that the Government appreciate the zeal and ability which you have frequently displayed in the various departments, both civil and military, in which you have served the colony; and the Native Minister regrets that the exigencies of existing circumstances render it necessary that he should relinquish your services to his department.

“As a member of the Civil Service, you are, of course, entitled by law to compensation for the loss of your office; and I have to request that you will be good enough to forward on the enclosed form a statement of your services, and a voucher for the amount of compensation claimed.—I have, &c., “T. W. LEWIS,

“Under-Secretary.

“Major C. Brown,
“Civil Commissioner, New Plymouth.”

That was the opinion of Mr. Bryce, who was one of the most particular Native Ministers they had ever had in New Zealand; and in that letter he spoke of Major Brown in the most flattering manner. He (Mr. McGuire) thought, and the House thought, that Major Brown was entitled to the inquiry he had asked for. That inquiry should be held before the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court, of whose Court he was an officer.

Mr. DUTHIE seconded the amendment. He did so because he thought the petitioner had received very harsh treatment indeed. He had known Major Brown for some thirty years. He had been in partnership with him about twenty-seven years ago for two or three years. He had therefore some knowledge of his personal character. It was to him very painful to find an old gentleman like him, at the end of his life, when he was over seventy years old, deprived of his means of livelihood, and disgraced by removal from the Bench of Justices. He thought there was no justification for this extraordinary treatment. There was this matter of interpreting a deed for the Maori woman, but, although technically it was incorrect, there was nothing exceptional; it was only what was done in the ordinary course of business in regard to like settlements, and he did not think there was any justification for the extremely severe treatment pursued. Judge Kettle pointed out that Major Brown was suffering, through advanced years, from defective memory; and he thought, such being the case, it was at least, in common justice, the duty of the Minister to have given Major Brown an opportunity of replying to the charges made against him. In place of that, in a most curt fashion, without any hearing, he was struck off the roll of Justices. Major Brown had occupied important political positions, and had been in the public service in various capacities for many years. So far as concerned anything in his previous career, that had been dealt with by the Ministry of the day, and the letter from Mr. Bryce was an answer. That was not under review. At present they were only dealing with the one charge, and in this case there was nothing to warrant the cruel treatment he had undergone. He thought, therefore, the matter should be referred back to the Committee for further investigation. It was very bad indeed if it had come to this: that Parliament was prepared to indorse such harsh actions without due inquiry, and that individuals should be punished without inquiry. It would be a great injury to the public service if this was to be tolerated, and he trusted the House would refer the matter again to the Committee.

Mr. JOYCE was sorry he had not had the opportunity of speaking before the honourable member for Wellington City. If that honourable gentleman had been at the Committee that morning he would have refrained from making the remarks he had made. It was to be regretted that the honourable member for Egmont had spoken as he had; but it was the old story of “Save me from my friends.” Judge Kettle had been brought down at the urgent request of that honourable member, and he would quote two expressions that gentleman had used that morning to the Committee, and leave the House then to say whether the report should be referred back. Judge Kettle had said, “The action of Major Brown was grossly careless in connection with his work, and there were gross irregularities in regard to this transaction.” The Committee were unanimous in their decision—indeed, the great effort of the Committee was to let the petitioner down as easily as possible.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—How many were there? Mr. JOYCE said he thought about five. But they were unanimous. Judge Kettle had been brought down more in the interests of the petitioner than of any one else, and those expressions he had used—and used in the hearing of the honourable member for Egmont—were so emphatic that it left no doubt in the minds of the Committee that, however honest Major Brown might be in his general dealings, so far as his official duties as Native interpreter were concerned, he was grossly careless, and there were gross irregularities in respect to this whole affair. He would say no more, as he did not wish to injure the petitioner in any way, but the impression on the minds of the members of the Committee was that he was not entitled to the relief he asked for.

Mr. SEDDON said he saw no good likely to arise from referring the matter back to the Committee. There was a Committee dealing with the matter in another place. The evidence in the case was very complete. There had been a question as to whether there could be any doubt as to Judge Kettle's report, or the views he held on the matter, and it had been specially requested that that gentleman should be brought down to give evidence on the Committee. He came and gave evidence, and his evidence did not help the petitioner at all. He was the Judge before whom the case was tried and the Commissioner before whom the other evidence was taken, and, relying on that case, there could be no doubt whatever. He did not want to place it on record for all time, but there was no doubt that there was gross carelessness in respect to the matter. It was not only in this case, but, if they were to protect the Natives at all from wrongdoings, they must be very particular as to the interpreters who were appointed. They were not simply appointed as interpreters to interpret the language, but they had to explain matters to the Natives. Here the true explanation could not have been given, because the documents spoke for themselves. He need say no more than this: How was it to be explained that an affidavit had been signed stating that £40 was paid, when a few minutes prior to that a receipt was given for only £20, which receipt had been written out by Major Brown, who was the interpreter in the case. He wanted to know how that 3.0. was explainable, except, as the Judge said, it was gross carelessness. He did not want to say anything more, for in this matter the Government had only carried out what was a most painful duty. The petitioner was a man who had held important positions, and who in the past had rendered good service to the country. His ability was not questioned. The testimonial read and relied on simply referred to his ability. There was nothing further said; but they could, by reference to the blue-books of the colony, find something worse. There was something more, and he (Mr. Seddon) had tried to avoid, if he could, this matter being dragged before the House more than was necessary. He regretted that he had had to do what he did. Where a transaction came before the Government which showed there had been gross carelessness, and where they had found that the Natives suffered, they would make no exception, but would have the person responsible struck off the roll of interpreters. Where there was any matter of that kind brought before them they would not hesitate to have an inquiry and do their duty. Judge Kettle said that morning before the Committee that the Justice of the Peace who witnessed the document was just as bad as Major Brown. He intended to look into that matter, and, he cared not who it was, if gross carelessness or culpable negligence had been committed which resulted in injustice, the person responsible was not fit to hold the position. He did not think it would help Major Brown to have the matter referred back to the Committee. He had thought the honourable gentleman would have let the matter go, and that there would be nothing whatever said. As to any punishment inflicted, if they looked at what had occurred they must admit that it was not at all too severe.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BUCHANAN could not pretend to have looked into this matter sufficiently to justify him in saying much about it; but what struck him was that the Government had apparently struck Major Brown off the roll of Justices, and had degraded him in the most brutal manner,—more particularly taking into account the position he had previously held in the community,—without first holding an inquiry. Why should a man be punished in this way without an investigation—without his being given the slightest opportunity of defending himself? Surely the position previously occupied by Major Brown clearly entitled him to that.

Sir R. STOUT said that, judging from the report which had been read, it seemed to him a most inconclusive document. As he understood it, it said that the charge on which Major Brown had been actually dismissed from office was one that the Committee had not had time to fully inquire into. It had not been investigated by the Committee, and yet the Committee would not recommend it to be inquired into. He could not understand that logic at all. It seemed to him that what Major Brown asked for was what they gave to the greatest criminal in the colony—that was, an inquiry. That was all he asked. He did not ask for reinstatement; he simply asked that some judicial officer should investigate his case, and he thought that was the least that could be granted to him. He (Sir R. Stout) also understood that the Premier attended the Committee and urged a certain course of action in the Committee as against Major Brown.

Mr. SEDDON.—Certainly not.

Sir R. STOUT.—Then, how did the honourable gentleman attend?

Mr. JOYCE.—As a witness.

Sir R. STOUT thought it was inconvenient that the Premier should attend even as a witness when it was his own administrative act that was in question. By attending he allowed himself, whether consciously or unconsciously, to sway the Committee, and he (Sir R. Stout) did not think that was at all desirable. That in itself was the strongest reason for awarding Major Brown all he asked—namely, a proper inquiry by a Judge of the Native Land Court. If the charge were narrowed down to one of gross carelessness, that might, no doubt, have occurred in doing interpreting work, but that was not the specific charge against him, and that was no reason why he should be removed from another office which had nothing to do with the interpreting of documents, and that was the office of Justice of the Peace. He would simply vote for referring the report back. It seemed to him that the report was its own condemnation, because the Committee had no business to say it did not investigate the case because it was too complicated for it to consider, and then practically uphold the Government for dismissing the man for the cause assigned. That seemed to him to be the logical conclusion. The honourable member who now interrupted had not read the whole of the report. He (Sir R. Stout) would read it. It said,—

“ . . . the petitioner was grossly careless in the Meringa case, but think he might have been requested by the Government to resign his position as interpreter and Justice of the Peace on account of his advanced age and defective memory (of which Mr. District Judge Kettle gave illustrations), which rendered him unable to deal with such a complicated case as Meringa's. The Committee are further of opinion that in the Meringa case the petitioner was less to blame than the other persons mixed up therewith—namely, Messrs. Ward and Humphries. The Committee cannot recommend that the inquiry prayed for should be granted.”

Mr. CROWTHER said the Committee had not said they had not time to make an investigation.

Sir R. STOUT.—That was what he understood, in the Meringa case. Did they go into the Meringa case? He understood they did not consider the Meringa case, and the Chairman of the Committee admitted this was so. On the face of this report the position was even stronger than he had stated it to the House, because this was what it said: “After having taken evidence on this petition, the Committee are of opinion that the petitioner was grossly careless in the Meringa case.” That was all. Well, then, if a man was to be dismissed from his position as Justice of the Peace because the Committee were unable to deal with a complicated case like the Meringa case, that gave the strongest reason why the report should be referred back.

Mr. SEDDON thought, after what Sir Robert Stout had said, he was entitled to make a further explanation. He had been sent for by the Committee, and when there he was asked several questions.

Sir R. STOUT.—That is not a personal explanation.

Mr. SEDDON did not know that some of the statements of the honourable member should be allowed to go uncontradicted. He (Mr. Seddon) said he was sent for by the Committee, and when before it he simply answered the questions that were submitted. He was under the impression that if he had not done so it might be considered he had taken a very wrong course, and was not showing that deference to the Committee he was entitled from his position to do.

Sir R. STOUT said this was not a personal explanation.

Mr. MILLS thought at this late period of the session it would be unwise to refer the report back, because in any case he thought what the friends of Major Brown should advise him to do was to allow the matter to stand over to another session, and then there would be a new Committee of the House set up. This was his idea of getting any alteration of the report. What he rose principally to speak for was to say that he was very much pleased to hear what the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) had said in the course of his recent remarks. He had just said, as an argument in its favour, that all that Major Brown asked for was what was granted to the greatest criminal. Then, why had the honourable gentleman opposed any inquiry at all in the case of Chemis? That was fought against in the House by the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) on many occasions.

Sir R. STOUT asked if the honourable member had any right to allude to a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER thought the honourable member was not exceeding his rights, in what he had said by way of illustrating his remarks, by making a comparison between this case and another.

Mr. MILLS said it was only at the last moment, when his changed position could have no effect, that the honourable gentleman found that was the proper position to take up. He (Mr. Mills) was much pleased at this late hour to hear the honourable gentleman acknowledge there was something in giving justice to those who could not get it in any other way except by an inquiry through a Committee of this House.

Mr. E. M. SMITH intended to support the amendment that this petition be referred back to the Committee. He did it for this reason: He wished to set himself right with the House and the colony; and, another thing, he did so because the report of the Committee had dragged in the name of a Justice of the Peace who was called in upon that occasion. Now, it was stated in the report that the Committee considered that Major Brown was not so blamable as Messrs. Humphries and Ward. Well, he might tell the House that Mr. Ward was the Justice of the Peace who was called in.

Sir R. STOUT asked, Was he present at the Committee?

Mr. E. M. SMITH said, No; he was not present, and yet his name as a Justice of the Peace was dragged in, when his only duty was to witness the signature of the person in the usual manner of witnessing a signature or declaration; this was all the part he took in the affair. He was not supposed to know the contents of the deed. The deed was neither interpreted to him nor explained. He was simply called in to witness the signature of this particular Native; he had no interest in the matter of the block, and gained nothing by the transaction. Now, he might state, in defence of that gentleman, that he was one of the oldest colonists in that part of the colony, and, more than that, he was a man who was held in the highest esteem and as above suspicion—all who knew him could testify to that fact; and therefore, before any blame should be thrown on him, he ought to be allowed to appear before the Committee, and be allowed to explain the action he took and defend himself, and prove that he took no part, only witnessed the Native sign the deed. On that ground, he would support the amendment referring the report back to the Committee. It would be in the minds of honourable members that in the early part of the session he asked the question of the Government whether they would carry out the recommendation of a public meeting in New Plymouth to refer this question to the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court, and he had done his "level best" during the session to attain that result. He had gone with a deputation to the Minister, and had done his "level best" to get a fair and impartial hearing of the case, and justice done to Major Brown. But he must state this: that outside the House Major Brown's friends and the papers—the Taranaki News and Inglewood Record—had mixed the case up with politics, and made his case worse than it was for him by dragging in other persons who had nothing to do with the case. They had been slating the Government, and they had thought proper to drag him (Mr. Smith) into the case. They had blamed him as the member who was the instrument of the Government in getting Major Charles Brown struck off the rolls as a Justice of the Peace and his certificate as an interpreter cancelled. He wished to state positively to the House, and he wished it placed on the records of the House, so as to enable him to clear his character, that he never had any personal interview with the Government prior to the occurrences just referred to, nor had he communicated with them by letter or otherwise. He had nothing whatever to do with it, and knew nothing of the case until it was mentioned to him by Major Brown's friends. His reply was that if the Government had done this without calling upon Major Brown for an explanation they had done wrong.

Mr. SEDDON.—He was called on for an explanation.

Mr. E. M. SMITH also said if Major Brown was not given an opportunity of stating his side of the case fairly he would do his best to see justice done to him. He did not believe in old colonists, who had honourably held important positions—and, in the case of Major Brown, he had been returned four times to the House of Parliament, was Officer Commanding the District, had also been Native Commissioner, and had carried himself through his public career in an honourable and praiseworthy manner,—should be summarily dealt with. He thought it was a hard case. The Premier had already explained that he (Mr. Smith) had had nothing to do with it, good, bad, or indifferent. He did not think it would be lowering to the dignity of the House or the Ministry to countenance the referring of this matter to a Judge of the Native Land Court, a man who from the highly-important position he held could only do justice in the case. If then it were found that any wrong had taken place, then the officer could be removed. He did hope, in the interests of justice to an old colonist, the Government would see their way clear to refer this matter back to the Committee; and that Mr. Joe Ward would be communicated with with a view of his giving evidence, as he knew that gentleman could prove that he had no hand in or knowledge of any irregularities. Justices of the Peace were only required to witness signatures, and were not supposed to know the contents of deeds or documents. Such being the case, it was unfair for the Committee to attach any blame to Mr. Ward, more especially when he had not been before the Committee to defend or answer for himself.

Mr. CROWTHER said, unlike the last speaker, he had no occasion to set himself right with his constituents. The Committee on this occasion had been as merciful as they possibly could be in the report, all the circumstances considered. The old lady mentioned by the last speaker, and who was selling her land, was, it was set forth clearly, to receive £40. She did not receive the £40; she received £20; and further, when it transpired that this four acres of land was worth more than £40, being assessed at £70, the trustees of this old lady appeared in Court and set up a claim for the extra £30. When she appeared in Court she appeared to be a perfect imbecile, and her evidence in Court could not be taken in consequence of her inability to give it. That was the kind of person they had been playing with from first to last. Here was an old lady who sold four acres of land for £70: £15 went to the Government for Native Land Court tax; £16 went to Mr. Humphries for commission: and just fancy dealing with Native lands as this four acres was dealt with! Major Brown was mixed up in this case as an expert. He did not appear as an ordinary interpreter, but as a trustworthy interpreter who represented the interests of this imbecile old lady, who signed the document in company with this Joe somebody or other; and the poor old lady got only £25 out of the £70! If that was the state of the case, what else could the Committee have done but say that the Government should have let Major Brown down as easily as possible? They could have given him an opportunity to resign. Nothing further could they, in mercy, possibly do, with all the evidence before them. Of course the inquiry would proceed at five o'clock, and they would then hear something further about it.

Mr. FLATMAN moved the adjournment of the debate, as there were several important Bills on the Order Paper to be dealt with that day.

Captain RUSSELL hoped the debate would not be adjourned. Here was a question of the greatest importance—a question as between the administration of the Government and the honour of a man, and surely it was not unduly occupying the time of the House to discuss it at full length. If the debate was adjourned they knew the matter would be shelved altogether so far as the House was concerned, and it was their duty to settle it once and for all.

Mr. PIRANI trusted the House would not consent to adjourn the debate; and he was surprised at the attitude taken up by the honourable member for Pareora in the proposition he had made, because they knew that the adjournment of the debate must quash the subject altogether, and leave it just as it was before.

Mr. E. M. Smith

Motion to adjourn the debate negatived.

Captain RUSSELL would like to say a few words on the point at issue. He as a rule avoided expressing his opinion as to the merits of a case until he had the whole of the facts before him, and, with the exception of the five honourable members who formed the Committee, and the Government, the House was not in a position to form an opinion as to the merits of this case. He greatly doubted if even the five members of the Committee were ready to form an opinion, because from what he had gathered members were in and out of the Committee-room during the sittings. Some attended regularly, some very irregularly; some were there all the time, some only attended about a quarter of the time, while others scarcely attended at all. When the question first came up he ventured to predict that such would take place, and it was extremely undesirable that when the personal honour of a man was at stake he should be subjected to such a tribunal. What they heard that afternoon more than justified the position he took up on that former occasion. The honourable member for New Plymouth had led them to understand by open speech what they had heard on that side of the House by rumour—that there was a question as to which party was supported by Major Brown at the last election. Some of the gentlemen whose names were mentioned in the report took one side in the election fight, while another took the losing side. It was said that the gentleman who took the losing side was Charles Brown, while the other two gentlemen, who the report told them were just as much to blame, took the right side—that is to say, the winning side.

Mr. SEDDON.—But is that true?

Captain RUSSELL could not say that from his own knowledge; but the honourable member for New Plymouth had put the matter very well in his speech when he stated that the local newspapers were full of comments on the fact that Charles Brown took the wrong side at the election. He did not, therefore, say that this was true, but, whatever his opinion might have been before, he thought now that the report should be handed back to the Committee for reconsideration, for the simple reason that the report stated that there were others whose conduct was worse than that of Major Brown. He did not know any of these personages, but he only quoted from the report; and, whether Charles Brown was innocent or guilty, he certainly was entitled to an impartial tribunal. If on inquiry he was found to be guilty, by all means let him take the deserts of his guilt. The honourable member for Waimea-Picton twitted the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) with changing his views, and mentioned the case of Chemis; but there was no analogy between the two cases. The honourable member for Waimea-

Picton himself expressed his intention of voting that the report should not be sent back to the Committee, and that there should now be an end to the inquiry; and yet he twitted the honourable member for Wellington City with opposing a reopening of the Chemis case. He seemed to forget that Chemis had a fair and open trial in the light of day, before twelve jurors, and subsequently an inquiry before the Governor. This person, Major Brown, mentioned in the report, had, it was stated, been guilty of carelessness. He had committed no crime, and yet he was not to be allowed any inquiry at all. He held that there should be a full and exhaustive inquiry. He was not one of those who thought that past distinguished services should prevent a man from receiving the deserts of his guilt. If he were found guilty let him receive the punishment he deserved; but, if he were proved innocent, how unjust the treatment he had been subjected to!

Mr. MILLS wished to explain that he did not advocate that no inquiry should be held. What he thought was that, just at the end of the session, it would be far better for Major Brown and his friends to hold the matter over until next session.

Mr. HEKE said the honourable gentleman who had just sat down did make the remarks attributed to him in reference to the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the Chemis case. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay had put the case quite correctly. He (Mr. Heke) could quite conceive that Major Brown had been accused of certain wrongful acts, and he held that when a man, Native or European, was accused of anything he should have the fullest opportunity of placing his case before one of the highest tribunals in the land. It was contended on the 3.30. part of some honourable members that an opportunity should be given to Major Brown to place his case before the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court, and he thought it was only fair that this gentleman should have that opportunity. If he was able to prove his innocence, that would be done; whereas, if he could not do so, the Court would report accordingly. He hoped the House would refer the report back to the Committee.

Mr. PERE thought this case ought to be referred to a Court for inquiry, and if it was found by the Court that the whole of the evidence given before the Committee was true, then punishment ought to alight on Major Brown. If it was found that the statements were incorrect, then he ought to have reparation. He had heard one honourable member say that Major Brown had deprived certain Natives of a sum of money. If it had been found by the Committee that that statement was correct, there was no reason why the case should be referred to another Committee. In that case the petitioner ought to be punished.

The House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 29.

Buddo	Harris	Montgomery
Buick	Hogg	Morrison
Cadman	Houston	Parata
Carncross	Maslin	Pinkerton
Carnell	McGowan	Seddon
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Crowthor	McNab	Thompson.
Guinness	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall	Millar	Flatman
Hall-Jones	Mills	Joyce.

NOES, 27.

Bell	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Button	Larnach	Smith, G. J.
Collins	Massey	Stout
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Te Ao
Graham	Newman	Wilson.
Green	Pere	Tellers.
Heke	Pirani	Duthie
Hutchison, G.	Russell, G. W.	McGuire.
Hutchison, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duncan	Mackenzie, T.
Lawry	Mitchelson
Mackintosh	Allen
Reeves.	Lang.

Majority for, 2.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

MINISTERIAL RESIDENCES SALE
BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be now read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the Bill be re-committed for the purpose of reconsidering the preamble and the schedule. He would not take up much time in explaining why he desired the Bill to be recommitted. In Committee he had moved that the Tinakori residence be handed over to the University College, Wellington, for the establishment of which an Act had been passed. The Premier objected, asking the Chairman to rule that the motion was out of order, on the ground that, as it was a piece of Crown land, it could only be diverted from the Crown by the Crown's consent. There was also another motion made, dealing with the proceeds of the land, by the honourable member for Riccarton; and to this the honourable gentleman also raised the same objection. The Chairman could not rule otherwise on the points raised. So that the Committee really had no opportunity of deciding the question, and the Committee would have no opportunity now of deciding it. All he asked on this occasion was that this piece of land should not be sold in the meantime till next session. He did not ask that the land should be given over to the University at present. He simply asked that the State should keep possession of the land. He might point out that this land was originally really a public domain. It appeared in "The Public Domains Act, 1881," and he presumed it was set apart at some time for public domain purposes. Of that he knew nothing, except what he saw in the Act of 1881; and he would ask members who objected to parting with this land by sale to agree with him in this matter. The State had to keep possession of the land, and it was simply leaving to a future session the disposal of it. What possible objection could there be to that? Further, he would urge that the middle district of New Zealand must have university education; it must have a university college. No country in the world could succeed as a democratic country without State-aided universities; and it was precisely those countries where most had been done for the universities, where most had been done for primary and secondary education, where the nation stood highest. Statistics showed that in the countries of Europe, with regard to primary education, Sweden and Norway had 97 per cent. of their people who could write, whilst the United Kingdom had only 90 per cent. In the small kingdom of Norway, a poor country as compared with New Zealand, there were one university and no less than 128 colleges; and it had done far more for education than we had attempted to do. It had a university at Christiania, and it was, perhaps, the most democratic country in Europe. Sweden had two universities and 146 colleges. What could they effect if they did not give more attention to university education? Where could they get a more striking example than that which had happened in Prussia and in Germany? In Germany there were no less than twenty-one universities, besides innumerable colleges and high schools. He would like to point out what happened in Prussia after the disastrous battle of Jena, and the Peace of Tilsit. The country was then in a terrible condition. No country was ever humiliated so much as it was at the time. But King Frederick William III. and Stein and Hardenberg not only dealt with the laws, but decided that attention should be paid to university, primary, and secondary education. There was a country sunk in debt, much of its territory taken away; and what did they do? They founded a university at Berlin. The result of higher education in Germany had been this: that she had taken perhaps the leading position in Europe, and it was her education that had enabled her to do it—not primary education alone, but higher education. No country could compete with other countries unless attention was paid to education. What was to be the future of New Zealand? Was it to depend upon outside countries for its clergymen, its scientists, its doctors, its lawyers, and its teachers? They must have their teachers trained in universities if they were to be efficient teachers and if primary education was to be raised. Those counties in Scotland which had the best primary education, which had produced the largest number of eminent pupils, were the counties in which they had the Dick and Milne bequests: that was, they had bonuses given to teachers who could show a university degree. If a teacher had a university degree he got an augmentation of his salary. The result was that they got highly-educated teachers, and their pupils were distinguished in the army, the navy, and the Indian service, and also in professional careers. This was entirely due to the primary schools being better equipped, and there one could go from the primary school direct to the university. That could not be done unless they had as primary-school teachers men who had had a university education. In the parish where he was trained they learned all the things taught in the primary schools, as well as the classics and French, German, and mathematics. What was the result? That they went direct from their schools to the university, and in one year one of their students carried off the Greek bursary. If they had their primary-school teachers equipped with a thoroughly scientific training, what advantage would they not confer upon their primary schools! It was all a mistake to assume that the university was for teaching Latin and Greek. The university became practically the highest school for technical science. He therefore asked, if the House was anxious to see the primary schools of the colony efficient, that they would vote for what he suggested at the present time. It was not a question at all of giving higher education to a few. It was the poor man's children who benefited, not altogether the rich man's. The rich man's children were sent to Europe—to the universities of England, Dublin, and Edinburgh—and, if they wished to do equal justice to all, it was their duty to promote this university education. He could go at greater length into this question, but he recognised that they were getting towards the end of the session, and that was his reason for not using one-tenth part of his notes. The Premier had said he would not object to giving the land for a poorhouse, but he would not give it for a university. It put him in mind of an historic incident, which he might call the Mary incident in which Judas figured. They had to look after the poor. They had got special Boards for that purpose. But they had to look after something more—just as high, just as necessary—that was, the social life, the citizen life,—that was promoted by higher education. He was not asking them to give an endowment for the Middle District University at present, but he was asking them to prevent this land from being sold; and he asked those who were denouncing the State for selling its land to support him, and this question would test their sincerity. The land was not to be sold until Parliament was consulted, when they would be able to dispose of it for the purpose of secondary education or anything else.

Mr. SEDDON said there was no doubt as to the intention of the honourable member in moving his amendment. The matter had been discussed at length in Committee, and he would have thought that the division then taken would have been quite sufficient to warrant the honourable gentleman in desisting from his attempt to take this land for the purpose indicated. This Bill was introduced, as he believed, for the purpose of settling once and for all the question of the Ministerial residences. That was what the Bill was introduced for, and forty-four members of the House to eleven voted on the second reading that the Ministerial residences should be sold. The honourable member's proposal was to submit for sale two of the Ministerial residences, but not to sell the other, but let the sale of it stand over for twelve months until the honourable gentleman could bring in an amending Bill for the Middle District University, and secure the land held over from the previous session as an endowment for the University. When the honourable gentleman introduced his Bill he told the House he was asking for nothing. He (Mr. Seddon) was told then, and members were fully aware, of what was going to happen shortly afterwards. He knew very well, at any rate, that the colony would be asked to endow this University. They were told at the time that nothing further was wanted. He would ask if the House was to be treated in that way. He had nothing to say against higher education. He had never contended that universities in our midst were not very desirable; but they should be accessible to all and not to a few if they were to benefit the country. He had said on the floor of the House, and now repeated, that higher education was taken advantage of by a select few, and that the majority of the people could not take advantage of it. That would be so so long as they had the present system of high fees and exclusiveness. With regard to the countries which the honourable gentleman had named—Norway and Sweden—and other countries, he would find that opportunities were given to every one, and that it was not as it was here. The question was this: Whether under the existing circumstances, in dealing with this question of selling a piece of land upon which a Ministerial residence was built, the whole question of university establishment should be raised. He thought they should wait until they had to deal with the universities, and then they could be dealt with in a comprehensive way. He thought the position he took up when the grant was made in regard to the University College of Auckland would prove that he was consistent—that he was not one of those who opposed higher education. The question was, whether they had come there to establish this university for the middle district of the colony and to grant the endowment which the honourable member sought under this Bill. The honourable member stated that we must train our own lawyers, our own doctors, our own scientists, and our own teachers. He thought that, at the rate they were going in the way of training lawyers—he did not know so much about doctors—but certainly, as far as the lawyers and teachers were concerned, there were too many in these professions. The result was that it was not tending to 4.0. improve the position of some of the professions to which he referred. He questioned very much whether they were not going too far. It was not the selection of the fittest; it was not making it universal; he said that we were giving advantages to a select few, and the colony had to provide for them first by endowments, and secondly by grants under legislation. Under these circumstances the honourable gentleman was commencing at the wrong end when he asked that this piece of land should be given for the purpose. The question was, Should the colony retain this Ministerial residence for another year, or should it be disposed of? He did not care what was done with the amount realised. It might be given for primary-school buildings, so that schools might be erected in newly-settled districts, so that it should not be as he had seen in his travels: there were settlements where he had seen children being taught in a cow-shed. If they wanted money for the purpose of grants to school-buildings in places where settlement was going on rapidly, let them use the money for that purpose, and he had not the slightest objection. And he said the claims of these people were much greater than for the Middle District University. He objected, therefore, to the recommitment of the Bill. Why did not the honourable gentleman, when the University Bill was before the House, put this land in the schedule of that Bill, and honestly ask the House for it for that purpose, instead of, by a side-wind, attempting to secure an endowment? This did not commend itself to his (Mr. Seddon's) mind as being a proper and legitimate way to treat the House. He thought the House should come to the conclusion to sell the residence, and have done with it once and for all. What did it mean? They had to keep the Ministerial residences in repair, and to keep gardeners there, and to go to all sorts of trouble and expense, and next year the whole question would be reopened again. In regard to the point raised as to the assent of the Crown not having been obtained, the honourable gentleman was debarred by the ruling of the Chairman: still, there was a division taken on the schedule, and there was a very large majority against the exclusion of this land from the schedule. He did not know whether honourable members had altered their opinions. It was quite true that there was a very small House, and he thought it was only fair to give the honourable gentleman the opportunity of bringing the matter before the House when more members were present, and that was why the third reading was postponed. He saw no reason why exception should be made of Wellington in respect to this piece of land. It was the property of the Crown, the House was in favour of disposing of it, and he thought there was much greater need for the proceeds to go to the establishment of primary schools in newly-settled districts than for the establishment of a university for the middle district. There were the Wellington College, the Roman Catholic College in Wellington, and the high schools. What were the high schools? They were select schools for the children of certain people who objected to their children mixing with pupils who attended the other schools. When the standard was brought down, and Fourth Standard pupils were admitted in the high schools, it was not what was intended at all. Not long ago £2,000 was asked for, and had been granted. Wellington could not complain, and Wellington had no claim whatever for the special provision the honourable gentleman asked for. If a majority was prepared to give this land for a university, let them say so. It was much better to have it decided once for all. He would take the decision on this division. If a majority were willing to recommit he would take it as an indication that the land was to be given for a Middle District University.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BELL said the honourable gentleman had hardly held out any olive-branch. He lost no opportunity of making a violent attack on the people of Wellington. He did it in Committee; and when in Committee on the Bill he (Mr. Bell) had refrained from replying. The honourable gentleman now repeated it in the House, and when the whole House was anxious to get on with the business the leader of the House made that attack. He would refrain again from occupying the time of the House at any length in what he had to say. First, with regard to what the Premier said about the senior member for Wellington City, he was entirely incorrect. That honourable gentleman, in introducing the Middle District University College Bill, said that he was prevented from proposing any endowment because that could only be done on the motion of the Crown; and therefore he said he was bringing in a Bill in an incomplete form: but he never said the House would not be asked at any time to give an endowment; and when the Premier said his honourable friend misled the House, and induced the House to pass the Bill by some false pretences of that sort, he was saying what was entirely incorrect, and what, had the honourable gentleman been a little careful, he must have known to be incorrect. The Premier went into the question of university education, and into that he did not propose to follow the honourable gentleman, except by giving an absolute contradiction to the statement that it was only open to a certain class. That was not the case, and the Premier only said it for the purpose of using an ad captandum argument in the House, and of getting that sort of flapdoodle into Hansard, to be used on the platforms afterwards. There was no sense, no accuracy, in it. But if it were so, what would be the remedy? The remedy would be to supplement the finances of the universities in order that they might be open to all. Did the honourable gentleman contend that the way to enlarge the scope of these institutions was to limit their means? No. If the honourable gentleman wanted to extend it to all classes—if it were limited now—the way was to endow the universities, so that they should be able to provide education at less cost to the students than at present. The honourable gentleman spoke of his attitude in regard to the Auckland University to show that he was not opposed to higher education.

He did not follow previous votes of honourable gentlemen in Hansard, and did not know how he voted on that occasion, but he assumed the honourable gentleman supported the delivery to the Auckland University of a building that was the property of the Crown, and its endowment with a sum of £4,000 per annum; and what consistency was there between that action and his speech of to-day?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said we had sufficient universities in the colony already.

Mr. BELL said the honourable gentleman might take that attitude consistently, but the Premier did not say that he opposed the motion because they had sufficient universities now, but because university education was a provision for a certain class.

Mr. SEDDON said he did not say that.

Mr. BELL said, then his ears could not be trusted.

Mr. SEDDON said he was referring to universities and high schools that now existed,—as to who had the advantage of them.

Mr. BELL said, then, why did the honourable gentleman vote to give a public building and £4,000 a year to the Auckland University, if that was the effect of it? The honourable gentleman was praising himself for his vote on that occasion. But this was playing with the question. The reason why his honourable friend asked for the recommitment of the Bill was this: On two occasions this particular building had been offered by the Government as an endowment for the University; and the Premier knew it quite well—that, if the building was to be disposed of, Parliament would be invited to allow it to be given for this purpose. Nothing new was being asked. He asked the Minister of Education to say whether this was not the case. That was the reason why special exception was asked for in regard to this building. At this late period of the session university education was far too wide a question to enter upon, but he asked the House to say whether it was not a great temptation to a representative of Wellington to use his full privilege in reply to the speech that had been made by the Premier. He would not yield to the temptation, but he would say in one sentence, in regard to the necessity for a university in Wellington, those who had universities established in their own districts ought in fairness to support this motion, inasmuch as it was asking for no more than the Government had been prepared to give before the Premier had got the idea that it was a popular thing to denounce university education as class education and university legislation as class legislation. Inasmuch as it had been offered, and inasmuch as it was the beginning of a necessary endowment, the House ought, in fairness, to agree to the recommitment, and to the exclusion of this piece of ground from the Bill.

Mr. REEVES said that, in answer to the question put by the honourable gentleman, he would say what he thought happened on the occasion to which he referred. He presumed the honourable gentleman referred to the occasion on which a large deputation waited upon him (Mr. Reeves) in the Government Buildings with regard to a university for Wellington. They asked that something should be done to establish a university; and either he (Mr. Reeves) suggested to them, or somebody else suggested and he took it up, that this Tinakori Road residence should be handed over as an endowment. He forgot whether he suggested it first, or whether somebody else suggested it and he himself took up the suggestion. Then some of the members for Wellington City, or perhaps the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs—he rather thought it was the honourable member over there—said that that would not do that; whatever the Government did, it ought not to be confined to some petty dribbling endowment of the kind, which would lead to nothing satisfactory, but that if any assistance at all were to be given they ought to give some substantial and sufficient endowment. Somebody else corroborated that; and he (Mr. Reeves) left it there. He thought the feeling of the deputation was that they did not want any trifling scraps of an endowment such as that, but that they wanted a really good and sufficient endowment or none at all.

Dr. NEWMAN thought, so far as his memory served him, that his desire was to take what they could get on that occasion, and to ask for more on a future occasion. That was good, sound policy, and, so far as he remembered, it was the policy he advocated—namely, that of taking all they could get, and coming back later on and asking, perhaps, the Minister of Lands to give them 10,000 acres out of the Awarua Block. He would not stick at a trifle like that if he could get it.

Mr. GREEN.—Why not ask for the whole block?

Dr. NEWMAN could not get the whole block, but if he could get 10,000 acres he would take it, and ask for more afterwards. He asked the Premier if he could not see his way to meet them in this matter. He thought it was only a little they were asking for, and if the honourable gentleman gave them a capitulation it would be all the better. He ventured to say, while they were going about it, that, if they were prepared to start the thing by giving it a habitation, a considerable number of people would be prepared to help considerably this University; and, under these circumstances, he hoped the honourable gentleman would see the advisability of giving it a start. He failed to see why he should not do so; the money would certainly be quite as well spent in the establishment of a university in Wellington as on the purposes for which large amounts were already being spent.

Mr. DUTHIE was sorry his colleague, in place of asking for one of the residences, did not ask for the whole of them. They might as well all be passed over for this purpose. If the House looked at the position of this province it would see that it was altogether different from that of the South. In early years it had no land revenue. The Provincial Government had to buy all its land from the Natives, and it had always been a struggle in this part of the country how to meet the cost of road-construction. The district was mountainous, and hence the Provincial Government had always been in an impecunious position, and never able to make endowments for the purpose of education, as the people in the more favoured South Island had been. It could only be by the sense of justice of the House this endowment could be given. The House had fairly provided for the Province of Auckland in the matter of university education by an endowment of £4,000 per annum.

Sir R. STOUT.—And land-endowments in addition.

Mr. DUTHIE.—Yes; they had land-endowments in addition to this charge upon the consolidated revenue of £4,000 per annum. This province, however, had no endowments whatever, and, seeing it had no property available, and that these residences were proposed to be sold, he could hardly think it was worth the while of the House to dispose of them otherwise than by granting them as an endowment for the purpose indicated. It would make very little difference to the colony on a year's income, and it was far better to apply these residences to assisting to meet this want, which, the House must recognise, gave a genuine claim against it for aid. He trusted the Premier would not press the matter, but would accept the amendment assigning the residences as an endowment to the University Board. In respect to higher education Wellington was in an impecunious state, and it was a district that was never found clamouring for contributions from the public purse. While a member during four years he had never preferred a claim upon the public purse. That being the case, he thought the House could fairly meet this modest request. He trusted the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. MEREDITH rose to protest against the suggestion of the honourable member who had just sat down—that the total proceeds from the sale of the Ministerial residences might be devoted to an endowment for a university for the City of Wellington. So long as the work of settlement was being extended in almost every direction in the North Island, and in the South Island as well, it was imperative to follow up settlement by planting schools, and he thought the needs of these settlers in the remote districts of the North Island, and in the South Island as well, to have their educational wants attended to, should be provided for before they went in for a lavish expenditure in the shape of endowments for a university in Wellington. If they had an abundance of money so as to give the settlers an opportunity of educating their children, there might be some reason for doing so. But, as that was not the case, he must protest against the proceeds of the Ministerial residences being set apart for the object advocated by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). The honourable member for Riccarton had offered a good suggestion to the House—namely, that the sum of £15,000 from the proceeds of the Ministerial residences should be devoted to overtake the wants of primary education in the different parts of the colony. He would supplement that recommendation by suggesting to the Premier that the balance of £10,000—as he had been informed, the total proceeds were likely to amount to £25,000—should be devoted towards the erection of a suitable building to contain the parliamentary library. That matter had been brought under the notice of the House again and again by the Joint Parliamentary Committee, and he understood it would require £10,000 to do that. He was quite sure, however, from his knowledge of the backward condition of remote districts, and from the reports of the Education Boards, that £15,000 would be inadequate to overtake the demands for primary schools. His honourable friend the member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) characterized the remarks of the Premier in regard to secondary schools as “flapdoodle.” He thought that was far from being complimentary, and far from being appropriate or applicable to the remarks of the Premier. The remarks of the Premier were quite true. He knew personally that in some secondary schools the children of wealthy parents were admitted that were not able to pass the Second Standard of the ordinary primary schools, and that the secondary schools were largely taken advantage of by wealthy parents to have their children educated, when they would be much better educated in the primary schools. He would ask the honourable member for the Wellington City, was it possible for the children of the ordinary labouring-man, or the artisan, or, indeed, of the great bulk of the settlers in the country districts to take advantage of the secondary schools at the present time? How could they, when the fees were prohibitory, running from eight to sixteen guineas a year?

Sir R. STOUT.—Why not have them free?

Mr. MEREDITH.—Yes; why not have them free? Let them legislate in that direction, so that every one, irrespective of his social status, should have the opportunity of having his children educated free. He was prepared to go as far as that, because he considered that every section of the community, whether rich or poor, should be entitled to equal educational advantages.

Major STEWARD said he had been absent from town on private business, and had not yet quite ascertained the position of affairs, but, as he understood, the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) had moved the recommitment of the Bill for the purpose of excepting from the clause the Ministerial residence in Tinakori Road, with the ultimate view, as he apprehended, that that building should be free to be devoted to the purposes of the Middle District University. He could only say that he would most heartily support the honourable member in that proposal, for he thought that all parts of New Zealand were entitled to equal advantages in regard to superior education. The middle portion of the colony for years past had not had equal advantages with other portions of the colony. They had a university in Otago, they had a university college in Auckland, they had similar provision to a certain extent in Christchurch, but there had been no provision made hitherto for Wellington and the parts hereabout. The honourable member had succeeded in passing a Bill by which they had agreed to the establishment of an organization with a view to the ultimate establishment of a university for the middle district of New Zealand. But it would also require buildings in which the teaching could be carried on, and he did not know that a more convenient site could be obtained in the vicinity of Wellington than that of the Ministerial residence in Tinakori Road. Therefore he would heartily support the honourable member in moving to except that particular building from the sale-power which the Government were to have respecting the other Ministerial houses in Wellington. He would like to offer this suggestion also: that, if power were given by the House to sell the other Ministerial residences, the money which was derived from the sale could not be better expended than for the purpose of establishing a permanent building for placing in security the very valuable library that belonged to the General Assembly. He had a motion on the Order Paper which, when the opportunity occurred, he intended to move—that was, to bring before the House the necessity which had been patent for some years past of erecting a more secure building for the safe custody of the very valuable library which was attached to these premises. If the question was how to find funds for the purpose of carrying that out, it would easily be solved by appropriating the proceeds from the sale of the other Ministerial residences to that purpose. If, when the Bill was passed, as he supposed it would be, for the sale of the Ministerial residences, an exception were made of the residence in Tinakori Road, with the view that that building should eventually be the home of the Middle District University, and if the proceeds of the sale of the other residences were devoted to the establishment of a permanent building for the reception of the valuable library in the Parliament Buildings, he thought it would be a very satisfactory result. He supported the Bill; but he also supported the amendment moved by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), for the reasons he had stated.

Mr. Duthie

Mr. ALLEN said the honourable member for Ashley had repeated that afternoon a statement that had been made very often in the House, and which he thought required refutation. He understood the Premier had also made that statement, and he desired to call attention to the remarks the honourable gentleman had made just now. It had often been stated in the House that the secondary schools were class schools, opened only for the advantage of the wealthy few.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. ALLEN.—“Hear, hear,” said another Minister. Now, he desired to give the Minister some information on the subject, and he hoped the honourable gentleman would accept it, and that he would, when he had further considered the matter, come to a different conclusion. He wished to put on record what was the condition of things as regarded the Otago Girls' and Boys' High Schools. He had a statement showing the classification according to occupation of the parents of the children attending the Otago Girls' and Boys' High Schools. With Mr. Speaker's permission he would read the list through:—

Agents ...	9	Gentlemen ...	4
Architects ...	2	Hotelkeepers ...	5
Auctioneers ...	3	Ironfounders ...	3
Brewer ...	1	Ironmongers ...	4
Bricklayer ...	1	Journalist ...	1
Brickmaker ...	1	Librarian ...	1
Blacksmiths ...	2	Laundryman ...	1
Booksellers, &c. ...	3	Money-lenders ...	2
Bootmakers ...	2	Merchants ...	13
Bank clerks ...	4	Medical men ...	2
Bank and company managers ...	10	Miner ...	1
Clergymen ...	6	Master mariner ...	1
Civil servants ...	12	Mate ...	1
Carver ...	1	Painter ...	1
Clerks ...	9	Printers ...	2
Commercial travellers ...	4	Railway servants ...	5
Carpenters ...	7	Runholders ...	8
Chemists ...	4	Sawmiller ...	1
Contractor ...	1	Solicitors ...	12
Dealer and driver ...	1	Storekeepers ...	4
Drapers and assistants ...	2	Shipping agents ...	2
Engine-driver ...	1	Soap-manufacturer ...	1
Engineers ...	2	Storemen ...	2
Engineers (Civil) ...	3	Surveyor ...	1
Expressmen ...	4	School Inspector ...	1
Farmers ...	21	Tinsmith ...	1
Furniture-dealer ...	1	Tailors and clothiers ...	4
Fellmongers ...	2	Teachers ...	11
		University Professors ...	6
		Warehousemen ...	11
		Widows ...	34

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Not a single labourer.

Mr. ALLEN asked, what did the honourable gentleman call bricklayers, brickmakers, engine-drivers, miners, and blacksmiths? Now that he had placed this on record it ought never again to be said in the House that these secondary schools were class schools. The list he had read out was a most satisfactory indication that secondary education was availed of by all classes, and the mixture was as complete as could be. In regard to the Bill, where there were pieces of land that might be reserved for education purposes they should not be sacrificed by the General Government. He was sorry that in the early days those who had charge of affairs were not so wise in some districts as in others, and it was a great pity they had not secured reserves for education purposes in their districts. The cry for resuming these reserves came from those districts which were not so fortunate in respect of reserves; but he would urge on members representing such districts that their best course would be even now to attempt to have reserves set aside in their districts for educational purposes, and he would be only too glad to assist them at any time in such attempts.

Captain RUSSELL would not like it to be thought that it was only the Wellington members who were supporting the creation of a university for the middle district of New Zealand. This want was felt far more widely than in the town and district of Wellington. He had been for many years connected with the education system in Hawke's Bay, and he could speak of the great difficulties they suffered under in not being able to obtain any choice of high-school education for the people. So far as university education went, Hawke's Bay, Taranaki, the Wairarapa, and a great portion of the lower centre of New Zealand were practically as far separated from university education as if there was no university in the colony at all. Practically, none of their youths were able to obtain university education. The honourable member for Bruce, in speaking just before, said it was a pity that some districts had not followed the good example of other more fortunate ones—meaning, he presumed, Otago and Canterbury—in making larger endowments for universities and educational purposes. With regard to the middle district, all the reserves were made before he (Captain Russell) came into public life, so that no blame attached to himself in the matter. But they had no reserves because they had but little land, and it was impossible to make them. Small areas were bought by the Crown from time to time from the Natives, but the great bulk of the land remained in the hands of the Native people, and it was impossible to set aside large endowments for university or other education from the simple fact that there was no land to set aside, and the difficulties which they had to overcome in the making of roads and bridges did not occur in some portions of the South Island, the character of the land being so different. And he would invite honourable members from the South Island to remember the large area of land was made a present to the South Island by the Government of New Zealand. The land was purchased for a small sum, and it was handed over to the various provincial districts.

An Hon. MEMBER.—We had to pay interest. Captain RUSSELL said the whole cost of the land was only £7,000, so that there was not much to be paid, at any rate. He could not say that the honourable gentleman was incorrect, but he would like to have a great deal more information before he could admit that the South Island had been treated otherwise than extremely well, because the fact remained that there was a magnificent land endowment granted by the Government to the southern provinces, out of which they were able to make their roads, bridges, et cetera—and quite properly. But there ought to be some consideration, at any rate, given, so that the youth of central New Zealand might obtain the advantages of university education. He was surprised to hear the honourable member for Ashley arguing against it. They had had labour legislation introduced into the House almost ad nauseam, and if they were really to advance the interests of the working-people they must endeavour to give them the best education possible, and a system of scholarships should be devised by which the clever boys should pass from the primary to the secondary schools, and the cleverest of them again on to the university, irrespective of class altogether.

Captain Russell

Mr. MEREDITH.—What about those who have no primary education?

Captain RUSSELL said the honourable gentleman himself, in speaking a little while ago, quoted a sum of £15,000 which ought to be voted in order to make school-buildings; and all the Government had to do now was to bring down on the supplementary estimates a vote of £40,000 for primary-school buildings, and they would carry it through the House with scarcely a dissentient voice. They must not delude themselves into the idea that they could not get money for primary education. If the Premier would ask the House to vote whatever sum was necessary, he (Captain Russell) guaranteed that sum would be voted without any difficulty from the Opposition. He held that there was a good deal of nonsense talked with regard to the schools in the outlying districts. He spoke with considerable authority with regard to his own district, at any rate. He did not mean to say that where two or three people were gathered together there was a school in their midst, but he said that when there were a very few children the Education Board was prepared to pay capitation-money if a school should be established there, if the parents supplemented the funds guaranteed by the Education Board. The result was that, while they were well provided with scholars, they were very badly provided with school-buildings, and this was because Government would not bring down such a sum as would place the school-buildings on a proper footing. An eternal cry was got up to the effect that the higher education was for the benefit of the rich only. There were fees to be paid, of course, and naturally it must be admitted that those who were blessed with the greatest supply of worldly goods could not but have better opportunities of obtaining for their children a higher education; but he knew that the youths of every class of society attended these schools, and he believed himself that the schools were carried on with the utmost regularity, and that excellent discipline was maintained. Let them by all means assist all those children that deserved assistance. He did not believe in giving those advantages to those children who would not learn, but, where children had proved by their success at primary schools that they were desirous of going on with higher studies, he held that it was the duty of the State to afford them every opportunity of so doing. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) quoted Scotland and Germany to show what had been done for the people in those countries in the way of education. One heard it jocularly stated that, if one went to the North Pole, there you would be sure to find a Scotchman sitting. He occupied every position of advantage. Scotchmen had had for years and years the benefit of a first-rate education, and the result was that in the army and navy, and in all the more scientific callings, Scotchmen would be found prominent, and that was because they had had the advantages of a first-class education in their very earliest days. It had been said that the higher education of children would make them dissatisfied with trade, but he thought that the children would be more capable of entering into the technical trades if the colony presented them with high-class education, and that, far from being discontented, they would take pride in their work and prove successful in their enterprises.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE was sorry the honourable member for Ashley had retired from the chamber.

Mr. MEREDITH.—I am here.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE was glad he had returned; but he should have heard what the honourable member for Bruce had said on the question of class education. The honourable member stated that the secondary schools were used as class institutions, and as he then left the chamber he deprived himself of hearing the information the honourable member for Bruce had to give the House. That honourable gentleman read a return which showed that in the secondary schools in Otago almost every class of the community was represented, and that the industrial classes predominated. No doubt the honourable member for Ashley made that speech because he thought the better class of the community were in a minority, and therefore ought not to be truckled to; but if the better classes were in a majority he would have submitted to them. The honourable member took up the same position when he discussed the extension of the franchise to women. He declared that he would not give a servant-girl the franchise in this country. That was the Liberalism of the honourable gentleman, and it was because at that time he thought the employers were in a majority. Then, the honourable member stated that there were children in the secondary schools who could not pass the Second Standard. Now, the honourable gentleman must know that that was incorrect. He had much pleasure in supporting the honourable member for Wellington City's (Sir R. Stout's) motion, as he thought this part of the colony ought to have the advantages of university education.

Mr. COLLINS would not like to say a word against the House granting further facilities for higher education, and he would not have troubled the House were it not to place another view of the education question before honourable members, in opposition to what appeared to him to be a rather misleading statement as to the educational position of New Zealand as compared with Continental countries. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay drew the attention of the House to the fact that the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) had spoken of the educational condition of Scotland and Germany, and he was somewhat sorry that in his plea for the disposal of these Government properties for educational purposes the honourable member for Wellington City should have used some words which were distinctly in disparagement of the educational system of New Zealand.

Sir R. STOUT.—I never did anything of the sort.

Mr. COLLINS said there was no other country in the world which had devoted so much attention, and successfully so, to the education of the masses of the people as New Zealand. He thought it was well that they should not lose sight of that fact. By way of converse to the points brought out by the honourable gentleman he would draw attention to the fact that, compared with the education of the masses of either Scotland or Prussia, New Zealand stood distinctly ahead of those countries. Those countries might have paid more attention to the education of the middle and upper classes, but so far as the masses were concerned New Zealand had produced results which placed it in a position of educational pre-eminence amongst the countries of the world. The following showed the proportion of those who could not write, as shown by the number who signed the marriage-register with a cross or mark: Prussia, 4.21; Scotland, 6.46; England and Wales, 9.85; Holland, 11.18; France, 11.50; Italy, 26.65; New Zealand, 2.52. So that New Zealand stood wonderfully ahead of all the other countries enumerated so far as the education of its masses was concerned. He thought they might advocate the claims of higher education without in any way disparaging our primary-education system.

Mr. HOGG said there were occasions when the theoretical and practical came into conflict, and he thought this was one of them. There was not the slightest doubt theoretically that higher education was very desirable, but practically in the present circumstances of the colony it was not always attainable. He was not by any means opposed to universities. Possibly he had as high an appreciation of universities and university education and of the benefit to be derived from them as the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout); but what he said was this: They had to consider ways and means. They had already in New Zealand two universities; and in proportion to our population they were well supplied with secondary schools, colleges, and universities. It was not a question of whether universities were desirable at all, but the question resolved itself simply into this: Could we really afford it? It was not so very long ago—in fact, it was only a few hours previously—that the honourable gentleman who that afternoon had been speaking in favour of this university was rating the Government very severely in that House because they were voting £300,000 or £400,000 for roads and bridges. The individual who would squander all this money on universities was the same honourable member who had denounced the Government for spending money on useful public works for the settlers of the colony.

Sir R. STOUT rose to a point of order. The honourable gentleman was referring to his speech in a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER thought the reference was very slight, but perhaps the honourable member, in view of the objection taken, would be good enough to abstain from continuing in that line.

Mr. HOGG would adhere strictly to the question at issue, although he might point out this fact: that the Bill they were now dealing with was a Bill for the sale of the Ministerial residences, and the honourable member, with his usual adroitness, had twisted that Bill round to introduce the question of higher education. Why did he interfere with the present Bill? Simply to introduce a great "fad" of his in reference to higher education. Universities, no doubt, were desirable. He would like to see one in every town in the colony. He would like to see one in Masterton, for one there would be a great advantage to the children of the settlers in that district. He would like to see every young man and woman in the colony with a university education. He would like to see them educated in such subjects as algebra, geometry, Euclid, and the classics. He would like to see every man his own lawyer, his own doctor, and his own clergyman, and possibly in the great future we should arrive at a time when we should be able to dispense with lawyers and doctors because every one would have a university education. He thought, however, that was travelling beyond the practical into the theoretical. Before they tried to attain the educational facilities that the honourable gentleman proposed they ought to see that their primary-education system was properly provided for. He maintained that in the present position of the colony they were unable to devote the amount of funds to primary education that they ought to do. After primary schools had been erected in every district where they were required, and after the children of the country settlers, as well as the children in our towns, had the opportunity of gaining higher education, it would be time enough to talk about establishing further universities in the larger centres. After all, what did it come to? It meant this: If you are going to establish universities beyond the demands of the people you would reduce the quality of those universities, for you will not be able to maintain the staff necessary to give the children the superior education which they have a right to expect when they enter those institutions. Wellington had, perhaps, been sadly neglected in the past, and it ought to enjoy a university at the present time; but, inasmuch as its claims had been overlooked, and universities and colleges had been established at Auckland, Christchurch, and Dunedin, they were not in a position to go to any more expense in that direction at the present time. They were spending a very large amount of money on various grades of education, and the question was, whether they were going to add the additional straw which would break the camel's back. He maintained that if the Government were going to spend any more money on universities and on higher education they ought to consult the opinions of the people—and when he referred to "the people" he referred to the opinions of the masses. He did not argue for a moment that the children of the well-to-do tradesmen in our cities should not have the advantage of university education; but he would ask this question: What opportunity had the children of the country settlers of coming down to a city like Wellington and receiving the benefit of university education? It would be simply impossible for the great mass of the children in the Wellington Provincial District to receive the benefit of a university education in Wellington City. The country settlers, who would be required to support this university, were the same people who at the present time were supporting the poor of Wellington. From whence came the money to support the charitable institutions in Wellington? Was it not from the Wairarapa? Not content with a poor-rate, the mover of the amendment (Sir R. Stout) wanted to afflict the country settlers with an education rate. He hoped honourable members would not entertain the idea of carrying the amendment.

Mr. MORRISON thought the House had been treated very unkindly by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). He remembered that at an earlier period of the session, when the honourable gentleman introduced the Middle District University College Bill, the honourable gentleman said it was simply a machinery measure, and that he was not asking for an endowment. Almost before the ink was dry on that Act the honourable gentleman now came down and asked for a liberal endowment for that university. What he (Mr. Morrison) complained of was this: That the honourable gentleman had not placed before the House any facts in connection with the proposed university. The honourable gentleman did not show that there was a demand for a university in Wellington; he did not show how many pupils attended the other universities. The honourable gentleman simply said, because the other large centres had university colleges, Wellington also must have one. The honourable gentleman said that they had got the machinery measure, and now was the opportunity to get a land-endowment. He did not think it was a proper position for the honourable gentleman to take up. The honourable member for Bruce was very ingenious in his reference to the occupations of the parents of the children attending the Boys' High School at Dunedin, and the honourable member tried to lead the House to believe that these children were receiving secondary education the same as other children. The children whose fathers were blacksmiths, bricklayers, and contractors were children who had passed through all the grades in the primary schools. They were bright, intelligent children who had gained scholarships in the primary schools. And members must also remember this: that in Dunedin every child who succeeded in obtaining 50 per cent. of marks at the annual examinations was entitled to twelve months' free education at the Otago high schools; and yet the honourable gentleman would like to lead the House to believe that these children were there just the same as other children. He did not think, therefore, the honourable gentleman's reference to this matter was of any considerable value. The honourable member for Clutha said that the boys attending the Boys' High School helped to reduce the cost per head of the children attending that school.

50. He did not know whether that was a fair illustration or not. Children who could only pass the Second Standard and yet attended the Boys' High School cost the colony from £8 to £10 per head; in the primary schools they cost £3 15s. per head; and he did not see why the State should be taxed £6 or £7 per head simply because the parents of a child belonged to a particular section of the community and would like to be able to say he was attending a high school. The feeling in the public mind was that the secondary education of the colony was not doing what it was intended to do. He contended that no boy or girl had a right to be admitted to a high school until he or she had passed all the grades of the primary school.

Sir R. STOUT rose to explain that it had been stated that he had said he did not wish for any endowment or moneys from the Crown. He had never said anything of the sort, and he would refer honourable members to page 109 of Hansard, No. 12.

Mr. BUCHANAN felt bound to strongly combat the impression sought to be created by several speakers that those who were in favour of the endowment of the Middle District University were careless of the interests of primary education. Such was not the case at all. He would yield to no honourable member in his desire to further primary education in every way possible. What surprised him most was what the honourable member for Westland had stated—namely, that the children of farmers would not be able to derive any benefit from the establishment of a college in Wellington, and that it would practically be at the disposal of Wellington residents only. He demurred altogether from that, for everybody knew that in Scotland, for instance, the Universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow were actually taken advantage of in greater proportion by the sons of farmers and country settlers than by any other class of the community. They had also an example of what was going on in Otago from the list that had just been read out by the honourable member for Bruce, by which they found that twenty-one farmers' sons were attending the high schools in the City of Dunedin. Any honourable member knew that when the residents of the country were really desirous of obtaining a better education for their children they could, and did, arrange to do so by sending them to live with their friends in town. Another important point, to which no reference had yet been made, was that of late years the greater part of the increase in the population of New Zealand had been in the middle district. The last census showed clearly that one-half, or nearly one-half, of the total increase was in the Wellington and Taranaki Provincial Districts. No argument was therefore necessary from him to show the House the necessity for providing educational facilities in those districts, which should be on a level with those in other parts of the colony. The honourable member for Masterton had represented that, if they increased the cost of education throughout the colony by such an endowment as this, it might be the last straw to break the camel's back. Could absurdity any further go than to hint at the possibility that this trifling endowment—an endowment that the colony could not feel at all—would be the last straw to break the colony's back? When silly arguments such as these were found necessary by any honourable member, it was not worth his while, or that of any other honourable gentleman, to get up and refute them. He did not propose to make any further remarks upon the question. All he would ask of honourable members from other parts of the colony was to give the Wellington middle district the same justice that the members representing the middle district had always, he thought, been willing to give them—namely, a fair share of the public funds, which by right should be at the disposal of all parts of the colony for secondary education. In these modern times, more than had ever been the case before in the world's history, a liberal education had become an absolute necessity if the people of New Zealand were to hold their own in the race of life. Otherwise they would find that all the prizes in every walk of life amongst us would be appropriated by people coming from outside, though of right they should belong to future generations of New Zealanders. He therefore hoped the Premier would not oppose the amendment before the House.

Mr. MILLAR did not intend to take up the time of the House by discussing the question of university education. He intended to support the amendment of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), on the ground, first, that they had no right to sell any of this land at all. It appeared to him to be highly inconsistent with the view that the State should be the sole landowner that the Government should support that policy and yet ask for the sale of this land. His second ground was that he was a supporter of free education—university and all other. He, for one, did not see why they should alienate land from the Crown, for the more land they sold the less they would have for higher education. He would vote against the third reading of the Bill.

The House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 35.

Buddo	Harris	Parata
Buick	Houston	Pinkerton
Cadman	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Carnecross	Kelly, J. W.	Reeves
Carnell	Lawry	Saunders
Carroll	Maelin	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Tanner
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Graham	McKenzie, R.	Ward.
Guinness	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Hogg
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Meredith.

NOES, 22.

Allen	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Button	McNab	Steward
Crowther	Millar	Stout
Earnshaw	Mitchelson	Te Ao.
Fraser	Montgomery
Heke	Newman	Tellers.
Lang	Russell, W. R.	Bell
Mackenzie, T.	Smith, E. M.	Buchanan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Joyce	Hutchison, G.
Kelly, W.	Duthie
Mackintosh.	Green.

Majority for, 13.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read a third time.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill do pass."

AYES, 36.

Buddo	Hogg	Parata
Cadman	Houston	Pirani
Carncross	Hutchison, W.	Saunders
Carnell	Kelly, J. W.	Seddon
Carroll	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McGowan	Steward
Crowther	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Thompson
Graham	McLachlan	Ward.
Guinness	Meredith	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Morrison
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Pinkerton.
Harris

NOES, 19.

Buick	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Button	McNab	Stout
Earnshaw	Millar	Te Ao.
Fraser	Mitchelson
Heke	Newman	Tellers.
Lang	Pere	Allen
Mackenzie, T.	Russell, W. R.	Buchanan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Joyce	Hutchison, G.
Kelly, W.	Duthie
Mackintosh.	Green.

Majority for, 17.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SEDDON brought up the report of a Conference on several Bills. [See proceedings of Legislative Council, pages 760, 761.]

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

7.30. On the motion of Mr. SEDDON, a Conference with the Legislative Council on the amendments made in this Bill was ordered to be asked for; and the following were appointed Managers for the Conference: Mr. Mills, Mr. Collins, and the mover.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

On the motion of Mr. J. MCKENZIE, the result of the Conference with the Legislative Council on this Bill was agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

Mr. WARD moved, That the result of the Conference with the Legislative Council on this Bill be agreed to.

Mr. BELL explained that it was understood that he was appointed one of the Managers for the House on the question of privilege only, and he wished to say that he took no part in the discussion as to whether the House should insist against accepting the amendments made by the Legislative Council. He, of course, agreed, as one of the Managers for the House, with the report, but he desired to absolve himself from being personally a party to the agreement by which an amendment was to be made by Governor's message.

Mr. SEDDON, as one of the Managers appointed by the House, might say that what the honourable member stated was absolutely correct. On the question of policy, as the honourable gentleman stated, he held different views from those of the members of the Government who were conducting the Conference. Still, it was on the question of privilege the honourable gentleman was particularly sent to assist in safeguarding the interests of the House. He must acknowledge the great ability and assistance rendered by the honourable gentleman in that respect, and he wished to say that the honourable gentleman was not responsible for the questions of policy which the Government adopted.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOURS BILL.

On the motion of Mr. WARD, the result of the Conference with the Legislative Council on this Bill was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

Mr. WARD said the most material point of alteration in this Bill was the limitation of the amount for which a loan was to be advanced. The maximum in the Bill as it passed through the House was £5,000. The Council decided in the first instance to reduce that to £1,000, but, as a result of the Conference, it was agreed that £2,500 should be inserted in lieu of the former amount, and this had been agreed to. The Council had reduced the amount for which advances were to be made from two-thirds of the value of the security in freehold to one-half, and, as a result of the Conference, they had agreed that "three-fifths" should be inserted instead of "two-thirds" in the case of freeholds. In the Bill as sent up to the Upper House, urban and suburban lands were included, but the Council had struck this out. The Managers for the House endeavoured to have these lands restored, but were unable to do so, and, as a result of the Conference, they had agreed to eliminate urban and suburban lands; and they had also agreed that the provisions for land-bonds should be struck out of the Bill. These were the material amendments, and he moved, That they be agreed to.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was surprised that there had been no voice raised in the House concerning the conduct of their Managers on the question of privilege. When this question was first introduced Mr. Speaker made a very excellent speech, in which he pointed out that a clear infringement of their privileges had occurred.

AN HON. MEMBER.—You have not heard the report.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he had heard the report, and the report said the question of privilege had not been touched upon. He had understood Mr. Speaker to say that a clear infringement of the House's privileges had occurred, and there was great applause when he stated they ought to maintain their privileges; and a Committee was appointed by the House to do so, and to object to these amendments on the ground of privilege. They appointed Managers, and it was thought at that time that the main point that would have to be dealt with was the very difficult question surrounding the whole law of privilege. What had been the result? The result had been that the question of privilege had not been dealt with at all by the Conference. There was nothing to show that their Managers had even claimed that it was the sole right of the Lower House to deal with public expenditure. The report showed that this had been left over; but it had not been left over for decision by the Law Advisers in England. What had been done was that the main amendments of the Legislative Council had been agreed to. But he maintained that the right course for the Managers of the House, if they agreed with the Managers of the Council, was not to agree to the amendments of the Council, but to say that if they would withdraw those amendments the Government would send them down by Governor's message in the form agreed to by the Conference. As it was, the House had recognised that the Council had some right to make the amendments, and he stated clearly that the position its Managers took up was that there was a recognised right on the part of the Council to make amendments. He understood that the House had placed gentlemen of high legal attainments on the Committee as Managers in order that they might be in a position to consider whether or not the amendments might be made, and whether the privileges of the House were to be maintained, and to do their best to prevent the Upper House from insisting on the principle it had acted on. The result had been that the Upper House had made amendments and those amendments had been agreed to. In former cases—in 1871, when the Payments to Provinces Act case was under consideration, and in 1881 in connection with the Pensions Act, and in other cases—the Upper House had withdrawn their amendments and these were sent down by Governor's message. Now the House had agreed to insert the Council's amendments, and had raised no protest against their making amendments; and he said the result of the Conference had been that the privileges of the House had been put in a worse position than they were in before. They stood now in a most peculiar and anomalous position. The Constitution Act did not define the privileges of the Lower House in relation to the Legislative Council, and the Parliamentary Privileges Act of 1865 made it worse by saying that both Houses had the same privileges as the House of Commons. In other cases of dispute between the two Houses which had been decided the Upper House had got the worst of it. In one case that was referred Home, Lord Coleridge decided against the Upper House; and in 1882, in the case of the Pensions Bill, which was sent Home to the great authority on parliamentary law, Sir Erskine May, he decided against the Upper House, but he did not decide what were the privileges as between the Lower House and the Legislative Council at all. This had never been decided, and they were now in the same position, or perhaps in a worse position than they were in before. He maintained that the duty of the Managers was to have stood by the privileges of the Lower House. He was sorry they had not done so, for they had lost an opportunity of determining once and for all the whole parliamentary law on the subject. He thought the least they might have done was to have referred the question Home, as was done in 1882, for decision by the Home authorities, so that they might know exactly for the future what their position was. Every year that they agreed to amendments such as these made by the Upper House they lost ground with regard to privileges on money Bills. Leaving the question of privilege, he would say a word on the amendments in the Advances to Settlers Bill. He was glad to see that the Colonial Treasurer had at length agreed to the amendments which he and other honourable members advocated when the Bill was before the House. He was one of those who had voted for the second reading of the Bill, and he did so believing the principle of the Bill was a good one, but, as their efforts to make the Bill a safe measure in Committee had been unsuccessful, he had voted against the third reading, because he thought, however good the principle of the Bill might be, it was not in a safe and workable form. He was therefore very glad to see that the Legislative Council had made very important amendments in the Bill, and he ventured to say that, whatever the Ministry or the House might think, there was no doubt the country would agree with every one of the amendments of the Legislative Council. These were the amendments: They had reduced the amount to be lent in each loan from £5,000 to £2,500. Many honourable members thought that was a wise amendment to make. Then, the Upper House had taken away the power to lend money on town lands. Both these amendments were insisted on by many honourable members in the House. Then, the amendment reducing the amount of the advance from two-thirds to three-fifths, and the amendment doing away with the land-bonds—these amendments were all proposed in the Lower House; and he did not think it was fair to the Lower House to refuse the same amendments to them and afterwards accept them from the Legislative Council. He was, however, glad that these amendments had been at last brought in, but he was sorry they had not gone a little further in reducing the total amount of money to be lent, as he had himself proposed. If these amendments had been carried in the Lower House in Committee he would have voted for the third reading of the Bill, and he hoped that the next time they had a Bill of this nature before them the Colonial Treasurer would accept reasonable amendments, especially when they came from his own side, and were moved with the object of making the Bill a safe and a workable one.

Mr. BELL said the position stated by the honourable gentleman was no doubt a correct one. The position which the Managers for the House took up at the Conference with the Managers for the Legislative Council was to maintain the privileges of the House, but they were unable to come to any agreement. They insisted on their privileges, and refused to abate them one jot; and the Managers for the Legislative Council also stood firm, and refused to accept the position taken up by the House. The question then arose whether there was to be a deadlock, or whether the Government legislation was to pass this session. If the Government desired that the legislation passed by the House this session should become law, then it was necessary to meet the Legislative Council upon the question of the merits of the amendments. Upon that question he (Mr. Bell) did not take any part. They did not waive the privileges of the House, as Mr. Speaker would agree, but they considered that it was time the privileges of the House should be determined once and for all, and they were prepared to leave the question to be decided by the Committee of the Privy Council. That was the course adopted in Queensland. He would do the Premier the justice to say that not until it was decided that there could not be an agreement as to the privileges of both Houses did the honourable gentleman consent to discuss the merits of the amendments, though at a later stage the question arose as to whether such a decision should be final if either House decided to submit the question to a higher tribunal. As it was then too late to suggest how a decision as to the privileges of both Houses should be obtained, the Conference proceeded to discuss the merits of the amendments. The Managers for the House insisted that there should be a distinct understanding that the present proceedings were not to establish any precedent, and that the privileges of the House were maintained. The House would see that the only course open to the Managers was either to say to the Legislative Council that they were prepared to abandon the Bills, or to say, "We will submit the question of privileges to some higher tribunal, and for this session only will we allow this course to be taken." The honourable member for Akaroa has suggested that they might have adopted the device of the Governor's message. Well, he would be no party to that. It appeared from the Constitution Act that the Governor had power to suggest amendments to make legislation clear, but he protested against an assumption by the Crown of power to interfere by amendment in a statute of a character that would alter a policy measure. That being so, it would be the far more open and straightforward course for the House to say, "We ourselves are the guardians of our privileges, and nobody else shall interfere. We waive none of our privileges, and we maintain our rights, but in order that the legislation of this session may be safe we will accept the amendments so far as we can." That was the course the Managers took, and in his opinion, and, he trusted, in the opinion of Mr. Speaker, it was strictly in accordance with many constitutional precedents which were to be found in the records of the House of Commons.

Sir R. STOUT did not intend to discuss the question of privileges on these various Bills. So far as the Advances to Settlers Bill was concerned, the House could claim its privileges in respect to clause 39, because an almost identical case with this arose in 1888, in connection with the Irish Land Purchase Act of that year. Both Lord Chancellor Halsbury and Lord Ashbourne held that the Lords had no power to alter a clause which was the converse of this. Clause 39 allowed new claims to come under the Bill, while the proposed amendment in the House of Lords was to exclude new claims. It seemed to him that in the amendments made by the Legislative Council the privileges of the House had been interfered with. With regard to the argument of his colleague the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), that this matter should not have been settled by Governor's message, but ought to be settled by the House maintaining its privileges—

Mr. BELL wished to explain that the reason he rose to speak when the Consols Bill was referred to was to explain that, though he signed the report, he did not agree to that particular course. The honourable gentleman evidently did not hear him.

8.0. Sir R. STOUT said he was not going to argue that point. He was going to speak on the merits of the settlement affecting the Advances to Settlers Bill. They had in the Bill, instead of accepting one-half as the limit of advance as the Council suggested, adopted three-fifths. He might also point out that the proportion of three-fifths was to settle the licensing question, and a limit to three-fifths was to settle the advances-to-settlers question. It was a blessed word, like the word "Mesopotamia" of old; but he did not think it would settle the matter at all. What he rose more to object to was this: Urban and suburban lands had been left out of the Bill. He did not think the Managers for the House should have given way on that point. He thought, if the Bill was to be a real Bill, and was to give advances to settlers, settlers in towns and suburbs had as much right to get assistance as settlers in the country districts, and he could not understand why the Council's amendment with regard to that point should have been agreed to. He was not going to deal with the wider question of whether or not the privileges of the House had been invaded in some of these Bills. To do that would require more than the half-hour limit which the House had unwisely put on honourable members, because it would necessitate his referring to some long extracts from the Journals of the House of Commons, the English Hansard, and several textbooks. He would only say this: that he for one would vote against this agreement as affecting the Advances to Settlers Bill. He thought it was utterly wrong. He thought it was indefensible, and it was contrary to what was stated in the House. Honourable members heard it stated in the House that this was not to be a class Bill; but if it were accepted as it now stood agreed to by the Managers for the House it would be a class Bill. It did not give any aid to small settlers in towns—that was, to the artisan class. They were practically excluded from its operation. Nor did it give any aid to gardeners or any others living in the suburbs, who were just as much entitled to such aid as what might be termed settlers or farmers. Therefore he would vote against the agreement to this compromise. As to the Consols Bill, he would not say anything about that, because he did not regard the point as being very material. As to the Harbours Bill, he thought the Council was within its right to reject that clause—that was, assuming the Council might reject a taxing clause. Therefore he would not say anything more about that. But, as to the last Bill, he would repeat that he did not agree with the amendment excluding urban and suburban lands, and would vote against it.

Mr. Montgomery

Mr. SEDDON would refer honourable members to the section in respect to which it had been contended that the rights of the House had been given up—namely, section 89 of the Land for Settlements Bill. In that section honourable members would find the following:—

“‘The Land for Settlements Act, 1892,’ is hereby repealed; but all directions of the Governor to the Board shall be deemed to be made under this Act, and may be proceeded with under this Act, and all proceedings or other matters begun or undertaken under that Act may be continued and perfected under this Act.”

Under that it was merely machinery, and being simply machinery it did not affect at all vitally the privileges of the House. After carefully going into the matter, the Government, as leading the House, advised that the House should concede the power to the Council to amend that clause. That having been conceded, and acting under advice, and having carefully considered the matter, the House accepted the responsibility.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said Yes; because the House agreed to the amendment made by the Legislative Council, and he thought Mr. Speaker agreed, so far as that clause was concerned, that the privileges of the House were not at all invaded. That being the case, the Managers were limited to the other clauses which were objected to. The House, of course, supported the Speaker, and he was quite satisfied that the Speaker would be the last man in that House, and the last man in the colony, to allow the privileges of the House or the rights of the people to be taken from them, and with his experience and, as honourable members knew, with the great care with which he watched the rights of the people, honourable members felt they were safe in the course which was then followed, because there was a difference between the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), Mr. Speaker, and himself upon that point. However, that being conceded, the honourable member was consistent in still maintaining his position. At the same time, that point was not before the Conference, so that he thought the House should now simply deal with the question as it was before the Conference, and with the attitude of the Managers for the House on the matters which were before the Conference, including the question of upholding the privileges of the House. Coming to the question of privilege first, the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) had told the House what had taken place—namely, that, after the question of privilege had been argued, and when authorities had been quoted,—which authorities, he maintained, supported the position taken up by the House and by Mr. Speaker in respect to the question of privilege,—still, the Managers on behalf of the House found that there was no chance whatever of the Managers on behalf of the Council agreeing that the Council was wrong in endeavouring to maintain the amendments made. The next question which arose was, whether or not they should go back to the House and tell the House that a deadlock had occurred, that the whole of the legislation should be set aside, and that the people should be deprived of the advantages which the proposed legislation would give to them; or whether, on the other hand, the Managers of each branch of the Legislature should retain, as it were, their relative position, and not concede one jot, and, holding that position, still go into the question of the merits of the proposed amendments. The honourable member for Ellesmere could not have been in the House when the report was read. The first paragraph of the report stated,—

“The Managers appointed by the House of Representatives to conduct the Conference upon the Land for Settlements Bill, the New Zealand Consols Bill, the Harbours Bill, and the Government Advances to Settlers Bill have the honour to report that they met the Managers appointed by the Legislative Council. The Managers of the Council and the House have to report that they have been unable to agree as to the privilege claimed by the House. Considering the late period of the session, and the exigencies of the position, it was agreed to consider the amendments of the several Bills on their merits. This proceeding shall not be drawn into a precedent or held to be a waiver of the privileges claimed by the House."

He thought, with this proviso, the rights of the people had been in no way jeopardized. He would be the last to give way one jot on this question, or to give away rights which had cost them so much to obtain for the people. Every care was taken; but seeing that there was an opportunity of giving to the people the advantage of this legislation—which they were entitled to—they did not consider the question of holding over the privilege phase of the question to be an insuperable difficulty. It would, he believed, have been acting according to precedent which they had before them as having occurred elsewhere, but it would have been, to his mind, a very reprehensible proceeding on the part of the Managers for the House, had they taken up that position. He might go further in this respect and say that, had what was first suggested occurred,—had they referred this question of privilege to the Judicial Committee,—it might have been contended that the proposed legislation was novel in its character; it might have been held that Home precedents did not meet the case. He claimed for the members of that House, and for the people they represented, that they had their rights, and they must claim those rights. The circumstances, as far as the Old World was concerned, were in many instances not in point. The matter was still left open. If he might have been allowed to advise, he would have said that at the present time, just at the end of the session, it would be inadvisable to enter into a course which he would indicate. He believed the time now had come when they were perfectly justified in laying down definitely, for the guidance of those who might occupy those benches hereafter as representatives of the people, what were the rights and privileges of the people, and what were the rights of those who were nominated to positions in the Legislative Council.

Sir R. STOUT.—You will have to do that by Act.

Mr. SEDDON admitted that would be necessary, and he believed that was the course they must follow. When we compared our position and the circumstances which surrounded these cases with the precedents which were established in the Old Country they were somewhat different. He gave great credit to the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). Although the honourable gentleman took very little time, the cases selected were analogous, and were almost unanswerable, in supporting the position taken up by Mr. Speaker and by the Managers on behalf of the House, notwithstanding that there was some difference, and the Managers on behalf of the Council were not slow in taking advantage of the differences. Two questions raised—which had not been settled, but which ought to be settled—were with regard to the power of the Council to deal with a clause in a Bill in the position of a money clause, without dealing with the whole Bill—that the Council should have a right to strike that clause out and allow the rest of the Bill to remain. That was a power that the Managers for the House had not conceded, but their position had been clearly maintained by them. At the same time, authorities had been quoted by the Managers for the Council that threw very great doubt as to whether the Managers for the House were right. This was a matter that ought to be set at rest—it applied to some of the amendments made, and to some of the Bills now under consideration,—as to whether or not the Council could not amend machinery clauses, having thrown out the particular money clause of the Bill. The fact of the matter was that the Managers for the House had conceded nothing. So far as their privileges were concerned, they had left them intact. He was therefore somewhat pained to hear the remarks of the honourable member for Ellesmere, which might lead the House to infer that they had not jealously guarded the rights of the House. Had the honourable gentleman carefully weighed the concluding paragraph of the report, where it was said this was not to be taken as a precedent? They had waived none of the rights or privileges claimed by the House, and it was not for the honourable member to say that the Managers for the House had not carefully conserved its rights and privileges. He thought he might reasonably contend that the honourable member had allowed his feelings to outweigh his better judgment. His sympathies were with the Legislative Council, and with every amendment made by the Council, for the honourable gentleman had told the House so. What were his words? He had said, "The amendments made by the Legislative Council are beneficial." Was this guarding the privileges of the members of the House? To whom were they to look for their conservation? He felt he was right in saying that the minority in this House were represented in another place, and that when the majority's views had been conceded in another place they were upbraiding themselves and those who had been managing the affairs of this Conference in the interests of members of the House. As to the honourable member for Ellesmere, he could only say he would put his conduct in juxtaposition to that of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), who had been against the Government on every line of policy in these measures, but who, when it came to a question of privilege, upheld the privileges of the House. That honourable member was there, and did his duty, and did it well: when it came to a question of policy, as stated to the House, he withdrew, but even then the report submitted to the House bore his signature. This was a proper position to take up when dealing with questions of such magnitude as were involved in the matter now before them. The honourable member for Ellesmere said that if the Colonial Treasurer had only come down in the House as he had had to come down at the Conference in all probability there would have been no necessity for a Conference at all.

Sir R. STOUT.—Hear, hear.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. SEDDON.—“Hear, hear,” said the honourable member. Did not that prove very clearly and conclusively what he had said—that the minority in the House had a majority in the Council, and that even when a question of the privileges of the House was involved they lent their support to the Council? There was no doubt about it. He spoke plainly, and said they did give that support, and probably if that support had not been given there would have been no need for a Conference, no necessity for the appointment of Managers, but they would have given the people much more perfect measures than would be given when these Bills became law. That was his contention. The question had been raised with regard to the advances to be made upon urban and suburban lands. He at once admitted that the Bill as it was sent to the Council with a limit of 5 per cent. as regarded urban and suburban lands was a measure which should have been passed, and that the people in the towns should have had the advantage of cheap money equally with those who were settlers in the country. That was his contention at the time the Bill was first introduced, and he had not departed from it. Even in giving way now for the purpose of getting this Act on the statute-book, they were conceding nothing. He believed it was a blot upon their legislation to make this distinction, but they knew that what led to that was the fact that when the Bill was passing through the House the advancing on urban and suburban land was only carried by a very narrow majority. Knowing that to be the case, and taking advantage of that, the members in another place were probably led to the conclusion they arrived at when they insisted on striking out urban and suburban lands. Those members of the House, therefore, who voted on that occasion against the Government and against the Bill were responsible for the present situation in respect to this question, and that responsibility must devolve upon them, just as the responsibility would devolve upon those who, rightly in his opinion, voted against advances being made on mining property, on machinery, or to manufacturers. He thought they were quite right in rejecting that, and he thought those who moved in that direction only did it to help to kill the Bill in another place. They had gone on until it came to the stage which he had described; and the question was, Were the people of this country, who had been labouring under difficulties for years, and who had had to pay enormous rates of interest, to lose the opportunity of having the rates of interest paid by the struggling settlers reduced, and of giving them cheaper money by using the credit of the people for that purpose? Were they to lose that, or should they for the time being—as was done by the amendment—prevent the towns from getting the same advantage as was given to the people in the country? Having viewed the matter carefully, he had come to the conclusion, with those on the Government benches, and with those who managed on behalf of the House, that they could concede that for the present, and get this Act on the statute-book—allow it a time to work, to prove that it worked satisfactorily. That would be of beneficial effect not only to the people of the country, but to the people of the towns, because it would have a tendency to lower the rate of interest. That being conceded, he trusted that honourable members who represented the towns in the House would fully understand why the Government had given way upon the point, and that, in so doing, they did that which ultimately would be a benefit to all. Then, he desired to point out to those who represented urban constituencies that they had other money-lending branches under the Government. There was the Government Insurance Department.

Sir R. STOUT.—Up to half.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member was mistaken. They had a Bill before the House; and in that Bill—

Sir R. STOUT.—Where is it?

Mr. SEDDON might say to the honourable gentleman that it had not yet gone aloft. In that Bill, acting under the advice of the Insurance Commissioner, they asked that the amount that could be advanced should be increased. As the law now stood, advances could be made upon urban, suburban, and rural lands up to one-half, and it was proposed to increase that by the Bill referred to; therefore there would still be provided machinery for making advances upon both urban and suburban lands.

8.30. That being the case, the legislation they were passing this session was not wholly confined to, nor did it wholly give advantages to, the people in the country. The measures had to be read together; and if they were passed—and he believed they would be passed—they would find that they would prove beneficial. What would be said by the country if they allowed the prorogation to take place without accepting the amendments, after the trouble they had taken over these measures? What would be said by those who had been looking forward to the passing of this measure for relief when they found that the difference was as between this £5,000 and £2,500 in the amount to be advanced, and as between two-thirds and three-fifths of the security offered? The men who wanted assistance at a lower rate of interest had not had an opportunity of getting advantages that others had had. What answer would they get if, on going back, they said that, owing to this difference, this relief had not been granted? He said that the hopes and expectations of these people would be dashed to the ground. They would not understand the niceties of the honourable member for Ellesmere and other members of the House. They would not understand such nice questions. They would look at the legislation, and would ask if their representatives had done their duty to them and to the country. They on that side of the House had honestly done their duty to them, and maintained the privileges of this House; and, with every confidence, he asked the House to agree to the motion.

Mr. MONTGOMERY rose to make a personal explanation. What he had said was that he was in favour of the motion being withdrawn and the matter being settled by a Governor's message.

Mr. SAUNDERS said that during the last few weeks he had been so anxious not to occupy any time in that House that he had sat dumb like a lamb before her shearers; but as the leader of the House had just occupied a whole half-hour in explaining the very simple amendments proposed by the Legislative Council there appeared to be little use in his practising so much self-restraint. Like the honourable member for Ellesmere, he had wished to see amendments in these Bills in the direction taken by the Council, and he believed that every amendment the Legislative Council had made was an improvement. He was very glad indeed that they had made these amendments. He did not want to make a lawyer's speech if he could, but there was one great fact in connection with these amendments which he thought they all ought to recognise, and the Premier especially. He thought the Premier in his remarks was rather mistaken as to his position in the House at the present time. In his present position he had everything to gain by encroaching on their rights and liberties, and nothing to lose. He did not look upon the honourable gentleman as the guardian of the liberties of this House. Like other great lovers of power, he was far more likely to encroach upon the rights of the House than to defend them. He was very much more in the position of Charles I. than in that of Pym and the Long Parliament. He thought the Premier and the lawyers who had spoken on this subject had really lost sight of the very great point to be considered in connection with these amendments. The point was this: that this House itself had given up the important duties and privileges of the Representative House. He did not care twopence about a trumpery piece of privilege of this kind, but they had given up their great privilege and their highest duty, which was that of guarding the public purse. The House was no longer the guardian of the public purse; and, having given up this most important function, they ought to feel very thankful that the other House was discharging it for them. If the Premier had sat on that side of the House as member for Kumara, as he once did, he would have said, in regard to these proposals, "Perish the Bills! let us maintain the privileges of the House." Now he said these Bills were more important than our privileges; but he (Mr. Saunders) thought the privileges they had given up in the House, in saying "Ditto" to everything the Premier proposed, and in not guarding the public purse, were of greater consequence than this; and he thought that in their entire dereliction of duty the Council had come to their help, and saved the privileges of the country.

Mr. LAWRY said it seemed to him that they were never going to have anything from the opponents of the Government but repeated lamentations of modern Jeremiahs. The honourable member for Wellington City made a sneering allusion to the two-thirds. He said the question of two-thirds was brought into every question before the House.

Sir R. STOUT.—Three-fifths.

Mr. LAWRY.—Well, as the honourable member had referred to the three-fifths, he might say that there were two-thirds who occupied a considerable amount of time of the House, and the two-thirds were the honourable member for the Buller and himself. It seemed to him that the speech just made by the honourable member for Selwyn showed an entire misconception of the whole case. The House had never given up the privilege in connection with the public purse. He (Mr. Lawry) utterly denied the premises the honourable member had taken up. He utterly denied that one single shilling of addition had been made to the public indebtedness by the legislation alluded to. He was reading Shakespeare a few minutes before, and what he had just heard was most ably represented by Shakespeare, who had more knowledge than he (Mr. Lawry) could boast of:—

Nature hath framed strange fellows in her time:
Some that will evermore peep through their eyes,
And laugh, like parrots, at a bagpiper.

Sir R. STOUT.—What about parrots?

Mr. LAWRY had seen very good imitations of parrots in that House, and when he made that statement he would like them to understand that he did not mean it to have any personal signification. He utterly denied that the proposals of the Government in regard to the Advances to Settlers Bill were calculated to add one single shilling to the public debt of the colony. They might take the case of Mr. William Aitken, a gentleman in Auckland, a very large land-agent, who through his agency brought, say, £5,000 into the country. What did he do with that? He advanced it to settlers under deeds of mortgage. Was that not adding to the debt of the colony as much as any of the proposals in this Bill? The cold-water party in that House had subordinated everything to the cold-water policy, but what he was stating was absolutely sound logic. If a settler took up a bush section, valued at £200, and got £150 advanced upon it to assist him in turning the wilderness into a smiling homestead, he was giving security for the money advanced. The honourable member for Selwyn got up and, as he understood him, talked about having sacrificed his principles as a member of the House; but he was sacrificing the interests of the House by not realising the situation. He (Mr. Lawry) was very glad that the compromise had been effected: because he did not want the Government to have any justification for retaliating on the Council. He said this without fear of contradiction: that if the Bill of the Government had been thrown out the Government would have been justified in flooding the Council, and in putting in a majority there to carry their proposals. The senior member for Wellington City said that the Council had done wrong in throwing out the power to lend on security of urban and suburban lands. He (Mr. Lawry) said, notwithstanding that he was representing perhaps the smallest electorate in the colony, which he could ride all round in half an hour—notwithstanding that he might be speaking against their interests, he said that the voice of the country went out at the last general election and indorsed what was foreshadowed in the speeches of the Premier and the Minister of Lands on this question. He said without fear of contradiction that the question of urban and suburban securities never entered into the matter at all. It was a question of advances to settlers to enable them to clear bush, to open up roads, to build bridges, and generally to develop the country. He had told his constituents at Farnell that it would not affect them at all, but that he understood that the proposal of the Government meant that it was to develop the bush districts of the North, the roadless North, the bridgeless North, and such land as that in the Forty-mile Bush. He thought the country would realise that the Government had brought down measures calculated to advance the colony by leaps and bounds without increasing the debt by a shilling. When it was said that the Consols would be increasing the public debt, it must be considered that unless the Consols were taken up the debt could not be increased, and there was nothing in the measure which declared that the people were bound to take them up. They might with equal logic say that the public debt would be increased because the people invested their money in the savings-bank. The first man who had ever mentioned the matter to him was one of the strongest opponents the present Government had. He was a brother professional of his honourable friend the reasonable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). He wished a great number of members who were on the same side as he was as reasonable as that honourable gentleman. He referred to Mr. S. Jackson, a lawyer in Auckland, of the firm of Jackson and Russell. He believed his arguments were irresistible, but he believed there was no necessity for them at all, because without them the resolution would be agreed to on the voices.

Mr. Montgomery

Mr. G. J. SMITH said there appeared to him to be one difficulty in connection with the amendments. Section 25 excluded urban and suburban lands; and the power of the Board to determine the classification of the lands was taken away in section 43. It seemed there would be some difficulty in the classification of land. He only wished to record his dissent from the exclusion of urban and suburban lands, and he would ask that that question should be put separately.

Mr. WARD, in reply to the honourable member who had just spoken, would like to point out that the vital point he had in view in connection with urban and suburban lands would, as the Premier pointed out, be met by the Government Insurance Bill, the proposed amendments in which were now before the House. They authorised an extension from £5,000 to £10,000, and an advance on two-thirds under certain conditions. He ventured to say that the experience of the working of these advances to settlers at 5 per cent. would be that the Government Insurance and Trust Departments would have to look to a much larger extent than hitherto to urban and suburban securities for suitable investments.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That might be struck out.

Mr. WARD said he fancied not. The difference between the two measures was very material. It had been mentioned at the Conference by some honourable members that the two Bills occupied an entirely different position. It was pointed out that the Government Insurance Department had to earn its moneys; its investments had to be made in such a way as to enable them to earn money for its shareholders: whereas it had been pointed out that money under this Bill was for entirely different purposes; and he ventured to say that the other place would not deal with it in the same way. That, however, remained to be seen; but, even so, he did say that the fact of the Advances to Settlers Bill placing money at the disposal of people in the country would, to a large extent, enable the Insurance and Trust Departments to lend money on city and suburban properties. He would like to say to the honourable member for Ellesmere that it was quite refreshing to hear that honourable gentleman pat himself on the back when discussing this matter. Had that honourable member's amendments been carried in Committee, instead of having to accept a reduction to £2,500 what would the result have been? He suggested £500, if he (Mr. Ward) remembered rightly.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I voted for the £5,000.

Mr. WARD said, at any rate some honourable member in the House suggested that £500 should be the amount; and another mentioned £1,000. Now, supposing the House had carried these amendments, what would have been the result? It would have been an indication to those in another place, and they would have acted quite rightly in suggesting, as the House thought right to fix £1,000, an amendment to reduce it to £500, and the opponents of the Bill in the House would then have said they acted very sensibly. It was a difference of opinion. Those who thought it right to retain the £5,000 had agreed to accept what was considered a fair compromise—namely, a reduction to £2,500. He was very glad the honourable gentleman's amendments had not been carried in Committee, because it would have been a clear indication to the other House to make further reductions and alterations, which would have made the result of this scheme uncertain and hazardous, and unless the scheme were based on sound lines it would have been very much better for the House to abandon it. He would be only too happy to accept reasonable amendments from the honourable member, or from any other member, but when an important principle was at stake he was not justified in doing so. It was their business to get the Bill through in as complete a form as they could, although they were compelled to make certain concessions in order to get the main principle through. He could only say, in reply to the honourable member for Selwyn, that that honourable gentleman had been quite consistent. He had opposed the Bill right through, and it was not surprising he was favourable to what had been done in another place. It would have met the views of those opposed to the Bill if the Bill had been hung up. He would reiterate what the Premier had said—that it would be very much against the interest of the country that this scheme should not have a fair trial, or should be hung up till next session. In the interval they would have had, to put it mildly, very considerable agitation in various parts of the colony on this question. Under these circumstances, the Managers for the House, not having lost sight of its privileges, were quite justified in agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. SEDDON said, as Mr. Speaker was the guardian in the first instance of the rights and privileges of the House, he would ask him whether he considered that the Managers of the House had in the slightest degree prejudiced its privileges.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had already stated his views on the infringement that the Legislative Council had made on the undoubted privileges of the House, and he was of opinion that no advantage was now to be obtained by his expressing any further opinion on the matter of the privileges of the House.

The House divided on the question, "That the amendment in section 25 to insert 'not being urban or suburban lands' be agreed to."

AYES, 43.

Buchanan	Joyce	O'Regan
Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carnoross	Lang	Pirani
Carroll	Larnach	Russell, W. R.
Collins	Lawry	Saunders
Crowther	Mackintosh	Seddon
Flatman	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Graham	Massey	Steward
Green	McGuire	Tanner
Guinness	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Wilson.
Harris	Millar
Hogg	Mills	Tellers.
Houston	Montgomery	Carnell
Hutchison, G.	Morrison	Meredith.

NOES, 12.

Buick	McGowan	Stout.
Button	McNab	Tellers.
Duthie	Mitchelson	Kelly, J. W.
Earnshaw	Newman	Smith, G. J.
Hall-Jones

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Pere.	Allen.

Majority for, 31.

Motion agreed to, and report of the Conference agreed to.

TONGARIRO NATIONAL PARK BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Mr. Ward

Dr. NEWMAN said he wished to say a word or two to thank the Minister of Lands for bringing in this Bill and passing it. It had been a hope of his for some years past, and was first suggested by him in the House, that these three magnificent mountains, Tongariro, Ruapehu, and Ngauruhoe, should be set aside specially as a national park, like Yosemite, and the Niagara Falls, in America. He thought the honourable gentleman had done a good work by putting this Bill through, and that they would now have a magnificent park of 63,000 acres, or thereabout, containing as many wonders as there were in any national park in the world. There were the glaciers of Ruapehu, the Volcano of Ngauruhoe, and many other things. He thought the future generations would be glad indeed that they had passed the Bill. He hoped it would go successfully through the other Chamber, and that the colony would possess for ever this great national park.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE would also like to say a few words. This was the third time he had tried to pass the Bill, and he was glad to find he had now been successful in getting a national park. He thought he would not be doing justice to the Native chief, Te Heuheu Tukino the younger, unless he said that he had assisted him very materially to at last bring the other Natives to give their consent to this Bill becoming law. Honourable members must know the great difficulty there was in getting a Bill through the House when the Natives objected. It was their opposition that had delayed the Bill during two previous sessions. But this year the Native chief, the grandson of the original grantee, came down and assisted him very materially in getting the Bill through by getting all opposition from the Natives removed. He therefore thought he should not be doing what was right unless he acknowledged the valuable assistance this Native chief had given in the passing of the Bill.

Bill read a third time.

HOSPITALS AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS BILL.

Mr. REEVES, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the bringing-in of this short Bill had been rendered necessary by the decision given by Mr. Justice Williams in a case between the Southland contributing bodies and the Southland Hospital and Charitable Aid Board. Judge Williams held there that the bodies could not be called upon to contribute to the cost of extending hospitals, the cost of fresh buildings, or the cost of furnishing buildings; that all that the bodies under the existing law could be called upon to contribute to was the maintenance of existing hospitals; and by his decision he had confined the meaning of the word "maintenance" to simply repairs in existing buildings. As a consequence of this decision it had come about that there was something like a deadlock in the hospital districts throughout the colony. Additions to existing hospitals were badly wanted in several districts; fresh buildings were wanted in certain places; and the Hospital Boards had no power to raise money locally for the purpose. The result was that they were obliged to come to the central Government for funds. Now, the Government, of course, could do something—and it did do something—towards helping the local bodies to bear the burden of hospital buildings; but the Government was totally unable to take upon its shoulders the whole of the cost of additions to hospitals, erecting fresh buildings, and furnishing them. He should think that the applications within the last few months added together would come to a sum-total of about £20,000. To provide this sum was quite beyond the resources of the Treasury. It was therefore necessary to bring in this Bill to enable the local bodies to call upon the contributories to find the necessary funds for adding to existing buildings and fitting them out. That was the main clause of the Bill, and that could be done by extending the meaning of the word "maintenance." The next clause was to clear up a doubt which had been found to exist regarding section 74 of the original Act. The intention of section 74 was, he thought, fairly clear—namely, that where a destitute person passed from one district to another, having been domiciled in district No. 1, and, within a short time after coming into district No. 2, came upon the rates, then the charitable-aid body in district No. 2 should be able to recover the cost of maintaining him from district No. 1, in which he had been domiciled. Owing to the reading of the clause it really did not seem to be at all so clear as was the evident intention of those who framed it. Judge Williams, again the same Judge, held that unless the person applied for charitable aid to the Board of district No. 2 directly he got there the Board of district No. 2 was unable to recover the cost of his maintenance from the Board of district No. 1. The Judge held that if a week or two elapsed after the time in which he came to district No. 2 the whole cost of his maintenance must be thrown upon district No. 2; and it would only be if he applied for charitable aid on the day he arrived in the second district that the Board of that district would be entitled to recover the cost of maintaining him from the Board of the district from which he had come. The unfairness of that was obvious, and it was also obviously in flat contradiction of the intention of the framers of this Act—that was, unless he (Mr. Reeves) entirely misread clause 74. The meaning of that clause obviously was that a district should not have the power to shunt its paupers upon other districts; otherwise there would be undoubtedly a system carried on by the unscrupulous authorities of one district of shunting their paupers upon a neighbouring district and throwing their cost on the rates of that district. For these reasons that clause had been put in. Honourable gentlemen would see that this was not an attempt to deal with the general question of charitable aid. It was simply a Bill containing two necessary clauses to enable local bodies to carry on from now until next session. The Bill had been introduced in consequence of a debate which took place in the House some two months ago. He had then promised to introduce it. He had kept his promise, and he saw no reason why the House should not pass it, and without very much debate.

Sir R. STOUT said he believed this Bill was necessary, but he hoped the honourable member would agree to the insertion of a new clause to the following effect: "The provisions of section eighty-eight of the said Act shall be at once given effect to." Section 88 provided for the setting aside of 250,000 acres of land as an endowment. Since 1886 nothing had been done, and now that eight years had elapsed they had a right to ask that that should be given effect to.

Mr. BUCHANAN had very little to say, except as regarded clause 2, which might prove very oppressive and intolerable. It did not appear that there was any escape from it. As to section 3, he quite agreed with the Minister of Education that, if possible, the intention of this clause should be given effect to, because one of the best methods of keeping down the cost of charitable aid was to relegate those applying for aid to the district whence they came. If that were done, many cases would be struck off from charitable aid of those who were quite capable of maintaining themselves. It was the habit of some of these people to go round to the charitable institutions in various districts, because where they were thoroughly well known they would have to maintain themselves.

Mr. THOMPSON said the honourable gentleman had called the attention of the House to the provision in clause 2; but he thought it was understood that the whole question of local government, which also dealt with charitable aid, was to stand over until next session. Now, at the last moment, within a few days of the close of the session, they had a Bill brought in, which was certainly a very short Bill of one or two clauses, but in one of which clauses power was given to Hospital and Charitable Aid Boards to levy rates not only for those who required assistance, but to erect buildings and furnish them, without any limit whatever. A few measures such as this would be sufficient to wipe the local bodies out of existence altogether. They were taxed up to the very hilt. Taxation was dragged out of the local bodies until their lives were almost crushed out of them. Instead of leaving the matter over until next year to amend the charitable-aid law, which had stunk in the nostrils of the people from the North Cape to the Bluff,—a law that had done more than anything else to pauperise the people of the colony,—at the last moment this Bill was brought in, and they were asked to pass it. Surely members had not lost their senses—to sit quietly and allow a Bill like this to pass without discussion. He had no desire to stand up and oppose the Bill if honourable members were so forgetful of their own interests, and if those who represented local bodies were so forgetful of their interests, as to allow a Bill like this to pass, throwing responsibilities on local bodies as this Bill did; because he ventured to say there was no local body in the colony which knew anything about the measure. A mine had been sprung upon the House without notice, and they were asked to give powers to local bodies to tax property-owners without limit. There was positively no limit to the amount of rates that might be levied upon property. He did not know what members of the House could be thinking about if they allowed such a Bill as this to pass. The whole thing was simply preposterous. He understood it was distinctly understood that they would next year deal with the whole question of local government. The question of local government must include charitable aid. That reform had been promised for the last two or three years, and now at the last moment this Bill was brought in. Surely the Minister must think that members of the House were so wearied and tired that they would allow anything to pass. For his part, he would do all he could to prevent the Bill from becoming law. He maintained that there was no question but that the people of the colony were taking a keen interest in this question of local government, and it was a question the people of the colony would insist on the Government taking up, not piecemeal, but in a way that would deal with the whole question, and place the charitable aid on a sound foundation. Their system of local government was breaking down. He trusted this Bill would not be allowed to go through. He would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He had no desire to waste the time of the House, but he did hope that members would give the Bill a happy despatch. The Bill could very well stand over, for no harm could be done before next session, and then the whole question could be dealt with in a proper manner.

Mr. PIRANI trusted that the amendment would not be carried; and, while he fully indorsed everything that had been said by the honourable member for Marsden with regard to the necessity for some alterations in the present system of local government, he did not think they should allow that to stand in the way of necessary amendments in the present law being passed. Very gross injustice had been done in the past in connection with these two matters of hospitals and charitable aid, and he thought the Minister had acted with considerable wisdom in embodying in this short measure the amendments necessary, and bringing it down to the House, notwithstanding the late period of the session. With regard to the 2nd clause, it was impossible at the present time to get anything done to the hospitals, because the Boards had not the funds to carry out the necessary work. The members were the representatives of the local bodies; they were locally elected; and if they did not do their duty the local bodies would find a simple way of dealing with them if they did not carry out their wishes.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said in clause 2 there was no limit whatever placed on the local Charitable Aid Boards, and they could erect the most palatial buildings if they saw fit. He hoped the House would use its power to oppose the clause being made law at the present time. No doubt every one sympathized with the desire of Hospital Boards to find better accommodation for their patients, but there should be some means of limiting their power of raising money. There should be sufficient safeguards to protect the interests of the ratepayers. If that clause were passed they would not be doing their duty as representatives of the people. He trusted the House would vigorously oppose the clause.

Mr. Thompson

Dr. NEWMAN hoped the honourable member who introduced the Bill would amend clause 2 when the Bill was in Committee. It seemed to give very large powers to Boards to impose rates. Suppose the Hospital Trustees in Christchurch or Wellington wanted to put up a building costing £5,000 or £6,000, they had the means by this clause of raising it without the ratepayers in the outside districts having any voice in the matter. He could not see why hospitals should not be built out of loan, the same as school-buildings and lunatic asylums. If the Minister insisted upon the clause going through, he thought he should see that those ratepayers living in the suburbs should have greater power than they now had. If a Board thought fit to put up a ward costing several thousands of pounds, under clause 2 they had power to do so. He thought any power of that kind to raise money should be spread over a number of years, instead of one year. Out-districts and suburbs would be outvoted in this matter; and if power were given to raise a loan there should be provision for a sinking fund to permit of the loan being wiped out. The Minister had stated that he had received applications for £20,000 for increased hospital accommodation, and that meant that the Charitable Aid Boards could levy that amount if the Bill passed.

Mr. REEVES.—Nothing of the kind.

Dr. NEWMAN maintained he was correct.

Mr. HOUSTON, as a member of a local body, would oppose the measure. For years past they had been trying to get some reform in local government. In 1893 and also this session promises had been made that there would be some change in local taxation. This was simply a change to increase the rates for the local bodies, and already they were suffering under the incubus of charitable aid. As a member of a local body he would oppose the measure.

11.0. Mr. McGOWAN intended to oppose the Bill on somewhat different grounds from those given by the honourable member for Marsden. He thought every member of the House recognised the importance of having proper accommodation for hospitals and charitable institutions throughout the colony. But it was the principle, or rather the want of principle, in the Bill which compelled him to oppose it. The bodies which had the management of these institutions were not elected by the people. They were appointed by the different local bodies; they were not, therefore, the direct representatives of the people, and this would put those managers in the position of being able to spend money, and being able to levy that money upon the people, who would have next to no voice in the expenditure. This was a vicious principle, and one which he was sure the House would condemn. He would therefore vote against the Bill.

Mr. CROWTHER said the Bill was of a somewhat serious nature to the local bodies. Most of them had been begging up till this session for sums of money in connection with charitable aid, and they had received no satisfaction whatever. At the end of the session this was offered to them, which, to his mind, was simply a Bill that must elicit the expression, "Thank you for nothing." In Auckland they had recently been turning patients out of the hospital before they ought to be allowed to go, in order to make room for others whom the management were unable to keep out. They had made overtures for grants in aid to enable them to make additions to their hospital, but had failed; and he believed they had failed in almost every other part of the country. Without the Bill they were aware they could spend their own money if they could raise it, but the taxpayers were so heavily laden that they were afraid to ask them. So far as this Bill was concerned, his opinion was there was no necessity for it at present. He said they should go on as they were until next session. They had gone on hitherto as best they could; and they should continue to do so until the Government faced the matter in a systematic manner, so that all should be treated alike, and that they would not have to come every session, one after another, cap in hand, asking the Government what they would kindly do for them. He had no desire to be unduly severe, but the taxpayers took members to task for nothing having been done. If they went back and showed them this Bill they would say, "Thank you for nothing." He thought it would be advisable to let the Bill drop for this session.

Mr. MEREDITH regretted he was not in a position to support the Bill. He represented an electorate containing several counties, and amongst all the local bodies in those counties that contributed towards hospital and charitable aid there was a strong and widespread feeling of dissatisfaction. Such being the case, it would be wrong for him to support the Bill. The feeling in his electorate was that the Government should introduce a comprehensive measure dealing with the whole question, and decentralise charitable aid so as to enable local bodies to administer it in their own districts. He did not wish to go into the question as to the hardship large centres of population might be called upon to submit to in consequence of the administration of charitable aid by the local bodies. He knew that poor people would gravitate to the large centres. That question would be easily settled by granting a special subsidy to the large cities. But this was not the time to bring down the present Bill; it should stand over till next session.

He objected more particularly to the 2nd clause, which gave to the Central Boards increased taxing-powers. The taxpayers were at present strained to their utmost tension by contributing towards charitable aid. He therefore sincerely hoped the Minister in charge would understand that his opposition arose not out of any personal feeling, but out of a sense of duty to his constituents.

Mr. REEVES said by the Standing Orders a Minister was put in a very uncomfortable position. When an amendment like this was moved he had either to hold his tongue when misstatements were being made about it, and run the risk of having the Bill killed for want of information, or else speak to the amendment and lose the right to reply. In either case he was put in an unfair position. That, however, was a minor matter. What he had to point out was this: This was not a measure which could stand over. There was a deadlock now with regard to the hospital accommodation. It was not a question of one, or two, or three, or four districts, but there was scarcely a district which was not in direct need of fresh buildings or extensions of existing buildings. It was clearly the intention of the Act that in regard to extension of hospitals half the cost should come out of local money, and the other half be contributed by the Treasurer. But in drawing up the Act it was so drawn that a Judge of the Supreme Court had been able to decide that local bodies have no power to rate for their half of the money to be spent on hospital buildings. This had been going on while the wants and requirements and needs and desires of the localities had been piling up one on top of the other, till at last there was a deadlock. The position was totally unworkable, and the hospitals were in the very direst need of additions and extensions. It was not a question of respect to him, or the Government, or the Bill, or the hour of the session; it was a question of humanity. He asked the House in the name of humanity not to let the Bill be hung up. Those who killed the Bill took upon themselves the responsibility of killing human beings. It was not a question of killing the Bill, but of killing men and women. He said that standing there as the responsible Minister charged with the administration of the department. It was not for him to try to alarm the House by wild words, but he was telling the House what he knew to be the truth—namely, that if the Bill were blocked men and women would die, and the health and comfort of hundreds of others would be seriously affected. If the House chose to laugh, as the honourable member for Marsden laughed, at the prospect of human beings being killed, the House might laugh, but in killing the Bill they would kill men, women, and children. The House would do so if they thought right to do it, but he was not going to take the responsibility of it without standing up and warning the House of the meaning of its action. Hospital extension was absolutely necessary in New Zealand at present. The Government had not the money, nor would it be right to take it for hospital extension; it was never the intention of the Act to do so, and would not have been a right intention if it had been so. The whole intention of the Act was that half the cost should come from the central Exchequer and half from local rates. That intention they meant to carry out by extending the meaning of the word "maintenance," so as to get round the decision which restricted the meaning of the word. There was no difference in the Bill as to the amount that could be raised by the local body in rates. The power they had they would have now, and, if honourable gentlemen in Committee considered it right to put any limit on the sum that might be raised in each district under the Bill, that could be done. Let it be done in Committee, and, at any rate, let not the fact of there being an amendment be an excuse for obstructing, blocking, or killing the Bill, because he could assure the House that it was absolutely necessary, in the interests of human life, that this Bill in some form or another should become law this session. It would not prevent the bringing-down of a comprehensive measure next session. How could it? This was not a Bill which dealt with the hospital and charitable-aid system. It was a Bill dealing with hospitals; and he could promise the House that next session he would bring down a Bill dealing with the whole question. The question of hospital and charitable aid was one question, that of hospital buildings was another, and this Bill simply enabled local bodies to raise half the money required to carry out any hospital extension, and he asked the House to take the responsibility off his shoulders of any deadlock in connection with hospital buildings, because there was human life at stake. He might tell honourable members, as Minister in charge of the department, that some such Bill as this was an absolute necessity, and he therefore hoped the House would allow it to go to Committee, and any reasonable amendment in Committee would not be refused by him.

Major STEWARD was surprised to find, on coming into the House, an amendment had been moved against the second reading of this Bill, as he expected it would go through as a matter of course. It seemed to him that it would have been obvious to every member of the House that the amendment in the original Act proposed by section 2 ought to be passed. He was aware that difficulty had arisen in connection with hospitals for some years past. They were entitled to expend their money in the maintenance of existing buildings, but if they required to extend their buildings in any shape or form it did not come within the provisions of the Act as it at present stood. It was an absolute necessity that the amendment now proposed should be passed, and he could not conceive how any honourable gentleman could take objection to the remaining section, No. 3, which dealt with the question of persons who became chargeable on hospitals. It was only a matter of common-sense that this provision should be agreed to. He had been exceedingly surprised, on coming into the House, to find that "this day six months" had been moved on the Bill, as it seemed to him in every sense a necessary measure.

Mr. GREEN was very much surprised at the last two speeches. He had heard the Minister tell the House that if the Bill was not passed the House would be responsible for the lives of human beings; but certainly that would not apply to Dunedin, although additions and improvements were undoubtedly required there; and so far as he knew nothing had occurred in any part of the colony to require legislation during the last twelve months; but, if anything had ever occurred to justify it, no doubt it was a law case in Invercargill four or five years ago.

Mr. REEVES.—It has occurred.

Mr. GREEN said if it had occurred the Minister should take the responsibility. The Minister was surprised that there should be such opposition raised to the Bill; but the fact was, as honourable members knew, the general taxation was very largely increased, and the local bodies had had to raise all the moneys that the local authorities could possibly pay, the taxpayers being now burdened with rates as high as they could pay, with the present low prices of stock and produce ruling in the colony. No doubt there was a great necessity for the extension of buildings in some places, and he was aware that there was not any power for the Boards of Trustees to raise money for this purpose; but he took leave to think that, wherever the Board of a district thought the expense not too great, there the money would be raised. If the position was as it had been described by the Minister, it was his bounden duty to make provision for these institutions; and he was of opinion it was the bounden duty of the Government to make provision in this direction rather than in some directions which had appeared in their estimates this year, because, while no one in that House felt, or was likely to express, a stronger desire in the matter of roads and bridges to open up the country and benefit settlers in country districts than he did, he was quite convinced that such institutions ought to be given consideration, and that they were, under certain conditions, of greater importance than even the making of roads and bridges. This session there had been a very large increased provision made for roads and bridges, and more provision made for them than for hospitals. This Bill had been described by the honourable member for Waitaki as a very small one, and the honourable member could not understand why there should be any objection to it. Of course the great objection was that numbers of people were of opinion that they were already taxed to their utmost limit, and that they could not afford to pay any more taxation.

Mr. REEVES.—Are we never to have any more buildings?

Mr. GREEN.—That is for the honourable gentleman to say.

Mr. SEDDON said that in regard to this matter the local authorities were only too ready to assist, but on account of the interpretation of the law given by the Judge there was no power given to the Board to make a levy for the purpose of maintenance. It was on account of that interpretation that the difficulty had arisen, and surely the House would not be so unjust as to prevent a Charitable Aid Board from assisting when it was quite prepared, as stated by the Minister of Education, to pay a fair amount towards the cost of the extension of buildings and accommodation required. The local authorities were prepared to contribute a penny or a halfpenny, as the case might be, in rates, and they desired to do what was right.

Mr. Reeves

Sir R. STOUT.—On the capital or annual value?

Mr. SEDDON said it depended upon what Rating Act they worked under. In some cases the local bodies rated on the capital value, and in others on the annual value. That was a Committee question, and when the Bill was in Committee it could be dealt with. To delay its passage now was unreasonable. They had had deputations from Canterbury, Auckland, and Wanganui asking for this power. The amount to be levied could be limited, and a maximum fixed. The Bill meant that additional burdens would be put on the Government, and consequently on the taxpayers; and, as the law stood at present, there was a deadlock. He would suggest that they should allow the Bill to go into Committee. The Government were compelled to ask for an amendment of the law in the direction of giving the local bodies power to levy a small rate. In some districts that power would not be exercised at all, as they could afford to do the work out of the ordinary rates. That was the position; and when the Bill was in Committee they would be able to make some adjustment on the question, and, if some reasonable amendment could not be made to meet the wishes of honourable members, he would be quite prepared to adjourn the Bill until they could draw up some clause that would satisfy honourable members. He had been present at the deputations that had waited on the Minister of Education, and had read the reports of the Inspector of Hospitals, and in the case of some hospitals there was a dire necessity for something being done, and they would not object to the Bill. He would ask the House to let the Bill go into Committee, and also to clear other Bills off the Order Paper.

Mr. FRASER said, after the promise of the Minister to accept amendments in Committee limiting the scope of the Bill, he would support it. He would do so for the reason that he knew something about these institutions, having been connected with them since the Act was passed in 1885. The law as it stood at present was not on a proper footing, and the erection of necessary buildings was delayed. He did not think they should have laws which they were obliged to break; yet the Boards were continually forced into this position. Amendments could be made in Committee which would meet most of the objections, especially the one with regard to limiting the amount of the rate. He did not intend to say anything further, as he presumed the Bill would be committed, and then would be the time for discussing it.

Mr. McNAB intended to support the second reading, but he would not detain the House long. He came from that part of the colony where the difficulty first arose, as it was at Invercargill that the learned Judge first pointed it out. They generally liked to see both sides receive fair-play, and, although he did not agree with those who were opposing the Bill, still he did not think it should be stated, because the Minister in charge of the Bill did not feel quite pleased with its reception, that honourable members would be responsible for the lives of the people in the hospitals if the measure did not pass. He would like to tell the House the circumstances under which the difficulty arose. After what had been said, honourable members would be surprised to hear that the argument in this case before the Judge took place on the 2nd December, 1889, and the judgment was given by 11.30. that Judge on the 13th January, 1890, so that it was very nearly five years since the decision was given. He thought it was hardly fair to taunt honourable members now who opposed the Bill with being responsible for the lives of those who died in the hospitals.

Mr. REEVES said this state of things had grown up gradually.

Mr. McNAB said it had culminated in the decision of the Judge on the 13th January, 1890.

Mr. REEVES said it originated then.

Mr. McNAB said that if the honourable gentleman would read the case he would see that the origin of it took place with the beginning of the facts which culminated in the Judge's decision.

Sir R. STOUT also could not understand why there should be any opposition to this Bill. The object of the Bill was very plain. It had been known for many years that the Hospital Boards could not get possession of sufficient money to pay for what was termed "hospital maintenance." One of the most important things, he submitted, was the maintenance of hospital property, and the local bodies ought to have power to erect buildings, and additional buildings if necessary. Now, the Judge who heard the case to which reference had been made gave his judgment, he thought, on a rather narrow view of the subject: he thought "maintenance" meant maintaining the existing buildings, and not the maintenance of a hospital. He (Sir R. Stout) did not understand why honourable members objected to this Bill. The reason why it was brought in was perfectly apparent, and quite right. They could not expect the General Government to give money out of public funds for the purpose of erecting hospitals. They must raise such money locally, and the best course to take was not to limit it to any amount, but to give power to the local authorities to borrow for a short term—say, five or six years—in order that the moneys required for putting up the buildings might be spread over that period, so that principal and interest would have to be paid, say, within a term of five years.

Mr. CROWTHER.—But we are not allowed to borrow.

Sir R. STOUT said power for that purpose could be put in the Bill in Committee. He could not understand why the outlying districts should object to contribute to the hospitals in the towns, seeing that they insured for their sick proper and reasonable hospitals being erected for that purpose. The fact was that just as many sick people came in from the country districts relatively to the population as from the towns, and, in fact, more. Of course in some hospital and charitable-aid districts there were small hospitals in the outlying districts; they had, for instance, a hospital in the Wairarapa, although that district was included in the Charitable-aid District of Wellington, and there might be cases coming from Wairarapa to Wellington, for in this central institution they had a large staff and every convenience they could expect for the treatment of diseases, and the people would be properly attended to in it. He thought it was a fair charge to put on the local bodies to meet this expenditure; they could not expect that the central Government could pay for all these local burdens. There seemed to him to be a tendency on the part of some honourable members to demand that everything should be put on the central Government—that it should find all the money that was required for roads, bridges, and for every conceivable thing—water-races and so forth.

Mr. THOMPSON.—But the people find the money.

Sir R. STOUT said Yes, the people found the money out of loans. By the system of borrowing he proposed, they would cast the burden on the local people, who wanted hospitals, and he did not know that it was an unfair burden.

Mr. CROWTHER.—Their credit is at an end.

Sir R. STOUT said their credit would be revived, inasmuch as this was the era of cheap borrowing; there would be no trouble in getting everything they wanted cheaply.

Mr. GUINNESS.—You said we should not borrow.

Sir R. STOUT had said that if they borrowed for this purpose it should be for only a short period, and in five or six years the people could repay the amount borrowed. He did not think the limit named by the Premier was too high. If they put a halfpenny rate on the county for a hospital there would be an outcry against it. He understood the Premier to suggest that if a sixpenny rate were imposed in the towns there would be an equally strong outcry against putting on such a rate for hospital purposes. He suggested that the Minister should keep to his Bill as it now stood, and insert a new clause in Committee providing that the money that required to be expended might be spread over, say, five years. He was glad to think that, so far as section 3 was concerned, that seemed to be universally agreed to, and he thought it was only fair.

Mr. BUCHANAN said surprise had been expressed that there should be such opposition to this Bill. Now, the honourable gentleman who had just sat down was the framer of the Charitable Institutions Act which was now upon the statute-book, and if he had not realised now he never would realise that what had set the most of the local bodies—or, rather, the majority of the ratepayers—upon edge throughout the colony was that they had no real representation, no real control over the expenditure.

Sir R. STOUT.—They have.

Mr. BUCHANAN said they never had, and they never would have until the present Act was wiped off the statute-book. They found themselves mulcted in all directions, because the administration of the Act was in the hands of people who were not directly responsible to them. It was therefore no wonder that the Minister that night had found this determined opposition against his Bill. He had only one word more to say: How was it, if the situation had become so desperate, that there had been this delay in bringing the measure in? They had now been in session nearly four months, and there was surely no reason for delaying it until the last week or fortnight of the session.

Mr. REEVES would have introduced it a month ago if he had had a chance.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Government had control of the Order Paper, and it was astonishing that they should have the Bill now before them under the circumstances detailed by the Minister.

Mr. G. J. SMITH found it necessary to vote against the Bill—at all events, against section 2, which conferred a rating-power to an almost unlimited extent; and, in view of the extent of rating for hospitals and charitable aid being so heavy in the city districts, he felt he could not consent, so far as he was concerned, to any additional burden being placed on the ratepayers. Now, the Minister in charge had referred to the fact that the Government had to provide money for hospitals. He was a member of a deputation which had waited upon the Minister for Public Works, asking for some assistance for the Christchurch Hospital. Unfortunately they were not able to get that assistance; but he would remind the House that, while Christchurch and Wanganui could not get anything of this description,—not to mention Invercargill or Auckland,—Dunedin had been very favourably treated. It had had a considerable amount given to it by way of grant to enable it to put up its hospital, and he found on the estimates for this year they had these appropriations: "Heating wards, Dunedin Hospital, £750." Then, on the public works estimates: "Dunedin—Completion new surgical wing, £700"; "Dunedin—Female refuge, additions, £700": making a total of £2,150 as Government assistance. He thought that if the Government could find money to send down to the southern capital it should find something for Christchurch to put up a wing there, and possibly for some of the hospitals in the more necessitous parts of the colony. He would not detain the House longer. He regretted he could not support the Minister in this Bill.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. REEVES said, all right; it meant killing more people in Christchurch.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said that, as pointed out by the honourable member for Mataura, if it had taken the Minister from 1890 up till the present time to prevent people from being killed, he did not see the necessity for passing the Bill that night. He could not consent to any further taxation being imposed upon the ratepayers.

Captain RUSSELL would very much like the Minister to explain what he meant by killing the men, women, and children throughout the colony. The remark frightened him so much that he went out and got the Inspector-General's report, and had read through his remarks on the various hospitals. He could not see that under the present system people were being killed at any hospital. In fact, almost every hospital was well spoken of. They knew that the population of New Zealand was, unfortunately, not increasing; they heard of a large exodus to Coolgardie and elsewhere; and yet he found from the report there were continued additions to the hospitals. Nearly all through the report they saw references to additions to the hospitals. Yet, as he said, while the population was not increasing, the hospital accommodation was. Where, then, was the urgent necessity for this Bill? It was this kind of speech which, as far as he could judge, caused every one to wonder what was really wrong; the inference being that if they were not led into passing the Bill they would individually and collectively be had up for manslaughter.

Mr. J. W. KELLY said that, while he sympathized very much with the honourable member for Marsden in his remarks with regard to the promise made by the Ministry concerning a reform of the Charitable Institutions Act, he really must support the second reading of this Bill. He assured honourable members there was an absolute necessity for it so far as Invercargill was concerned. Dr. MacGregor, in his reports for the last few years, had condemned in very strong terms their hospital buildings. It was a very serious matter at Invercargill, and he hoped this Bill would be carried, even with a limit. They had got nothing in the nature of hospital accommodation, and could not possibly get it, owing, as the Minister stated, to the decision given by Mr. Justice Williams in this case. He appealed to honourable members, if they did not wish the House to vote the money for hospital buildings, to give an opportunity to people who were badly in want, and were willing to tax themselves a little more to provide hospital accommodation for the sick. He would have much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

The House divided on the question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

AYES, 85.

Allen	Mackintosh	Reeves
Carnell	McKenzie, J.	Russell, W. R.
Carroll	McNab	Saunders
Collins	Millar	Seddon
Duncan	Mills	Stevens
Earnshaw	Mitchelson	Steward
Harris	Montgomery	Stout
Hutchison, W.	Morrison	Ward
Joyce	O'Regan	Willis.
Lang	Parata	Tellers.
Lawry	Pinkerton	Fraser
Mackenzie, T.	Pirani	Kelly, J. W.

NOES, 29.

Buchanan	Hall-Jones	McLachlan
Buddo	Hogg	Meredith
Buick	Houston	Newman
Button	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Carncross	Larnach	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	Maslin	Tanner
Graham	Massey	Wilson.
Green	McGowan	Tellers.
Guinness	McGuire	Crowther
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Thompson.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Pere.	Te Ao.

Majority for, 6.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read a second time.

COUNTIES VEHICLE-LICENSING BILL.

Mr. SEDDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was simply to give power by Order in Council to extend the present Act, which had worked in a most satisfactory way ever since it had been brought into operation.

Mr. TANNER said, in order not to put the Ministry in any difficulty as to his position, he would move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months. There were a number of new members in the House who were not there during the sessions of 1892 and 1893, and who were probably not conversant with the history of this measure. During the session of 1892 a Bill was introduced into the House which was called the Westland Counties Vehicles-licensing Bill, which gave power to a number of County Councils on the west coast of the South Island that were in a somewhat impecunious position to aid their revenues by imposing a tax on vehicles.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable gentleman had evidently not read the Bill.

Mr. TANNER said, fortunately he had read the Bill of last year, and this year's also, and knew exactly what he was speaking about. He was about to say that last year the principle of the Act passed in 1892 was extended, and a number of counties in the northern part of the Province of Auckland, through their members, requested that the provisions of the Act might be applied to themselves. A Bill was drafted which provided that those powers might be given to the County Councils in the northern portion of the Auckland Province; it was passed under the title of "The Counties Vehicle-licensing Act, 1893," and those counties were accordingly satisfied. During the discussion that took place last year some member of the House—he forgot who it was—suggested that it would be an excellent thing if the Bill were so extended in its operation as to embrace every county in the colony, and at that point he (Mr. Tanner) entered a strong protest against it. He was, fortunately, successful. The result was that a number of counties to which the Bill would apply, most of them being hilly and broken counties, and very difficult country for the making and maintenance of roads, were inserted in the schedule which was attached to the Bill; but the rest of the colony was not affected. Of all the counties in the colony there was only one in the interior of the South Island which at the present time was under the operation of the Act. He might be allowed to point out, for the benefit of a number of new members in the House who were not aware of the fact, that there was such a difference between the various portions of the colony with regard to the road-making that he was justly entitled to claim that certain portions of the colony should be exempted. He had no objection whatever to the inhabitants of various counties in the colony asking for these powers to be conferred on their County Councils if they wished to be taxed in the manner in which he believed the inhabitants of the northern counties of the South Island and particularly the Buller County were taxed—namely, £2 10s. for a pair of light wheels up to £12 10s. per annum—a local tax which had elicited strong expressions of disapproval from the farmers who were compelled to pay, and which led to a special resolution being passed at the Agricultural Conference held in Wellington lately, calling upon Parliament to limit the operation of the Act of last year. If the inhabitants of the counties wished to place themselves under restrictions of that kind he was quite willing that they should do so. But he would point out that in the Province of Canterbury matters were very different. From the level nature of the country, and from the almost inexhaustible supplies of shingle in the river-beds, the roads, he supposed, were in a better state of efficiency than in most parts of the colony, and a proposal of this kind, to license vehicles running upon the roads, would cause a general feeling of popular irritation. He felt so strongly on this subject that he should oppose the Bill in every possible way. If it was fortunate enough to get to Committee he should do all he could to get Canterbury exempted from its operation. He had had occasion during the last election contest to point out to some of the ratepayers in his district that a Bill of this nature would subject them to a local tax of a very annoying and irritating character, and he found there was a general feeling of relief that the operation of the Bill had not been extended as was originally proposed in the Act of 1893. He considered they were dealing with a subject which demanding more serious and earnest consideration than the House was inclined to give to it. They had already passed one Bill that evening which, if it became operative, would impose local taxation to a large extent upon the people, and here was another taxing Bill within a few minutes. The other Bill was the Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Bill. He knew there were many honourable members in the House who looked upon that Bill with disfavour, including himself, for he thought the subject should not be dealt with in this piecemeal fashion, but in a comprehensive measure. He felt that the House was not justified at this late period of the session, when the number of hours to the end of the session could almost be counted, in passing two Bills in a few minutes—at any rate, in less than half an hour. He desired to enter his strong protest against the forcing of this kind of legislation through the House. The Bill had been in print for some days, but the bulk of honourable members had been too much occupied with Committee-work, and looking up a number of other subjects, to thoroughly comprehend what was proposed in this and some other Bills to be found on the Order Paper. If they allowed this Bill to get through, and the various County Councils seized upon it as a means by which they might replenish their coffers, he felt quite certain that most of the country members would hear of it again, and in no very favourable terms, from their constituents. For instance, there were honourable members from South Canterbury—Pareora, Rangitata, Ellesmere, Selwyn, and Ashburton districts—to whom the passage of a measure of this kind must be a matter of great importance. They, like himself, would have to meet their constituents. Amongst their constituents were large numbers of small farmers, and at the present time the position of the farming and agricultural population, especially the small holders of land, was not one of such a brilliant character as to justify the House in passing in the course of one evening two Bills which imposed additional taxation upon them. In his own district there were many small holders of sections up to twenty acres, but all had their vehicles to run their produce to the neighbouring city, and it would come upon them as a disagreeable surprise when they found that every year they would be compelled to put their hands in their pockets and pay a license which, if this Bill were passed—which he trusted would not be the case—would amount, in all probability, to £3 or £4. They often had discussions in the House about the advisability of repealing the tea and sugar duties, or on cognate subjects, and taking off what were after all some trifling imposts in comparison with the revival of such a barbarous relic of medievalism as this. This was of more consequence to the people of the colony—or, at least, to that class who were compelled to keep vehicles—than the sugar duty could be, for this Bill would come upon them with a crushing weight. He was not prepared, under the circumstances, to give his support to the measure, but would do his best in the other direction.

Mr. Tanner

Mr. McNAB also intended to oppose this Bill. It was only the strong opposition which he had to the principle of the Bill which compelled him at that late hour of the night and at that late period of the session to say anything which would detain the House even for a short time. He thought, if he pointed out to the House the peculiar application which this Bill would have, the House would hesitate before it brought it into law. At the present time there were two enactments which dealt with the licensing of vehicles in counties and Road Board districts. First there was the Counties Act, which provided that all vehicles plying for hire should be licensed. In the Public Works Bill which they recently passed there was a provision for the local authority to make regulations providing for imposing a yearly license-fee on any vehicle or machine engaged in heavy traffic. Therefore there was at the present time power given to the local authorities to enforce licenses for any machine plying for hire, whether carrying passengers or goods, and the local bodies were able to impose license-fees on all machines carrying heavy traffic. Did they want to make the people to pay a license-fee who only had machines to carry very light loads, or who were using light-running buggies on the public roads? He thought, if the country knew they were legislating in that direction, the country would cry out very loudly against it, because he thought it was pressing particularly on a section of the people who were not doing a very heavy trade upon the roads. Already all those who used the roads very heavily had to be licensed. This Bill appeared to him only to reach those persons who only occasionally used the roads. If the provisions of the Bill were such that those alone would be licensed who did not pay rates, then, he thought, the position could be defended. He thought, if an exemption were made in the case of those who paid rates, there might be some justification for passing the Bill; but in the form in which it was at the present time, being the revival of an Act which contained the sections he had mentioned, he felt it to be his duty to oppose the Bill strongly. Already the country settlers suffered under sufficient restrictions without Parliament pressing any more burdens upon them. They were not crying out for burdens, but they were crying out for relief. They were crying out for bread, and he was afraid the Government were casting them a stone.

Mr. SEDDON said honourable members might be entirely misled by the honourable member for Avon and the honourable member who had just spoken. If this were not the close of the session, and their supporters were not helping them to kill their Bills by "three months" and "six months," he might say the Government were getting on very rapidly, and were getting very much nearer home. This was only No. 4 on the Order Paper for that day, and no further work could be done that night.

That was not a very good day's record. There were no objections taken against this Bill at all except what were Committee objections, and objections which, he might say, were entirely unfounded. If the honourable member had looked at the original Act, or read this Bill, he would have seen that it was only by Order in Council that the Act was brought into operation. If that was not clear, the honourable member could make it clear, or the Bill could be made to be brought into operation by special resolution of the local authority. That was the intention of the Bill. If the local body of the district, who were the representatives of the ratepayers, desired that they should have this by-law, why should they not have it? It was permissive, and it was beneficial. If the honourable gentleman wished it should be subject to a vote of the ratepayers, he had no objection to that. The district of the honourable member for Avon verged, as it were, on several Road Board districts, and some difficulty might arise in consequence; but why should the honourable gentleman, because of the peculiar situation of his district, deprive other counties of the benefit of this legislation? The honourable gentleman was most selfish in his objection to the Bill. He would tell the House the scope of the Bill. First of all this measure was to be brought into force by the Governor in Council empowering the local authorities to make any of these by-laws. At the present time there were people getting their living on the roads—using miles and miles of roads, and paying nothing whatever for repairing them. They were plying for hire. This Bill would entitle the county to compel the owners of such vehicles to pay license-fees. In some districts there were toll-gates, which was acknowledged to be a barbarous and most expensive way of collecting money. This Bill abolished altogether the necessity for toll-gates. He would point out to the honourable member for Mataura that a County Council, in making these by-laws, had the power of exempting the ratepayers if it thought fit. The Bill was entirely permissive. The honourable member for the Buller interjected that a fee of ten guineas might be charged. He might mention that there were people in the Borough of Westport who had eight- and ten-ton wagons, and who carried produce from Westport to a place at some distance, using thirty miles of the county roads, smashing bridges and cutting up the roads, and who paid nothing whatever to the county funds. This Bill was for the protection of the country districts and the ratepayers. If the honourable member for Avon had consulted him or read the Bill he would not have moved the amendment. The Government had very good reason to complain of a surprise motion like that on a very useful measure. If the Bill was read a second time he would be quite prepared to amend it so as to make it clear that it was entirely permissive, and that full powers should be given to the local authorities, if they thought proper, to exempt ratepayers. He wanted to make it a good and workable measure. It was, in the interest of Canterbury and other parts of the colony, absolutely necessary to get the Bill on the statute-book.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped the honourable gentleman would not persist in attempting to pass the second reading of this Bill. He was sure that members of the House would very much object to any further facilities for taxation in the country districts, which was already, as he well knew, very heavy. This was but another plan by which temptation would be put in the way of local bodies to further harass the unfortunate ratepayers. The honourable gentleman had given an instance of heavy wagons of ten tons going from Westport to the Lyell; but he knew very well that the County Council whose roads were injured by the passage of these heavy wagons had power, through their by-laws, to limit the weight carried and to regulate the width of their tires. And, after all, whose work were these wagons doing? Why, in most instances, the work of the country settlers; and as soon as the carriers were taxed they would necessarily have to raise their rates in order to pay their way. The same argument applied to this as to tolls. It might be said it was optional; but what would happen? One local body would begin to tax, and then would come retaliation all round. They could not possibly prevent a local body from adopting the Act, and, as soon as one did, then the others would be compelled to do so in self-defence. They knew how easy it was to set local bodies as well as ratepayers fighting, and they did not want to see this Bill on the statute-book. The Premier knew very well that the Bill of last year was designed to meet the necessities of the gumfields, where there was no rateable property, and where it was necessary to provide some means for raising revenue; and in outlying country districts, where there was much Native land, the same necessity existed. But as for applying it to ordinary country districts, where the land was mostly rateable, there was not the slightest necessity for it, and he should therefore oppose the Bill.

Mr. FLATMAN was afraid he could not support the Bill. He thought it would be far better to bring in the old toll system straight away. He could not see how it could work well. There were adjoining counties. This year they had passed the Levels County Act, and that county had a market-town—Timaru—which belonged to the settlers north as far as Geraldine; consequently they would have to pass through Levels County to get to Timaru. Now, the Levels County might adopt this Act and the Geraldine County might not, and, consequently, the one county would be paying the other one's rates while not using its roads very much. He doubted very much whether by-laws could be passed so as to exempt certain ratepayers, and therefore they must either all be taxed or none. He remembered how this kind of licensing acted in the Old Country when he was a boy. At one time a man could not ride in a spring-cart if he had not as much money as his neighbour, but had to be jolted on a pair of trusses; because springs were taxed.

Mr. Seddon

He did not think they wanted to go back to that state of things, and he thought it would be much better to establish tolls at once than to adopt this Act. He would like to see his way to support the measure, but he could not support a Bill of this kind.

Mr. BUDDO thought there was very little use for this short amendment at all, and wanted to know what particular district required it. They had provisions in the various Acts already passed for nearly every case that could come under such a system as this. There was a provision that had been mentioned by the honourable member for Mataura, giving full power regarding width of tires, and the weight of load to be taken on vehicles. Then, again, the Counties Act very clearly defined the position with regard to this question. He thought it undesirable to put this Bill on the statute-book. Probably it would injuriously affect the small holders, who would have more vehicles carrying on business than the holders of large areas of land. He presumed it would be said they could very well guard themselves, having the voting-power, or, at least, being the more numerous; but if it was enacted by a local body that these vehicles should be licensed he had no doubt the small holder would suffer. This was also entirely opposed to the system already in vogue among local bodies, of rating for the purpose of keeping their roads. There was also the other side of the question that had not been entered into. He did not think the measure would be very much use to the local bodies, and certainly would be less use to the ratepayers, because if the carriers had to pay a license they would charge it on the freight, and therefore the ratepayers would have to pay all the same. Why they should put such a measure on the statute-book he did not know. It must be to affect some district in particular; and, if that was so, why not have a local Bill to deal with it, instead of a general one?

Mr. R. MCKENZIE was somewhat surprised at the Premier introducing this Bill without any remarks. Efforts had been made during the last two years to put a similar Act in operation in the district he represented, but every County Council there found that its by-laws under that Act were ultra vires. They had been tried in Court on several occasions, and the County Council got the worst of it. He had no doubt this Bill was brought in specially to enable the County Council of the Buller to make legal by-laws. The Minister of Lands could, no doubt, give an elaborate explanation of the operation of the Bill in the West Coast counties. The honourable gentleman was there a few months ago and travelled through the four West Coast counties, he and another gentleman, who was an ex-member of this House, and made themselves liable for something like sixty or seventy guineas for licenses. No doubt the Minister of Lands, if he considered the question, would know how the thing worked on the West Coast. The operation of the Act there was this: that for a four-horse coach you had to pay ten guineas to every county. The honourable gentleman had travelled through three counties, and found he was liable to something like sixty or seventy guineas. He (Mr. R. McKenzie) had introduced a deputation to him, trying to get that Act repealed. The Minister of Mines went down shortly afterwards by the mail-coach, and after he arrived at Westport he had occasion to go to Charleston with the same coach. On the Charleston Road the coachman had not the contract for the mails, and when he came back the tax-collector was waiting to collect ten guineas from him for being away with the coach some five or six hours without a license. That was the way the Act operated in that district. Any one who wanted to go from the Buller County to Inangahua had to pay £2 10s. as a fee for a single buggy, and for a buggy and pair some £5. He had no doubt if this Bill was brought into operation it would work like that all over the colony. He had several letters and petitions sent him on the matter,—which he had presented to the Government,—asking him to get the Act on the statute-book referring to the four West Coast counties repealed. These four counties had been made the scapegoat of the colony during many years for experimental legislation. The Government had promised a Local Government Bill next session, and, if they were anxious to have this Bill put on the statute-book, that would be the opportunity for it. There had been sufficient provision made in the Public Works Act in connection with this matter to last for a year, and therefore it was a mistake to bring this Bill forward at present. They should reconsider the question, and withdraw the measure from the Order Paper.

Mr. O'REGAN would have much pleasure in voting against the second reading of this Bill. If he were the Minister he certainly would hesitate to pass such a measure. It seemed to him to be simply tinkering with legislation. If the Government were driven to straits for the purpose of providing revenue for local bodies, then why in the name of common-sense did they not revert to the tollgate system? That, obnoxious as it would be, would be preferable to this. A few years ago they had on the West Coast what was called the gold duty, and, although he could not say that he looked upon the gold duty as being an equitable means of providing revenue, it certainly was preferable to anything the Premier had propounded since its abolition. He might say there had been no more sturdy opponent of the gold duty than the Premier. Time after time he had spoken and voted against its retention, and finally, mainly by his efforts, it was abolished. Since then the local bodies on the West Coast had been in a state of impecuniosity, and the Premier had repeatedly promised to provide some substitute for it; but, instead of seeing that something substantial was done, he had given them nothing but mere scraps, such as the Bill now before them. The Premier would be far more logical if he went back to the tollgate or to the window-tax; neither of them would be more oppressive than the vehicle-tax. It was ridiculous, and he could assure honourable members that there was no more obnoxious thing on the West Coast than the imposition of a vehicle-tax by the local bodies. He ventured to say, if the question were put to the people, nine-tenths of them would vote against it. The most preposterous cases had arisen since this provision had been availed of by the local bodies, a few samples of which had been related to the House by his honourable friend the member for the Buller. He would certainly vote against the second reading, and he hoped the majority of the House would reject it.

Mr. MILLAR said he would support 2.80. the Bill if it applied to Borough and County Councils, because he knew one borough which owned a large extent of main road that was entirely used by country settlers. They had four miles of this road, and the ratepayers of the borough were compelled to maintain it. It was only under such a system as this that the counties could be made to maintain these roads. When the ratepayers of boroughs were taxed to keep up these roads, he thought it was high time that some such equitable system as this was imposed for the purpose of compelling the counties to assist in maintaining these roads.

Mr. CROWTHER said the last speaker had entirely met his circumstances. The Premier had said that the injuries caused by vehicles travelling over the roads were paid for out of county rates, but the last speaker had shown that it was possible for the reverse to be the case. This was one of those things which must exist; why, then, should they interfere in the matter? They should let the counties and boroughs work together, according to the situation and circumstances that existed. Why should the Governor in Council indicate and regulate their duties? As had been said by the last speaker, the borough authorities had to go into Road Board districts for road-metal for their streets and footpaths, and a Board in his district had made regulations that vehicles were not to go over the roads unless they had tires 4in. wide. Seeing that all these regulations had prevailed, and that the counties and boroughs were working together according to their circumstances, why should they introduce such a measure as this? It did not seem to suit the boroughs, and according to some members it did not seem to suit the counties, and therefore the measure did not seem to be required.

Mr. J. McKENZIE was very much surprised that members from the West Coast should object to this Bill. They had been continually applying to the Government to keep up the bridges and keep the roads open; and, if they objected to any taxation of this kind, how could they expect the colony to maintain the roads for them? He was afraid they were in the wrong box. If honourable members would look at the estimates they would see large provision there made from the general revenue of the colony to maintain main roads on the West Coast, and also to put bridges in repair, and assist them in all sorts of ways; and, if they objected to things of this sort, he was afraid they would not get the money. Complaints had been made to the Government during the last year about the heavy wagons used over those bridges—wagons which were too heavy for the bridges in that part of the colony—and the Government were informed that these wagons were in danger of going through the bridges; and, as honourable members must know, the Government had assisted to repair some of these bridges until the House met, and until a further vote could be taken to maintain the bridges and the roads. He thought it was fair to the local bodies that this fact should be recognised. What better position would honourable members be in if the Bill were thrown out? Throwing the Bill out would not help them a bit. The Bill was permissive; and, in his opinion, it was very hard upon a large number of ratepayers that they should be compelled to pay rates and get no assistance from a number of people who used these roads. In many cases sawmill proprietors and others had wagons which were continually using the country roads for the purpose of taking away timber, lime, and so forth, and they paid nothing at all for the maintenance of the roads they went over. The Government would not bring the Act into force until such time as the County Councils and local bodies asked them to do so, and it was entirely in their hands to do what they thought right in the matter.

Mr. MASLIN intended to vote against the second reading of the Bill, because he did not see how it could be amended to make it an acceptable measure. If restricted to County Councils it would not be so objectionable, but every Road Board district and town district where the Counties Act was not in force had power to levy a tax under this Bill. In one part of his district there were five Boards, and, if the Bill passed, each one of them would have power to impose a tax on vehicles which passed through the Board's district to get into town. It was a measure to tax farmers and every other person who used the roads, and he thought it decidedly objectionable, and would vote against it.

Mr. McGUIRE would give his hearty support to the Bill, because he considered it was in the interests of the settlers. The settlers had suffered very severely through heavy wagons laden with timber and other goods passing over their roads; and he should support the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON said he intended to make it very clear that the Bill was permissive.

The House divided on the question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

AYES, 31.

Carncross	Hogg	Mills
Carnell	Houston	Mitchelson
Carroll	Joyce	Morrison
Collins	Kelly, W.	Parata
Duncan	McGowan	Pinkerton
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Reeves
Fraser	McLachlan	Seddon
Hall	Millar	Smith, E. M.

Mr. J. McKenzie

Stevens
Steward
Thompson

Ward
Willis.

Tellers.
Lawry
McGuire.

NOES, 25.

Allen
Buchanan
Buddo
Buick
Crowther
Flatman
Graham
Green
Guinness

Hall-Jones
Heke
Lang
Mackenzie, T.
Maslin
Massey
McKenzie, R.
Meredith
Montgomery

O'Regan
Russell, G. W.
Saunders
Smith, G. J.
Wilson.

Tellers.
McNab
Tanner.

PAIRS.

For.

Cadman
Larnach
Mackintosh.

Against.

Duthie
Harris
Kelly, J. W.

Majority for, 6.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read a second time.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE moved to add the following new clause: "Any vehicle licensed in any county, town district, or borough will be exempt from paying any license-fee in any other county, town district, or borough."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 11.

Allen
Buchanan
Duncan
Earnshaw

Graham
Maslin
McNab
Montgomery

O'Regan.
Tellers.
McKenzie, R.
Tanner.

NOES, 35.

Bell
Buddo
Buick
Carnell
Carroll
Crowther
Flatman
Fraser
Green
Hall-Jones
Hogg
Houston

Hutchison, G.
Kelly, W.
Lawry
Mackenzie, T.
Massey
McGowan
McGuire
McKenzie, J.
McLachlan
Meredith
Mills
Mitchelson

Morrison
Parata
Pinkerton
Seddon
Smith, E. M.
Smith, G. J.
Stevens
Ward
Willis.

Tellers.

Joyce
Millar.

PAIRS.

For.

Button
Duthie
Harris
Kelly, J. W.
Lang
Te Ao.

Against.

Steward
Cadman
Larnach
Mackintosh
Reeves
Carnaross.

Majority against, 24.

Clause negatived.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved to add the following new clause: "This Act shall have no application to the Provincial District of Canterbury."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 14.

Allen	Flatman	Smith, G. J.
Bell	Hall-Jones	Tanner.
Buddo	Maslin	Tellers.
Duncan	McNab	Buchanan
Earnshaw	Meredith	Montgomery.

NOES, 31.

Buick	Kelly, W.	Mitchelson
Carnell	Lawry	Parata
Carroll	Mackenzie, T.	Pinkerton
Crowther	Massey	Seddon
Fraser	McGowan	Stevens
Graham	McGuire	Ward
Green	McKenzie, J.	Willis.
Hall	McKenzie, R.
Houston	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Millar	Morrison
Joyce	Mills	O'Regan.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Button	Steward
Duthie	Cadman
Harris	Larnach
Kelly, J. W.	Mackintosh
Lang	Reeves
Saunders	Collins
Te Ao.	Carncross.

Majority against, 17.

Clause negatived.

Mr. MILLAR moved to add the following new clause: "All powers granted under 'the Counties Vehicle-licensing Act, 1893,' and this Act, to Town Boards, Road Boards, or County Councils may be exercised by any Borough Council."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Mr. FRASER moved to add the following new clause: "The word 'vehicle' in 'The Counties Vehicle-licensing Act, 1893,' shall not include any gig, spring-cart, or similar class of conveyance."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 13.

Allen	Flatman	Smith, G. J.
Buchanan	Hall
Buddo	Mackenzie, T.	Tellers.
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Hall-Jones
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Maslin.

NOES, 23.

Bell	McGowan	Parata
Buick	McGuire	Pinkerton
Carnell	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Carroll	McLachlan	Stevens
Crowther	McNab	Willis.
Joyce	Meredith	Tellers.
Lawry	Millar	Mills
Massey	Morrison	Tanner.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Button	Steward
Duthie	Cadman
Green	Ward
Harris	Larnach

Lang
Saunders
Te Ao.Reeves
Collins
Carncross.

Majority against, 10.

Clause negatived.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the amendments be agreed to.

Mr. DUNCAN moved, as an amendment, That the amendments be agreed to that day month. He thought that would give honourable members time to think over the matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN seconded the amendment of the honourable member for Oamaru, and wished to enter his emphatic protest against a trumpery Bill, which the Premier must know should not be put on the statute-book, and, if it were, would be a burlesque on legislation, forced as it was through the House at that hour of the morning. The Premier had all through the session driven members beyond endurance, without either reason or justification. He (Mr. Buchanan) had done his best in the interests of his constituents to prevent the Bill from being passed, and, having done so, could do no more.

Mr. SEDDON asked if it was fair that those honourable members who had been there all the time endeavouring to make the Bill a good workable measure should now have their work postponed for a month. He did not think it was fair, and it was not his fault that they had not gone home three hours before. He had accepted all reasonable amendments, with a view to getting the Bill through, and he could not help it if the honourable member for Wairarapa would make a burlesque of the matter. It was a pity that at a certain time in the morning the honourable gentleman got into the frame of mind he generally did, and the only solution that he could suggest would be that if there were an attraction that would take the honourable gentleman out of the House earlier in the evening they would not be troubled with him, and he would not then be taking part in what he called a burlesque.

The House divided on the question, "That the amendments be considered forthwith."

AYES, 17.

Carnell	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Hall	McNab	Stevens
Joyce	Millar	Willis.
Lawry	Mitchelson	Tellers.
McGowan	Morrison	McLachlan
McGuire	Parata	Mills.

NOES, 12.

Buick	Maslin	Tanner.
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Buchanan
Flatman	Smith, G. J.	Duncan.
Hall-Jones

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Carncross	Te Ao
Collins	Saunders
Houston	Mackenzie, T.

Larnach	Harris
Reeves	Lang
Steward	Button
Ward.	Green.

Majority for, 5.

Motion agreed to.

Amendments agreed to.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. DUNCAN said he had now entered a fair protest against this Bill, and it was because the small boroughs had brought this into operation for the purpose of levying taxation on the country settlers; and it would have the effect of setting country against town, and there would be no end of worry and trouble over it. In the Road Boards it would be worse still, because wherever they moved they would be confronted with toll-gates or policemen to arrest one if one had a vehicle that was not licensed. He considered it a bad Bill, and quite uncalled-for, and it should not go on the statute-book. That was his honest conviction. If the Bill were passed it would create no end of trouble in the country.

Mr. HALL-JONES quite agreed with the remarks of the honourable member for Oamaru. This Bill was not required by the country. He had opposed the Bill in Committee, because he saw the effect of it would be this: In certain localities they might adopt the provisions contained in this Bill, but if they did they would force the adjoining local bodies to do the same, and the result would be that no vehicle of any description would be allowed to travel through the country without being licensed. He was sure the people did not desire that. He had also to protest against such Bills as these being brought down at so late a period of the session. They were now within a few days of the prorogation of Parliament, and they ought not to bring in any more legislation of this kind. They should now only deal with what was absolutely required by the country, and if there was nothing more important to be placed before them than Bills like this the sooner they made an end of it the better, so that the session might close.

Mr. SEDDON said they had done very little in the last four hours. If he thought the Bill was a trumpety one, they might be certain he would not ask the House to agree to it; but this Bill was wanted by many of the counties, and many honourable members knew very well it was wanted. They had made it permissive, and power was given to revoke by-laws if any local body wished to do so. There was full power given to the Governor, by Order in Council, to do that, and there was provision made that the majority of the ratepayers could stop the by-laws coming into force. With those safeguards what was there to fear? They would find that the Bill would work well, and there would be no friction if it were once passed. As regarded bringing the measure down at the end of the session, there were many other Bills, which were just as important, which were brought down at as late a period. This Bill was proposed at a much earlier period of the session, and the Government had been twice asked during the session whether they were going to push it through or not. They had promised to do so, and were now twitted because they were keeping faith. If he had not done that, the next thing he would have been twitted with would have been with having broken faith with the House. If Canterbury had been exempted there would not have been a word said against this Bill. He did not think one part of the colony should say that unless legislation suited them no other part of the colony should have it. He did not think that was a fair way of dealing with legislation. There might come a time when Canterbury would want special legislation, and then honourable members from other parts of the colony might say they were not prepared to give it to Canterbury. He did not believe in such narrow and circumscribed legislation.

The House divided.

AYES, 15.
Carnell	McLachlan	Seddon
Hall	Millar	Stevens.
Lawry	Morrison	Tellers.
McGowan	O'Regan	Joyce
McGuire	Parata	Mills.
McKenzie, J.

NOES, 18.
Allen	Fraser	Smith, G. J.
Buchanan	Maslin	Tanner
Buddo	Massey	Willis.
Buick	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Crowther	McNab	Flatman
Duncan	Montgomery	Hall-Jones.
Earnshaw

For.	Against.
Cadman	Duthie
Carncross	Te Ao
Collins	Saunders
Houston	Mackenzie, T.
Larnach	Harris
Reeves	Lang
Steward	Button
Ward.	Green.

Majority against, 8.

Motion for third reading negatived.

The House adjourned at seventeen minutes past three o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 16th October, 1894.

Duke of York's Son—First Readings—Third Readings
—New Zealand Consols Bill—Criminal Code Bill
—District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates—Public Works Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DUKE OF YORK'S SON.

A message was received from the Governor transmitting a copy of a despatch received from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 22nd August, 1894, conveying to the Council the sincere thanks of Her Majesty the Queen for their loyal congratulations upon the birth of a son to the Duke and Duchess of York.

FIRST READINGS.

Tongariro National Park Bill, Ministerial Residences Sale Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Stamp Bill, Water-supply Bill, Abattoirs and Slaughterhouses Bill, Dairy Industry Bill.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives intimating that it had agreed to an amendment in this Bill received by message from the Governor, and transmitting the same for the consideration of the Council.

On the motion of the Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, the amendment was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives desiring a Conference on the subject of the Council's amendments in this Bill.

On the motion of the Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, the Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. McLean, and the mover were appointed Managers for the Conference on behalf of the Council.

DISTRICT COURT JUDGES AND STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—In moving the motion of which I have given notice, I do not think it will be necessary for me to take up much time. The motion is one which I think, at all events as to the greater part of it, will commend itself to the members of the Council. The first part is, "That in the opinion of this Council it is essential to the impartial and fearless administration of justice that (a) the tenure of office of District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates exercising extended jurisdiction should be during ability and good behaviour, and not, as at present, during the pleasure of the Executive." Now, it will be remembered that last session when the Magistrates' Courts Bill was before the Council a clause was inserted providing a system of appointment of Magistrates such as is indicated in this motion, and the Bill passed through all its stages, this clause receiving after some discussion the sanction of the Council. Afterwards, however, the Government thought it would be an anomalous thing that Stipendiary Magistrates should hold office during ability and good behaviour whilst District Court Judges were to hold office at the pleasure of the Executive; consequently the clause, after the Bill had been recommitted for the purpose, was struck out. The clause, however, that I now suggest is, I think, generally admitted to be an eminently desirable one. There is no reason at all, that I can see, why any distinction should be made between Supreme Court Judges and District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates exercising extended jurisdiction. It cannot be said, I think, that the duties devolving upon Supreme Court Judges are of any greater importance to the community than the duties of these Judges. In point of fact, infinitely more people are affected by the decisions of the Stipendiary Magistrates and District Court Judges than are concerned in the decisions of the Supreme Court Judges. The amount of money, measuring the matter pecuniarily, that is concerned in the proceedings of the Magistrates' Courts annually is very much larger than the amount passing through the Supreme Court; and the District Courts and the Magistrates' Courts as a whole, I am sure, touch the great bulk of the people more nearly than the proceedings of the Supreme Courts; and it is just as necessary in the cases of these District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates as in the case of a Supreme Court Judge that we should have the Magistrates independent of the Executive of the hour; and it is a well-recognised principle of English constitutional law that the Judges should be independent. With regard to the state of matters in the other colonies, it is a remarkable thing that in New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland, and also in South Australia, the County Court Judges, who are practically the same as our Stipendiary Magistrates, and have no greater jurisdiction,—in some cases not so great as our Stipendiary Magistrates have,—are all appointed during ability and good behaviour. I do not think any good reason can be urged why the same rule should not be applied in New Zealand. As to the second branch of the question, as to the salaries of Judges and Magistrates, it is this: "the salaries of such Judges and Magistrates should be adequate, and should not be liable to be reduced during the term of office of the Judge or Magistrate receiving the same." The same considerations apply to this matter of salary, and I do not think any one can suggest any reason why these District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates should not receive salaries adequate to the important work intrusted to them. We know that these officials, in most cases, have very heavy work indeed—probably very much heavier work than that of the Judges of the Supreme Court; and as to the abstract proposition that they should receive adequate remuneration, I do not think any one would dispute it. When we come to the remaining branch of the motion, however, "That in the opinion of the Council the salaries at present paid to District Judges and such Magistrates, and especially the former, are wholly inadequate," it will be necessary for me to mention what the salaries are that are paid at present. The salaries in New Zealand, I find, of District Judges average about £500. One District Judge—certainly the oldest, District Judge Ward—receives, I think, £900. The others receive—one £550, and the rest £500. Now, I do not think that any one can suggest that £500 is an adequate salary for a District Court Judge. These District Court Judges in all cases, I think, exercise the functions of Stipendiary Magistrates as well. They have very wide districts over which they travel, and their duties are exceedingly onerous; and I do not think it will be suggested that, inasmuch as men have been got to take these salaries at present, that is a sufficient indication that the salaries paid are sufficient. That, I think, is not a fair inference to draw, and not a proper doctrine to set up. The question is, whether or not these men are receiving proper and adequate remuneration for the work they do and the services they render, and not as to whether we can get men to do the work any cheaper. In the Australian Colonies much larger salaries are paid, and retiring-allowances are also made: in New South Wales, £1,000; in Victoria, £1,500; in Queensland, £1,000. In England County Court Judges get £1,500 a year and a pension. I move the motion as a whole standing in my name, and I hope the Council will agree to it. It is a very important matter, and a matter that I myself have long considered to be one requiring the attention of the Legislature, and I hope the Government will give it the attention it deserves.

Motion made, and question proposed,—" (1.) That in the opinion of this Council it is essential to the impartial and fearless administration of justice that (a) the tenure of office of District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates exercising extended jurisdiction should be 'during ability and good behaviour,' and not, as at present, during the pleasure of the Executive; (b) the salaries of such Judges and Magistrates should be adequate, and should not be liable to be reduced during the term of office of the Judge or Magistrate receiving the same. (2.) That in the opinion of the Council the salaries at present paid to District Judges and such Magistrates, and especially the former, are wholly inadequate."—(Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.)

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—I may state that I very heartily approve of this motion. The impartial administration of justice should be an object, I think, which this Legislature should keep steadily in view; and all persons in the community are interested in justice being administered not only with ability but with absolute impartiality. The independence of the English Bench since the passing of the Act of Settlement has been the subject not only of approval, but, I may say, of admiration. The Supreme Courts in these various colonies through the independence of the Judges have, I think, administered justice with satisfaction to the community. I have never been able to understand why District Court Judges, whose duties are very onerous, should not be placed on a footing of perfect independence. We know that in this colony, as well as in some of the other colonies, the Government have been brought into conflict with private citizens, and it is very well said that justice should not only be administered free from what may be termed partiality, but free from the appearance of partiality. When the Government are brought into conflict with private citizens I think the Judges should be absolutely free, so that there should be no possible control moving them to give judgment in a case except on its merits. I entirely agree with the honourable gentleman when he says that the amount of work performed by the District Court Judges, as well as by the Magistrates, is not only very considerable, but is much in excess in importance of that discharged by the Judges of the Supreme Court. I think the Government should take immediate steps to place the District Court Judges on the same footing as the Supreme Court Judges, and I regret that this was not done last session in reference to the Stipendiary Magistrates. With regard to the remuneration of District Court Judges, of course I am not prepared to express any opinion, because if persons choose to accept a position of that kind with the salary attached to it they have no reason to complain. If the salary is insufficient, the public, apart from the Judge, are interested in seeing that men of ability are placed on the bench, and that can only be secured by proper remuneration being paid. I believe that one Judge either petitioned the Legislature this session or intended to do so to have the tenure of office put on a more satisfactory footing; and I think that, in this colony as well as in others, it is of the utmost importance that the judicature should be on the most independent footing possible. I shall have much pleasure in supporting the motion.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Sometimes these officers take office without knowing the amount of duties they will have to perform. They take the position at a very low salary, but subsequently find the work they have to perform is far beyond the income they are receiving. Very likely that has been the case of the Judge who petitioned the House the other day. He probably found that his work was so great and his salary so small that he was justified in making the application.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—I am glad the honourable gentleman has brought this question forward, if it is only to get a vote of the Council upon it. At this late stage of the session we cannot expect that anything will be done, but I think it is satisfactory that the Council should express its opinion that the liberty of the subject depends upon the independence of the Courts of justice. There is no reason that the tenure of office should not be the same in the case of the District as of the Supreme Court. It was said by Burke that the whole complex machinery of the British Constitution was a machinery to get twelve honest men into a jury-box. What he meant, of course, was that the liberty of every one depended upon the independence of the Courts. I am glad this opportunity is given to the Council to express its opinion on the subject.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I have great pleasure in supporting the motion, and think it is of the greatest importance that our Stipendiary Magistrates and District Court Judges should be totally independent of Government control. They have certain judicial functions to fulfil, and if it is suspected that they do not fulfil them properly or are under coercion by the Government of the day the Courts of justice will lose public confidence. With regard to the second part of the motion, I think we must admit that the salaries of the Stipendiary Magistrates, and also of the District Judges, are far too low. I think £450 has been quoted by the Hon. Mr. MacGregor: that is not sufficient for any District Judge. At that salary no man who is qualified to fill that position could possibly be got in the colony to fulfil his duties satisfactorily. He would be kept constantly worrying himself as to how he could support his family. This should not be. A Judge's mind should be entirely free to attend to his duties, instead of continually having his mind unduly taken up with financial anxiety how to keep out of debt and maintain his house. This applies also to Stipendiary Magistrates, who have to keep up a certain position, and ought to be looked up to by the public. I trust that the Government will give favourable consideration to the motion, and that the matter will be attended to during the recess.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—The Hon. Mr. MacGregor in his motion implies that justice has not been impartially and fearlessly administered in the past, and therefore I think it is a reflection on District Court Judges and the Stipendiary Magistrates. That is the inference, to my mind. I think the District Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates of New Zealand are too high-spirited and independent and intelligent men to be influenced by any consideration, whether they occupy their position during good behaviour or during the pleasure of the Executive. I do not think this would make any difference whatever in the administration of their functions. It has been stated that District Judges receive from £900 to £500 a year. I am not prepared to say whether this is a proper salary for a man occupying that position or not; I should have no objection to raise the amount if it were considered necessary to do so; but what I take the greatest exception to is maintaining the Magistrates in office for all time during ability and good behaviour. I know, in my part of the country, in regard to the Magistrates for Reefton, Grey-mouth, Hokitika, and Ross, some have been dispensed with through want of business, and I think that two Magistrates are now doing the work of the whole Coast. If in other districts the population fell off, and business fell off, the Executive would have no power to remove the Magistrates. They would have to keep them on with their high salaries until they had committed some fault, or until they were too old to administer their duties. I think, therefore, it would be better that this motion should not be proceeded with. As I have stated before, I cannot see that the tenure of office will make any difference to the class of men who occupy these positions now. If their salaries are found to be inadequate, let them be increased. If we look round we shall find many men in the employ of Government, occupying the highest and the lowest positions, who are underpaid. Even the Ministers of the country are receiving, I believe, no larger salaries than some of their Under-Secretaries. I think that, if we consider that these men are receiving too little, their salaries should be increased, and to those who are receiving only a few shillings a day a little more should be given, so that they may be able to live comfortably.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, this opens up a very large question, and I am not at all sorry that my honourable and learned friend has brought the motion forward. In the first place, I should like to say one word in regard to the insinuation made by the Hon. Mr. Reynolds, in saying that Magistrates ought to be independent of the control of the Government. Let me ask that honourable gentleman if, during his experience, he has ever known the Government to interfere in the administration of justice, or if any Government would dare to do anything of the kind. These men have accepted these positions, and they knew perfectly well what they were doing; and it is not from this or from any Government that they are receiving their salaries. They accepted office with a full knowledge of their responsibilities and duties. I have had some experience with regard to some of these Magistrates, and I am bound to say that in some cases they are inadequately paid for the work they do. Some, I am sorry to say, are not exactly what you would expect. They have administered justice to the best of their ability, but they are out of date; and to continue these men in office "during good behaviour" would be an outrage on the colony. I will not refer to any one in particular. We all agree that there can be no doubt whatever that one of the greatest bulwarks of our liberty is the pure administration of justice. My honourable friend referred to Stipendiary Magistrates with extended jurisdiction, and District Court Judges, but I go further and say that there are no harder-worked men than the Supreme Court Judges, or any men who are worse paid for their work.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—My honourable friend seems to doubt; but let him look at the Chief Justices in Australia: their salary is more than double that of our Chief Justice, and I undertake to say that our men are quite as good as any Judges in any part of Her Majesty's dominions. The question of the status of the District Judges involves a large question of policy. I am of opinion, and I have held that opinion for a long time, that the time is fast approaching when we should do away with our District Judges altogether; and when we give extended jurisdiction to superior men we shall have no necessity for District Judges. The Stipendiary Magistrates whom we hope to obtain will be sufficient to carry out the important work, and the Supreme Court will be able to perform its functions with far greater ease. My natural inclination has for some time been to try to secure for the large centres trained lawyers as Stipendiary Magistrates, and if we get these men at reasonable salaries I should be in favour of the abolition of the District Courts. We have been fortunate in securing one or two, and I am sure the Council will know to whom I refer. Nothing could be better than the way in which their duties have been performed, particularly by one man. I think, myself, the question is one of very great importance, and requires very serious consideration, and I am quite satisfied that none of these men—I mean, of those who are suitable for extended jurisdiction—is anything like adequately paid. But before we can increase their salaries in the present position of affairs I think, at any rate, we ought to have superior men. I am entirely in sympathy with the motion, but it is one that requires far greater consideration than the passing of a resolution in this Council.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I wish to explain that I did not accuse the present Government, or any other Government, of exercising any jurisdiction over the District Judges or Stipendiary Magistrates. If the honourable gentlemen, however, thinks that the cap fits, by all means let him put it on.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—This is a subject which may be treated from two different points of view. The honourable gentleman says, to begin with, that he thinks the District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates should be independent of Government control. There are very few who will not agree with him, provided that they are carefully selected. I differ from my honourable friend the Attorney-General, who says that he thinks the Stipendiary Magistrates should be trained lawyers. I think the most successful Magistrates we have had in the colony have not been trained lawyers. I need not go much further than my honourable friend opposite, Mr. Bowen; the present Stipendiary Magistrate at Christchurch; the present Stipendiary Magistrate at Dunedin, Dr. Giles; and many others, with whose names the Council will be familiar, who have quite satisfied the public, and who have done very useful work. The second point is as to salaries. I do not think that in this Council we can very well afford to express any very distinct opinion on that subject, because we cannot do anything effective. What is the use of saying that these men are inadequately paid, when we cannot adequately pay them? Of course, as a mere matter of opinion, I do not think that they are sufficiently paid. I think it was a very shameful thing reducing the salary of the Governor, and I think the Ministers of the colony are disgracefully paid, and I think more consideration should be paid to the Judges of the Supreme Court. I am also inclined to think that we have reduced the salaries of some of our most valuable Civil servants to an absurd sum. When pinching off these few thousands a year, and giving little sums away for roads and bridges, we are quite forgetting that far more important than any roads and bridges is the proper administration of justice, and of the government of the colony. With the honourable gentleman, I shall be glad to see these gentlemen better paid; but, on the other hand, they suffer with a great many people who do work which they are not adequately paid for. But, as regards the first part of the honourable gentleman's speech, that brings me to another subject. The Attorney-General asked just now what Government had ever interfered with the District Judges. It was not so long ago—it will be in the memory of a great many members—that the Government did interfere in the grossest manner with a District Court Judge, and if it had not been for the action of this Council I doubt if he would have been on the bench to-day.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—It was not this Government.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I never said it was this Government; but the honourable gentleman asked if any Government had done so. I say it has been shown that a Government could do that, and what has been done once may be done again. I say, at all events, that District Judges ought to be entirely beyond the control of the Government of the day; and, assuming that the Government is to give extended jurisdiction to the most valuable of the Stipendiary Magistrates, I say these Magistrates should be made as independent as possible. It is pitiable to see to what extent at this moment Stipendiary Magistrates find themselves compelled by the circumstances of their position to waive their own opinions and to do things they really ought not to do. I must say it would be for the benefit of the whole community if, at all events in large places, where the interests are greater, the Stipendiary Magistrates were made as independent as possible of political influence: and they are certainly not to-day. I do not say there has been any interference with them. I do not wish to say anything offensive to the honourable gentleman; but for a number of years—pretty nearly a generation of time—I have watched the actions of gentlemen holding these positions, and I absolutely know that they have very often been constrained to act as they would not have willingly acted because they were afraid of offending the Government; and offending the Government in these days means offending a person who may be very humble, but for the moment has a little political influence, and the sort of way in which this person is supposed to state the merits or demerits of an official is a matter of serious consideration to those who hold these appointments. I shall vote for the honourable gentleman's motion; but the question of salaries we cannot interfere with. I have no objection to say that their salaries ought to be increased; but we might say so from now till ten years hence, and it would make no difference unless the temper of the country altered. It is all very well to say that Civil servants get certain salaries; but their salaries are continually being reduced. I have in my mind a gentleman who for twenty years has been serving the Government in one of these positions, and his salary is £150 less than it was twenty years ago. Taking amounts of £50 here and there off these public servants has the worst possible effect, and I do think it is anything but beneficial to the administrative service that it should continue. I have seen the thing going on continually for years and years, and therefore I should be very happy if the resolution of my honourable friend were carried, if to a certain extent it should have the effect of making these officers more independent than they are at present.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—While keeping steadily in view the interests of these judicial officers, we ought not to lose sight of the effect on the pockets of the taxpayers. With regard to adequate salaries, what is an adequate salary? Some persons with double the amounts these gentlemen receive would not consider them adequate; and in considering these special cases we must also consider the whole of the Civil servants, and whether those who hold equally responsible positions are getting adequate salaries. This is a very large question indeed, and I do not see, myself, what particular good would follow from our passing a resolution of this sort. It is a question of money, and one that would be more appropriately dealt with by the other branch of the Legislature. With regard to the position of these officers, it is said that their dependent positions must affect their decisions, and that they cannot act fairly and impartially. To my mind, that is a most unfair reflection to cast upon these officers. The mere fact of increasing a man's salary does not make him a better Judge: that depends on the quality of his mind. Some men with very small salaries may be better Judges than those getting larger ones. It is simply a question of the intellectual capacity and fitness of the man. And a Judge requires more than a technical knowledge of the law: he requires a judicial mind and common-sense, which many men who hold high technical qualifications do not possess. Look at the position we should be placed, in supposing this were given effect to. A man is appointed for life; we cannot dismiss him, and we cannot reduce his salary. We may have to do away with the office, and we cannot do so without giving him an equally highly-paid position, or else giving him very large compensation. If this question is to be dealt with at all it should be dealt with in a general way. These gentlemen took office knowing what salary they would get, and I think they had no reason to complain, unless the Government have not kept faith with them. If any injustice has been done to any particular officer I should be glad to afford redress; but, in increasing the salaries of these officers and appointing them for life, we must bear in mind the circumstances of other officers, the financial condition of the colony, and the large number of persons living in the colony whose incomes have been reduced by the low price of produce.

The Hon. Mr. FELDWICK.—I do not propose to address myself to the resolution at all, because the question is one upon which, after listening to all the arguments, the Council will be very glad to avoid coming to any decision. I therefore move "the previous question."

The Council divided on the question, "That the question be now put."

AYES, 19.

Bonar	Montgomery	Shrimski
Bowen	Morris	Stewart
Buckley	Oliver	Swanson
Grace	Ormond	Whitmore
Kenny	Reynolds	Whyte
MacGregor	Richardson	Williams.
Mantell

NOES, 13.

Acland	Jennings	McLean
Barnicoat	Kelly	Peacock
Bolt	Kerr	Pharazyn
Feldwick	McCullough	Rigg.
Jenkinson

Majority for, 6.

Motion agreed to.

The Council divided on the question, "That the resolution be agreed to."

AYES, 25.

Acland	McLean	Shrimski
Barnicoat	Montgomery	Stewart
Bonar	Morris	Swanson
Bowen	Oliver	Taiaroa
Buckley	Ormond	Walker, L.
Grace	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Kenny	Reynolds	Whyte
MacGregor	Richardson	Williams.
Mantell

NOES, 8.

Baillie	Kelly	Peacock
Feldwick	Kerr	Rigg.
Jenkinson	McCullough

Majority for, 17.

Resolution agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 171.—Government to make crossings to give access to lands.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved the following addition to the clause: "Provided that not more than one crossing may be demanded in respect of each property, unless the frontage to such property to the railway exceeds one mile in length, in which case one crossing shall, on the application of the owner of such property, be given for each mile of frontage; but no additional crossing or crossings need be given in the event of the land being, or having been, subdivided after the construction of the railway."

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK moved, as an amendment, That the words "one mile" be struck out, and "sixty chains" inserted in lieu thereof.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 22.

Acland	Buckley	Kelly
Bolt	Feldwick	Kerr
Bowen	Jenkinson	McCullough

McLean	Reynolds	Stewart
Montgomery	Richardson	Swanson
Oliver	Rigg	Taiaroa
Ormond	Shrimski	Williams.
Pharazyn

NOES, 3.

Barnicoat Mantell Peacock.

Majority for, 19.

Words retained, and proviso added to clause.

Bill reported, and read the third time.

The Council adjourned at five minutes to five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 16th October, 1894.

First Readings—Midland Railway Contract Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Railways Authorisation Bill, Westport-Ngawau Railway Extension Bill.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CONTRACT BILL.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, there is a great amount of interest being taken in the measure which I now ask the House to consider. The Government, in this Bill, ask the House to deal with a most complicated and difficult question. There are very few members of the House now who were here at the time the construction of the Midland Railway was first mooted, and it will be necessary for me to give a brief history of what led to the proposals being made, and of the formation of the company and the initiation of the work. First of all, I may say that in 1884 there was found to be great necessity for making some provision for the tourist traffic, and a connection between the east and west coast. One of the principal reasons was that a produce- and mineral-carrying railway was required, so as to bring from the west coast to the east our coal, timber, and other products, taking back from Canterbury its products, and at the same time facilitating a closer communication in the way of traffic generally. A Commission was appointed, and that Commission reported upon this work—as to its payable character and other details—and an Act was passed giving power for a contract to be made. A contract was made, and representatives of the syndicate were sent to the Old Country. A company was formed upon their representation, supported as it was by the documentary evidence, and by the report of the Commissioners, and the other information which had been collected by the representatives of the syndicate who were sent Home. This contract was entered into, and in it there was the alternate-block-of-land system, which was that by the State giving one-half the value of the construction of the line increased value would be given to the alternate blocks, and the State would be repaid for the land that it had given away. I think nothing would explain the position better than the position of that case, with its several divisions, we see upon the table of the House. That marked "a" would belong to the company, "b" would belong to the Crown, "c" to the company, "d" to the Crown, and so alternately the blocks of land would be laid off, each alternate block within a fifteen-mile limit being given to the company. That was in the first Act—that of 1884. Subsequently, when the new contract came to be made, it was found that there had been a serious omission in the first Act, inasmuch as by the alternate-block system the colony had given inferentially the right to select large areas of auriferous land; but, while the alternate-block system was a perfectly right thing to be permitted, it simply meant that some of the gold-workings would be included in the alternate blocks, and to have allowed this would have been against the public interest. The company under the first contract might, in my opinion, have selected tracts of country upon which the colony has spent large sums of money in water-races and other goldfields works. There was at the same time a disadvantage to the company even in the alternate-block system on the east coast. For it would have had to take the land along the railway first, and this land was of very inferior quality. When the second Bill came before the House, under which the second contract was framed, then the alternate-block-of-land system was abandoned, and the company was given power to take land within the area and to make their own selection; and in respect to the lands on the west coast they had the right to deal with timber, but had no right to interfere in any shape or form with mining operations. Of course there was a good deal of communication between the colony and the company, and, to my mind, the company had the best of the bargain. That is my impression, and I do not think there is any doubt about it. At the same time, had the company adhered to the original contract I have no hesitation in saying that the colony would have had to come to the rescue, and to take such steps as would have prevented the company from securing the auriferous lands which were within the fifteen-mile limit. Otherwise there would have been a serious conflict as between the miners and the company, and as between the Government and the company. Under the circumstances the Legislature stepped in and altered the law, and the new contract was entered into. Very well. As time went on the company proceeded with the work of constructing the line from Brunnerton to Reefton, and it completed that line, which is a very good line indeed, and, I think, is paying fairly well, and has been a great boon to the West Coast. The company also proceeded to construct what is known as the east coast connection—that is, commencing at Stillwater, and going via Lake Brunner and Jackson's, and at the other end from Springfield to Paterson's Creek. The line has been finished to Paterson's Creek at the Christchurch end, and as far as Jackson's at the west coast end of the line, and that shortens the distance somewhat between the east and the west coast. I may say in the construction of the line from Stillwater to Jackson's the company asked the colony to permit a deviation. The deviation diverted the line from the west to the east side of Lake Brunner. The company claimed that the deviation would cost no more to construct, that it would be no longer, and that the grades upon it would be much better than they would have been on the originally surveyed line. Parliament, in its wisdom, thought fit to permit this; and I considered Parliament made a serious mistake. I opposed that deviation, as I thought the original line ought to have been maintained; and I think so still. However, Parliament thought fit to grant the deviation, and the line now constructed is upon that deviation. It was found that that construction did not cost less—it cost more—and when it was constructed it was found to be longer than the original would have been. It certainly taps a little good land, but that land is not Crown land; and at the same time I believe myself, as a tourist line, the beauties of the lake would have been seen better from the west branch, and the line is now deprived of that advantage. As a mineral-carrying line also I do not think myself it is in any way a better line. But what I urged then, and what I urge now, is this: that the breaking of the original contract then, over that deviation, gives the company some justification, in my opinion, to claim an extension of time, because Parliament knew that it would require to be surveyed, and in the laying-off and surveying of the old line everything was prepared, and the work could have gone on. Now, Parliament having said that a deviation was to be granted, and the deviation having been made, I am of opinion that the company has a reasonable claim to an extension of time, owing to Parliament having sanctioned the deviation to which I refer.

Sir R. STOUT.—When did they agree?

Mr. SEDDON.—In 1890 there was an Act passed, and you will see there the conditions upon which this was granted. The company, I may say, for the concession, spent some two thousand and odd pounds in constructing a road so as to give connection between the railway, Lake Brunner, and the lower part of Westland. They were also bound to place a steamer on the lake. That was the concession granted to the colony in connection with this deviation, and I think that concession was a reasonable one. The company complied fairly with what was stipulated, and there was an end to that transaction. We then come to another question, and that is the question of the tunnel which was to be made at the Otira Gorge, or the Abt system. It was found on examination that, from the nature of the country through which the railway had to go, the tunnel would be very expensive to construct, the country being exceedingly broken. Then came the question as to whether the construction would stand, and that was a somewhat difficult question to decide. Of course, the slides that took place there made it hard to say what the effect might be in some of those narrow points, and there was also the question of the Abt system, and the question of putting the line on a lower level than the tunnel. However, these are matters of detail which were settled by engineers to whom the matter was referred. The fact, at all events, is that representations were made to the Government prior to the signing of the contract, as I have already mentioned. This was a change that was expected to arise, and provision therefore was made accordingly. The company submitted their proposals to the Government, and the Government took the advice of the best engineers they could get—the matter was submitted to Mr. Maxwell, the late Commissioner of Railways; and ultimately the Abt system was approved. In this, great delay took place on account of the company having to make new surveys, which took a very considerable time. However, this was done; but, having made the change from the tunnel and from the original plans to the Abt system, the question comes in as to whether or not the company could on these grounds claim an extension of time. I simply refer to it for the purpose of showing to the House the position. I am not advising the House to do anything but take a common-sense view. From some experience I have had in regard to contracts I look upon these questions that have been submitted to Ministers as leading to the further question whether under the circumstances they would be in a position to refuse an extension of time. But then, I say, 12.0. it goes beyond the Minister. There are conditions in the contract that would go beyond the Government altogether. I refer to certain matters which, in case of dispute, are to be referred to arbitration, and I know that in cases of arbitration the Government always goes to the wall.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The company have asked for it.

Mr. SEDDON.—I have no doubt the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs has not the slightest doubt that, failing a satisfactory settlement, the company will claim all the rights and everything which can be claimed within the terms of the contract. At all events, the Abt system was conceded. The company went on with its work, and finished the line as far as Jackson's. I may say that at this stage the company's funds were exhausted, and they applied to Parliament for a concession and for a new contract. The company have not kept anything back from the Government. They have been very open to the colony, and have told the colony their financial position. A most unfortunate position it is, I say, for the company. Circumstances, of course, at the initiation were very much against them—what they had to pay for raising their money and not having in the first instance sufficient capital. However, the fact remained that when they had taken the line to Jackson's they could proceed no further. They then appealed to the colony. The demands first made, I need scarcely repeat, were such as could not be entertained by the colony. I think the lowest amount asked for the construction of the line from Paterson's Gully up to Jackson's was some three-quarters of a million. Last session the House went into this matter. The whole matter was referred to the Public Accounts Committee, and the Committee went very fully into it. If honourable members will look at the evidence they will see what was claimed by the company, and they will see on what grounds it was claimed. They will see how these claims were met. Ultimately the Committee reported that debentures in lieu of land-grants should be offered, and that the original contract should be maintained—that was, including the Nelson connection. The company were to construct the whole of the lines of railway mentioned in the original contract, but at the same time they were to receive debentures in lieu of land-grants. That was the position taken up by Parliament last session. These conditions were offered to the company. If honourable members look at the correspondence they will find that the decision of the House was communicated to the company, and the company replied to that communication. The difference this session is that the company have asked to be relieved from making what is known as the Motueka-Reefton connection. I may say on that point that, that being a departure from what was recommended by the House last session, the Government had to satisfy itself first as to whether or not the company had made every reasonable effort to raise sufficient money to complete the whole contract in terms of the recommendations of the House last session. After that inquiry, I say here, knowing as I do every detail in connection with the company and its financial position and what it has offered to do, that it is not in a position to carry out the original contract and to construct the Motueka-Reefton Section, thus completing the Nelson connection. For me to formulate and to support this Bill, leaving out as it does the Nelson connection, after what I have done, and after what has been done in reference to this railway, I say is a most painful thing—it is almost a humiliating position to be placed in. There were the hopes and expectations of the people of Nelson and Reefton as to that connection; they have waited for it for years. They have had no settlement going on, and they have had very little expenditure taking place—only some £60,000 odd. Now suddenly we are called upon to ask Parliament to agree to the abandonment, at all events for the time being, of that communication. I say this: that, notwithstanding that it is painful for me to have to do it, I look upon it simply as a matter of duty—that, under the extraordinary circumstances in which we are placed, duty compels me to advise the course which I am advising. In the proposals, I may say, the Nelson-Reefton connection is not altogether abandoned:

Mr. Seddon

it is left open for further negotiation, and there is a completion at all events to one point, which will shorten the distance between Reefton and Nelson—I refer to the completion of the line to a point at Norris's Gully. In this line you will have a workable piece of line, upon which an expenditure of £90,000 has taken place, and that is all that the good people of Nelson will receive for having their land-settlement stopped for ten years. So far as they are concerned, for some years to come there will be nothing done. Further, there is this to be taken into consideration: The company is not in a position to do it, as it cannot get the money. It may be argued, and will be argued, that as regards the land-grants that portion of the line has received less, proportionately, than other portions of the line. The expenditure on the other end of the line would be greater; and what weighs with me, and what weighed with the Government, is this fact: that the amounts to be paid are fixed by the original contract, and are scheduled, so that it cannot be said that you can fairly claim in that respect that the company should not receive the amount so fixed. Now, the amounts are fixed in a schedule, and the company claim to have received a profit on the land, and, so far, their transactions show that they did receive a profit on the land granted, but when the thing is completed to a larger amount I question very much whether there will be a very large profit to them. However, that is the position, I think, put very fairly in this respect. The next part is the Bill that is now before the House, and what has led to the Bill being introduced. I may say that the company notified the Government that they could not complete the whole line, but that they were prepared to complete the connection between Paterson's Creek and Jackson's on certain terms. They asked that £618,000, by way of debentures, should be lodged with the Public Trustee, and stated that this amount would pay interest for fourteen years at the rate of 4 per cent. on the £1,250,000 required to complete the line between these two points, and which said amount the company are in a position to raise.

Mr. BUTTON.—Would that open it to Springfield?

Mr. SEDDON.—That completes the line from Brunnerton to Springfield. It is urged that this £618,000 would pay more than 4 per cent. for more than fourteen years on the £1,250,000. A computation was made showing that if the sum were lodged immediately it would do so. But if honourable members will look at the Bill they will find that we have not agreed to that. Under section 5 the company first of all, within two years, has to complete the line to Norris's Gully, and I may say that after that completion we pay nothing at all upon it. After it is completed it is to be handed over to the colony without payment of anything whatever. That is practically giving to the colony what has cost the company about £60,000. Out of the amount already spent we have given away in land-grants land to the value of £30,000, so that we may say we shall receive in round numbers about £60,000 of what has been spent by the company after they have completed the line. We shall be told, probably, that we are getting a line which it will not pay the company to work. I admit that it will not pay the company to work it, but I say, with our railway staff at the Nelson end, the colony can work it without any extra cost whatever. It will also bring trade to the other Government railway, and will shorten the distance to Reefton. In that respect it will be a great advantage to the colony, and we are therefore getting a concession in the company handing over that constructed piece of line free of cost. Then, as regards the line from Jackson's to Springfield, the company is, in lieu of land-grants, to receive 34-per-cent. debentures to the value of £618,250. I wish honourable members to mark this: that the debentures are to be issued and delivered as follows:—

“(d.) Such debentures shall be issued and delivered as follows: Debentures to the value of two hundred thousand pounds within one year from the date of the new contract, and debentures to the value of a further sum of two hundred thousand pounds within two years from the same date, and debentures to the value of two hundred and eighteen thousand two hundred and fifty pounds upon the said railway between Springfield and Jackson's being completed and opened for traffic:

“Provided, however, that no delivery of debentures shall take place as aforesaid until at least one-fourth of the total amount or value of the works to be completed by the company under the new contract are so completed in terms of such contract; nor shall the second delivery of debentures (to the value of a further sum of two hundred thousand pounds) be made until works to the value of at least one-half of the whole of the works agreed to be completed shall have been completed by the company as aforesaid.”

Honourable members will therefore see that the objections raised to lodging debentures for the benefit of the company in the first instance have been met, and that the present proposed arrangements are in favour of the colony; because, if you divide £1,250,000 by 4, you will see that you are getting more than the value of the works done by the company; and then we have a safeguard, in regard to the expenditure on the work constructed, to the value of the debentures. Not only that, but you will see that the moneys you give will not give them more than 4 per cent. for the fourteen years claimed in the way that we propose to give this money. I make this clear in order to meet the arguments used outside, because it is said that we are asking to give more money to the company than they in the first instance stated was required. If this money had been lodged—this £618,000—immediately after the contract was signed it would have paid more in fourteen years than 4 per cent. Lodging the debentures as now proposed would not pay more than 4 per cent.—in fact, it is under. I hope I have made that clear to honourable members, because it is a point that has been raised, and it might be raised again. The next question, after having placed the contract fairly before the House, is, What are the advantages that can be claimed for the colony for conceding what we are conceding by the present proposals? I say the question of encouraging tourist traffic by the construction of this line has greater weight to-day than when the Stout-Vogel Government agreed to construct the line; and every argument that was then used by what was known as the Canterbury party—and at that time they were a united and formidable band—every argument then used stands quite as good to-day, and indeed has greater force, because as the years roll on there is greater advantage to this colony from the tourist traffic, New Zealand is being better known with regard to its capabilities, its scenery, and its position by tourists. Its advantages have been taken further afield, and by these means there is much indirect advantage. I may say that not only to Canterbury and the West Coast is there an advantage as regards the tourist traffic, but the Otago scenery on the West Coast is known world-wide. In addition there is the North Island scenery, the Rotorua geysers, and the other class of scenery which we have in the North Island, and tourists who come to New Zealand to see the scenery on the West Coast would assuredly pay the North Island a visit. I do not think there is a single person in this House who will not admit the great advantage to the colony of fostering and encouraging tourist traffic. There is another phase of the question, as regards the carrying of mineral products and timber, and the advantage of the connection between the east and west coasts. I say that it will be a great advantage. There are parts of Canterbury, and other parts of the South Island, that would be fed directly from the coal-mines. The argument that we have now harbours and shipping competing against the railways successfully might obtain as against the North and some parts of the South Island, but, as regards Canterbury, and right down to Oamaru, I say that the coal put direct into the trucks from the mines could be taken at a payable price and landed at the places I have indicated. In that respect the arguments in favour of the line are as sound as the day the proposal was first made. There is also another advantage which might be gained, and that is this: If it was wise to make railway connection between Otago and Canterbury this proposed connection between the West Coast and Canterbury would have greater force; if it was wise to construct a line between Wellington and Auckland, then I say it applies with equal force that the east coast of the Middle Island should be connected with the west coast. Then, there is also to be taken into consideration that there will be work found for two thousand men. We have at the present time a steady drain from the colony, and I am compelled to admit it. We lost one hundred and forty-four of our population last month, more than what came to the colony. If there is anything that pains me more than another it is that, while we have such a beautiful country as this, which offers so many opportunities to our people, we should be losing our population. If you will only pass this Bill, and let this company go to work. I say that the Otira Gorge will be a second Coolgardie. It will stop men from leaving us with their few pounds, their stout hearts, and their bone and muscle, for they are going now away to make Australia; and I say if you pass this Bill they will stop in the colony. Wellington would receive an advantage from the construction of this line. And every representative in this House will agree that it is a great loss to the colony for us to be losing our population. When work is to be given to the unemployed by the expenditure of this £2,500,000, I venture to say that there is not a man in this House who should oppose the finding of work for these toilers. I say that the farmers and producers of Canterbury and other parts of the colony would benefit by the work being put in hand. They are getting extremely low prices for all kinds of produce. There is nothing more profitable than markets near home, and the effect of having two thousand men at work to feed with their own products would prove a great advantage to the unfortunate farmers of Canterbury, who have been suffering for some years past. That may be regarded as a small matter by some members of the House, but if they put half the money earned by the men into Canterbury it would prove very beneficial to the farmers. I claim this also as of paramount importance, not only to that district but to the whole colony: that if we fix the matter on the lines laid down in this Bill it means that we shall set free five million acres of Crown lands for settlement purposes.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The land is useless.

Mr. SEDDON.—I say the land is not useless. I say there is a large tract of land in Canterbury; there is a large tract of land in Nelson; and a large tract of land south of Westland, known as the Whanganui Flats, from about ten miles below Ross, right down almost to Okarito, which is as good grazing-land as you can get in any part of the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You want a roof over it.

Mr. SEDDON.—We do not want a roof over it. There are other places that require roofing nearer home. If some honourable members were to go and see the grass on those lands to which I have referred to they would say that there was no better land than that about the Whanganui Flats, almost to Mount Hercules, and that this land is capable of maintaining a large population. During the last ten years the settlement on the West Coast has been almost stopped; and five million acres would be set free if this Bill were passed. The people of Nelson, Canterbury, and Westland have had land locked up for the last ten years, and they are only asking now in this Bill that the land should be set free; and that is one of the advantages that I claim under the present proposal. It is not fair nor just to those in that part of the colony that Parliament should refuse to allow this land to be set free for settlement purposes. Now we will take the alternative. I said in my speech that an extension of time would be claimed. I gave the reason why, for I know that the company will claim—in fact, it has already claimed—an extension of time, and, as I told the House, if the matter goes to arbitration I am almost confident that the extension of time will be conceded.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. SEDDON.—Because of the alterations that have been made in the contract. There are the deviation and the Abt system.

Sir R. STOUT.—That is not an alteration.

Mr. SEDDON.—Why, from the fact of the company coming to Parliament and petitioning Parliament, and from the fact that we have this year discussed and last year discussed this matter, and that concessions have been made pending further proposals, if the question went to arbitration on that ground alone we might reasonably expect that the company would succeed in obtaining some consideration. Sitting on these benches and dealing with this question, in which the honour of the colony is concerned, I say that if we deal harshly with the company, and do not give them fair concessions, we shall injure the good name of New Zealand. I for one will not be a party to that. The names of the gentlemen connected with this company in London, and of those who went to London to float the company, are those of well-known men; and after the position taken up, supported as it is by documents and evidence, I say that it would seriously affect the credit of the colony if the Government did not give the company fair treatment. That is my contention.

12.30. Well, then, there may be—we will say that probably there will be—an extension of time granted; there will be a greater or less concession given in the way of extension of time. If, on the other hand, an extension of the contract time were refused, and the Government commenced to deal with the land, what would follow then? An appeal to the Supreme Court for an injunction to prevent the colony from dealing with the land within the area.

Sir R. STOUT.—How can they get an injunction against the Crown?

Mr. SEDDON.—Well, I am not so well versed in law as the honourable member; but, at all events, there is a contract in existence, and the land for the time being is kept from being dealt with by the Crown. Government cannot sell or lease, except for mining purposes, an acre of land within the contract area until such time as the company has done its work, and then they can claim their land-grants on the land-certificates.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What if they do not do their work?

Mr. SEDDON.—If they do not do their work all things must come to an end, and, I suppose, so will this contract; but it would not come to an end if there was any reasonable ground for an extension of time, and to commence to deal with lands as though the contract had expired wholly by effluxion of time must inevitably lead to litigation, and damages would be claimed. That is what I contend. Now we come to the question of litigation as between the company and the Government. We have had in the history of the colony litigation on contracts. The litigation on the Brogden claims will probably not soon be forgotten; and in that matter what had the colony to pay?

Mr. Seddon

An Hon. MEMBER.—It won.

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes, it won; but what did it cost us, and what would this cost? Members should look at it from a reasonable standpoint, and if possible litigation should be avoided. Then, supposing the company had completed its work on the land-grant system, we should be bound to give the full value in land, no matter if it took the five million acres, and I believe on a fair reading of the contract the Government will have to modify the price in the schedule till the company has practically got the £618,000 in land. If I were bringing in a Bill for the first time to the House to agree to such terms as these now before us the House would no doubt reject it, but we must take the position as we find it, and it is simply a variation of the contract made in 1884 and 1888, which has been several times amended, and now we come to a final arrangement, which will, in my opinion, if granted, settle once and for all this very difficult question. Now, I say there is an objection, and I ask, where is that objection coming from, and what is underneath and behind it? I have heard it said by honourable members, "Why should the Midland Company contract be entered into? If we can knock out these proposals, and keep Canterbury, Otago, and Auckland together, we are bound to force the construction of the Otago Central Railway and the completion of the North Island Trunk. The Canterbury people must go with us, and we will have a good big loan." These were the arguments used. I do not think the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs will deny that he is favourable to the purchase of the Manawatu Railway, so that when they put the whole of these together there will come about what should be avoided, and what, I say, as far as this colony is concerned, has been a serious blot in the past, for which we are suffering to-day in having to pay the interest on a huge loan for the construction of works out of that loan-money. Now, I say those who are against borrowing, those who are with the Government for a self-reliant, non-borrowing policy, must support this Bill if they are at all consistent. Now, I must repudiate that this is fresh borrowing decidedly and openly—

Mr. ALLEN.—So will New Zealand have to, if we go on like this.

Mr. SEDDON.—I will show the honourable member in a few minutes what has been going on very steadily for the last ten years in other parts of New Zealand, and then, I think, he will admit that great injustice has been done to the parts of the colony more particularly affected by this proposal. I cannot believe for a moment that there are many members here who would desire to inaugurate such a borrowing system of policy as I have described, to bring about advantage to their own particular district by doing a grievous wrong to another part of the colony. I hope there are very few—I hope there are no members in the House who would do this; but I have simply told the House what has been stated to me, and I may say I heard one member make a statement to the effect I have now mentioned. I will now take the comparative expenditure in the several parts of the colony during the time this Midland contract has been proceeding, and will give the figures to the House. I say that if honourable members are open to reason at all, if they are prepared to do what is fair and just, they ought to support the proposals of this Bill. I will take first of all the expenditure out of loan in the provincial district from the 1st of April, 1886, to the 31st March, 1894, and also the value of the land granted in connection with the Midland Railway.

Sir R. STOUT.—Why take 1886?

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member ought to know the time of the contract.

Sir R. STOUT.—The contract was not signed in 1886.

Mr. SEDDON.—Good gracious! A syndicate went Home in connection with the contract authorised by the Act of 1884. The first contract was signed in 1885, and legalised by the Act of 1886; the second contract was made in 1888: thus 1886 is the mean. If I took the expenditure from 1884 it is all the more against you.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—Oh! but it is. I have only gone over the time of the present contract. I have not taken an unreasonable date; but the further I go back the worse it will be for the other provincial districts. I am interrupted by the senior member for Wellington City, perhaps purposely, but I shall give these figures. The Auckland District has had expended out of loan £1,085,813, Hawke's Bay has had £196,871, the Wellington District has had £931,114, Taranaki has had £95,760, Nelson £191,000, Marlborough £91,800, Canterbury £268,173, whilst Westland has had £232,717, and Otago has had £1,053,327. Now, in round numbers, what has been the expenditure out of loan? In Auckland a million, in Wellington £931,000, and in Otago £1,053,000.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—Where is Southland?

Mr. SEDDON.—That is included in Otago. And, now, what has Canterbury had? The total amount by land-grants for the ten years is £184,753. That is all her expenditure on this railway under the land-grants. Nelson has had in value £38,743, and therefore, between the two, there is a little over £200,000 in land, and in Canterbury £268,173 out of loan. The total altogether for Canterbury for the ten years is £452,956, for Auckland a million, for Wellington a million, and for Otago a million. And, again, what have we provided this year on the estimates—the public-works estimates? For Auckland £167,000, for Wellington £147,000, and for Otago £165,000; and all that you propose here, specially during the next two years, is £200,000 for Canterbury, Nelson, and Westland, when the other three provincial districts have—since the Midland Railway contract was entered into—had £3,000,000 sterling out of loan. This £618,000 is to be spread over four years, and that means annually £150,000, while we have on the estimates for this year £167,000 for Auckland, £147,000 for Wellington, and £165,000 for Otago. I say, speaking so far as one can see for the next four years, you will find the same expenditure voted for the other provincial districts; and, this being the case, why in all reason should we refuse to do what is just and fair to those parts of the colony to which this Bill specially applies, which, I say, have suffered for the last ten years? For my part, I will be no party to that, and if honourable members are just they will not refuse to deal out even-handed justice to all parts of the colony, and should not refuse to accept these proposals to carry this Bill, and once for all to end a matter which, if not dealt with now, must lead the colony into great and serious trouble. I feel assured that the honour of this colony is, as it were, at stake in regard to this transaction—that what we are doing is watched very carefully, and that we should not for a moment lightly treat our honour, or allow it to be sullied, and sullied it will be unless we meet the company fully and fairly, and do justice to these parts of the colony, and say in the spirit of honesty it is our duty to open the lands there for settlement—those districts have suffered for the last ten years, and shall suffer no longer.

Sir R. STOUT.—I do not know that I have ever heard a more misleading speech than that delivered this forenoon. It is not only misleading, but I cannot understand how the honourable gentleman makes so many blunders in facts. If he had taken the trouble even to read the short synopsis of the history of the contract which appeared in D.-2 of session 1887 he would not have fallen into so many blunders. Let me, in the short time allowed to me by our wonderful rules, give a short history of how the contract arose. Sir, it was originally intended by the public-works policy—and I am speaking first of the Canterbury Section—that the railway should be made right through the Middle Island; and that railway was proceeded with, and had got up to a certain point in 1881. In 1881, however, a new system of railway-construction was started in New Zealand: that system was called “the land-grant system”; and an Act was passed authorising companies to be formed and to obtain land-grants up to a certain amount. This East and West Coast Railway—though not known then as the East and West Coast Railway, because it was to go by Reefton in a different direction, and join a line to be made from North Canterbury—was included in the schedule to the Bill. Certain railways have been made under that land-grant system. The Manawatu Railway is one, and that was also included in the schedule; but, so far as the land-grant system is concerned, it had been suggested in this colony so far back as 1868, and proposals had been submitted to Parliament for a contract for a railway from Nelson under the land-grant system before the public-works policy was brought down to the House. We come back now to 1884. Negotiations had been going on between several gentlemen for the formation of a railway under the land-grant system of 1881, and an Act was passed in 1884 making certain concessions different from those in the Act of 1881, and, though these concessions did not really amount to very much, there was a difference in the amount of land to be given. Instead of being a third it was to be a half; and it had this great distinction: Under the Act of 1881 the land was to be valued, and it might be valued so low as 1s. an acre. Some of the land included in the five-million limit is not worth 1d. an acre—it is merely glaciers and mountain-tops. However, the minimum price fixed by the Act of 1884 was 10s. an acre, and no land could be valued at less. A contract was drawn up and signed between certain gentlemen residing in Christchurch—Messrs. Chrystall, Scott, and others. They went to London to see if a syndicate would take up their contract; but the syndicate declined to take up the contract unless certain further concessions were made. These further concessions came before the House in 1886, and if honourable members will look at the statute they will see the concessions that were asked and the concessions that were granted. The further concessions that were granted were, first, as to selection—that the lands were to be selected; secondly, as to interest during the contract; running-powers; and a deposit of £150,000 on the assignment of the contract. These were all the concessions that were further granted by the Act of 1886. Then, the honourable member has said that provision was not made in the Acts of 1884 and 1886 to safeguard the goldfields interests.

Mr. SEDDON.—Hear, hear.

Sir R. STOUT.—Provision was made to safeguard the goldfields interest even in the Act of 1884.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Sir R. STOUT.—The honourable member may say “No,” but the Act states this: “No land now used for mining purposes.” That is surely wide enough.

Mr. SEDDON.—That was land which the Law Officers held to be occupied at the time as mining claims.

Sir R. STOUT.—What law does the honourable member refer to?

Mr. SEDDON.—I refer to the advice of the Law Officers.

Sir R. STOUT.—The clause also says, “or which shall be known gold-workings, shall be deemed Crown lands under this Act.” However, so far as the Act of 1884 was concerned, the company would not take up that contract, and so far as the Crown was concerned that contract was practically at an end. Then, under the Act of 1886 another contract was drawn up, and honourable members will find it in D.-2, page 4, of the session of 1887, and in that contract no one can say that mining interests were not safe-guarded. There was provision for reserves in the draft contract of 1887. That contract, as drawn up in 1887, safeguarded the mining interest absolutely. There was no doubt about that; and in the contract there was power, under the Mines Act, to make reserves, and I believe a Proclamation was issued by the honourable member for Tuapeka to that effect. Then, again, this talk of arbitration, I simply say, has been used as a lever to get further concessions. That contract was sent to England, and the company declined to accept it, but they said they would accept it as a basis, and they wanted a further modification, that further modification being that the Abt system should be adopted; and the value of this concession was to them something like £470,000. I am giving the figures of the former Under-Secretary for Public Works, Mr. O'Connor. They asked also that the alternate-block system should be abandoned, which meant a concession to them of £500,000 or £600,000 more. The total of the concessions asked for by them in the new contract of 1888 were worth, I believe, no less than one million. Do honourable members know what the abolition of the alternate-block system meant? Under the alternate-block system they were not allowed to select a single acre within the five millions of the reserves until the alternate blocks had been taken up. The alternate blocks faced the railway, and were to have a one-mile frontage, and extend fifteen miles back, and they were bound to take the steep mountain-sides and glaciers. Much of that land was not worth 1d. an acre. And what then happened? They came to Parliament in 1887; and a further contract was made—in fact, the only contract that has been made by the company. It was made on the 3rd August, 1888. What did that give them? It gave them the right to select land anywhere within the five-mile area they pleased, with the result that they took up the better country, and on the east coast they had magnificent tracts of land, and on the east coast going across the mountain-range they took pastoral land which we know afterwards they were enabled to sell at something like 35 per cent. advance on what it had been valued at when they took it. They picked out the eyes of the land; the land left to them now is bush-land, and the west coast land would take more to road—to make approaches to it—than practically it is worth. The new contract was made, and these enormous concessions were given to them. The Crown has a right to select, I think, 750,000 acres for mining purposes, and out of this area I understand that up to the present only some 300,000 have been selected. What do they want now? They have got this land, they have picked out the eyes of it, and on the land they have sold they have got an advance of 35 per cent., and now they come to the House and say, "We do not want any more land. We want you to give us £618,000 in cash—that is, that you are to buy our rights from us"; and that means that the colony is to raise a loan in London at 3½ per cent. It simply means that we are to buy up what are called their land-rights for £618,000, and we are to set aside altogether the construction of the Nelson end. This is the further concession they ask from the first contract made, and from the second contract made in 1888. That is the difference between the concessions; and we come to this: that the concessions already given to this London company are not less than £1,000,000. Now this new concession is proposed, and we have another half-million. That is what I object to. Why should we allow this company to violate its contract? I say that the honour of the colony is at stake, and that this contract should not be violated. I say the honour of the colony is pledged to this Nelson end just as much as it is to a syndicate in London. Therefore, if we are to keep the honour of the colony, we have a right to say to that company, "Carry out your contract to the letter closely," and to keep them to their contract. That is the way we should perform our part of the contract; but to say that we are to buy them off and make these further concessions—what does this mean? It amounts to the sum of £618,000; and we are to give them that for what? For the making of a line that will not cost more than one million of money, and then the line is not to belong to the colony at all, but to the company. That is, we are to give this company £618,000 to make a million pounds' worth of railway, and then that million pounds' worth of railway is not to belong to us, but to the company. If the original contract had been carried out on the alternate-block-system the result would have been that, instead of giving the land on the east coast, the company would only have had alternate blocks along the line. Now, it is clear that the new contract has given them much more than they would have got under the land-grant system under the Act of 1881. What do they want now? To have money substituted for land; and does the honourable member think that these sharp business-men in London are doing all this for the monetary benefit of the colony? They are doing it for the monetary benefit of themselves, and they know this fact: that they cannot sell the land for anything like £618,000, perhaps not for £300,000. Therefore they ask for further concessions; and where is the question of honour for them? I am amazed that such an argument was advanced here. Then, the Premier said that if we do not do this we shall have a law-suit; but if the honourable gentleman had looked after the honour of the colony as Minister for Public Works, and had performed his part of the contract, he need not have been afraid of a law-suit.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. SEDDON.—I never said I was afraid.

Sir R. STOUT.—Then, if the Premier is not afraid of a law-suit, what is the next thing to appeal to? Arbitration. But the honourable gentleman says the arbitrator may be an unjust man. That is a peculiar notion of arbitration, when the whole of our labour troubles are to be solved by arbitration. This is a question for arbitration, and if the colony has wronged this company of a single farthing the colony ought to pay for it. That is the way we ought to maintain our honour, and we ought not to be afraid to leave it to any arbitrator to arbitrate between the colony and the company; and if the colony has done no wrong—and I do not know that wrong has been done—we need not be afraid of any Court, or of arbitration. The next point made was that under the circumstances we are bound to give them a further extension of time in order to complete the work. How are we bound? So far as the deviation to Lake Brunner is concerned, the Act of 1890, which allowed that deviation to be made, said it was to be read as part of the original contract, and there is no provision in the amended contract which bound the Crown to give the company an extended time to perform the work.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is also in the original contract.

Sir R. STOUT.—There is nothing in the original contract binding. It is left entirely to the discretion of the Crown, and it does not bind the Crown to give a single day's extension of time, and it is not for Parliament to give a single day's extension of time merely because this company is not able to perform its part of the bargain; and I say that any Government that gives a concession to a company that is unable to perform its part of a bargain is not looking after the due interests of the colony. The Premier talks about the lands, and says they must be opened for settlement; but does not this House know that at the end of this year, within two months of now, half of these lands can be opened for settlement? What is to keep them from being opened? If there is no extension of time given the lands can be opened up, and if an extension ought to be given to the company it is a question of negotiation between the company and the Crown, and the Crown should say, "We will give you an extension of time if you allow a certain number of blocks to be opened for settlement."

2.30. Another reason urged by the Premier why we should vote this sum of money to this company is that the tourist traffic ought to be developed. I do not deny that the tourist traffic ought to be developed, but I am not yet aware that it is necessary, in order that the tourist traffic may be developed, that a railway should be made to the West Coast. The Premier spoke about the beauties of the Otira Gorge. Sir, the Buller Gorge, I believe, far exceeds the Otira Gorge in every respect, and, if it is necessary to make a railway for the sake of scenery, then the railway between Reefton and Nelson ought to have been made. I have been through the Otira Gorge, and I have been a number of times through the Buller Gorge. I have also been up the Wanganui River, and have seen the gorge there.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Have you seen the Mokau?

Sir R. STOUT.—No; I have not been to the

Sir R. Stout

Mokau, but I have seen most of the rivers of the colony, and I do not think that any river or any gorge can equal the Buller in its scenery.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The Wanganui River far surpasses it.

Sir R. STOUT.—Well, Sir, I have been more than once up the Wanganui River above the Mango-a-te-ao, and it is no doubt very fine, but I do not think it excels the Buller Gorge. It is absurd, then, to say that we should make this railway for the sake of the tourist traffic. I do not know that the railway would improve the tourist traffic at all. If people wished to see the Otira Gorge, the few tourists we have coming to the colony could go by coach; and, as to aiding the North Island, that appears to me to be a very far-fetched idea. Then, the totals of the public-works expenditure since 1886 in the several provincial districts was given by the Premier, and he stated that very little had been expended in Canterbury. I quite admit that, and the reason is very obvious. Canterbury has had railways made from the north to the south, and did not require any further railway-construction; and it was a most unfair and absurd suggestion to make that the country should judge the making of these railways by the amount of railway money expended since 1886 in the various provincial districts. If you were to go back to the foundation of the colony, that would be a fair thing to do, and to say, even according to the population, what had been spent in the various districts. If that were done I do not think Canterbury would be placed in the unfair position stated by the Premier; and I have yet to learn that in a level country you have to spend as much money in developing the country as you have to do in a mountainous country, which takes a great deal of money to open up. If you take the West Coast—Westland County, for example—it has had more public-works expenditure, according to its population, than any other district in the colony.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Sir R. STOUT.—Yes, more than any other district in the colony; and the reason is obvious. It is a very difficult country indeed in which to construct public works. It has no agricultural lands, and has no products for carriage by railway. It has no wool. It is really a mineral country, and you cannot expect the same results from railways in that country as you can from an agricultural country. There is therefore no argument to be got by quoting these figures. They are also misleading: they only deal with facts since 1886. They do not pretend to be exhaustive, and they are of no value whatever in considering this question. Then, the honourable gentleman says, "Well, if this proposal is not accepted, what are we to do?" Sir, I do not know that it is necessary for us to suggest a counter-proposal if we do not accept this one; but I will tell the honourable gentleman what I think we ought to do: We ought to maintain our contract. That is what we ought to do, and if the company then is unable to fulfil its contract with the colony it will be for the colony to consider what is the next best thing to do. There are a great many things that might be suggested. Why, if this land is so valuable as the honourable gentleman says it is—I do not think it is, but if it is so valuable, why have we not set aside land permanently as an endowment for the making of this railway? I should have no objection to that; and every penny that came out of the land after the surveys had been paid should go to form a fund for the purpose of making this railway. And if the land can be settled on, if it is valuable land and has valuable timber upon it, as I believe it has, considerable royalties might be obtained from the timber. But if it be land suitable for settlement, let it be permanently set aside for the making of this railway. I have no objection whatever to that. But I would ask the House to consider what the giving of this large sum of money means. This colony will have to pay a little over £20,000 a year for all time. That is what it means. If you add this £20,000 a year every year for making the railway, see what a promise you would make. Even when the line is made you will not have the railway in addition to the expenditure of your money—this £618,000; you get nothing in return. It is simply a bonus given for the making of the railway. You have to buy the railway back again, if you wish to get into your own lands, by giving this enormous sum of money to the company. This will not satisfy the company. The company will come to this Parliament again and again, and will demand that this Parliament shall either purchase the line or grant some other concession. Ever since this question has been raised the company has continually been asking for more, and this will not end the asking. Then the honourable gentleman passed on to say that if we do not wish to launch into a big loan to finish the North Island Trunk Railway and the Otago Central Railway, we must allow this railway to be made. His argument was this: The North Island Trunk line must stop where it is, the Otago Central must stop where it is, but this West Coast Railway must go on in the hands of this company. I should have thought that that argument was rather against the work going on, if members are to be influenced by what is going to happen in their own districts. The plain fact from the statement of the Minister is that there need be no loan for the North Island or for the Otago Central—that if you give this line to this company, you will not be troubled with any loans for the future. But I really think the honourable member must have been fooling the House, or else he must have been fooled himself, when he talked about this being a non-borrowing and a self-reliant policy. Why, it is the very opposite of that. This is simply a loan of £618,000 given to a private company to make a railway. And I will ask the House, especially the members of the House who came to this House pledged against borrowing, how can they reconcile their professions with voting for the Bill brought in by the Premier? What does it mean? I am not going back upon what has already been done this session. I am not going to deal with the loans which have already been sanctioned; I am not going to deal with the borrowing that has already been sanctioned this session; and I am not going to point out how the professions of self-reliance and non-borrowing have been cast to the winds. But I ask honourable members this: Are they prepared to go still further in this borrowing direction? Are they prepared to say that to aid this company we are to give them £618,000? I have already pointed out, so far as the equivalent of the land is concerned, that this money-grant is far more than an equivalent for the land. I will undertake to say that if the company thought the land more profitable than the money they would at once have taken the land and not have taken the money. I will say one word more: The honourable member held out a sort of threat. He said that “these important people”—or words to that effect—“in London who floated the company would be able to do something against the colony.” I cannot understand such an argument as that. Nothing will do any harm to the colony if the colony honestly fulfils its bargain. If it has not fulfilled its bargain, then it ought to pay damages to the company for not fulfilling its bargain. I believe that is the honest thing to do. I believe it has fulfilled its bargain; and therefore I cannot see that we should be asked now to make this further concession to the company. I do hope this House will look on this question from a business point of view, entirely free from any bias, and do what is just. And I believe if the House does that this Bill will not pass into law this session.

Mr. GRAHAM.—Sir, I feel a considerable amount of diffidence in rising to follow two honourable members such as the Premier and the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). The speech of the latter gentleman, especially that portion of it delivered before the adjournment, was one of the most brilliant speeches which I have ever listened to—certainly the most brilliant speech delivered in this House this session. And it was very brilliant when compared with the speech delivered by the Premier, in which that honourable gentleman certainly did not do himself justice. I think that was because he felt that the subject he had in hand was one which he was not able to give his whole heart to—he felt he was speaking for a losing cause; and I am quite sure honourable members who are prepared to vote upon this question upon the arguments which they have heard must give their votes against the proposals now made on behalf of the Midland Railway Company. I regret that the course has been followed this as it was followed last session of bringing up a question of so much importance as this at a period so near the end of the session. It was the same last session as it is now: instead of dealing with questions of such magnitude earlier in the session, many of these large questions are left till the last few days before Parliament is prorogued. The Premier in his speech, and also in the Public Works Statement, expressed his sympathy with the people of Nelson because he feels bound to leave it out of the new arrangement which he proposes to make with the company. Neither Nelson nor the colony desires any sympathy from the Premier with reference to this matter. All that we require is absolute justice, and that we shall not get if we agree to the present proposals of the company. I have not a word to say against the gentleman who is manager for the company. He is a very able man. It is his duty to do his best for the company, and he has done so. He went into this arrangement for the company, and it is his duty, if possible, to see it carried out. Is it possible that this question has been so long delayed in order to give that gentleman an opportunity of using his influence with honourable members to endeavour to get them to vote in accordance with his views? He has been very busy for a considerable time past; and he has a large number of private friends, both in and out of this House, many of whom would like to do him a personal favour if they can; but I am sure the duty they have to perform to the colony is of much greater importance than that of obliging a private gentleman. I will simply say this with reference to the general manager of the company: that it would have been better for the colony, after he had given his evidence before the Committee, if he had been found accommodation in the large brick building which some honourable gentlemen have described as being situated on the best site in Wellington, until this question had been finally decided by this House.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. GRAHAM.—It has been, of course, this gentleman's business to look after the interests of the company to the utmost of his ability, and he has done so: but it is not fair to the colony that a gentleman, trying to get what he can for the company as against this colony, should act as he has done; and I say it would have paid us to have given that gentleman accommodation in the way I have said, because of his remarkable personal influence with some members of this House, and of the means he appeared to possess, as evidenced by the report, of acquiring knowledge of the proceedings of the Select Committee before those proceedings were supposed or intended to be made public. What is this proposal? The proposal is that we should abrogate a contract entered into between a company and the colony to carry out works of very great importance. If we consent to annul that contract we shall be setting up a precedent which will stand up and face us at future times with reference to other contracts. As to what the Premier has said with reference to the concessions which have been made—that they have told against the company—I have no hesitation in asserting, on the other hand, that these concessions have all been in favour of the company. Any concessions which have been made have really been in favour of the company. As has been stated by the honourable member for Wellington City, originally the land-grants that were to be given as a bonus for the construction of the railway were to be in alternate blocks along the line of railway which the company had contracted to build. That would really have been a benefit to the colony, because the alternate blocks would have been left to the colony, and they would have been so greatly increased in value that they would have been worth much more than the whole of the land would have been had no railway been constructed. As has also been pointed out, another very important concession was made in allowing the company to adopt the Abt system instead of the tunnel system at a certain difficult and expensive part of the work. It was a saving to the company, as has been shown, of between £400,000 and £500,000. I know, of course, that the general manager of the company said that it was, in reality, no saving at all, inasmuch as the railway, even with the concessions, cost the company more than the original estimate. But that really has nothing to do with it. If they had not got this concession it would have cost them so much more. Not only have the company now asked to be relieved of their contract, but they have also asked us to enter into a new contract on an entirely different basis. They have asked to be relieved of constructing some ninety-seven miles, and they have asked to be allowed to construct a shorter line of some fifty-seven miles, from Jackson's to Patterson's Creek, towards which they ask us to give them a bonus of £618,000. That is what it amounts to—a bonus of £618,000 towards the construction of a work the cost of which, it is estimated by the Government Engineer, as will be seen from the Engineer's letter annexed to the report, will be £973,000, or, say, a million of money. This means that we are asked really to give a bonus of three-fifths of the cost of construction. I know the Premier has stated that the company proposes to raise £1,250,000. That is true; but the line is to cost about one million, and Mr. Wilson himself admitted that that was pretty near the estimate. On being asked why he wanted to raise so large a sum more than was required, I think he stated that the company must be on the safe side,—that they must raise plenty of money to provide for incidental expenses and every contingency, because they could not go back to the money-lenders in England. He admitted that the credit of the company was such that they could not expect to raise their money at par. Then, there are all the management expenses and other expenses to be deducted from the £1,250,000. At any rate, the cost of the work, as stated by the Engineer-in-Chief,—a statement which Mr. Wilson has practically confirmed,—is under a million; and we are asked to contribute £618,000, or three-fifths of the value of the work! That means that we are asked to give an amount equal to £10,840 for every mile which they construct, or 12s. 6d. in every pound spent upon work which, when completed, would become the property of the company. It means that we shall increase the debt of the colony by the amount we are going to make the company a present of; and it means an everlasting addition to the taxation of the colony of £21,630 to provide interest upon £618,000. For what purpose? To make a present to the Midland Railway Company. The Hon. the Premier, who preceded me, has referred to the history of this measure from what he termed "its inception" in 1884. Sir Robert Stout went back a good deal further, and stated that even so far back as 1868 Nelson took steps in reference to communication by railway between Nelson and the West Coast. Steps were taken and negotiations entered into then to have a line constructed from Nelson to the West Coast on the basis of a land-grant by way of bonus towards the construction of the line. They had made arrangements, and these arrangements were on the point of being successful. They were only prevented from being successful by the unfortunate intervention of the Franco-Prussian War in 1870. In the same year Sir Julius Vogel brought forward his famous public-works policy, which included the construction of the main trunk lines of railway from north to south. And if, as he said at the time, Nelson had resumed her negotiations to construct the line of railway from Nelson to the Coast, it might have clashed with the colonial policy; therefore, at his request, Nelson forewent her right and intention to renew negotiations for the independent construction of her railway to the West Coast, on the distinct understanding that it should be included in the colonial policy; and this was agreed to by Sir Julius Vogel. The money was borrowed for that main trunk line, and it ought to have been built; but, through political intrigues, I might call them, the money was spent on political railways, and consequently the line in question was never constructed. And so the matter went on, until the year 1884, which has been referred to, when Sir Julius Vogel in moving the second reading of this measure, said that, while he was sure that neither the House nor the country would agree to the raising of a loan to construct the railway, the Government had come to a conclusion, and had discovered means by which it could be done on the land-grant basis without placing any additional burden upon the taxpayers of the colony, and, if carried out, would prove to be of immense mutual advantage to the colony and any private company who might undertake the work. That was the beginning of the present arrangement. Afterwards, when the Bill was passed, a preliminary contract was entered into by five citizens of Nelson and five of Christchurch. This had to be done before the first day of the following session of Parliament; otherwise, according to the provisions of the Act, the contract could not have been entered into at all. The people of Nelson and Canterbury then joined together and sent Home delegates to, if possible, get the contract taken up by a syndicate in England. After many vicissitudes, they succeeded in obtaining proposals. Before the contract was taken up by the Midland Railway Company we had proposals made by Messrs. Meiggs and Son, American contractors, to carry out the work. They offered to carry it out in five years, provided that the colony guaranteed that they would be able to earn a profit of 2½ per cent. on the capital employed in the undertaking. This was rejected, and the proposal fell to the ground. But, as things have turned out, it would have been very much better for the colony if those proposals had been accepted, for we should now have had the railway. The Midland Railway Company then agreed to take up the contract on the conditions laid down in the Bill, provided that certain concessions were made. An Act was passed in 1886, in which certain modifications were made to satisfy the company, and they then accepted the contract, and expressed satisfaction with the bargain they had made. Mr. Wilson says that the company have been deceived. Now, Sir, I do not think it is the company who have been deceived; I think it is the company who have really deceived the colony as to their ability to carry out the contract which they undertook. Nothing was over-painted by the colony; on the contrary, Sir Julius Vogel was always careful not to do that. We were always told that the company was a particularly strong one, and that there was no reason to fear that they would not be able to carry out the contract in its integrity. Mr. Alan Scott, speaking at Christchurch at a banquet on the 21st October, 1886, said,—

Mr. Graham

"It had been a matter of importance to ascertain the character of the contractors, and he was glad to say he had found they were able and strong, with plenty of backing, and well known for their upright dealing."

Sir Julius Vogel, on the 26th April of the same year, prior to the contract being entered into, said,—

"New company registered, with strong directorate. Shares would be offered to the public after Easter, but the construction of railway was assured whether public took shares or not. The directors were not only so wealthy that they might undertake the work themselves, but they are men of great reputation, and, having satisfied themselves of the feasibility of the scheme, are certain to push it on to a successful termination."

The company had evidently hidden something, or we could not have had representations like this from the men I have named. Sir Julius Vogel, on the second reading of the Bill of 1884, said,—

"I do not wish to say very much as to the prospects of the railway, because, the arrangement being for a private company to make the line, anything I might say might devolve upon the Government a certain amount of responsibility, which it is as well I should avoid."

And, later on in the same speech, he again says,—

"... it is proposed that this railway should be constructed by private enterprise, and that it would not be well for me, on behalf of the Government, to say too much as to what are considered to be its prospects, because it is for those who deal with the Government to form their estimates of the same."

So that there was no deception on the part of the colony. Again, Sir Julius Vogel said, in 1886,—

"I venture to say that there never has been an undertaking entered upon in a more genuine manner than this. It has been taken up by good and substantial men, of high reputation; and it would be impossible for us to get so large a work undertaken with greater security for success than we have in the nature of this company and its surroundings."

We also had a visit to New Zealand by Mr. Brodie Hoare, a director, I believe, of the company, and he was accompanied by a gentleman, now in this chamber—an able engineer who acts, and has acted from the beginning, as general manager for the company, and along with them were a number of other eminent engineers. At a banquet given to Mr. Alan Scott, in Nelson, Mr. Brodie Hoare said,—

"He might say that in London and in the colony he had heard discouraging reports, and when he left London he confessed that he was not without misgivings at the bottom of his heart. He had met croakers here, and a man ready to pour cold water down one's back there, but he was now perfectly convinced that the line could be made, and that when made it would be a great success, so that his firm determination was—so far as in him lay—that it shall be made. . . . His determination would not overcome the difficulties of the Otira Gorge tunnel through the Arthur Pass, or carry the line for twenty-one miles through the Buller Gorge. . . . He had now travelled the length and breadth of New Zealand. . . . If ever a globe-trotter saw New Zealand he had, and he ventured to think there were not more than ten men in that room who had seen so much of the colony as he had. He had not only seen New Zealand, but he had had exceptional advantages, and had conversed with men of all ranks. . . . He had inspected crops, seen gold-mines and coal-mines, and had travelled by rail, by steamer, and coach; whilst the more he had travelled the more convinced had he been of the great resources of the colony, and the great wealth that must pass over the Midland Railway. He believed the railway would not only benefit the towns along its route, but the whole trade of the country. He was also convinced that the whole trade of the colony would benefit the railway."

This was a public statement, be it remembered, made by Mr. Hoare immediately after he had travelled through the country from Reefton to Nelson, when he was accompanied by Messrs. Avigdor, Wilson, Alan Scott, and other able railway engineers; and, although Mr. Wilson said, to the Select Committee here, that Mr. Hoare was simply giving expression to his own opinions, yet, seeing that he was travelling through the country, and took those gentlemen with him as engineers to instruct and educate him as to the advantages or otherwise of constructing the line, and that they did not contradict his statements, we have a right to conclude that he was speaking with those gentlemen at his back. Then he went on to give the people of Nelson a lecture on morality. They should have nothing to do with bogus companies, but should only deal with companies like his. He said,—

Mr. Graham

"Might he add one word of warning? If they wished that railway made, and successfully made, would their newspapers and all of them combine to put in the horsepond any man who wished to float on the English market bogus companies?"

He was perfectly satisfied, at all events, that his was not a bogus company. He said,—

"If a mine such as the West Coast people called a 'duffer' were floated on the English market, what would happen? Well, people would go to him and say, 'Why, this mine your railway was going through you told us was gold-bearing, but it has turned out a "duffer": all these mines must be bad.' This would not be true, but there would be just a convenient amount of truth to hang the lie to. He urged them to use their influence in the interests of what was sound and good. He believed they possessed fields on which it was legitimate to use English capital, but their credit, public and private, should be above suspicion."

This shows that Mr. Brodie Hoare and those with him were perfectly satisfied at that time, at all events, that they had got a good thing. Sir, instead of the colony having deceived the company, I think it is pretty clear that the colony itself was very much deceived by the company, and that the real reason of the company being unable to carry out its contract was its impecuniosity from the very beginning. It was found, previous to last session of Parliament, that the company could not finance its contract on the land-grant basis, and the Parliament of last year came to the conclusion that they would comply with the request of the company and give them interest-bearing debentures instead of the land-grant, on condition that they showed themselves to be in a position to carry out the whole of the contract. The last clause of the resolutions was "That these modifications of the contract"—namely, the giving of debentures in lieu of the land-grant—"be made conditionally on the company having first satisfied the Government that it is in a position to raise the necessary capital required to complete the several railway-works enumerated in the contract." That was on the 2nd October, 1893, and it was communicated to the company on the 13th December, when the Government informed them that—

"On the company satisfying the Government in terms of clause D above, the Government will, during the next session of the General Assembly, be prepared to submit the necessary measure sanctioning the proposed modification of the existing contract, and containing the requisite powers to carry out the same."

The directors' answer to this was as follows:—

"My directors have thought it right to call your attention to this point at the earliest opportunity afforded to them, as they cannot help believing that the intention of the resolution is that the Government will be content with my company showing by the statement of a good financial house that they can raise the capital necessary to complete the main line from east to west."

This shows very distinctly that the company purposely chose to misinterpret the resolution of the House. Further, to show their impecuniosity, in answer to question 7, before the Select Committee, Mr. Wilson said,—

"It is not a question of the colony's credit, it is a question of the company's credit. The company must be able to show that they have absolute security before the financiers will raise the money. They say, 'If you have this placed at deposit it is all right enough, we will raise the whole capital.'"

And again he said,—

"My Board cabled me to say that it will facilitate matters very much if we can get the money placed in a lump sum in the hands of the Public Trustee."

And, still further,—

"I do not raise the question myself at all. It is purely a question of the financiers stating that they would be able to go to the public with a statement that the £618,250 had been placed by the Government in the hands of the Public Trustee, and that there is therefore absolute security. That is the whole question at issue."

And when reminded that under the land-grant arrangements the company had to do the work before they got the land, he answered,—

"Assuming we had the money we could do that now; but, then, the British public would know that we had not got the money. We have to meet these financiers on their own terms as to how they will provide the money. That is the position we are now in."

That shows pretty well the impecuniosity of the company. I am surprised at the change of front of the Premier. On the 2nd October, 1893, he said,—

"I am not one of those who fear, so far as the colony is concerned, the result of any litigation. I am with the honourable member for Inangahua [then Sir R. Stout] as to non-violation of the terms of contract between the Government and the company; and I do not fear any litigation, or the result of the litigation. . . . If the company would submit proposals accepting debentures in lieu of land-grant, then the Government would submit such proposals for the consideration of Parliament. We have not deviated one jot from that, and we are not deviating from it now, and we have no intention of doing so. . . . You have kept back settlement in the Nelson part of the colony, and all the rest of that district, for over ten years; and you are now going to vary it and say to the company, 'We will have you complete the contract from Springfield to Tere-makau only.' That means, as far as the colony is concerned, a breach of faith. It would not be just, it would not be honourable, on the part of Parliament."

Before the last general election, in a speech delivered at Nelson, Mr. Seddon stated in effect, "Now, we had a number of Liberal candidates standing together in the Nelson and West Coast Districts, whose interests were identical. If we elected these, and if we stood together, we should get what we wanted." He did not in that speech mention one word about the railway; but a gentleman who got up and proposed a vote of thanks referred to it, when Mr. Seddon replied as follows:—

"Mr. Seddon, in acknowledging the vote, said he purposely refrained from mentioning the Midland Railway that it might not be said that he did so in order to get a vote of thanks. He stated, however, that he had insisted on the original contract, and that the resolution of the House [that is, clause D, referred to] would be the guide of the Government. The time was not now far distant, he hoped, when the embargo would be removed from the land, and it would be thrown open for settlement. In the interests of the colony he said they must stand by the contract."

That is what he said ten days before the general election. Then, when the Minister of Lands was in Nelson, in February last, it was pointed out to him that there was a danger of Nelson being left out, because the company were attempting to raise only a portion of the money necessary to complete the whole line; and these are the words, as reported at the time in the Press, and which I remember he used in answer to a question put by myself as one of the deputation that waited upon him. He said, "The Government intended to insist upon the whole contract being carried out." That is what he said then. Why is there now this change of front on the part of the Government? I am certain the heart of the Premier is not in the question before this House to-day. He has simply brought it forward because of the pressure brought to bear upon the Government. I have seen a communication telling the Canterbury members, in effect, they are to inform the Government that, if they do not agree to the proposals of the company, those members were to desert them. I observe my limit of time is nearly up,—it really does not seem to be half an hour since I commenced speaking,—and I must therefore conclude by recapitulating what the result to the taxpayers would be if this Bill were passed into law. It would mean an addition of more than three-fifths of a million of money to the debt of the colony. It would mean a contribution of £618,250 to a private company towards a work costing about a million, and which, when finished, would belong absolutely to the company. This would be equal to nearly £11,000 a mile by way of gift to the company, with the result of an increased burden upon the taxpayers of £21,630 a year. The company, being, professedly, unable to carry out the whole contract, would, of course, have been fools not to have tried to make the best possible bargain for themselves.

Captain RUSSELL.—I think that every person who has been listening to the debate to-day will fully agree with me in this: that the sooner we change our Standing Orders to allow men whose souls are full of important matter to have a chance of disburdening them the better it will be for the House when considering any important business that comes before us. It is undoubtedly ridiculous that men like the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the honourable member for Nelson City—who made a most excellent speech, without a single word that was unnecessary in it—should not be allowed to put fairly before the House all the arguments which they think it right should be brought forward on a question so important as this is. The Hon. the Premier told us we must deal fairly with the company, that fair-play is bonny play, and that all that is wanted is fair-play to the company, and that he asks us only to deal in a fair way with the company. Is it not our primary duty to endeavour to deal fairly by the colony also? Apart from the question of Canterbury's interests, and apart from the question of the Nelson line, there is the great question of what is best for the taxpayers of this colony; and, in dealing fairly with the company, are we not to be asked also to consider the interests of the taxpayers? The Premier, in speaking, scarcely allowed a word to escape as to the interests of the colony. Though it was but a half-hearted speech, it was the speech of an advocate for the company rather than of the Premier of the colony. What, then, are the principal reasons, according to the Premier, why we should carry on this railway? Sir, it is perfectly ridiculous. The first reason, consequently the best, which the Premier gave why we should spend £618,250 of public money on this railway was that tourists from other parts of the world might come and see the beauties of the Otira Gorge. It is true that he drew a connection between the Otira Gorge and the geysers of the North Island, but what the actual connection was I failed to see, except this: that he thought it was good that New Zealand should spend large sums of money in one particular place, because he hoped, if that were done, other parts of the colony might prosper also. Sir, as a matter of fact, the tourist is not a person who wants to travel at a prodigious rate through the country; and all that we want to do, if we wish to see the effect of the making of a railway upon scenery, and its benefit to the tourist, is to take the Manawatu train and travel through the Manawatu Gorge. There we shall see how the beautiful and magnificent scenery has been entirely destroyed by a railway similar to that which the Hon. the Premier is so anxious to push on primarily to allow tourists to tear at a headlong pace through the beautiful valley which this railway is to be taken through. If he has no better reason than that to urge for the construction of the line he has not much to urge in favour of it. Coming to two or three arguments which he used, it seemed to me that none were sufficiently cogent to be worthy of any serious consideration. He told us that the deviation of the line of railway at Lake Brunner, instead of the original line, was in itself a claim for an extension of the time. I do not imagine that any honourable member would be particularly anxious to prevent an extension of time from being granted if the extension of time promised bona fide to lead to the desirable result—I will not qualify it by using the word “desirable,” but will say if it will lead to the result of the completion of the line of railway. The question of the extension of time has never been in dispute, and so it was unnecessary that such a point should have been dwelt upon. But bear in mind that the deviation was agreed to so far back as the year 1890, and therefore, as the railway is to be completed within four years of the present time, the question of deviation is really not one of very much importance. Then, again, he referred to the effect of the slides, which would be, he contended, worse with the tunnel than with the Abt system. As has been pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington City, the concession granted by the colony foregoing the right of insisting on the tunnel and allowing the Abt system was one of infinite importance to the company, and, I believe, it will have been distinctly injurious to the traffic over the railway, and therefore to the colony itself. Whether it would have been more difficult to work the railway by tunnel or by the Abt system is not a matter for me to consider. It is nothing to the point for us to consider in the matter of the extension of time, because no person can possibly imagine that the enormous tunnel to be made through Arthur's Pass would not have taken three or four times as long as the construction of the line on the Abt system; and therefore the contention of the company that it has a right to an extension of time consequent upon the permission granted by the colony to abandon the tunnel and go in for the Abt system is wholly untenable. Now we come to the most important point of the whole question. We must clearly bear this in mind: that however much we may desire to do justice to the company, and with every desire to allow every possible concession to them, there are one or two points staring us startlingly in the face. One of these is that from the commencement of this work there was not a sufficient capital to carry it out, and, though we have heard talks of arbitration, and have had allusions made to law-courts, speaking merely as a layman I have very grave doubts whether the company can possibly have any claim which can be fairly established before the law-courts, when it can be shown incontrovertibly that at every period, from first to last, the capital of the company has been insufficient for the completion of the railway. Surely we must all agree that there must be two parties to a transaction, and that, whatever alterations have been made by the colony in the contract which was entered into at one time or another, the proposals have originated with the company, and not with the colony; and therefore that there could be no claim substantiated by the company against the colony on the question of the extension of time or any other difficulty, seeing that the proposals have come from the company, and, whether they did or did not originate the proposals, after full and careful consideration the company has agreed to the alterations of the contract. The principle, of course, on which the railway was to be constructed was the principle of land-grants, and we are asked now to abandon the principle of land-grants, and to give money for the construction of the line in lieu of land-grants. It was urged in the Select Committee that, so long as the colony gets back the land, it is immaterial whether the company have money or not—that the payment is nothing more to the colony, inasmuch as the land is worth the money which is to be given in lieu of it. But I think that begs the point altogether, because at the inception of the railway it was urged that by a system of alternate blocks being given as the railway progressed the lands would be enhanced in value by every mile of railway that was constructed, and the consequence would be that as soon as a certain portion of the line was open, and the land was settled along that railway, an increased value would attach to the land which was subsequently to be opened up as the railway progressed. We must bear in mind that this was a very important consideration for the colony. It was urged that there would be settlement on these lands by the efforts of the company. I have always been opposed to the railway, and can give my reasons for that opposition, but it was always looked upon that, at any rate, the company would not be simply a company of contractors which was going to make a line of railway, but in reality would be a colonising company, and that its influence at Home would induce persons to come out and settle on the lands adjacent to the line of railway. Therefore I would ask the House to consider this: that, in abandoning the system of land-grants,—as we are now asked to abandon it and to adopt the money payment,—we are abandoning the original intention in making the railway: that the railway should be made, and that there should be settlement progressing along the line of railway as it was carried on. The Premier said, "Knowing all about the position of the company, and its difficulty in raising capital, I know it is unable to complete the Nelson Section of the railway, and we are now compelled to ask the House to abandon that section." Surely if we are to have fair-play—and the Premier has claimed that there should be fair-play—fair-play is that the contract should be carried out in its entirety. We should not proceed, in any Jewish fashion, to exact more than our pound of flesh, but, when a company deliberately enters into a contract for making a complete system of railways from Nelson through Belgrove and so on to Brunner and the eastern coast to Springfield, should it be allowed to abandon the contract which was entered into?

Captain Russell

3.30. Does my honourable friend imagine for one moment that, if the proposal which was originally made had been for the making of the railway from Springfield to Brunner, the colony would have accepted such a proposal? Unquestionably it would not. It is not desirable to inquire into all the circumstances which brought about what was known as the Midland Railway Contract, and it is not my wish to do so. But this is certain: that we know that had the Nelson people believed that the railway from Nelson to Brunner would not have been made their votes would have been cast against its construction. Simply the position was that a contract was entered into, after much agitation, by which the Nelson District was to be connected by railway with the other portions of the colony; and surely it is not fair that the Nelson people should be thrown overboard, and a contract be entered into by the Premier for the benefit of one particular section of the colony only. The Premier told us that the company had, so far, made a profit upon their land,—that they had made a profit of 35 per cent. in excess of the original value placed on the land, but he doubted whether they would be able to do so from the large areas still remaining; and within two minutes, or, at most, five minutes, he went on to say there was a lot of land on the West Coast which was as good as any land in any part of the colony. I interjected, "A great bulk of the land is useless"; and the Premier told us that "there were large areas of land which was not useless, but was as good as in any part of the colony." Supposing that assertion to be true,—I am afraid, however, that the Hon. the Premier does not know as much about land as about politics,—surely that is no reason why the company should not select and dispose of that land instead of coming to the House for concessions in money. Another point, it seems to me, the Premier utterly ignored, or, at any rate, he did not allude to, was as to the benefits the colony was to obtain by the change in the contract. I submit that, whatever benefit the company is to derive from this change of contract, it is our first duty to protect the interests of the colony. And no honourable member yet has stood up and, in speaking upon the subject, ventured in any way to endeavour even to show that the colony is going to benefit by the change of contract. The only attempt was made when the Premier told us that it would provide employment for two thousand men in making the line of railway. It would, of course, be of great benefit that the superabundant population should find profitable occupation; but he must not forget this: that this employment of men can only be carried on by large expenditure—by the expenditure of large sums of money, in this case, which the colony derives no benefit from whatever, because the £150,000 the Premier spoke of as being expended annually in the colony is not expended for the benefit of the colony, although it is true the wages will be paid out of that. But the whole of that £150,000 is to be expended in the construction of a railway not the property of the colony; and therefore it has not been shown in what way the colony will benefit by the alteration of the contract we are now asked to agree to. It is true that he said the farmers of Canterbury would benefit by their produce being conveyed to the West Coast by the railway; but all the produce used on the West Coast grown in New Zealand can be conveyed, and will be conveyed until the railway is completed, by sea rather than by rail, and there is really no argument in what the honourable gentleman put forward. The Premier also told us that the honour of the colony is at stake. I do not see how the honour of the colony is at stake. I believe the honour of the colony is to carry out any contract it enters into, regardless of any loss or profit that may come from it; and if the colony by its Ministers enters into a deliberate contract it is the duty of the colony to carry it out; but it is also the duty of the colony to insist that the other parties to a contract shall fulfil literally also every condition of a contract which both parties have entered into; and, whilst there is no attempt to say that the company are not to do that, we believe it is impossible that the company can say that they can do so. It was a matter for their own consideration before deliberately entering into a bargain, and our honour is not at stake in any way if we offer to carry out to the extremest point every contract we enter into. It was sad to hear the Premier speak of the possible combination of Auckland, Wellington, Canterbury, and Otago for a profligate loan policy if this proposal were not given effect to. I do not believe for one instant that we need apprehend anything of that sort. I remember many years ago, when I myself moved a reduction in the public-works expenditure, in 1885, that the same argument was put forward—that unless we agreed to the making of this same railway there would be a combination of all parts of the colony for a large public-works expenditure. To a large extent it is perfectly true that a madness has overtaken Ministers, who are prepared to plunge to any extent the House would like; but, so far as concerns the possibility of the four provinces forming a combination, if this line is not made, to initiate a loan policy, I dare the Government to go to the country upon a large borrowing scheme. The country is not mad, and this madness of Ministers will pass; and, at any rate, if they appeal to the country I venture to say that the country will not tolerate a large borrowing policy again. Even if it would, there is a power greater even than this House. That is the power of the money-lenders at Home; and, if this colony ventures again to go for a large borrowing scheme in the London market, without a doubt we shall feel the power of the money-lender, and in such a way that no Minister will dare to borrow, so low will be the rate at which the loan will float. I sincerely hope that will be the case, and that what the Premier has told us to-day—that there is going to be a sordid, selfish combination of members to provide money for works that they do not believe to be profitable—will not come about; and I say the sooner the credit of the colony is damned the better, if what he states to be likely should prove true. It was urged that some consideration ought to be accorded to the company inasmuch as from time to time various persons in authority have spoken as to the quality of the land, and the company has said that they had reason at one time to believe that the land was more valuable than it is now said to be. As has been pointed out by the honourable member for Nelson City, there really is nothing in that, inasmuch as Mr. Brodie Hoare, Mr. Avigdor, and Mr. Wilson themselves travelled from one end of the proposed line to the other, and I know that Mr. Brodie Hoare expressed himself as in the highest degree satisfied with the quality of the land and the prospects of the line, saying he had reason to believe the line would pay handsomely indeed when it was completed. Even supposing that the public men of this colony have expressed an opinion as to the quality of the land, and if the promoters of the company originally were more or less of the opinion I have mentioned,—and by the advisers of the company they should have been quite able to form an opinion for themselves,—there was a Commission appointed in 1883 to report upon the various routes over which the Midland Railway might pass to connect Brunnerton with the east coast. I myself, as a member of that Commission, visited and travelled through the different routes over which it would pass, and at the end of our Commission we reported—I think I might say, in a lucid and extended form—to Parliament on the lines of our observations. The report of that Commission was published in extenso, with all the evidence, in 1883, before the contract was signed; and, if any importance is to attach to the utterances of a politician who may wish to have public moneys expended in his particular district, and whatever the reports of public officers may be, I think it is naturally right to expect that the promoters of the railway should have studied the report of the parliamentary Commission appointed to inspect this railway. The Commission was not concerned in reporting on the line from Brunnerton to Reefton, but simply on the line from the east to the west coast. I propose to read certain portions of that report to the House, inasmuch as it shows what the opinion of the Commission was at the time. The report of the Commission was before the promoters, so that they had it to consider, and could see the opinion the Commission formed of the railway. I may say that it was drawn up in as sanguine a spirit as it was possible for competent and impartial men to write in. There was no intention to take a doleful view of the prospects of the railway or of the quality of the land, and the prospect of the success of the railway as a paying venture on its completion was set out, as all those who take the trouble to read it can see. Here is what the Commission said:—

“The West Coast, so far as visited by the Commission, appeared to contain little land suitable for agriculture; though there is a considerable amount of level and terrace land on the Lower Teremakan, Hokitika, and Little Grey Rivers, and all around Lake Brunner, which appears to be of a fair to good quality, and no doubt, if cleared, would grow excellent grass. The climate, however, seems quite unsuitable for the raising of grain. But the most important factor in considering the West Coast as a farming district undoubtedly is the dense forest with which the whole country is covered. The present cost of felling and burning the bush is out of all proportion to the value of the land when cleared; and, owing to the humidity of the climate, underscrub and rushes soon appear unless the land is ploughed. Agriculture on any scale beyond the most insignificant is out of the question where the cost of preparing the land for the plough is, as it is stated to be, £50 per acre. The agricultural statistics show that only 14 acres were sown in grain crops in 1882, and 343 acres in green crops and potatoes, although evidence obtained at Reefton shows prices to be such as should prove extremely remunerative, bread, meat, and flour being twice, oats nearly three times, and potatoes five times as dear as at Christchurch."

Captain Russell

That is the opinion of the Commission that went to examine the line, and the actual record of the farming operations in 1882 proved that farming, although the prices of produce on the west coast were enormously in excess of prices on the east coast, was there carried on under such difficulties that it was practically impossible to carry on farming profitably at all. Then, we come to the eastern slopes:—

"On the eastern side of the dividing-range the country is far less wooded than on the western slopes, but on those portions which would be affected by any of the proposed routes the land is unfit for agriculture. The valleys of the rivers are rough and stony, and the mountain slopes afford only indifferent grazing for sheep. They cannot support a farming population, and will not produce traffic of any consequence for a railway. The features of the country are similar in all the rivers along which the proposed routes would travel. As soon as the plains and downs are left behind, the country becomes rugged and barren; the valleys are mostly little more than river-beds—either naked shingle, or having a thin covering of soil, liable to be carried away by floods—and the hills exceedingly steep and rough."

This was an impartial statement, written and published before the company signed the contract, and before they commenced work; and therefore the assertion that the company deserve greater consideration owing to the statements of public men is to be discounted by the fact that there was an opinion for them written and published before they entered into the contract, and one which they could have read if they had thought fit, and which it is certain they did read. Then, the Commissioners, in recapitulation, said this:—

"The nature or circumstances of the soil are such that along neither of the alternative lines can it be looked to for the support of a population earning a subsistence from either pastoral or agricultural pursuits; and, although metals other than gold probably exist in many places, we have no reason to suppose they can be found in such quantity or quality of ore as to become or many years of any commercial importance, or likely to afford employment to a population of any magnitude."

And then the final words of the report summed up the whole position, and to any person who will read them they should be of great importance in a careful consideration of this question. They are as follow:—

"The benefit to be derived by the colony, as a whole, from the connection of the east and west coasts by railway, apart from the commercial and other merits attaching to the construction of any particular line, is a matter demanding due consideration, and the Commissioners can imagine a state of things which might justify the construction of a line irrespective of the direct financial return ordinarily demanded from an investment; but there does not appear to us any monopoly of the trade in either coal or timber, or any other circumstances to render it necessary for produce to be carried over the proposed line at a lower rate than such as will pay at the present wear-and-tear, maintenance, wages, salaries, and a fair percentage on the capital expended on its construction, and full interest in the immediate future. It would be manifestly unfair to provide the community settled round Christchurch with cheap coal and timber at the cost of the taxpayer living elsewhere, and unsound policy to interfere with industries already in full operation by bringing others into existence through the aid of carriage unremunerative to the State.

"That at a future date the coal and timber of the west coast, if nearly as extensive as we were led to suppose, must become of enormous value to the country we feel assured; but it would be the height of unwisdom to commence any line depending entirely for its success on these products until reliable information has been obtained as to their area and available quantity. And, in addition to recommending that a detail survey of the Arthur's Pass route be made, we would urge most strongly that a survey of the forest-lands and coal-bearing country of the west coast be also made, with a view to determining their extent and probable duration, and the more valuable areas being permanently reserved from sale; so that, instead of falling into the hands of speculators, they may become a source of wealth to the colony, as well as revenue for the railway.

"After considering the whole of the foregoing conclusions and opinions, we most respectfully report to your Excellency that, on account of its being the shortest line between the centres of production and demand, we recommend the route by Arthur's Pass as the most suitable; but the most sanguine view the Commission can take is that there is no prospect of the traffic paying more than working-expenses on the completion of any of the alternative lines. No commensurate indirect results can be anticipated from the expenditure of so large a sum as would be necessary for its construction, and not for as many as ten years or more can full interest on the cost be hoped for."

That, Sir, is a summary of a very long and exhaustive report upon all the circumstances likely to attend on the making of this railway. All these circumstances were before the promoters of this venture before the contract was signed, and therefore, when it is said that special consideration is due to the company, I think we should take into consideration that this document was placed before the promoters before any contract was made. I think our first duty is to consider the interests of the taxpayers of the colony. By all means let the company have all the land that can be given to them for the construction and completion of their railway; but to say that the taxpayers of this colony are to become responsible for £618,250, and to be subjected to the payment of £21,630 a year for ever and ever, so as to give this company a railway that will never be for the benefit of the taxpayers, seems to me to be a piece of the highest unwisdom that one could imagine.

Mr. REEVES.—Sir, I do not agree with those who complain that the time-limit has the effect of unfairly restricting those who wish to speak on this question. I have, I can say, at least as much desire to speak on this question as any other honourable member in this House, and if I have not as much material as others upon which to speak with regard to the Bill I ought to have, at any rate, for this Midland Railway scheme has been part of my political existence for the last twelve years at least. However, I am inclined to think that half an hour ought to be a reasonable time in which to condense our arguments on this question. Because I do not think that this is an occasion for indulging in exhaustive historical reviews of the details of the Midland Railway question from its earliest days. The matter has been before the country, as I have already mentioned, for the last twelve years, and there cannot be any intelligent man, one taking an interest in our public affairs, who does not know fairly well the leading points of the story. It does not seem to me to be necessary to go into the efforts of the early syndicates in the South to establish this railway, or to treat the House to the story of somebody's journey Home, and somebody-else's journey back here, and where he went, and what he did when he came to a certain town. I do not see how these matters bear upon the question of granting further concessions to the Midland Railway Company. I am not sneering at the speeches that have been made at all. Some of them have been very able and straightforward speeches from the point of view of those who have delivered them. They have been hostile views, of course, but that is only what we might have expected, so that we are not at all disappointed because we have heard them. But, having paid that compliment—which I do sincerely—to those speeches, it is not to be supposed that I accept a large number of the arguments advanced, or that I consider them by any means relevant or weighty. They seem to have been divided into three classes. First of all there was the argument of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, directed not against the continuation of the contract, but altogether against having the railway made at all. Surely it is a little late in the day, Sir, to read long extracts from blue-books to show that the colony never ought to have entered into the Midland Railway contract at all. The whole of the honourable gentleman's remarks were to the effect that we should never have touched that railway at all, or else that the Government should have had nothing whatever to do with the company; but I say that such arguments against the railway as an enterprise can hardly now be taken into consideration. Then, we had attacks upon the speech of the Premier of a more or less trifling character. And then we had the argument—and, I admit, a weighty argument—that, having once made a contract with the company, and having once induced them to commit themselves to that contract, and having more than once given them valuable concessions, we ought not now to give them anything more, and that on their side the company ought to be rather ashamed to come and ask Parliament for more. I admit, Sir, that that is a very weighty argument, and it lies with us to show why that argument should not carry the House along with it. But, as for the argument that the railway itself is not worth making, or that it ought not to be made because it passes through a range of mountains which cannot carry a large farming population, who ever said the Southern Alps would ever carry a large farming population? What the Premier really said was that the line would join a farming to a mining population. Then, the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) said the Premier asked that the railway should be made because it would develop tourist traffic, and because the Otira Gorge contained very beautiful scenery, and so on. And the honourable member stated that if we were to make a railway for tourist traffic and beautiful scenery we should make it through the Buller Gorge. Can any one who listened to the Premier when speaking say he argued that this line was to be made merely because it would open a tourist traffic? What he said was that one of the things which would go to increase the value of the land would undoubtedly be the great increase of the tourist traffic which that railway would develop. Yet we hear it seriously stated by two honourable gentlemen of high standing in this House that a railway does not enlarge tourist traffic. Have those honourable gentlemen ever travelled in Europe or in England? Have they ever read accounts of the countries most frequented by tourists? If they have, how can they claim that tourist traffic is not increased by railways? Is a man going to drive or ride through the country when railways exist in it? No. The tourists come in thousands, and tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands to these different countries, and it is notorious that ninety-nine out of every hundred of these tourists would never come to those places if there were no railways. So much for that argument. However, that is but a side-issue. Then, the honourable member for Hawke's Bay stated that the tourists came to see beautiful scenery. And he instanced the effect of a railway made through one of the loveliest gorges in New Zealand—that we had only to go to the Manawatu Gorge to see how the hand of the spoiler had ruined its grace. I admit that the devastation of that gorge is a very sad sight, but I deny that that is any reason for fearing that the Oira or other West Coast gorges are in any danger of being ruined in the same manner by the Midland Railway Company. The Midland Company has nothing to gain by destroying the scenery. One of the objects of that company will be to see that that scenery is carefully conserved, so as to get the tourist traffic, to enable them to make the railway pay. The Midland Railway Company are bound, in their own interests, to carefully preserve the scenery of the beautiful gorges through which the railway is to run. Their own common-sense would tell them that they should not allow the scenery to be ruined. I may say I have the assurance of the company to that effect, and I think we can accept that assurance in good faith, that they are not going to destroy one of their most valuable assets. Then, some hard words have been said with regard to this company. It was said by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that they could not be looked upon as philanthropists. We are told that they do not make railways for the benefit of the colony, but they are making this railway for themselves. But, Sir, who, in the name of common-sense, ever suggested that this business company were making this railway for philanthropic purposes? They are making the railway in the hope that it will pay them. But, then, the colony did not go into the enterprise in the hope that it would put money into the contractors' pockets, and surely what is true with regard to the State might reasonably be expected to be true with regard to the company. Both parties went into the enterprise from a purely business point of view. We hope to do well out of the company, and the company hope to do well out of us. They have as much right to hope to make money out of us as we have to make something out of their enterprise. The question, then, is, Is it right or not that the railway should be made? I

Captain Russell

4.0. am not going to detain the House by recapitulating the arguments which have from time to time been adduced in favour of this work. Year after year this question was fought out in this House and the country, and finally it was decided by majorities in both Houses that the railway should be made if we could get a company to make it. It is said that it is not worth making because it is a tourist railway: but it is more than a tourist railway. It is a tourist railway, it is a mineral railway, and it is a timber railway. It is a railway which will enable the producing districts of the colony to supply the mineral and timber districts of the South Island. I say no railway should be made simply for the purpose of opening up a timber forest. The Auckland members, however, have not thought it beneath them to support more than once the making of such a railway. I cannot say that the result of such lines has been of such a character as to encourage us to make any more. But railways have been made in various parts of the world too simply to open up tourist traffic. Railways are made in other parts of the world, and are made to pay, simply because of minerals. But here is a railway which is a mineral, a tourist, and a timber railway, and a railway which will tap and open up a large district in the colony as well, and, to a certain extent, will enable Westland to be settled by a population. The friends of the railway do not come here simply asking that this railway may be made for one or two reasons: there are several good and sufficient reasons why the line should be made. But, as I say, all those arguments are matters of ancient history now. But what we now say is that circumstances seem to show that unless a variation of the contract is consented to there is no chance whatever of the railway being made. Is it desirable that the House should vary the contract further, or is it desirable that the whole of the labour of the last ten or twelve years in connection with this railway should be thrown away and that no railway shall be made? Let honourable members remember that is the alternative. Either we must agree to such arrangements with the company that there will be a fair chance of the company making the railway, or the thing must be abandoned. I do not believe that for some time to come it will be possible for the colony to make the line out of borrowed money. I do not fear, as has been apprehended by certain honourable gentlemen, that the stoppage of this line will mean a combination for the purpose of inaugurating a gigantic borrowing policy. I do not fear, if this line is stopped, that irresistible pressure will, for some years at any rate, be brought to bear on this House to construct the Otago Central line, the North Island Trunk line, and this line, and to purchase the Manawatu line, and that that pressure will force this House to go on the London market for a gigantic loan to make these three lines and buy the fourth. I do not fear that. I think there is another alternative which is far more probable. What I do fear is, that if this Bill is thrown out this line will be hung up for some time to come; that the colony will be plunged into a sea of litigation; that this land which we are so very anxious to see unlocked will not be unlocked for some time to come; and that, in particular, the province from which I come will have sacrificed an enormous area of its land for nothing whatever—will be left without this railway, and will be left labouring under a bitter sense of injustice and a rankling sense of injury. Now, I make no threats at all. I do not think it desirable that threats should be made. But I do appeal to the common-sense and to the sense of fairness of this House, and ask honourable members to think whether that argument also is not worth considering—whether they should not.

take into consideration the fact that if this Bill is thrown out the work of years will be thrown away, and that a large portion of the colonists of New Zealand will feel that they have been unfairly and unjustly sacrificed. Because, after all, what are these so-called concessions which we are told the colony has been making for the Midland Railway? The colony certainly gave up a nominally enormous area of land for the Midland Railway. We are told by some of the bitterest opponents of the Bill that that area of land was not an area of valuable land—that part of it was utterly valueless. We hear a great deal about riverbeds, snowy mountain-slopes, barren valleys, and glaciers, and we are led to believe that far the largest share of this territory which we are supposed to surrender to the company is of that character. I do not say that a good deal of that is not exaggerated. I think it is. But what I do say is that unless that railway is made that land will not be of any great value to the colony. If the territory is to become valuable, then this railway ought to be made through it, and must be made through it. If the railway is not to be made the land will remain for many years to a very large extent valueless. So much for the sacrifice. Then, there are those concessions. We are told that we made an important concession with regard to the Brunner deviation. We did. We are told that we made another concession in reference to the Abt system. And so we did. But, after all, did these concessions injure the colony in any way? After all, would the colony have been any richer, or would it have been any better off, if we had insisted on the company following the old line along Lake Brunner? Or would it have helped us if a tunnel had been made instead of the Abt system being adopted? On the contrary, if we had stuck to the tunnel we should have been cursed by tourists and travellers yet unborn. We should have sacrificed the scenery of one of the most lovely and beautiful parts of the whole journey. In answer to an interruption of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, I may say that I have already explained that the tourist traffic is only one advantage in connection with this line. The concessions we have made have been a great advantage to the company, but they have been no disadvantage to the colony whatever. Now we come to the present position; and that is, after all, the main point. The honourable member for Nelson City made such a speech as we might have expected, and such a speech as I should imagine each one of us would have made had we occupied the position of that honourable gentleman. I do not deny for a moment that had I represented Nelson, had I been a Nelson citizen, and had I the feelings of a Nelson man—I do not doubt that I should have been swayed by those feelings. I should probably have thought as the honourable member thinks, and have spoken as he has spoken. But this is the vital point: Can anything we do enable the Nelson part of the line to be made? Is it possible to make that portion? I say it is not. It is unfair to reproach the Government with abandoning Nelson. We did not abandon that line as long as there was the slightest chance of forcing the company to make the Nelson branch. But when it became clear that that portion of the line was absolutely beyond praying for, that its construction was hopeless, that the company must either be relieved of that or the whole line would be stopped, under these circumstances it simply became a question of what we could snatch from the fire. We, of course, saved what we could, and abandoned what we could not save. That is our whole crime, and I do not think it is a heinous crime. We tried to get the whole line and nothing less than the whole line, but when that chance vanished into thin air we tried to get what we could. The question is, whether Christchurch is to be connected with the West Coast—whether her three hundred thousand pounds' worth of land is to be sacrificed for some purpose, or for very little purpose? Shall Canterbury get what she is fairly entitled to, or shall the whole of the past work be thrown away, and shall we simply be satisfied with going to law with the company? That is the question which honourable gentlemen have to ask themselves now. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) laughed at the idea of litigation. The honourable gentleman may not fear litigation; I can quite imagine that he may not be afraid of litigation: the honourable gentleman is accustomed to litigation. But there are many men in New Zealand who are not so accustomed to litigation, and who may not look at it with quite so light a heart as my honourable friend. For my own part I do not look with a light heart on the prospect of a lawsuit with the company. I do not think it will do New Zealand any good, though I trust, if it does occur, we shall be on the successful side in the end. Still, I think it would be a good thing to avoid it. But, in addition to that litigation, when I see this railway abandoned after ten years' work, and three hundred thousand pounds' worth of Canterbury land sacrificed for naught, and when I see us put back to the beginning of our labours once more, it is natural that I should not look at the prospect with a feeling of satisfaction. But, of course, the question is, whether the concession which we ask for is a justifiable concession. I maintain it is, though I admit that if the railway is not made this land is not territory of enormous value. I maintain that this land, if the line really is to be made, is going to be territory of very considerable value to New Zealand, and that to get this land back, at the same time that the railway is going through it and developing it, will be a very good stroke of business indeed for the colony. Remember this: It is said that we are giving £618,000 for the making of a railway which will cost a million. There is no use in quarrelling as to whether the line will cost a million or a million and a quarter. The cost of construction will doubtless come up to about £1,100,000 or £1,200,000. The total cost ought to be put down at what it will be—namely, about £1,200,000—and we should not try to make it less because the actual outlay—the engineering work—will be merely a million. If it will cost the company £1,200,000 to make the line, then the company is entitled to call that the cost of the line. It is said that we are going to give up £618,000 for the making of a line which will cost £1,200,000. Precisely; but that is always what we have said we would do. We said we would give the company £618,000 in land. It is not fair to try to mislead this House by pretending that this land which we are to give them will not be equal to £618,000. Why, we have contracted to make it worth £618,000, no matter whether it consists of glaciers, mountain-torrents, or barren alpine valleys. Whatever the value of the land may be in its nature and to the purchaser, we have contracted to make it worth £618,000 to the company, and, if it is not worth £618,000, then we have to give them either hard cash or something else to make it up to that value. What is the difference, then, whether we give them £618,000 partly in land there and elsewhere or partly in land and cash, or give £618,000 in debentures? It may have been against the interests of the colony to give £618,000, but we agreed to do it, and I say it is unfair to argue now that the arrangement was a bad one. The colony deliberately entered into the contract after fuller argument than it is possible to apply to it now. An enormous deal of argument with regard to the value of the railway was brought to bear by those who were the friends of the line to prove to the satisfaction of Parliament that this part of the railway was worth the colony giving £618,000, whatever might be said now about its only costing £1,200,000. The only thing involved in the variation between what the House assented to last year and what it is asked to assent to now is not a question as to the amount we should contribute for the cost of the land, but as to whether the line is worth making at all without the Nelson portion. I ask honourable gentlemen to remember that the House deliberately assented to make this line on these terms—namely, that we should give something more than half the cost of the line in debentures in order to get that line made. That was what the Parliament agreed to do just before the general election. Why should the Premier be taunted with having deceived Nelson or any other district with regard to this railway? Parliament now proposes to go back upon the pledge which was honourably given to Canterbury and Westland on the eve of the general election. I say that on the eve of the general election the House of Representatives solemnly agreed that the railway should be made on this principle, and the only variation we ask now from this is that, if the whole of the line cannot be made on that principle, the larger and most valuable part of the railway should be made. I ask the House to pause before it allows that pledge to be departed from. I ask members to pause before they say that efforts of the last twelve years shall be thrown away and rendered nugatory and useless. I ask the House to pause before it deprives the Province of Canterbury, which has contributed to the public works of the colony out of the land-tax put upon itself by its citizens, that province which made its roads and bridges out of its own pocket, that province which made the most valuable and costly piece of its railways out of its own pocket, and which has for the last twelve years, without murmuring, provided money for railways for other parts of New Zealand, and money for roads and bridges for other parts of New Zealand, in order that they might be settled, and is to be asked year after year by Otago, Wellington, and Auckland to go on doing so—I ask the House to pause before it deprives Canterbury of the only concession she asks for. Other parts of the colony have had public works for the last twelve years at the expense of Canterbury; and is she to sit down for the future without murmuring and without complaint? I tell honourable gentlemen that a refusal now will cause a rankling feeling of wrong and injustice in Canterbury.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman has given us what I may call a resurrection speech—

Mr. REEVES.—Ah! it has brought you up!

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It is a counterpart of speeches which Canterbury members have made us familiar with for the last twelve years. The honourable gentleman has spoken this afternoon not as a member of the Government on those benches, representing the whole of the colony, but from the narrow point of view of a Canterbury member.

Mr. REEVES.—I am not ashamed of being a Canterbury man.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am not asking the honourable gentleman to be ashamed; any effort of mine in that direction would be of a fruitless character. He told us that this line of railway had been part of his political existence for the last twelve years. He resurrects its political history, tells us that bit by bit in 1884 the House voted for the construction of the line, and he now practically explains that Parliament refuses to vary the resolution then passed. Why does he not take up the cudgels for the North Island Trunk Railway, the Otago Central line, the Eketahuna-Woodville line, and many others which have received the assent of Parliament, and on which very little progress has been made? Sir Julius Vogel, in introducing the question of the Midland Railway line in 1884, makes use of this language:—

“Sir, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I desire to explain that it contains the conditions under which a work of vast importance to the colony may be constructed without imposing upon the colony any direct burden.”

That is the first sentence of his speech; and a little lower down he goes on to say,—

“But we think the work is now so important that, while we cannot recommend the House to undertake direct liability for the cost, still it is a work in respect to which the colony may offer large inducements to private enterprise to construct it."

And a little further down he says,—

"The land is of so poor and doubtful a character that the amount prescribed in the Railways Construction Act is not considered a sufficient inducement to obtain the necessary capital."

Then a little further down again he says,—

"We are prepared to take our stand upon this, and no iteration in this House or in the Press will shake us from it: that, as the colony is already burdened with direct demands for borrowing, it is the duty of the Government, where it sees its way to do so, to encourage certain large works for the benefit of the colony without the aid of borrowed money."

Now, Sir, we all know the political history of the gentleman who uttered those words, and the condemnation which has again and again been heaped upon him for plunging this colony into debt; and yet he flinched from asking the colony to borrow for the construction of this railway, confining himself strictly to a land endowment. But the Government on those benches quite gaily propose to add £618,000 to the debt of the colony. The debt of the colony in 1884 was £29,429,000, and the debt to-day is £38,874,000, an increase of £9,300,000. In case it might be said that our debt had only increased in proportion to population, I have estimated as closely as I can the population of the colony in 1884 at 534,000 souls, and in 1894 at 635,000. Now, Sir, these figures show that, while the population has only increased by 22 per cent. in these ten years, our debt has increased by no less than 31 per cent. And now we have the non-borrowing Government, the Government of self-reliance, the Government of strict economy, actually out-Vogeling Vogel, and calling upon Parliament to support this proposal. What is the proposal? To cast a cool £618,000 of increased debt upon the back of the taxpayers of the colony.

Mr. WARD.—You supported a proposal for £500,000 the other day.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I did support the borrowing of a moderate sum for constructing roads on Government land and to purchase Native lands; but I did not vote for the £500,000, and the honourable gentleman knows it. In 1891, when the Railways Construction Act, under which the Manawatu Railway was afterwards constructed, was passed, the Government of the day was denounced for giving a subsidy in land of 80 per cent., but the Government of 1894 increased the subsidy designed for the Midland line to 50 per cent. But, Sir, this non-borrowing, self-reliant Government actually urges us to give a bonus of £618,000 in cash—not in land—to construct this railway-line. I call the proposal nothing less than monstrous. The honourable gentleman at the head of the Government is continually telling us that theirs is a Government of the people—that they keep the people always in view. Who are the people in this case? The people in Westland? Do we find a growing population there? Do we find the wealth of the colony being added to by a fast-increasing population there, or an increase of products? By the census of March, 1874, the population of Westland was 14,860; in 1878 it had increased to 16,932; and by the last census, in 1891, it had come down to 15,887. Now, Sir, If the Government really wish to legislate for the people, to legislate for the good of the greatest number, I invite them to look at the statistics of the Provincial District of Wellington, for instance. By the census of March, 1874, the population of the Wellington Provincial District was 27,790. By the census of 1891 we find that the population has increased to no fewer than 97,725 souls; and, to give additional point to the enormous difference in the rate of development in the two sections of the colony, I wish the honourable gentleman to realise that the increase of the population in the Wellington Provincial District between the census of 1886 and that of 1891 was over twenty thousand, or nearly five thousand more than the total population of Westland. And here we have the Government of the day proposing to borrow an enormous sum of money for the benefit of a district which shows such miserable results as these in comparison with other more prosperous parts of the country. It is not my wish for a moment to prejudice the District of Westland, but it is the duty of every member to look facts in the face, and to legislate for the many and not for the few. The Westland District was opened thirty years ago, and in all that time they have opened sufficient country to carry twenty thousand cattle and twenty-three thousand sheep. Last year they produced 1,619 tons of potatoes, and the produce of about 200 acres.

Mr. GUINNESS.—Give us the whole district, not a part.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I have given the figures for the whole District of Westland, and will supply them to the honourable gentleman. If he can show me that I am in error I will, of course, withdraw what I have said. I am quoting in all good faith the figures supplied to me by the department. The production of oats was 1,900 bushels, of other crops 416 acres; in sown grasses there is a little under 50,000 acres, and in hay about 2,000 acres. Now, these figures tell us, in language such as he who runs may read, that, in spite of the best market in the colony at their door, the figures I have quoted represent the development attained in all these years from the millions of acres we have in the Westland District. And yet we are told that the colony, in getting this land back from the Midland Railway Company, as is proposed, is going to derive a great benefit. The company would not be offering to return it if they could settle a population upon it, as we are able to do on our bush-lands in the North Island. The Hon. the Minister of Education was good enough to tell us that, failing the £618,000 provided in the present Bill, the colony was bound to make up that amount in land under the present contract. Surely the honourable gentleman forgot that he was speaking to men of reasonable intelligence. If the land concessions were really convertible into £618,000 in cash, does the honourable gentleman mean to tell us that the London syndicates would not take that land up just as readily as the £618,000 in cash which it is proposed to give? The honourable gentleman shakes his head; but I cannot see where the difference lies. The colony would be bound, if the case is as he put it to the House, to make up the full amount, and the syndicate in London would care little how it was made up so long as they pocketed the cash. But the honourable gentleman must know that what he has put before us is altogether misleading, because the land is not of a quality that can be converted into cash. Then he quoted a long paper to us showing the expenditure of borrowed money in the different parts of the colony since 1886. I have the figures before me, and, without giving the gross amounts, they mean that in the Provincial District of Auckland the expenditure has been at the rate of £8 per head of the population; in Hawke's Bay, £7 per head; in Wellington, £9 per head; in the Nelson District, £5 per head; in Marlborough, £3 per head; in the Canterbury District, £3 per head; and in the Westland District no less than £15 per head of the population. In Otago and Southland the expenditure was £7 per head. Now, Sir, surely the Canterbury District has not so much to complain of, although the expenditure was only £3 per head of the population, because every one knows, who knows Canterbury at all, that as far as roading and railway communication are concerned there is no provincial district throughout the whole colony that is so well off as that district.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. REEVES.—We made our own roads.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman says that Canterbury made her own roads. That is true in a sense, but he puts it in a very misleading way, because the colony, in the first instance, endowed Canterbury with a landed estate out of which she was enabled to make her roads, and of course the money, in a level country like that, went very much further than money would go in the rough and hilly districts of the colony. Then, if we take Canterbury and Westland together, we find the expenditure of borrowed money at per head of the population upon the railways alone amounts to £4 per head; and these two districts have therefore not so much to complain of, when the average for the whole colony is only £6 per head of the population. Then, Sir, if this railway-line is constructed, what is bound to happen is that pressure will be brought to bear on the colony in every possible way from Canterbury and Westland to compel the purchase of the line. The colony will first have spent £618,000, as proposed by the Bill, in addition to the large sum of money which has been already spent by handing over 300,000 acres of Canterbury lands to the company, and then, after all, the colony will have to buy the railway—a veritable white elephant in every conceivable way. The honourable gentleman, and those who are on his side on this question, have also forgotten to tell us that if this railway-line is opened, and if the traffic proves to be what they anticipate, a large part of it must necessarily be at the expense of the harbour-works we have constructed on the West Coast at an enormous cost to the colony. Those works would necessarily suffer very heavily indeed; and the gain—if there should be any gain from the working of the railway—will be to a large extent, if not wholly or more than wholly, lost by the loss to those two important ports. The honourable gentleman tells us that unless this railway is constructed Canterbury will suffer under a rankling sense of injustice. I for one would never be a party to doing anything unjust or unfair against Canterbury; but Canterbury cannot very well complain of her present position either with regard to roads or railways; and, if the Midland Railway is not constructed, what will be the measure of injury to Canterbury? Will she send less produce to the West Coast? Will she suffer seriously in any other way? I altogether fail to see it. To-day she furnishes the West Coast with most of the agricultural produce required, and if the railway is never constructed she will always continue to do so, as far as I am able to judge. Why, therefore, should she suffer a rankling sense of injustice if this line is never constructed? Then, the Premier told us that the construction of the line would find employment for something like two thousand men. The honourable gentleman has always told this House that he has steadily resisted the finding of employment for men except upon reproductive works. Does the honourable gentleman contend for a moment that the construction of the East and West Coast Railway would be a reproductive work? The honourable gentleman knows that all the testimony of those whose opinion is worth anything is altogether against such a conclusion. He appealed to us on account of the toilers—our brother toilers. It would be much better if the honourable gentleman kept such phrases as that for his election speeches. In this House we prefer to hear common-sense, whether from the occupants of the Government benches or from any other members who may address the House. He tells us that the extremely low prices of produce gives Canterbury a claim upon the rest of the colony. Canterbury has no doubt suffered heavily, as has the whole colony, but I cannot see that Canterbury is entitled to any special treatment any more than any other part of the colony. The Premier told us that there are five million acres on the West Coast available for settlement, and that some of it in the direction of Okarito consisted of large tracts of level land very valuable indeed for grazing purposes, if not for agriculture. I deny altogether that there is any extent of good land in the Okarito district, or, in fact, in any part of Westland: indeed, the nature of the timber growing on the greater part of it is sufficient indication to any practical man that, taken as a whole, settlement on the land cannot in our day be a success. As long as we have hundreds of thousands of fertile acres in the North Island unoccupied, and other large areas only partly developed, the stream of settlement will never go in the direction of Westland. It is quite true that there is some valuable timber, but its area, according to the report of the Commission read by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, is comparatively limited. The information is that only about two hundred thousand acres are available, and I need scarcely point out that, with the present output, this, if not cut out, will certainly be very much reduced. I appeal to honourable members who have been sent to this House pledged to a policy of non-borrowing and self-reliance to vote against this Bill; and, if they are determined to break their pledges, let them vote for the purchase of the Manawatu Railway, or, better still, for the extension of the Main Trunk line into the heart of the Awarua Block, where the Government have lately acquired a great deal of valuable land for settlement purposes, and they will there find a field for expenditure which would be much more profitable. I could not give a silent vote on this question, nor, in justice to my constituents, do other than oppose this Bill at every stage.

Mr. BELL.—I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than a few moments, but it is due to myself that I should state very briefly the reasons why I differ entirely from my honourable friends near me who have spoken, and why I support the Bill before the House. I shall ask you, Sir, whether I am at liberty to vote on the question or not, for the reasons I am about to state. Two years ago I was the advocate for this company before a Committee of this House, and I am not at all clear whether under the Standing Orders, and considering the relation of the partnership of which I am a member to the Midland Railway Company, I am at liberty to deliver a vote on the question; but that will not prevent me from speaking. If this were a proposal to give the money of the colony to the company I should for one oppose the Bill. But, Sir, it is not so. The colony has conceded to the company—that is the endowment promise—that its right of selection shall be the value which appears by the proportions set out in the contract of 1888, which honourable members will find in Volume 2 of the Appendices of 1888. If the railway be completed by the company the colony will have to give an equivalent of £618,000. What the Minister of Education said was correct—and probably the House knows it perfectly well—that there is no use talking about the land being valueless and the company having been obliged to take valueless land. Six million acres were set aside, and the company are entitled to go on selling and selling until they obtain £618,000. There is no doubt about the wording of the contract. Therefore the colony has got to find that amount; and whether it finds it now and takes the land or not is as much a matter of indifference as the making of the line is a matter of importance. Then, the Premier and the Minister of Education will differ from me in the reason I am now about to state. In my opinion, quite apart from the question of whether the colony is being asked or not to give any concession to the company at present other than the extension of time, the colony is indebted to the company. I am not going over the ground I took before the Public Accounts Committee. If I were to attempt to do that I should occupy the time of the House very much longer than is allotted to a member, and it is not at all my desire to enter into a long discussion of the kind, but I will take one point alone, and the main point—what I have conceived to be the clear point which the colony can never escape from. And on this point I shall differ entirely from the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government. He conducted the case for the Government before the Committee in 1892, and I conducted the case for the Midland Company, and we then differed. But the House will understand this point, which is very clear and very concise: In the 16th article of the contract of 1888 the colony reserved to itself the power to reserve for mining purposes 750,000 acres of land, so that the land taken by the colony for mining purposes should not be open for selection by the company. The colony was entitled to set apart for itself this area of land, and free it from the lien the company had on all lands within the B1 area. Now, the provision of the contract is this: The lands so set apart and proclaimed from time to time—and this is the point I want honourable gentlemen to consider—the lands so set apart and proclaimed from time to time are not in the aggregate to exceed 750,000 acres; and no more than 10,000 acres are to be so set apart or proclaimed in any one block at any one time. What the colony did was this: It reserved the whole of the Grey Valley and the lands surrounding it in successive Proclamations, with evasive intervals of time, and without any break in continuity of the boundaries. It was said that was within the legal interpretation of the contract. Was it within the honest interpretation of the contract? In my opinion—of course, the House will discount it to its full extent—in my opinion it was not within the legal power of the colony to do such a thing; and it certainly was, in my opinion—quite apart from the legal point—not an honest interpretation of the contract. Understand me, I am not accusing the honourable gentleman; the honourable gentleman looked at it, no doubt, from the point of view of the colony—that the Grey Valley and the lands surrounding it were lands which it was necessary in the interests of the miners to reserve, and, inasmuch as he could only reserve 10,000 acres at one time, he proceeded to do it by Proclamation following Proclamation, so as to get the whole. When my honourable colleague the senior member for Wellington City said he was so confident of the result if the colony were to go to law, I felt this as the one point of all points to lay before the House, and I say to my honourable friend and to the Minister of Education the colony will find the war a real one. I believe the company may have been—indeed, I believe it has been—negligent in the performance of its contract; I believe that the company is open to a considerable amount of honest attack on the ground that it never did provide the funds necessary for the completion of the line. I admit that, from my point of view—of course, I am not speaking for the company; I do not suppose the company would admit that. I am here to speak as a representative of the people in this House. But, on the other hand, the colony, in its attitude to the company, has placed obstacle after obstacle in the way of the carrying-out by the company of its work. And it is a fact—though the company has no right to complain of legislation which followed—it is the truth that the endowment—the provision by which the company was entitled to this large area of land, became so worthless as to make the company's finance impossible. Everybody, of course, must accept the chances of legislation, and nobody has a right to complain in a country of the result to him of the incidence of taxation. This has been the result, and the company has no right to complain so far as the incidence of taxation has interfered with the finance of the company. But to go back to the point. As I have told the House, it is impossible for me to enter into matters which members will find discussed at length if they take the trouble to read the address I delivered to the Committee in 1892. But this point which I have stated must commend itself to the mind of every colonist as forming so grave a question for compromise that the mere extension of time proposed is one which may well be given in order to settle such a question as this. As I have said, were the proposal one to give the company more than it is entitled to, I for one would oppose it. But this I will say, in conclusion: The gift by the company of the land—the proposal to transfer to the company £618,000—is a surrender by the company of the profit which the company would have had if left to sell the land. There is a possibility, according to my idea—there was a probability to the company—that the company would not only get this £618,000, but the increasing value of the land by reason of the railway running through it, which would give to it in land a value of a million, as representing the £618,000, which was the B1 value. The colony gets that, if it be anything. If it be nothing, then I say the colony misled the people in England. I have heard speeches referred to by my honourable friend which show that there was nothing of the kind. There have been speeches, on the other hand, which are indicative of an entirely contrary view.

Mr. Buchanan

5.0. But this is certain: that if we knew—and we knew this as well as we know it now—that this was worthless land, useless country, which we were offering to these capitalists as an inducement to build this railway for us, we did a dishonest and disgraceful thing; and the sooner we remedy it the better. I will not be one to admit that the Colony of

New Zealand made a base and false representation to the London market for the purpose of inducing capitalists to bring their money here where it might become the prey of the colony. I believe this to be a surrender by the company of a very great deal; I believe it to be the offer by the colony of nothing but an extension of time; and I believe, if rejected, the result to the colony as a whole will not be creditable to it. The result may possibly be financial loss, and on those grounds, and because I believe it to be right, and though the popular thing is to oppose it, I shall, if permitted, give my vote in favour of the measure introduced by the Government.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman has made a speech, and really I wondered which way he was going to vote. It is satisfactory to know that he is going to vote in one direction. I intend to oppose this measure, and I do so because from the very first I recognised that the work was never likely to be carried out, and I have from the first opposed this undertaking. I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any length; I should like to say, however, regarding the last statement made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell),—that, if we knew the country to be mountainous and glacierly we had no right to induce capitalists to put their money into it,—that we knew nothing of the sort. The company had ample opportunities. They sent their representative here, and he examined the country, and went Home and reported to his people. He was so absolutely satisfied that he reported on reaching Home that the land was quite good. So there is no use in stating on the floor of this House that the colony was deceiving the Home investors. I believe that we are simply committing the colony to a liability of £618,000. I heard the opinion stated by the Minister of Education, and which was supported by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), that we were liable for either cash or land to the extent of £618,000; but I do not believe that is a correct view at all. I believe the company are entitled to select land out of the prescribed area, and are not entitled to call upon the country if they are not satisfied after they exhaust the whole of that area. The whole of it may not be worth £618,000, and I do not believe that they are entitled to fall back upon the colony for cash for the balance.

Mr. REEVES.—I did not say so.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I gathered that most distinctly from the Minister of Education—that we had to give them either land or cash. I heard the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) also say “Hear, hear” to that statement, and I am quite sure those two honourable members agree that the company are entitled to land, and, if any deficiency occurs, then to cash.

Mr. BELL.—Land up to six million acres.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—And if these six million acres did not yield £618,000, then the company is entitled to cash to make up the balance.

Mr. BELL.—I did not understand the Minister to say that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—What the Minister said was quite distinct on that point, and I am amazed to think that any member of this House should have indorsed the statement. I do not think the colony is liable for anything of the kind but the six million acres, and I say, in reference to this measure, that we are not justified in putting a responsibility of this sort on the shoulders of the colony. The difference between guaranteeing the £618,000 and giving land is that interest begins from date, whereas no interest is accumulating in respect of a land-grant. A number of us have consistently opposed the work; and, if we agree to give this £618,000 in cash, then we are favouring Canterbury at the expense of the other parts of the colony, and if the country is going in for the construction of these public works, then you have the North Island Main Trunk line, which is as much entitled to consideration as the West Coast line in Canterbury; and there is the Otago Central in precisely the same position, the Gore-Kelso, the Heriot Extension, the Catlin's River, and other lines in the South Island. For this reason I beg to oppose the Bill.

Mr. HEKE.—I do not intend to say much on this matter, but I should like to say that all the members who have spoken on the Bill have put forward the strongest grounds why they say it is correct to oppose the Bill now before the House. As far as I understand the Bill, it sets out that the colony is to hand over to the Midland Railway Company the sum of £618,000. Now, we have heard during this session honourable members, especially those from Christchurch, urging upon the Government to reduce the tariff rates, and all sorts of arguments have been advanced in favour of trying to decrease the indebtedness of the colony; but at the present time every member can see, and even those who have raised arms against the colony being put to extra debt—those honourable members now are open to vote for the sum of £618,000 to increase the debt of the colony. It seems to me very amusing that, although members stand up coolly in this House, and express to it a desire to relieve the poorer classes in the colony from the burdens they are now suffering under, at the same time they wish to cast on the colony a matter which they believe to be beneficial to themselves alone, and not to the colony as a whole. They intend to vote for such a measure as this, which every one can quite clearly see tends to nothing else but to increase the debt of the colony. The poorer classes of this country are beginning to ask whether it is advisable to believe the actions and statements of the Government on the hustings or not. It is quite apparent in all the different parts of the colony at the present time that the working-classes are rising to the occasion, and that they see that all the promises made before them by the Liberal members of the present Government go for nothing at all. They begin to see that their actions in this House are the reverse of what they stated before the electors. I refer to some of the remarks made by the honourable member for Nelson City in reference to the Premier. When in Nelson, before the last general election, it appears the Premier told the people there that he intended to make the company carry out the whole contract; and now, in his place, after he comes into this House, he introduces a measure which is entirely inconsistent with all the statements made before the country and the policy which was laid down by the late John Ballance. It has been stated by the present Premier that the Government do not intend to borrow; but this policy is almost cast aside; and why it has been cast aside I do not know. I can only surmise, and every member of the House can surmise, that the only reason is that the Government have appropriated all the moneys that were set apart to release the colony from its indebtedness, and to carry out works that were quite unnecessary in many respects. I will refer to the purchase of Native lands. The purchase of Native lands, as I have always stated in this House, is not necessary at the present time. What is really necessary is as stated by honourable members hailing from Canterbury and others—that is to say, that the Colonial Treasurer should decrease the debt of the colony. That is the step to take, and to do this we should cease purchasing more Native land at the present time, and bring about a system upon which the land held by the Crown now, and those lands which the Crown has bought from the Natives during the last few years, should be settled. The Crown lands at present lying idle amount to something like ten million acres; the first-class land—land suitable for agricultural purposes—amounts to two million acres, and eight are fit for pastoral purposes. It would be far more beneficial to the colony as a whole, and to the poorer classes, to get this land settled. I have also stated that the best policy that the present Government, or any other Government, could pursue was not to purchase Native lands, but to lease them from the Natives, and if such a policy is introduced by the Government it will relieve the State of having to constantly pay interest on the money borrowed from England, and it would dispose of a great deal of the interest accruing from the moneys borrowed in former years. It is apparent that there is no desire on the part of the Government at the present time to decrease the debt of the colony. It is their desire, apparently, at the present time to increase that debt; and then they coolly tell the electors who sent them here that they desire to decrease the debt. This is quite a reversal of the action that they said they would take, and of the policy which sent them to this House. I do not wish to say anything further than this: I quite sympathize with all those persons who have undertaken to construct this railway from the west coast of the South Island, and who have placed confidence in the whole matter, with a view to recouping themselves and making a fair amount of profit from the concern when the undertaking was taken over by them. At the same time, we ought to see that the promoters or agents of that company, who have negotiated the contract with the Government, must have known that circumstances would arise when a change of taxation in the colony would take place, and that all its property and lands would be liable to the changes of taxation. I wish to say, if the Premier can only assure this House that they intend to hand back all the land which they do not wish to use at the present time to the Government, and not ask for the debentures, which amount to £618,000, then I can see my way quite clear to support that intention. In conclusion, I wish to say that every borrowing measure that has been introduced into the House by the present Government I have opposed. This is another borrowing measure, involving the amount of £618,000, and I do not think it would be consistent for me to vote for this sum to be saddled on the taxpayers of the colony.

Mr. T. Mackenzie

Mr. GUINNESS.—What about the six million acres of land we are getting?

Mr. HEKE.—In reference to the six million acres of land, if it is good land, as the honourable member for Mawhera says—I know the honourable member for the Grey rather prefers to be called by that Maori name, “the honourable member for Mawhera”—if there is any prospect at all of a beneficial result arising from that large area of land, it will be to the interest of the company to hold on to that area, and to try to do the best they can to settle it themselves. Therefore the interjection made by the honourable member for Mawhera goes for nothing at all, in my opinion.

Mr. ALLEN.—I should like to say, Sir, that I have devoted a little time to this question, and I always take an opportunity of speaking on this important question when it comes before this House. The whole history of this affair is a very unfortunate one for the colony, and I am afraid, if this Bill is carried, the unfortunate history will continue in the future. Ever since the railway was started, ever since this House was asked for the first time to take on its own shoulders a burden that would be very serious, and a hard one to bear, up to the present time, the whole history has been a very unfortunate one. It is quite true that in 1887 it was necessary that some alteration should be made by the colony in the contract, but I am not at all certain now that it was wise even to make that alteration. At any rate, there was an alteration made, but out of that alteration there was some good accruing to both sides. The colony secured the right to take a certain amount of land—some 750,000 acres—for mining purposes, and the colony gave up the right to the alternate blocks. That was a fair compromise. Alterations, it is true, have been made since that time. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) has pointed out that the alterations that have been made, or, at any rate, the dealings as regards the alterations, have been certainly in favour of the company and not of the colony. The company secured on every occasion more than they gave, and therefore the company have no reason to complain. But the Premier, in moving the second reading of the Bill this afternoon, laid great stress, it seemed to me, upon one point only, and that was that it was necessary the colony should give an extension of time to the company to complete the contract. Now, why did he take so much interest in such a point as that? If that is the only argument he had to give—namely, that we should give the company an extension of time before breaking the existing contract—surely that is a very weak argument why we should support this Bill. There was no threat from the Premier of possible litigation. That threat has been thrown out from time to time by several honourable members, but I do not consider it serious. It may be or it may not be serious, but I want to point out this: that the Premier this afternoon made no use of this threat, because, I believe, he did not think there was much in it. He has before told the House, last year, that, so far as the threat of litigation was concerned, he had no fear of it whatever; and I suppose he is of the same opinion still. The Premier, having no fear of litigation, has, of course, not ventured to tell the House that there is any fear of litigation this afternoon.

Mr. SEDDON.—What I said was that I did not fear the result of litigation.

Mr. ALLEN.—That is what I mean. Then, I say that the Premier, having stated that he had no fear of the result of litigation, comes down this afternoon and tells us that the only concession that should be made to the company is an extension of time. If that is so, why does he come down to the House with a Bill which alters the whole aspect of the contract, and alters it in a very serious way to the colony?—because he has opened up a very large question indeed, which affects not only the West Coast, Nelson, and Canterbury, but also the whole colony. If the colony is to borrow money for the opening-up of railway-lines, then let us have a general policy to complete all the lines that require to be completed.

Mr. GUINNESS.—Would you support it?

Mr. ALLEN.—That is another question altogether; but, if it is to be done, what I say is that, in all fairness, it ought to be done as much for the Otago Central Railway, the North Island Trunk Railway, and various other lines that might be put in the same category. It is not fair to come down to the House and ask them to break a contract—for that is what it is—or that the colony should be asked to borrow £618,000 in order to enable the company to construct a railway for their own benefit. What do we get by it? We get the right over five million acres of land, and if the contract is allowed to run its course this five million acres of land will, in a short time, come to us. As I said before, the Premier states that there is no fear of litigation. Then, why does he not allow the contract to run out? Does he mean to say that the five million acres will be locked up after the expiry of the time for the completion of the contract? I say we should compel the company to fulfil their contract, or, if they cannot complete their contract, other negotiations would have to take place with regard to the land now locked up. Then, I say, if there is no fear of the result of litigation, the contract should be allowed to run its due course. If the contract is not fulfilled, then the company should be left to bear the evil results, whatever they may be. If we have fulfilled our part of the contract, why should we be asked now to make a serious alteration in the policy we have adopted in regard to this railway, and give money instead of land, especially when other railways are languishing for want of funds themselves? Now, there is another point which has been touched upon by other honourable members, and it is a point of some importance. The company entered into a contract to complete the line not only from the east to the west coast, but also from the Nelson end; and the Premier, in speaking on one point of the line—the Belgrove-Nelson Section—made use of remarks of this kind last year: that it would be a breach of faith to allow this piece of line to remain unconstructed. Now, if it was a breach of faith in 1893, how is it that the Premier comes down to the House and says, “The best policy I can put before you is this: for the abandonment of the construction of the Nelson-Belgrove Section; and what was a breach of faith in 1893 is now, in 1894, the best policy to pursue”? I think the company ought to be held to the construction of that part, and also to the completion of the contract. They entered into a bargain with the colony, and I say that bargain ought to be kept, and if they are not going to complete it they ought to be the sufferers, and not the taxpayers of the colony. Then, with regard to the proposal that is to be made, we are told that a certain amount of money is to be given in yearly instalments, for the first two years at all events, to this company, in lieu of land-grants. I would point out that this is different from the proposal of last year, which was that the money was to be given in lieu of land-grants—that is, that the company was to construct the line partly out of the money that was placed in their hands by the Parliament of this country, and that they would give up their land-grants—that is, that the money to be used for the construction of the line should be £618,000. The land-grant was in a similar position. The land was sold, and we may presume—I think rightly—that the proceeds of the sale were placed to the capital account of the railway. Now the proposal is, it seems to me, a very different one. The debentures that are now to be placed at the disposal of the company are not to go to capital account, but are to be used as a means of providing interest to those who supply a million of money for the construction of the East and West Coast Railway. That seems to me to be a very different position from that which we took up last year. We are not going to find the money to assist capital account, but to pay interest on the money that is lent, for I do not know how many years. And what security have we that the necessary money will be raised and utilised as it ought to be? It is true the money has to be spent before they get our debentures, but the security does not seem to me to be a sufficient one, and it would be a much more satisfactory process if our money were used in the construction of the line rather than to pay interest on the cost of construction. They ought to find interest themselves. Now, I think it is a very unfair thing that the colony should be asked not only to break a contract of this kind, but to break it to the detriment of New Zealand, because it is to the detriment of the colony that the line should not be completed by the contractors, and that it should be asked to bear the whole burden of the interest of the £618,000 for I do not know how many years. So soon as they get their debentures we have to pay interest; and what do we get in return? The honourable gentleman says we get the land. But in the ordinary process of time we shall get the land; the company finds that it cannot fulfil the conditions of its contract. How can the Premier come down to us with this Bill upon so flimsy a statement as that which he made to-day? Willingly would the House grant, I doubt, an extension of time if that is all that is necessary, but the House cannot be asked willingly grant the abandonment of the principle of land-grants and the payment of interest. Those are really, so far as I can judge, all the sound reasons—and they are very sound—honourable members will admit—which the Premier adduced this forenoon in moving the second reading of the Bill. It is quite true that he did adduce some minor reasons, but rather, adduced some reasons which did not directly affect the particular matter before us, but were in favour of the construction of the line. I say that arguments in favour of the construction of the line, on the contrary, have nothing whatever to do with the present position. We entered into a contract with a certain company. It is true that that contract has been amended, but it is also true, as has been pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), that, so far as the amendments are concerned, the company have got the better of the colony. Yet we are now asked to abandon all that has been done in the past and allow these people not to carry out their contract. We are asked to put our hand in our pocket and subscribe £618,000 in solid hard cash to enable the people to complete their work. They ought to complete their bargain on the terms on which they entered into it. They should have entered into it, if they were wise men, knowing what they were doing. If they did not know what they were doing, surely the colony is to blame, and they ought to carry out what they hope the colony will see that this is done—contract, and nothing but the contract, and there can be a reasonable compromise made at on both sides. The compromise we are asked for is no compromise: it is an entire under of the colony's position. It is an entire giving-up of the principle upon which the line was to be built; and, further than that, it means the abandoning of all the other railways in the colony: at least, so it seems to me. If the colony is to borrow money—and it is neither more nor less than borrowing money—for the construction of railway-lines should do so on some definite and approved principle. The Premier told us, in moving the second reading, that the tourist traffic and the mineral traffic were sufficient to justify the construction of the line.

Mr. Allen

Mr. SEDDON.—The timber.

Mr. ALLEN.—Yes, and the timber; and I deal with that first, as the honourable gentleman has mentioned it. The timber is only, after all, a very ephemeral product. It is not to be very many years before the timber has disappeared.

Mr. GUINNESS.—Certainly not.

Mr. ALLEN.—Let the honourable gentleman consider for a moment. How long, after all, will the timber remain there? How long will it remain, for instance, on the West Coast, if the railway, if the railway is constructed? Timber, I think, can be put out of the question altogether, for two reasons—first of all, because the timber cannot last for a very long time; and, secondly, for this reason: that it can be conveyed just as well and as cheaply by sea as it can be by land. And this argument has just as much force with regard to minerals as to timber. I say that coal can be conveyed from the West Coast by sea as cheaply as by rail, and in all probability it can be carried at a much cheaper rate, because the maintenance cost of this railway, considering the rough country it goes over, and the climatic influences which will disturb it, will be very, very large. It certainly will remain in this: that, as far as cost is concerned, conveyance will, I believe, cost more along the railway-line than by sea. And even if it is a little bit cheaper, surely that is not a valid argument for the colony to put its hand in its pocket and go in for a loan for the purpose of constructing this line. If it be an argument that this line must be constructed if the colony's borrowed money because it will convey minerals across the Island, surely that is a very strong argument in favour of the construction of many other lines throughout the colony—lines that are to be constructed not for the conveyance of minerals, but for the purpose of placing the colony's hand upon the colony's land. That is a far stronger argument than can possibly be used in favour of the conveyance of coal.

Mr. O'REGAN.—That applies to the West Coast also.

Mr. ALLEN.—“That applies to the West Coast”! The honourable member knows that if the West Coast were deprived of its coal and the population there would very rapidly decrease: in fact, I am told that the population there is decreasing now. What would it be if these two products were taken away altogether, and if the district had to depend upon ordinary settlement? What would be the position of the West Coast under those circumstances? I say there is nothing to justify the borrowing of money by the colony to complete this line. There is nothing to justify it, if the argument of settlement is to be used. Let us compare that line with others. For instance, compare it with the North Island Main Trunk line, or even the Otago Central. I say, as regards the question of settlement, there can be no argument about it whatever. The North Island Trunk line will go through land which will hold a large population, and the Otago Central line will also go through country which will hold a considerable population. In those cases you would have permanent and satisfactory settlement of the land, settlement which will not be ephemeral, but which would become of more and more value to the colony as years go on. What are the conditions with regard to this line? It depends, as I say, not on settlement, but upon the production of and traffic in minerals. But, as I pointed out, that traffic can be as well conducted by sea as by rail. There is nothing to justify us in borrowing money for the completion of this line while other lines are not completed the completion of which would really assist in the permanent settlement of the colony. The Premier said that all the arguments in favour of the construction of this line were just as good now as they ever were. I am quite willing to accept that. If it be true that the arguments in favour of the construction of this line are as good now as they ever were, why does the company come and ask us to alter the terms of the contract? If the conditions are the same, why are we asked to put our hands in our pockets and give the company so much hard cash? Then, with regard to the company, surely it has been in a very curious position from the first. I do not know how they entered into the contract in the first instance, but surely if they were wise—and it is to be presumed they were—they must have entered into the first contract having at least taken some precautions before they did so, and knowing where they could get the money to carry out the work. Did they do that? I cannot say whether they did so or not: but, leaving that out of the question altogether, and coming down to last year, a proposal was then made for an alteration in the contract. We had a statement from the Premier of the colony at the time that at that time the company was in a position to raise the whole of the money to complete the line, and I presume he meant by that the completion of the line not only from the east to the west coast, but also from Nelson to Belgrove. The Premier now admits, in his own statement, that even under the new proposals the company can only raise sufficient money to complete the railway from the east to the west coast. The honourable gentleman abandons altogether Nelson and the other portion of Westland. Sir, I do think that the position the Premier has taken up to-day must be to him a very unpleasant one. He and others who at the time represented Canterbury and the West Coast were the very members who forced this railway upon the colony.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—The Premier was one of the strongest supporters then, but in 1893 he said that one of the things in his political existence which he most regretted was the action he took with regard to this land. He said, "I am sorry I entered into a contract which would give away over six million acres of land, and which would not be settled."

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—I remember his words quite well, and they are also recorded in Hansard, and I can easily find them. I say the members from Canterbury, Nelson, and Westland have nobody to blame for this contract but themselves. In spite of the House and the verdict of the country, they forced this Railway Bill through, and I say we are suffering now for what they did at that time. They themselves are to blame, and not the rest of the colony. I do not see what justification they have for coming to the House now as another solid band, but as a portion only of the original band, which now has sacrificed the people of Nelson. I cannot see what justification the rest of the band have for saying this: "We want the colony to take further liabilities upon its shoulders with regard to this railway." And what will be the result in future if we do not take a firm stand and say, "We have conceded all that we intend to concede"? The result will be this: If the line does not pay, do you mean to tell me that a further effort will not be made in this House to put still further liabilities on the shoulders of the colony? What will be the position then? That the colony will renew the large area of land; the colony will have given £618,000 in solid cash, and then, if it is a non-paying line, it will be forced upon the colony by the solid vote of the members from Canterbury and Westland; and so a further serious burden will be placed upon the colony's shoulders. I think the position taken up is unreasonable and unfair, and I hope members of the House will justify the opinion of the electors of the country and will take this stand, and say, "We have entered into a bargain which we are prepared to carry out, but we are not prepared to go beyond that; and, if the company has got into difficulties, it is through their own fault and not ours, and the company must bear the responsibility."

Mr. BUTTON.—It would be exceedingly gratifying to me if I could only see my way to support the Bill before the House. I have endeavoured to approach this question with the feelings of a jurymen, endeavouring to listen to the arguments so that I might come to a satisfactory conclusion; but I cannot shake off altogether the feelings of sympathy which I entertain towards the West Coast and Canterbury, feelings which were engendered by a long residence amidst the beautiful scenery of the West Coast, and amidst the genial and kindly people both of the West Coast and Canterbury. But, Sir, I have taken a very great interest in this question since many years ago, when there was no immediate hope of the railway being constructed, when it seemed to be quite in the future—this was before 1880,—at the time when the people on the West Coast, and all in that neighbourhood, earnestly desired to have communication with Canterbury. It was not, Sir, a railway to be constructed on lines such as we have in the present contract. It was not supposed that a private company would undertake so great a work. It was supposed to be a national work, and so had the sympathy of all those who knew the importance of the matter. But, nevertheless, the question now before the House may be considered a question of the Midland Railway Company against the colony, and, after hearing the arguments pro and con, I am very sorry to say that I am unable to give the Bill my support. I have very carefully listened to the arguments on both sides. I attentively listened to the Premier when he opened the debate. I was exceedingly anxious to know what would be said both in favour of the Bill and against it, because I came into the House this afternoon as far as I possibly could to give it my unbiassed and unprejudiced mind. My leanings were in favour of the Bill out of regard for my former associations with Westland and Canterbury. I refer to my sympathies in that direction in order that honourable members may see that I feel compelled to say that I cannot give a vote in favour of the Bill, and that I am now taking up an attitude I feel bound to assume having regard to the case before the House, and on which we have listened to the arguments on both sides. It appears to me that the burden of proof was upon the Premier and those who support the Bill. The question is, whether it is a desirable thing for the colony. Has the company any such claim on the colony as to render it necessary and almost indispensable that such an arrangement as this should be entered into? What are we to have for this? What does the company propose to give to the colony for relinquishing this contract? On the one hand, I find they are to construct one part of the railway—namely, from Jackson's to Springfield, a distance of fifty-seven miles; but, on the other hand, the colony is to release them from the remainder of their contract—the balance of the railway, which extends from Belgrove to Reefton, a distance of ninety-seven miles. We have, on the one hand, a railway of fifty-seven miles to be constructed, and, on the other hand, a railway of ninety-seven miles to be given up. And then we are to have the colony paying debentures to the amount of £618,250! Considerably more than half a million of money is to be guaranteed in the shape of debentures to this company, instead of the land which they were to have received. Now, it has been said that the cost of the construction of the railway which this company propose to continue and finish is something under £1,000,000. Well, if we give £618,250, that goes a long way towards meeting the million—a long way towards the construction of this piece of railway.

Mr. Allen

Mr. SEDDON.—That is incorrect; you have to take £125,000 to equip it.

Mr. BUTTON.—The equipment is not included in the contract.

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes it is.

Mr. BUTTON.—That is not what we are to pay for. Supposing it was, then we have more than half a million which would be necessary to construct this piece of railway which the company are going to construct. It is true we have the land released, and it is stated that the company, under any circumstances, were to be guaranteed land to the value of £618,000. Well, I have been looking at the contract, and, although that may be practically true, it is not said so literally. The provision that is made—and I suppose it is the only clause that refers to the matter—is clause 36 of the contract of the 3rd August, 1888, and that provides that a valuation shall be made. I should like to read the clause, Sir. If the House will indulge me I will read the whole clause, because I think honourable members will then see the bearing of this clause upon the whole matter:—

“Within three months after the expiration of one year from the completion of the said railway”—I ask honourable members to notice that; the railway is to be completed first—“an account shall be taken of all moneys theretofore received by and then owing to the company as proceeds of the land granted to and sold by the company, or otherwise sold, leased, or disposed of under these presents on its behalf, and as proceeds of its timber and coal, whether by way of purchase-money, rent, or royalty, and a valuation shall be made, either by agreement between the parties hereto or by arbitration as hereinafter provided, of all the land, timber, and coal of the company then unsold; and if the aggregate of the moneys so received and owing, together with the sum of such valuation, shall not amount to one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, or such less sum as shall represent one half of the actual cost, including equipment, of the entire railway from Springfield to Belgrove, if the company shall construct the alternative line mentioned in clause 4 hereof, the only claim of the company in respect of such difference (if any) shall be a right on the part of the company, within six months thereafter, to select further land out of the land then remaining unselected, and described as available for selection under clause 16 hereof, to the extent of such land then remaining so available. All such further land shall be valued either by agreement or arbitration as aforesaid, and the company shall not select any such further land to a value greater than the difference (if any) between the aggregate of the moneys so received and owing, together with the sum of such valuation as aforesaid, and the said sum of one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, or such less sum as shall represent one-half of the actual cost, including equipment, of the entire railway from Springfield to Belgrove, if the company shall construct the alternative line mentioned in clause 4 hereof.”

Now, then, we have here, first, that the whole line must be constructed before they can claim any advantage or privilege under this clause 36—the whole line must be constructed. But what has the Premier told us this afternoon? He has told us that the company are quite incompetent to carry out this contract—that it cannot be completed; consequently this clause could never come into effect. They are only entitled to claim this privilege when the whole line from Springfield to Belgrove, including this piece which is now proposed to be left out of the contract—the whole line is constructed. And then, again, Sir, after all, the country does not guarantee the value of the land, but only allows them to take a further amount of land out of the reserve. Why do the company now wish to have the debentures? Why would they rather have the debentures than the land? If the land was so available and good it would be easily sold. Why should they prefer to have this £618,250 in the colony's debentures rather than in the shape of land, having such a quantity as might be necessary to make up the amount? Well, Sir, I think we can easily guess the reason. It is because they know that the land is not saleable just now. Not because of its poverty. I do not say a word about that. I know there is a great deal of very good land on the West Coast. I know the land the Premier referred to between Ross and the Little Wanganui River, and I am of opinion that there is a great deal of good land there. The lands are not saleable now. Large properties are not saleable in the colony, and the company know it. They understand that. And why is that? Because of the policy of the Government. To a very large extent the depreciation in the values of lands, the unsaleableness of land, has been produced by the policy of the present Government.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. BUTTON.—Honourable members may dissent as much as they please, but I hold my own opinion upon that. I know by experience that the working of the policy of the Government has its effect upon the values of properties. I say there is a want of confidence in the colony, and in the stability of property, that has been brought about by the policy of the present Government. Those who have moneys to invest in land wonder where this policy is going to end, and what is to be the result of it; and they carefully shut up their pockets and lock up their cash-boxes, and will not invest in land. Now, the Midland Railway Company are well aware of this, and they do not care to be the owners of large blocks of land in a colony where the policy of the Government is continually shifting, and where every time it shifts it goes further and further against capitalists and those who own land. Now, Sir, if we adopt this proposal we shall have the land unlocked and thrown on our hands, and we shall be liable for the debentures. I see that by the Bill the rate of interest is to be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I have made a calculation upon that, and I think honourable members will find that it is pretty correct. I find the interest will amount to £21,688 15s. per annum. That is the amount of interest we shall have to pay on these debentures the moment they are handed over, and we shall have land hanging on our hands that will produce no interest for many years to come, probably; but nevertheless this £21,688 will be annually accruing, and will have to be paid by the colony. Now, the question, so far as that is concerned, is, Will the colony do what the company does not wish to do? Will the colony take the land and give the money for it? For it is exactly the same as if we purchased this land from the company. We may just as well offer the company £618,000 for their interest in this land. That is just the position. Well, is the colony prepared to do that, and is the colony prepared, from the moment it issues the debentures, to pay interest on those debentures; while it has all this land unoccupied, and not producing, perhaps, a single sixpence for many years? Now, Sir, a strong argument, or one which was supposed to be a strong argument, was produced before us to induce us to support this Bill—namely, that the colony was liable to some litigation. The Premier laid great stress upon the claim which the company would have for an extension of time. Well, if that were all, if the company were only entitled to an extension of time—and, of course, if so, it would only be entitled to a reasonable extension of time—I do not know that the House would feel very great regret in granting that extension of time. However, I cannot see, from the way the Premier put it, that the company would be entitled to any such extension. These alterations in the contract were a concession to the company, and I do not see that they have any title at all to an extension of time simply because they obtained further concessions. Indeed, as the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) pointed out, the Act which allowed them the last concession distinctly provides that no alterations shall be made in the terms of the contract, but that the new concession shall be read into the contract. So that it would appear they are not entitled to any extension. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) pointed out that we might be confronted by a very serious difficulty—namely, that the Premier might have put this company in very great difficulty, into very great distress, by unfairly proclaiming alternate blocks, or, if not alternate blocks, blocks of land on the Coast of ten thousand acres each, the maximum the Government were entitled to reserve under the contract. It was alleged that the Premier had reserved these from time to time by Proclamation, so that the company were unable to take advantage of them for the purposes of their contract. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) said that, as he read the contract, that was unfair—that it was not within the meaning of the contract. Well, that may or it may not be so. If the company have a claim upon the colony, the colony must fairly meet it,—if it has any such claim. I dare say the Premier will deny that it has any such claim upon the ground stated, and, at all events, it is the only one that has been put forward this afternoon that appears to have any weight at all. But we are asked now to agree to a compromise; this House is now asked to accept the provisions of this Bill, and so compromise any claim which the Midland Railway Company has upon the colony. But is this House in a position to entertain such a question? Do we know, or have we any adequate conception whatever of the extent of, the claim that this company has upon us? Have we any conception of what would be due to the company, of what would be fair to the company, as compensation for any injury or supposed injury that the company may have sustained from the action of the Premier in proclaiming these blocks of land? Sir, I say that we are in the dark. We are being asked to agree to a compromise the terms of which we know nothing at all about; and I say it would be unfair, it would be unreasonable, for this House to enter into such an arrangement—to make a compromise of the effect of which, and the terms of which, it was ignorant. Sir, I contend, as I did at the commencement, that the burden of proof was upon those who supported this Bill. It was incumbent upon them to make out their case, to show that the country was committed to this company to such an extent that it was bound to help them in their difficulty, and that this was a fair and reasonable way of meeting the company, and securing the honour as well as the interests of the colony.

Mr. Button

8.30. I think they have failed to do so, and, although, as an old West-Coaster, I feel very sorry that I cannot support my old friends in this matter, my convictions compel me to vote against this Bill.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Sir, I did not intend to say a single word on this Bill, and I should not have risen had it not been for the speech of the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). When he said the reason this company is now desirous of getting debentures for their large claim against the colony in place of taking land is to be found in the land policy of the Government I think the honourable gentleman made a very unfortunate remark. Because I think it will be admitted that if the policy now pursued by the colony in connection with the land-laws had been pursued in the past this colony would not be in the unfortunate position it is in at the present time. What has made the land policy of the colony the curse that it has been? Has it not been the fact that large companies, such as the honourable gentleman represents in this House,—

Mr. BUTTON.—I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman the Minister refers to does not represent any companies in this House, but his constituents in Auckland.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman does not directly represent those companies in this House, but every one knows he is connected with a certain number of companies who have large areas of land in the colony, and no doubt he was giving the mind of these companies when he said that they could not sell their land owing to the land policy of the present Government. Why cannot they dispose of their land? The reason is, that they demand for this land a far larger value than it is worth to the people of the colony. If the honourable gentleman's companies would bring the land down to its value to the settlers of the country they would very soon get purchasers for it. But we know these large companies have bought up large areas of land, and have lent large sums of money on land; and when they try to get the land sold for the money they have lent on it they cannot do so, and so they are keeping their lands locked up. They will not sell or do anything with them, and they are misleading the shareholders in the large companies to the effect that the estates are worth more than they really are. What has the policy of the Government to do with the blundering mistakes made by those companies in buying these large areas of land that they make no good use of? That is no reason why the policy of the Government should be censured by the honourable gentleman. I now have something to say in connection with this Midland area of land. The Colony of New Zealand has promised this company to find them in land to the value of £618,000, and for this purpose five million acres of land have been set aside. Let me here say that the senior member for Wellington City cannot free himself from responsibility for setting aside this five million acres of land. It was he and the Government with which he was associated that first initiated this contract with the Midland Railway Company, and, notwithstanding what may be said to the contrary by the honourable gentleman, if this initiation had not been entered into by his Government this contract would never have been an accomplished fact. I myself and several other members who are here were not connected with it. We raised our voices against this system of giving large areas of land for the construction of railways. Had it not been for a gallant fight made by a few members in this House on one occasion the same thing would have happened with regard to the Otago Central, and lands would have been handed over to a syndicate for the construction of that railway. When this proposition was first brought before the House a number of members I see in the House at present objected to making railways under the land-grant system, and it has now come home to the people of the colony, who can see the great mistake that was made in locking up five million acres to a syndicate in the way in which it has been done in the other Island. We have another example of this system of land-grants for the construction of railways in the Manawatu line, where land worth £250,000 was given to a company to make a railway, and now this colony will no doubt have to buy the railway, making the company a present of the whole of the land.

The same thing would apply if this company had been able to get money to make the railway and fulfil its contract. But a great injustice was done to Westland, to Canterbury, and to Nelson when it was agreed by the House to give this land for the purpose of constructing a railway; and the action I would take, and have tried to take all along, is to get back to the colony the large area of land that was sacrificed to this company; and I say the amount of the debentures we propose to give to the company in exchange for the land—getting back our land for the settlement of the people—will be a good bargain to the colony. I myself went over a large part of this land, and came back prepared to advise the Government as to whether it was desirable to give these debentures and take back the land. I have heard it stated that the land is useless—this five million acres of land. I am not going to say that the whole of it is valuable; a good deal of it is broken and poor land; but amongst this five million acres there is a large area of very good land, and another large area of fair land. Now, why has this land not been more in demand? Simply because no person could get an acre of it. Since the company got possession of it they have made selections on the East Coast, and on the grassy slopes of Canterbury, where they could get those big companies of which the honourable gentleman is a friend to purchase it and put sheep upon it. But had they wanted to make the railway a success they would have gone across the range and taken up selections in Westland, and settled the people on it. Then the people in Westland would have been satisfied: and I venture to say hundreds of people were willing to settle there, but could not get an acre of it. Not only have the company had a large number of applicants, but a large number of applications have been made to the Government. People cannot understand why the Government should have this area of land locked up, and why they are not able to get any of it for settlement. I could point out to members in this House cases where a large number of young men from the West Coast have left that part of the country and come to this Island, as they could get no land to settle on. I venture to say that if this land comes back to the Crown we shall have a large area open for settlement in a year. I could go and select blocks on the West Coast where settlers from every part of the colony would be glad to go, cut down the timber, and make grass farms of it. When we hear this land is valueless, and that that is the reason why the company will have nothing to do with it, that is an erroneous way of looking at the matter. No doubt if this company could get the cash it would be much easier for them to construct the railway, for this reason: that to properly settle the land would take a considerable amount to survey and road it, and put it in such a position that settlers would go on it, and it would be a slow process; but I venture to say that it should be made use of for settlement, because to keep it as at present deprives this colony of a large area of Crown land, and prevents the young men of the colony from going on land in that part of the colony. I say that the action I take on the present occasion, and that the Government is taking, is for the purpose of getting this land back to the colony of New Zealand for settlement. The senior member for Wellington City this afternoon made a very able speech on the subject. I heard him make a speech in the House when this subject was first introduced into the House, and I venture to say, if he takes Hansard and compares that speech with the speech of the Minister of Education this afternoon, he will find it is almost the same. At that time, when the colony was asked to give this large area of land for making the railway, the statement was that it was going to open up the whole mining district, and every word my honourable friend the Minister of Education said this afternoon was made use of by the senior member for Wellington City when he first introduced the subject. The land is not of such a poor character as some honourable members wish to represent it, and I say there are large areas of land there that could be profitably occupied, but which I am quite assured in my own mind would never be occupied under the company. If we have an area sufficient to make up the value of £618,000, and give debentures for the same amount, what is the difference? The colony at the present moment is purchasing land for the purpose of settlement, while all this large area is locked up. And there is not only the large area they would get, but a large area besides which cannot be used till such time as the company have made their selections. It is in the interests of the West Coast and of settlement in the Colony of New Zealand generally that the Government should get this land back if possible, and I say this is the best mode of getting this done; and if we do this, and at the same time get the railway made to add to the value of our own territory there, it will be a better course than to let matters go on in the way they will go if nothing is done in the present session.

Mr. McGUIRE.—Sir, I should not say a word on the subject to-night had it not been for the remarks—the very injudicious remarks—of the Minister of Lands. He has blamed the senior member for Wellington City for giving away this five million acres of land. Did not the honourable gentleman help him to do it? Will he deny that? Will the Premier deny that he had a hand in it? Will the honourable member for the Grey deny it? We have seen enough of this virtuous indignation assumed by the Minister of Lands for the purpose of misleading the public. I should have thought the honourable gentleman would have learned sense when a large quantity of land was given to the Manawatu Company to make that railway. Sir, the honourable gentleman advocated that we should buy this land back again, the alienation of which he was a party to, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. REEVES.—He will not advocate you.

Mr. McGUIRE.—He will not advocate me? I do not require his advocacy; nor do I require the assistance of the Minister of Labour. I can get along without the Government advocating me. I have paddled my own way so far, and I hope to be able to reach harbour without the assistance of the Government. The Premier once advocated the honourable gentleman and got him into his Ministry, but I certainly think he is not a great advantage to the Government. Sir, I have always stood on my own bottom; I have worked my own way straightforwardly, honourably, and honestly, and whatever I have done I can claim to have done it myself: in this respect I differ from the Hon. the Minister of Labour, and as the member for Egmont I am here in spite of the Government. I say the Government have not on any occasion assisted me. The Premier and the Minister of Lands came up to my district on one occasion, but I did not want them. I have always advocated the true interest of this country in a straightforward manner, and that is the course I intend to pursue; and I intend to work honestly in the interests of the people for the future, as I have done in the past. In reference to this matter of the Midland Railway, I say a bad bargain has been made in the past, and now the Minister of Lands wants the House to commit the colony further. I say I will be no party to such a transaction, which is so hurtful to the best interests of this country. Sir, the Minister of Lands was in the House at the time when large areas of the land of the colony were given to the Manawatu Railway Company. I say that was a bad bargain too. We gave that company a large block of reclaimed land and an expensive plant; and what have we to do now? We have to buy the whole back again; and is that in the interests of the colony? No, a thousand times no. But, having the experience of the past, you would think the Government would have profited by it. I therefore regret to see that those honourable gentlemen gave away this large quantity of land to this Midland Railway Company.

Mr. J. McKensie

Mr. SEDDON.—I did not.

Mr. McGUIRE.—Yes, you did: I can prove it; and the honourable gentleman should know by this time that I am not in the habit of making statements which I cannot substantiate. In the Journals of the House is the following entry:—

"5. East and West Coast (Middle Island) and Nelson Railway Bill.—The order of the day being read for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading of the East and West Coast (Middle Island) and Nelson Railway Bill;

"And the question being again proposed, the House resumed the said debate.

"Mr. Bryce moved, That the question be amended by the omission of all the words after the word 'That,' and the insertion of the following words in lieu thereof: 'it is not expedient to alienate vast tracts of public land and mineral property of unknown value to a private company as a premium for engaging in railway speculation in New Zealand.'

"A debate arose thereupon."

The House divided on the question after twelve o'clock on Tuesday morning. A division was called for, and I find that Messrs. J. McKenzie, Seddon, and Guinness voted for the second reading. That is the reason I rose when I heard the Minister of Lands virtuously telling honourable members that they should not give away the land, knowing as I did that the honourable gentleman supported in this House the giving-away of the land in question. Now the honourable gentleman wants his own party in this House to buy this land back again, and to pay the company for it. The excuse was made, when this land was given to the company by the honourable gentleman and his friends, that the company intended to settle it; and now we are asked, in the most unblushing manner, by the Minister to purchase this land from the company. I say that such a proposal is not in the interest of the colony; and I further say that it is not an honest proposal. In conclusion, I would say that a great blunder has been made in the past. I trust the honourable gentleman will be satisfied with the injury he has already done in giving away the land to the company. Let him not add to the injustice he has already done to the colony by purchasing it back. Let the company keep to their contract, and let the House carry out theirs to the letter. I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further.

Mr. MILLS.—Sir, were it not for the short time I have at my disposal, I intended to review this contract from its inception to its proposed extension. If honourable members will refer to Hansard and read the speech just delivered by the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), they will read as a preface what I intended to say about its history. Some two or three years ago I expressed my opinion with regard to this contract, and I have always expressed that opinion clearly and openly. I see no reason now, and I have never seen any reason during the past twelve months, to alter that opinion in any way. We have before us the report of the Committee, which I intend to deal with; but, before doing so, I would just call attention to what appears in Hansard, 1893, Volume 82, page 841. In that we find that Mr. Brodie Hoare, chairman of the Midland Railway Company, expressed himself in these words:—

"He did not profess any great generosity on the part of the company, for they were actuated purely by self-interest, and he believed that by an enlightened policy in dealing with the lands their best interests would be furthered. It was their interest to construct the line as fast as they could possibly do so."

That clearly proves that when this contract was entered into there was no sentiment about it at all. It was purely a business transaction made on behalf of the company, which was supposed at that time to be very wealthy and able to command a great sum of money; and they should undoubtedly have fulfilled their contract in the same way as any other individuals who might make a contract with the colony. I know that there is a divided opinion in this House with reference to this contract, and I also appreciate the regret of other honourable members who say they are very sorry to know that the Nelson end of this railway, which the company agreed to construct simultaneously with the Canterbury end, is not to be started, but is to be ignored in every way and practically abandoned. But I am not going to rest satisfied with that expression of sorrow, or anything approaching it. I was quite willing to entertain anything like a reasonable proposal had one been made last year when this matter cropped up; and it will be within the recollection of the old members, at any rate, that the company then wanted a sum of 15 per cent. on the face-value of their lands. That represented in round numbers a sum of £92,000 besides the £618,000, and I was told that if I did not vote for that we should lose all our claim to any railway, and the colony would be landed in a great lawsuit which would cause a serious disaster, and the credit of the colony would be ruined. But I do not see that that prophecy has come to pass. I think we have saved that £92,000, and nothing of the kind has occurred which it was said at that time would happen. I again ask this Assembly to look at the contract from a fair and equitable, but purely business, standpoint; and those honourable members who are in favour of constructing this line should express something like substantial sympathy with the Nelson people; but I cannot understand those who express sympathy without giving any practical aid at all. Sir, admiring the old Quaker who gave five shillings to an old friend as his practical sympathy, I am not prepared to give this company my sympathy to the tune of £618,000. When I refer to this report that was brought down by the Committee, I find there that Mr. Wilson was asked if they intended to continue the work, and he said distinctly, "No; we require £618,000 before we proceed"; and when the Committee objected he proposed to give the colony the amount the company had expended on the two and a half miles at the Belgrove end, and which, if completed, would be of very little use to the colony. Then, in reply to a further question, this genial manager says, "If that is not enough, I will give you what is equal to another £30,000—that is, another three miles of railway to what called is Norris's Gully." Now, as a businessman, it strikes me as very peculiar that the company can afford to give away £75,000 in hard cash as a bonus to get £618,000; and, if they are in the position to give this £75,000 in hard cash, surely this £618,000 was far too much to ask from the colony. It must be either one thing or another; and if you look more closely at the whole position as a monetary transaction—if we turn over a little further, to page 10—we find the same gentleman telling the Committee, "My Board cabled to me to say that it will facilitate matters very much if we can get the money placed in a lump sum in the hands of the Public Trustee." I have no doubt about that; and it is ridiculous for any one to say that if we gave the company £618,000 in a lump sum it would not be much better for the company than asking the Government for only £200,000 annually. Therefore the more I look at this the more it appears to me that we have to deal with a company who, at any rate, have stated fairly that their credit is actually gone, and practically in the same breath we are told that if we do not do so-and-so the result will be a famine in the London money-market, and our credit finally ruined. Now, if that company are unable to finance a small sum of this description, what influence can they have in the monetary circles at Home, and what influence can they have on the credit of this colony? To use an argument of that description before sensible persons seems to me to be utterly absurd; and, from the references I have seen to meetings held at Home in regard to the colony, it appears to me that, instead of the company doing what they could to assist our credit, they have done quite the reverse, and therefore they are now suffering—I cannot say they are paying—all the penalties that they have brought upon themselves. I realise this principle:

9.0.

When they took that contract from the colony they took it with their eyes open, and we are not asking for any advantage from them in any way; but we do ask them to complete that contract, and the colony is still quite ready to carry out its share of the bargain. Sir, in turning over a leaf or two to page 40, what are the views we find expressed by the honourable member for Patea? He seems to be a sort of legal adviser to the company, and puts leading questions asking how they were to be treated under certain circumstances. Then, the reply to that is that the lawyers in London think they have a claim against the Government, and the shareholders would probably subscribe to a legal defence fund. Well, I doubt very much, in these days when bogus companies have been so prevalent, whether the shareholders will subscribe more money to defend an action which has such weak legal legs to stand on. When Mr. Tanner asks about the termination of the contract, he is told the time will expire on the 7th of January, 1895. Well, if that is the termination of the contract, let that time arrive; and I contend that if the company cannot give any good reason why they should not fulfil their contract we have a perfect right as a colony to resume possession of the lands that we have pledged. If they complete their bargain, they have, of course, the right to seek their remedy for any grievance in a Court of law, and to recover such damages as may be awarded to them. So far as I have followed the contract all through, I find that the concessions we have given were mainly in favour of the company. Now, it may seem a matter of very little importance to some members that Nelson is to be thrown over; but I say in all honesty of purpose that the people of Nelson deserve quite as much consideration as any of the people who live either in Canterbury or on the West Coast. I ask, has not Nelson always done its best in the interests and general welfare of the colony in any public matter? Have they not always sent as good statesmen to this Chamber as any other part of the colony, and have not those statesmen proved themselves always ready to do their utmost to advance the colony by free education and other matters; and, what is more important, have they not always commanded the respect of all people from one end of the colony to another? I say most emphatically they have; and now at the present juncture, when Nelson will be cut out of the contract altogether for the sole purpose of carrying the railway between the West Coast and Canterbury, it is a most unfair, unjust, and disgraceful position for the House to take up. The vice-chairman of the board of directors of the Midland Railway Company, when speaking at Nelson, said,—

“The resources of this great colony were only now beginning to be found out, and as for the west coast of this Island they were as yet almost undiscovered. He believed firmly that were he to revisit this district twenty years hence he would find a population such as is now seen around Durham and Sheffield, and that the people would be clamouring to the company to double the line so as to cope with the traffic. He was now perfectly convinced that the line could be made, and his firm determination was—as far as in him lay—that it shall be made.”

Now, let me ask the House how that promise has been fulfilled. We have about two and a half miles of unfinished railway. Canterbury has five and a half; but Westland has many miles—in fact, it goes into good round numbers; therefore I do not find fault with the members for Westland, or any other part of the West Coast, for doing all they can to get the contract carried out. They have had a very good innings. Seventy miles of railway have been constructed out of the contract, and I can quite understand they are doing their utmost to get the same company to carry out the rest of the contract now, because it suits their interests. But, judging by the past, which is only a fair record to go by, I cannot see, even if the House were to grant this concession, they would be able to make much greater progress than they have been doing during the last few years. So far as the employment of a large number of working-men is concerned, I can quite understand the company will simply employ good men who understand their work, and that the “unemployed” difficulty will remain with us, so far as that company is concerned, in much the same position as it was in before. The directors of the company are not the class of men to give work to men who do not understand what they have to do, and I cannot think for one moment that this proposal will give very much relief to those people who are styled “the unemployed.” It would be, I think, much better for us to provide, instead of this large sum, a sum of smaller dimensions that would meet their case. I consider that there are far more important works to be undertaken in the colony than this if the money is to be spent, because, after all, when this large sum of money is spent, at the end of the time we shall find that our share of that railway is something like the fifth wheel of a coach—nothing more. Now, another point I wish to raise is this: If the company have a claim on this colony, surely then the colony has a claim on the company. When this contract was entered into about ten years ago it was on the understanding that something like rapid progress should be made, and that we should have a great number of bond fide settlers on the land. Any Government could have reasonably expected that this accession of population would bring in a certain amount of revenue, through our Customs and in other ways. We might as well come down and ask for a rebate for that reason. There can be no doubt that it was a mutual understanding that for giving such a large area of land we should gain some advantages as well as the company. And, again, if they had gone on with their work, and selected these alternate sections, then a great number of our young men who have left this colony would have been here to-day. Hundreds of them—I am not exaggerating—have left the northern end of Nelson, round the Waimea and Inangahua, simply because of that land being locked up; and I have long been anxious to see these young people settled on the land. But, viewing the position as we stand to-day, I say that the fact of their being kept off the land for nine years without any occupation or recompense, while the railway is to be completed from Canterbury to the West Coast, is to my mind offering a man a stone when he asks for bread. There is one other quotation I intend to call the attention of the House to, and that is, when the first sod was turned in connection with this railway in Westland, there was some speechifying there, and among others who spoke at that particular time was the honourable member for the Grey. He referred to this work in very warm terms. The Hon. Mr. Richardson turned the first sod; and Mr. Guinness spoke as follows at the banquet given in the evening:—

Mr. Mills

“One effect of the great work already was the cementing of a bond of friendship between the people of Canterbury, Nelson, and Westland that would not be easily broken, for the members from all these parts of the colony voted to a man—with a few miserable exceptions—for the construction of this railway.”

Well, Sir, I say that we have now a perfect right, as representing those who have contributed towards this work in Nelson, to ask for the same loyalty as we showed to them then. There can be no doubt that, acting as we did towards them for all these years, they should prove true comrades to us at the present juncture. I am quite satisfied that if we had stood together, united in words and actions, a better arrangement might have been come to than has been offered to us by the Government at the present time. But the fact of some division of opinion creeping in between the Canterbury and Nelson Railway League has, to my mind at any rate, led the company to ask for further concessions, which have been not only outrageous to Nelson, but most injurious to both ends of the line. Sir, I sometimes wonder what was the commercial standing of the company at first, and why they were not able to raise £618,000, having such substantial assets. They seemed to have got credit chiefly on the work they were “going to do”; and in this case why is it that they cannot find the finances to carry out the contract? If this land has increased in value 15 per cent. on the face-value, as they stated last year, why should they not be able to finance at Home if they hold the standing we suppose them to occupy? I maintain that we have no right in the colony to practically turn what is a non-liquid into a liquid liability, and to hand over to the company this very large amount they ask for. When the Premier was referring to this matter he stated that it was not in the power of the company to complete the contract, and, of course, a great number of us believed him; but that is no reason why we should supply them with all the money and build up their credit to enable them to complete the work. Let them stand to their guns, as other contractors or their sureties have to do. All I ask for is that justice shall be rendered to the part of the colony which I represent—not from a local reason, but for a colonial reason; because I say that the railway they have attempted to form, if it were once completed, might then be of some advantage not only to Canterbury, but also to the North Island as well. As to the statement made that the men employed upon this work when it is begun will be consuming a large quantity of produce raised by farmers about there, that is, to my mind, a very slight reason. We all know that this company will buy in the cheapest market, and, if four or five hundred men are taken on the work, there is no doubt, to my mind, they will purchase their provisions or other stores, or whatever they may require, from the company or its agents, and supply themselves in that way. There are a good many other points I wished to refer to, but the ringing bell warns me that I have not much time left, and therefore I shall simply pass over some of the notes I have taken, and probably some other member will refer to them. There is one thing I would wish to point out, and it is this: that for all these years this large area of land has been locked up—there has been no rating-power over it, and it has made no contribution to the property-tax and local rates, which it would no doubt have paid had the land been settled. All these are matters of importance and matters of great interest to us as colonists. I am not going to contrast the amount of money spent in other districts with the amount spent in Canterbury. I do not think there is any sound reason in that, nor do I think it fair to make quotations to this House as to so much money having been spent in one part of the colony as compared with the others, unless the physical geography and general facilities of the place are also explained. There is no doubt to my mind that, as far as Canterbury is concerned, they have had a good share of public works in their network of railways. Then, we know that one-third of the extent of this land was in the northern part of the Provincial District of Nelson, and that therefore, although some money may have been spent there, it is altogether too small to be considered. As to the setting-free of this large area of land, there can be no doubt it would be a great advantage; but the five million acres do not all belong to us. Some honourable members referred to it as if Nelson desired all the benefit; but it is scattered, part being in Nelson and part being in Westland, and, in fact, the bulk of it is some distance from the main roads, and principally in the direction of the West Coast. In conclusion, I say that, while we may be threatened with an injunction, while strong threats may be held out of legal action against the colony, that our credit will be ruined, I still think that any one who believes he is right, and does what is right, need not ever fear anything of the kind. If the colony has done wrong, let it pay whatever may be awarded to the company as damages, but let us keep our £618,000. Finally, I say we shall be doing the right thing if we relegate this Bill to the archives of the past, and then we shall show in a forcible and practical way that this Parliament is going to do what is for the best in the interest of all New Zealand.

Mr. DUTHIE.—In approaching the consideration of this Bill, it is important to recognise that the work contemplated is the completion of fifty-seven miles of railway, which is going to cost, according to the estimate, £21,000 per mile. This cost is enormous, it is beyond all colonial experience, and could only be justified if it were to connect two large centres of population or of manufactures, which would insure traffic; and it seems to me that after a dispassionate examination of the prospects of this line no one can see the remotest chance of it paying working-expenses. But, Sir, the question has got beyond that stage. If it were in the initial stage I for one should have no hesitation in voting against it, and doing all in my power to prevent so useless and wasteful an undertaking. However, at the present time we may with some advantage consider the class of country we are about to join together. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay this afternoon read from the original report of the Commissioners who visited the country, and the honourable member for Wairarapa gave us a vivid description of the class of country to be passed through and on the West Coast; and I have also visited that country on various occasions during the last thirty years, and I say without hesitation that along that West Coast there is scarcely any country desirable for settlement. The fact that up to the present day the whole of the grain, with the exception of the thousand bushels which the honourable member for Wairarapa quoted, has been imported from the East Coast shows that the country is unproductive and unfit for grain crops; so we cannot look for the close settlement which was pictured to us by the Minister of Lands, who rashly asserted that if he had the land in his hands he would settle it with a large population within twelve months. Why, the country along the West Coast is subject to such a heavy rainfall that when at great cost the bush is cleared rushes come, and settlers are unable to grow crops, or even keep the land in grass. We know there is a dense bush-country there; we find in the report which the honourable member for Hawke's Bay referred to that the cost to clear, fence, and grass it was put down at £50 an acre. This cost is largely due to the heavy rainfall, and the fact that you cannot get the fire to run through or to burn the bush. A man may fell it, but he has frequently to wait for the very slow process of decay to get rid of the timber, unless when on a rare occasion he may get a season in which he may obtain a good burn and thus clear it away. When the Minister of Lands holds up a picture of smiling homesteads, and asserts that this is the class of country where small farmers could be settled, he is speaking without a knowledge of what he is talking about; I say it is utterly impossible. In that part of the country there may be patches of better soil than that which I have been describing. I believe that there are some river deposits, and especially along the Grey Valley there is a limited area of good land; and probably, too, it is better towards Ross, which the Premier quoted; but, after all, that forms a very small proportion of the land, and I say that that part of the colony, as a whole, is utterly unfitted for a small farming population whenever the small local market is met, and they have to turn to export. Then, as far as the other five million acres are concerned, if you travel along the road from Reefton towards Nelson you get a general idea of it. It is there a poor clay soil, without bush,—not even fit to grow grass. I believe there are some valleys here and there where a little grass can be got to grow, and a few sheep can be kept; but it is all nonsense endeavouring to mislead the House by telling us that if these five million acres are placed at the disposal of the colony a large population can be settled there. It will not carry population, but only a few merino sheep of energetic and active habits. Then, we have the coal-traffic—the mainstay of the Coast. Others have dealt with the impossibility of hauling coals across these mountains. In this connection, however, there are other considerations to be borne in mind. This House guaranteed a large sum of money for the construction of the Greymouth Harbour, and, if this railway proves to be the success its supporters predicate, the effect will be to divert the trade from the Greymouth Harbour, in which case the Harbour Board would turn round and call upon this House to make good the deficiency in its revenue. The House must recognise that that contingency is unavoidable. The Premier recognised that difficulty, and he pointed out that the trade of the North Island would be left. Now, what does the whole of the North Island trade consist of, if we are to rely upon it to keep that harbour going, and after the lion's share has gone to Westport? We have only Wellington, Wanganui, and the small amount of coal that goes to the Manukau; and surely that will not recoup the trade that is to be diverted by this railway. I say that diversion would give Grey-mouth an equitable, as it has a legal, claim upon the colony to make good the deficiency in the revenue. Then, again, I do not think we have any permanent coal-supply in the Grey Valley. From time to time we have been given inflated statements of the enormous extent of the deposits of coal there; but there are two or three mines which were working a few years ago that are now abandoned. The Brunner Mine is all but worked out. These coal-deposits seem merely small pockets; certainly they are not of a permanent character, nor such as would warrant the construction of a railway. Another source of revenue which has been pointed to is its timber. Well, Sir, there are very valuable forests there; but at the present time there are valuable forests in many other parts of New Zealand; and, moreover, there is little market at the present time for our timber. Such prices as can be got for the timber will not pay for some years to come—until, in fact, the timber supplies from more accessible districts have been exhausted. We have in the Sounds and the Rai Valley an enormous extent of timber which can be got to market more cheaply than from the West Coast, even if in New Zealand there was the market. Then, as regards sending it by this railway to Greymouth and shipping it to Australia, that is out of the question. We know that the kauri forests of the North are more accessible to the shipping, that kauri is better and cheaper timber, that strenuous efforts were made for years and much money was lost in the endeavour to secure the Australian market and to supplant the large supplies that go there from Oregon. But we cannot send timber in the small vessels that can enter the Grey and be able to sell at the prices which the timber sent from America in the large and cheap timber-carrying vessels can be profitably sold at, and the proof of this lies in the fact that the company that is embarked in that trade between this colony and Australia, while practically enjoying a monopoly, has, judged by the value of its shares, also lost heavily. So far as the forests are concerned, they are an important possession, and ought to be kept. They are about the only forests we have that cannot be destroyed. There is not much fear of their being burnt in that damp climate, and they will be of great value to another generation that will come after us when perhaps timber is scarce. There will be much advantage in leaving that timber standing for the use of succeeding generations, since it is not required for the present.

Mr. Mills

Mr. O'REGAN.—They have burns there almost every summer.

Mr. DUTHIE.—I am glad to hear that; but I have never yet heard of standing bush burning on the Coast. Then, the Premier urged upon us the argument that the construction of this line would find employment for two thousand men—that this railway would be a second Coolgardie. Surely it is very disappointing to hear the Minister driven to use arguments of this sort. It is a sorry outcome of four years of Liberal Government to find their boasted self-reliance gone, and the Premier, unabashed, urging the House to go in for borrowing money to find work for people. Past experience, however, tells us that the kind of people for whom this railway contract will find employment are not those who are at all likely to settle down on the Government lands and devote themselves to developing the resources of the country like ordinary settlers. Even if they were, how is the Government going to get suitable land in that country for them to cultivate? The honourable gentleman cannot point to any case where railway navvies take up the work of settlers. We know from our experience in this Island that when navvies can no longer get the work they are accustomed to they go to another country where they can get that work. The men who would be put on the work of railway-formation by this railway company would not be nondescript co-operatives, but experienced and competent workmen, who are not the class to settle down to dairy-farming. And the Premier would be disappointed if he expected it, for the country the line passes through is unfit to settle them upon even if they wished it. Then the honourable gentleman used the words, "There is something more important to be considered: the tourist traffic";—that is to say, he specially urges us to embark upon this railway in order to encourage the tourist traffic. But he has himself brought in session after session legislation taking away any security of license from the hotels of the country. No one will invest a sixpence in building or improving a hotel, so that we now have hotels that are no credit to us. There is no British colony where the hotel accommodation is so miserable and insufficient as it is in New Zealand, and if the honourable gentleman wishes to encourage the tourist traffic he must give protection to the legitimate interests of those who invest in this class of property, in order that we may be provided with superior hotels. Our tourist traffic, which should be a mine of wealth, is dying away, owing to the fact that we have no accommodation worthy the name for tourists. Now, five years ago the tourist traffic was double, perhaps treble, what it is at the present day; and it is scarcely likely to revive because we provide a railway, unless in the first place the colony affords proper hotel accommodation.

9.30. Despite what the Minister of Lands has said, the company know they cannot find buyers for the land which in future would fall into their hands. It is not the price of the land which prevents people buying. It is the Government system of taxation. The company have suffered grievous injury by the policy of the Government, since it so injuriously affects this class of country—land which can only be held in large blocks. But the greatest claim which I consider the company has against the colony arises out of the unscrupulous conduct of the Minister for Public Works in proclaiming certain blocks of land as being auriferous. One of the main advantages offered to the company was, that they were to receive alternate blocks of land for the construction of the railway, and the price which they got above the schedule price was to be the profit of the company. But we find that all along the Grey Valley the Premier, without any special reason to even suspect that it was auriferous land, beyond the general character of the country, proclaimed block after block as auriferous, and so prevented the company from getting the alternate blocks of land benefited by the railway—land that was their due. The company was thus reduced to take land remote and inaccessible, and so they were unable to make a profit out of that land. I consider the company have an undeniable claim against the colony through conduct of that sort. I can quite understand the manager of the company, while seeking to get a compromise, only lightly urging these points, since to strongly press them would give offence to the Minister for Public Works. From what has also taken place—tedious delay over necessary deviations and alterations—we know that great injustice has been done to the company, wrecking its possible success on questions of finance. For these reasons, I consider that the company has an undeniable claim against the colony. The undertaking was, however, perhaps doomed to failure from the outset. It was at first insisted, if I remember aright, that the company must have a million of capital. That amount was reduced to £500,000, and it was reduced a second time to the altogether inadequate amount of £250,000. The company never had sufficient capital to enter upon this undertaking, and it should never have been allowed to enter into it. But there was so great a pressure behind the Government of the day that that was accepted, and success was only possible with liberal and generous support by the Government, with a view to the new contract now contemplated. The Committee in its report says, "Provided the Government are satisfied that the company can give practical effect to such new contract." The Bill before us says, "Before the new contract is entered on the Minister shall satisfy himself that the company is or is likely to be in a position to give practical effect to the contract." Merely "likely to be" is altogether insufficient, and I think we ought to go no further in this matter till we know that the company is in a position to carry out its contract. Though I shall vote for the second reading, I do not commit myself to further support the Bill, unless the point I have referred to is made clear and the company proves its financial ability to carry out and complete the works. It is very desirable that this complicated question should be brought to an issue. The Minister has grossly mismanaged this business, and has behaved very badly to the company. We should fulfil our bargain with the company: the honour of the colony is at stake. I think the proposals in the Bill are, under the circumstances, a fair solution of the question. For the reasons I have stated I shall support the second reading, but I do not pledge myself further, reserving free action as circumstances arise.

Mr. Duthie

Mr. CROWTHER.—As a new member of this House, I cannot talk on this question with the same experience as those who have been discussing this matter on the floor of this House during the last eight, ten, or twelve years. I have come to this conclusion in my mind, from what I have heard during the day—namely, that this Bill should have come down to us under another name. It should have come down to us under the name of a Bill to borrow £618,000, and I think it should have been linked with the Bill called the Land for Settlements Act, because it is clear enough that the Minister of Lands has it in his mind that, if this land is acquired by the Government in the manner prescribed by the Bill, the land will be available under this Act. We have heard it read out by yourself, Sir, that authority has now been given by another place to certain borrowing Bills, so that those Bills will become law. This is another one, and if it were a straightforward borrowing Bill we should certainly understand it better. But what is troubling me most is this: We have learned that the company have picked out, and have either sold or still hold at the present time, all the valuable land at one end; we have also learned that the company have picked out all the good land at the other end of the line. Now, this question arises: What is left for this £618,000? Who wants it? What will you give for it?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Going!

Mr. CROWTHER.—An honourable member says "Going." It is my impression that if a reasonable bid could have been got for it it would have been gone long ago, and we should not have been bothered by this business to-night; and I think the honourable gentleman who said "Going" knows that much better than I do, because he is much better acquainted with this question than I am. But there is in my mind this responsibility. This House has no right to be asked to accept such a responsibility. To my mind we are incurring a responsibility on account of somebody else. We have done that this session once before, and I believe when we did it we regretted it, and we have regretted it ever since. I ask, are we to repeat it? If the Minister of Lands can stand up and tell us he can utilise this land beneficially for the colony in connection with his Land for Settlements Bill, I shall be very much better satisfied than I am at present. Under the surroundings as I know them, it appears to me beyond all doubt that the land which is left to represent this £618,000 is not value for that money. If it were value for the money, the company, as a set of business-men undertaking a speculation, would have seen that they could utilise the land better than we can possibly do so. If such is the true state of the business as it exists to-night, then, I say, we should pause—we should be very careful before we enter further into this complicated business. Beyond all doubt a mistake was made in the first instance when the door was opened to allow the contract to be altered or amended. Whenever these contracts of such magnitude are allowed to be altered and amended, then there are always disagreements and differences continually arising to the end. How we are going to get out of this I do not know. I can quite understand that the Government are extremely anxious to do something. The Premier told us to-day that he is not at all sure in his own mind that he understands that the question is to be so absolutely settled that legal differences will not arise. He said he did not fear legal difficulties, but he shadowed forth plainly to my mind that, if this Bill is not passed by this House, there is a possibility, and even a probability, that legal difficulties may arise. Such being the case, I can understand how very anxious the Government are to get this Bill passed through. I have just one word more to say before I sit down. Here we are at the tail-end of the session; we have been here now for four months: and this is a very important measure. The Premier told us yesterday that he did not know of any Bill on the Order Paper which need occupy many minutes in discussing. If we are to measure the Premier's statements on these lines, what are they worth?

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. CROWTHER.—I am speaking seriously, and I say that in my mind certainly such a statement has created distrust. I am not going to say more than that, and I feel very sorry indeed to have to say even so much, but still I feel justified in saying what I have said.

Dr. NEWMAN.—The speech made by the last speaker, I think, comes very near the truth. There are certain times in this House when honourable members are very fond of playing little jokes, and I think one of the Premier's little jokes is the introduction of this Bill. In my opinion, this Bill occupies very much the position which the Licensing Bill did. A Bill is brought down and thrown on the floor of the House, and honourable members are allowed to tear it, and then, after a day or two, it is put low down on the Order Paper, and the House knows no more of it for the session. That, I think, is very much the position of this Bill. In my opinion, we ought not to entertain this Bill as it is at present drawn, for in this shape it is neither more nor less than an insult to the intelligence of the House. It is a Bill which would not be put before any other body of men except the members of the House of Representatives, for no Government but one sure of a large majority at their back would dare, in my opinion, to bring down such a measure. This question has been before the House ever since I have been a member. It has been like the daughter of the horse-leech, which cries, "Give, give." The colony has been always giving. It was not long ago that this line with its extension to Nelson was to do wonders for New Zealand. After it was started a new contract was arranged by Sir Harry Atkinson, who brought it down as a Bill—a measure granting alternate blocks. The Premier said to-day that every one must be anxious to avoid litigation. I would remind honourable members that the company asked for the deviation. The company begged the House to allow it to make the deviation from one side of Lake Brunner to the other. How is the company going to get litigation out of that? He quoted the Abt system. What is the Abt system? Mr. Wilson said that he had an ingenious device, copied from Germany, which would save many thousands of pounds in climbing up to the heights of the mountain. The Midland Company itself brought it before the House, and then the House last year, or the year before, deliberately said it would adopt the Abt system. That did away with the idea of compensation to this company. After giving them all that they wanted we are brought face to face with the extraordinary proposal brought down in this Bill: that the company shall only be supposed to do half of what they have engaged to do—that is, they may leave out the Nelson portion of the railway. The cost of the railway, Springfield to Jackson's, is £950,000, and out of that the colony is asked to provide £618,000. We are to provide that, and they are to provide the other £330,000, and then they will graciously condescend to make the line, and the line will be theirs for evermore. Would any one ask such a thing outside a lunatic asylum, or outside the House of Representatives?—and I take it they are very much the same, after the absurd proposals that have been brought down this session. Would it be believed anywhere else that the Premier would have asked for such a thing? Sir, instead of asking for £618,000 to be given as a bonus to the company, he should have asked for £950,000, in order that the line might be completed by the colony and might be owned by the colony. But after finding the £618,000, and after asking the colony to bear additional taxation for this purpose, the whole of it is given away; and when the line is completed there will be an agitation for the line to be bought back, and we shall be buying back the £618,000 already given, together with the whole line, making about £1,236,000 of our own money. The Premier told the House a remarkable thing. He said that if this House does not grant this money to the Midland Railway Company the next thing will be a loan for the completion of the North Island Main Trunk Railway and of the Otago Central: in other words, if you grant this money there will be no loan for the Otago Central and North Island Main Trunk railways. I appeal to the North Island members and the Otago members to say whether they are going to sit down and vote away £618,000 to Westland and Canterbury, and next year be told that the North Island Railway is not to be proceeded with because there is no money, and that the Otago Central is not to be proceeded with because there will be no loan for the purpose. Why should we give a loan of £618,000 to Canterbury and Westland and not to other parts of the colony? I was in the House a few years ago; and what happened then?

Canterbury and Westland formed an unholy alliance with the Nelson members for the construction of this line. Those gentlemen did not want the Nelson line, but they wanted two or three votes in this House, and they rolled a log, and ever since they have been acting with treachery towards the Nelson members; and now Nelson can go to the dogs, because it has served the purpose. Let me warn the House about this. If honourable members from Canterbury and Westland get this £618,000 there will be repeated a trick which was played here a few years ago, when the honourable member for Hawke's Bay moved to reduce, and did so reduce, the public works estimates by £500,000. Then Canterbury voted to stop all railways, and would do so again. I hope that the House will not be unwise enough to grant this £618,000 now, for next year they will stick up the North Island Main Trunk line and the Otago Central. Some years ago some innocent members for Wellington in the House who wanted a university were told that if they supported a vote of £4,000 for Auckland they would get a vote the next year for what they wanted in Wellington. But have the Auckland members got anything for Wellington? No. And if Canterbury and Westland get this £618,000, then it will be good-bye to the Otago Central and the North Island Trunk Line.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You will not trust them now.

Dr. NEWMAN.—No. The Premier went to Nelson just before the election; and what did he say? He said, of course, that the railway should go up to Nelson; that they could not think of any abandonment, and that they had a majority in favour of it in the House. Where is unhappy Nelson now? Sir, I believe this: that the proper thing to do is that we should not go on with this railway this year, but that during the recess the Premier should open up negotiations with the company and ask how much it would take to clear out of the colony, and then there will be three great railways to be constructed for the colony. We have already two thousand miles of railway, but there are the Otago Central to Lake Hawea, the Springfield line across to Jackson's, and the North Island Main Trunk Railway—about two hundred and fifty miles of line to be constructed—and when that has been done the colony will not have very much more need for railways. I think that would be the very best policy that could be arranged. I have been a member of the Public Accounts Committee in connection with this matter, and think that, if the Midland Railway Company have some small claims against the colony, it is not for us to do all that is asked for. If we ask, "What is the colony to get for this £618,000?" it will be found that we are to get almost nothing. This Bill is the climax of a series of measures brought down this year, all abandoning the self-reliant policy and giving constant additions to the debt of the colony. The Government are borrowing for everything, and are afraid to come down to the colony with a bold policy, but, in the dying hours of the session, are now asking for £618,000. Can any one believe that this is that one of the railways that is most wanted? I say that the North Island Main Trunk and Otago Central lines are urgently required. Those are two, and then, for the third line this could be constructed. But they should be constructed in that order. I say that next year we should not have a very large loan to finish these railways, but we should only have a certain amount spent every year, and in that way I think the colony would get on very well, and all three railways be proceeded with. I hope the House will not consent to this Bill, and it would be very much better to kill it on its second reading than to go into Committee with the same result as followed the Counties Vehicle-licensing Bill and the Licensing Bill in this House. We are getting near the end of a very long session, and I hope the House will have the wisdom to kill this Bill on the second reading, and allow us to go home some time before daylight.

Dr. Newman

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has treated the House to one of those semi-humorous speeches with which he occasionally regales honourable members. I have a difficulty sometimes in ascertaining where the humorousness ends and the seriousness begins, but I think that for once he has been serious, and has declared in no uncertain terms what, from his point of view, should be the policy of the country—that is, the policy of the party he is identified with. His idea is that the Midland Railway should, next session, be included in a gigantic scheme for completing that line, plus the Otago Central and plus the North Island Main Trunk line. That is introducing an entirely new element into the question, and for this reason: that the Midland Railway contract stands in a different position from the other railways to which the honourable gentleman has referred. I do not propose to speak at any length this evening, because I know that honourable members are anxious to get to a vote, but as a Canterbury member it is my duty to state, as succinctly as I can, my views on this matter. I should like first of all to refer to a statement made by the honourable member for Nelson City to-day, in which he gratuitously attacked the manager for the Midland Railway Company. He asserted that a large amount of lobbying had been done, and that members of this House had been influenced by the action of the manager of the company. Speaking for myself, I can say that no officer of the company has ever approached me, or even mentioned the matter of the railway to me, and that never until to-day had I the pleasure of meeting the manager for the company, and then when I spoke to him it was to ask him one simple question. I have asked members on both sides whether any attempt has been made at lobbying, and I have been unable to meet any member who had been approached by any one connected with the Midland Railway Company. I feel it is only an act of justice to mention this, after the statements made by the honourable member for Nelson City on that head, which I consider to be entirely erroneous. I might go further and say that so much cannot be said for Nelson, because for weeks past a deputation from that town have systematically lobbied honourable members in connection with the Midland Railway Company in opposition to the proposals in this Bill, and therefore I thought it unfair that the honourable member for Nelson City should make the attack he did, considering all the circumstances. I should like to say, in connection with this matter, that I approach the question of the Midland Railway entirely apart from any pledges as to what has been done in years past. I have heard of compacts between Nelson and Canterbury members, but, as far as this question is concerned, I entirely remove them from my own mind. I was returned to represent one part of Canterbury, and I desire to consider the question apart altogether from anything that has happened in the past. What are the questions involved in the Bill before us? They are these: Will the present proposal be for the benefit of the country? Is it just to the country? and will it promote the settlement of the colony? That is the position. A good deal has been said in the course of the debate as to the land-grants; and if we are to accept the statements of honourable members who have spoken, including the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, and the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Crowther), it appears perfectly clear to my mind that the land-grant given to the company has not proved of the value that it was thought to be when it was accepted. What was the land estimated at in section 8 of the Act of 1884? I find that the company was entitled to select land up to 50 per cent. of the cost of the railway, and the cost of the railway for the purpose of selection was estimated to be £1,750,000. In other words; the company was to be allowed to select land, for the purpose of assisting the formation of the line, to the extent of £875,000. What is the position to-day? We find that the whole of the land that has been selected and sold by the company has brought in only £220,000, and, considering that a great deal of this land has been sold at an advance of 25, 30, and 40 per cent. over and above the 10s. an acre at which it was taken by the company, it appears to me that the statements of the honourable gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House are perfectly true—namely, that the company have been deceived in connection with the value of the land: at any rate, if they have not been deceived, they have been disappointed; and therefore it gives them a perfect right to come to the House and ask for a reconsideration of the terms of their contract. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), in the address which he gave to the House this morning, spoke of the honour of the colony being involved, and said the honour of the colony was to be maintained by insisting upon the company keeping to the contract; but I would point out to that honourable gentleman that the company accepted its first contract from his Government. If there has been any deception or disappointment, it has been in the contract which he made, because it is in consequence of the land not proving of the value that it was represented to be by his Government that the company has been unable to carry on. What, Sir, is the position of the company at the present time? What is the position of the line? It is this: that, though the company have undertaken to construct the railway, they have not been able to finance the work, for the reason that the land has not proved so liquid an asset as it was expected to be; and, as the honourable member for Auckland City said, the land policy of recent years has undoubtedly stood in the way of the company being able to dispose of this land. Not only so, but the lands that are on the western side of the range are so far removed from roads and railways that it has been almost impossible for the company to settle those lands. Hence, although something was said about this, and the company was charged with selfishly selling land first on the eastern coast, that has been because those lands have been, of those open to selection, the most accessible, and therefore the most easily disposed of. Therefore, I say, the position stands in this way: that, as the company, for reasons that are not altogether of its own making, has been compelled to seek the further assistance of the colony, it is not for the colony at this time to say, "You have bound yourselves by a contract, and we are going to make you keep to it." The colony can afford to lay aside the policy of Shylock, who demanded his pound of flesh; the colony can afford, if not to be generous, at least to be just; and though these men entered into engagements which, through the land-values proving fictitious, they are not able to carry out, yet the colony can afford to say, "We will strive to do what is just and reasonable, and will recast the terms of the contract." That is, I imagine, all that the Government has asked the House to do in the Bill before it. Now, I wish to refer for a moment to the position of the land in question. We find that throughout Canterbury and Westland there has been for the last eight or ten years a power of selection vested in the Midland Railway Company which has almost entirely locked up the lands on the east and west coasts within the railway area. I myself, some six or eight months ago, went on a visit to the Westland District, and heard the complaints there of persons who desired to settle on the land on that coast, and who are unable to do so because of this land being locked up by the company; and I say that those members of the House who profess to be Radicals—those honourable members who believe that the land should be administered by the State, who believe it is not sound policy or consistent with proper legislation that vast tracts of land should be locked up in the hands of an English syndicate—those honourable members ought to support this Bill, if for no other reason than that it at once unlocks these lands, and vests them in the hands of the Minister of Lands, who has declared his intention to carry out, in connection with this part of the country, the same policy of opening up the lands to the people which he has so successfully carried out and administered in Canterbury, Otago, and other parts of the colony. I appeal, therefore, to those honourable members who believe in progressive land-legislation to vote for the Bill now before the House, so that the land that is locked up by the Midland Railway Company may be released and dealt with in a way by which settlement can be secured and prosperity brought about. We have been told by the senior member for Wellington City to-day that it would cost over £20,000 per annum to the colony in interest on this £618,000. But that is an entirely improper way of stating the case, because from that it might be assumed that this £618,000 was to be at once paid; whereas what is the fact, according to the Bill now before the House? Under subsection (d) of section 5 these debentures are to be issued thus: Debentures to the value of £200,000 are to be issued within one year, another £200,000 within two years, and £218,000 on the line being completed and open for traffic between Springfield and Jackson's. But there is also an important proviso. It is this:—

“Provided, however, that no delivery of debentures shall take place as aforesaid until at least one-fourth of the total amount or value of the works to be completed by the company under the new contract are so completed in terms of such contract; nor shall the second delivery of debentures (to the value of a further sum of two hundred thousand pounds) be made until works to the value of at least one-half of the whole of the works agreed to be completed shall have been completed by the company as aforesaid.”

Now, I say that the indirect benefits that will follow from the expenditure of the large sums of money that will be expended under the contract will compensate to a very large extent indeed for the interest that the colony will be required to pay. Look, for instance, at the condition of Canterbury in recent years. We have had no public works that are worth considering going on in Canterbury for the last seven or eight years; and what has been the result? The result has been that, while in other parts of the colony the unemployed have been absorbed by the public works, we have had constantly recurring the “unemployed” difficulty; and I say that by means of this Bill, and the employment of two thousand men, which will be the number employed upon the railway, the “unemployed” difficulty will be settled for years to come in the Province of Canterbury. Then, Sir, I should like to draw attention to one other matter, and it is this: The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) has very strongly opposed this Bill to-day; but that honourable gentleman's opposition to the Bill must be discounted by the fact that he was the head of the Government which first launched this contract, and it was he who gave the right of selection over this five or six million acres of land within the Midland Railway area; and it is one of the crimes that the democracy of the country allege against him, and it is one of the things that will prevent his taking that position he might have taken in connection with the politics of the country as a Radical leader, that he did give the right of selection over this land, and has year after year looked up all the middle part of New Zealand from settlement as he did. I say, therefore, his opposition in connection with this Bill must be largely discounted by the fact I have stated. Now, a great deal has been said in connection with this matter by way of attempting to evoke sympathy on behalf of the Nelson District. The honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, in that plaintive voice he can so readily assume, when one can almost see the tears trickling from his eyes, tried to create sympathy on behalf of Nelson. Sir, I sympathize with Nelson, because I think that the Nelson people are disappointed in this matter; but I should like to show to the Nelson people the practical side of the question, and it is this: At the present time they have railways running in their district. They have had £165,000 expended in making railways, and those railways run through the settled parts of their province, where, if anywhere, there would be a prospect of revenue being obtained from them. But what is the position? I find that last year the Nelson railways did not pay any interest on construction, but that the deficit on the working-expenses was £194. The same remarks apply to Marlborough. In Marlborough £205,000 has been expended on railways, and those railways last year did not pay their working-expenses, but left a deficit of £95. Let us compare that with the position of the Hurunui-Bluff Section. The Hurunui-Bluff Section returned £3 1s. 10d. per cent. on the cost of construction; and, speaking with some knowledge of the subject, I say that, were the Canterbury Section cut off from a number of the weaker non-paying lines in the southern part of the Island, the profits made by the Canterbury railways would more than pay interest on their construction, even though that interest stands at 4 or 4½ per cent. Let me therefore point out the position in connection with this line. It is this: that, while we may sympathize with Nelson in its disappointment, we must look at the question practically. We judge it by the financial test. Compare the Nelson lines with the Canterbury lines: the former are non-paying, but the latter are among the most productive in the colony. A number of honourable members have discussed the Midland line as though they were discussing it for the first time. They have not accepted the situation that the line is almost partially constructed—that we are not making a new contract, but are only recasting a contract to meet the altered circumstances that have arisen. What is the position now? On one side of the Island, the western side, we have a population of thirty-five thousand people, all engaged in or dependent on mining interests, or the timber interests; where, as you have been told by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay to-day, there is no agricultural land. On the other side of the range you have exactly the complement of mining country—that is, magnificent agricultural and pastoral country. From the one side you can obtain the hidden wealth of the earth—you can dig the coal, and obtain the gold; and from the other side of the range you can obtain the food with which the miners can be fed. Sir, if ever there was a sound principle upon which railways should be constructed in any part of the world it applies where you have two diverse districts of that character; the policy should be to unite them. I repeat, when you have on the one side Canterbury, with its magnificent agricultural and pastoral wealth, and on the other the undeveloped mineral wealth of the West Coast, the policy of the country should be, at the earliest possible moment, to push through the line, in order to connect two districts that are so naturally the complement one of the other. I should like to point out one other thing, and that is this: The Canterbury members, throughout the whole session, have loyally supported the Government policy. We have stood by the Government policy in connection with the acquisition of Native lands, in connection with supplying the money that is to be used for roads, and in other ways; and I say that, to a large extent, the policy of the Government throughout this session has been a North Island one. Let honourable members who choose take the Public Works Statement, and the estimates that have accompanied it, and I ask, how much money is there coming to Canterbury? I think I am correct in saying there is less than £20,000 out of the £940,000 voted under the Public Works Statement that will come to the Provincial District of Canterbury; and yet the Province of Canterbury in taxation contributes probably at least a fifth of the whole revenue of the colony. That being the case, if honourable members who are to receive all these benefits in the way of roads and other works in the North Island have any gratitude, they ought not now to oppose this work. That would mean they were quite willing we southern men should support their roads and railways and so on, but when we want this one question considered—the question of recasting the terms of the contract—they will lock up their sympathies and say, “No; we will keep you out of the railway this year, so that next year we can use this line as a lever by which to secure two other railways in other parts of the country.” I say, if that is the case,—if the policy of my honourable friend the member for Wellington Suburbs has voiced the morality of the House,—I am disappointed in the House and in him. I thought he would have taken a nobler stand than that, and have been prepared to support this railway, without connecting it with the North Island Main Trunk Railway and the Otago Central for his own purposes, and would have recognised that the matter now before the House is not a loan of £618,000—that we are asking for nothing of the kind; but that it is merely to recast a contract honestly and faithfully entered into years ago, so that the country will receive back its lands in exchange for debentures which can be floated and used as money to construct the line as it proceeds. If the proposals were that the colony should enter upon a scheme of borrowing £618,000, and of handing that £618,000 over to the company to do what it chose with, I could understand a great deal of the objection; but I say if settlement proceeds, as it will under the Minister of Lands, at once on the lands that are now locked up, the practical results of that settlement will compensate for the interest on the 3½-per-cent. debentures as they fall due, and these debentures will only be handed over to the company as it proceeds with the work. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay referred strongly this afternoon to the fact that a Commission in connection with this railway reported against it. No doubt that is correct; but was that the only railway reported against by a Commission? I remember in 1881 giving evidence in Foxton, where I then lived, before a Commission in favour of the West Coast railway here being made, but the Committee before which I gave evidence declared that there was not the slightest use in making it, and reported dead against it. But in due course that railway was made, and there it is—a thorough success. If I mistake not, a Commission reported against the Otago Central; but the Otago Central is accepted as part of the policy, and is being made; and the progress made with the Midland Railway justifies the decision of the company which undertook the work, and justifies the House in saying that the work, now that it has progressed so far, should not be stopped. I only say, in conclusion, I appeal with confidence to the good sense and the sense of justice of members of this House. I appeal to honourable members belonging to the North Island, on the ground that they are receiving benefits in connection with this year's legislation which will have the effect of diminishing the “unemployed” difficulty in their neighbourhood. I appeal to honourable members connected with Otago, because the Government have treated their railway with no unsparing hand in the estimates that have been brought down: £45,000 is placed on the estimates for the Otago Central. And I can only say this: that all we ask is that we should be treated with some justice and fairness; and in making this claim I again repeat that honourable members are not asked to give us the money: what the House is asked to do is to change the form of security which the company holds. The advantage must be obvious to every Radical. I appeal to those honourable members who are Radicals in connection with land-legislation, and I ask, is it not better that the Government—a Liberal Government—should have the administration of the lands involved in connection with this railway than that they shall be held still by a foreign syndicate, which can sell whatever blocks it chooses, and which will sell them without any consideration for settlement, but with a special regard to how it can get the most money for them? Viewing matters in this light, I have no hesitation in supporting the Bill, and I shall do all I can to help it in Committee.

Mr. G. W. Russell

Mr. GUINNESS.—I consider that it is due to my constituents that I should say a few words as to why, in my opinion, the House should support the second reading of this Bill. In the first place, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is not a question of starting the construction of a railway. It is not a question of borrowing money to start a railway or to complete one. It must be accepted by honourable members that this is a work to the completion of which the inhabitants of Canterbury, Westland, and Nelson, for the last twelve years, have been looking forward, with the desire to see the districts I have mentioned linked with the railway system of the South Island. The question has been settled by this Parliament, led as it was on that occasion by the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), and the contract has been entered into. It is too late in the day now to discuss whether the railway is one that ought or ought not to have been undertaken on the land-grant system, or to say that it should be undertaken by the colony as a national work. That is a passed question. The question now before the House is this: Having entered into a contract, and having entered into certain obligations in connection with that contract, is it a wise and a proper thing to compel the carrying-out of that contract in its entirety? I think before I conclude I shall be able to show that, the contract having been entered into, and during its performance certain difficulties having cropped up,—difficulties on both sides, on the side of the party which let the contract and on the side of the party which took it,—these difficulties from time to time were met by this Parliament and the other contracting parties. And because these difficulties occurred, and were met by Parliament, I say the member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and other members had no right to say that this is a company that has always been coming to the House for concessions, and that from time to time concessions have been granted to the company. The real fact is, the concessions have been mutual, and for the good of both parties to the contract. I will instance one or two of these. In the first place, the contract entered into by the Stout-Vogel Government neglected to provide proper safeguards with regard to the mining interests on the West Coast goldfields. Provision certainly was made that the contract should give power to the colony to select from the blocks of reserved land only those areas then held for gold-mining purposes, or known to be gold-workings, and the interpretation put upon these words by the Law Officers of the Crown was that it only reserved a very limited area—that “gold-workings” only meant areas that were being worked or where gold had been discovered; and that

Mr. G. W. Russell

“ground now held” meant only ground then actually held or being worked by miners. This meant that if any gold was found in the land granted to the company it would become the property of the company, and it could have taken up all the auriferous ground on the Coast that was not then actually held for mining purposes, and if at any future time new discoveries of gold were traced or found in those lands the company could retain them, and exact such license-fees as it thought fit if gold were traced into them. This was considered a most inadvisable thing, and therefore the mutual concession was made that the alternate-block system should be given up; the colony gave up its right to insist on alternate blocks being taken, and the company consented to modify the provisions with regard to the gold-mining area, giving the colony the right to reserve from time to time three-quarters of a million acres for gold-mining purposes, but that was to be reserved of auriferous land, and was to be reserved from time to time. On this point—as to whether this new contract then entered into was properly carried out by the Mines Department of the day—I dissent entirely from the view taken up by the Premier, and I say the company had a right to complain, and had a just complaint against the colony with regard to the administration of these auriferous lands and the reserves that were made. As an illustration, I will mention what actually occurred. Many honourable members know the line of railway constructed following the main line of road from Brunnerton to Reefton, a distance of about forty miles. Along the south side of this road, or along the side of it where the particular lands were to be taken up by the company when they made the line, before the company got the certificate to take them up the Mines Department proclaimed blocks of land fronting this line of railway almost the whole distance from Brunnerton to Reefton—areas of 3,000, 2,000, and some of 10,000 acres—to be auriferous lands. What was the effect? The company, which made the railway through the Grey Valley to the Inangahua Valley, expected that by making that section of railway the lands could be taken up then and be sold and settled; but this land was blocked, and they were prevented from taking it, because it was said by the Mines Department to be auriferous. Now, was it auriferous? If it was, we should have found gold-miners working at it. Had they tried to prove whether it was auriferous? They had; and on many of these reserved auriferous areas evidence showed that shafts had been sunk years and years ago, and had been abandoned, clearly proving that, in the opinion of miners, they were not auriferous, and had been abandoned because they were not worth taking up for mining purposes. And, if they were not worth taking up for mining purposes, the company had a right to complain that they could not select any of this land. That is where I differ from the Premier on the question of the mining reserves. On this head the company has, I think, a claim—if not a legal, an equitable claim—against the colony, because they made the railway through these lands on the West Coast, and they had a right to take up these lands; they had a right to expect that by making the railway the lands would have an enhanced value: and there is not the least doubt that they have an enhanced value. Now, there is another question with regard to the modification of the contract—the question of the Abt system. The honourable gentleman told us that had saved the company £400,000 on the cost of construction. Under the terms of the contract that must have saved the colony two hundred thousand pounds' worth of land.

Mr. PIRANI.—It varied the contract.

Mr. GUINNESS.—But it varied the contract to the material advantage of both parties. Can it be said to be a modification in favour of the company? The whole argument against this further concession asked for in the Bill is that the company from time to time had got all the concessions on their side. I have been endeavouring to show that it is not so. Many of the concessions were as much in favour of the colony as of the company. Then, passing on, we come to the question of whether this railway is one that will pay. Now, certain representations were made to the contractors as to what was likely to be the paying nature of the traffic on this line, and I think sufficient evidence was placed before the Committee to 11.0. show that this line will be of a payable nature. Contrasting that with the other lines in the colony, I think honourable members will see that the probability is in favour of its being a paying line. This is the only railway in the colony that has not to compete against any steamer or sailing-vessel. Every other line in the colony is subject to competition by steamer or sailing-vessel—from Christchurch to Timaru, Timaru to Oamaru, Oamaru to Dunedin, and Dunedin to Invercargill itself. Take the lines in the North Island—from Wellington to Wanganui: that line is subject to competition by steamer; and from Wanganui to New Plymouth. Then take the line from Wellington to Napier: Is not that subject to competition by steamer, and not only for the goods carried, but also for the passengers? Will the line between the west coast and the east coast be subject to any such competition? I say most decidedly not. Therefore, looking at it from every point of view, I think honourable members must admit that there is a very strong argument to be placed before this House why that line is very likely to pay as a line connecting the east and west coasts: it is not at all a parallel line like the east coast, upon which there is a highway for vessels to compete against it. In order to further support this contention, what do we find are the facts with regard to a portion of this railway which has already been constructed by the company?—I refer to that portion between Brunnerton and Reefton, a distance of about forty miles. We find, after that piece was constructed by the company, that these facts were elicited in regard to the traffic upon that line after it was opened, and up to the present time: On page 15 of the evidence attached to the report presented by the Select Committee on the company's proposals this session we find that these questions were asked of Mr. Wilson, the engineer and general manager of the company:—

"122. Mr. Hutchison.] Can you say how the portions you have made are paying?—The piece from Stillwater to Reefton is earning a gross amount of about £17,000 a year. We are working a little over 54 per cent.

"123. What is the capital?—It will be about £380,000. The line is practically a branch one. The traffic is to and from Reefton and Grey-mouth, and from the settlement on the line.

"124. Mr. Guinness.] How long has that line been open?—About three and a half to four years.

"125. Do the receipts show that the traffic is gradually increasing, or is it stationary, or decreasing?—The gross receipts have been annually £8,000, £12,000, and £17,000, for the financial years ending 30th June, 1892, 1893, and 1894 respectively. It is steadily increasing."

That shows to those honourable members who predicted that this line and this company would not pay that, although the mining interest and mining industry in the Reefton district is very much depressed, and has been so for the last twelve months, yet the earnings on this railway during the last three years have steadily been increasing from £8,000 to the end of June of the present year to the rate of £17,000 per annum. What is the traffic that is likely to go upon the line between the east and west coasts? We have it in evidence in one report presented from the Public Accounts Committee two years ago, in the evidence of Mr. Martin Kennedy, than who there is no greater authority in the colony on the question of the coal traffic. With regard to the coal traffic, and the benefit the line would be to the coal traffic, he states that the coal traffic, in his opinion, from Brunnerton to Christchurch would amount to at least £75,000 per annum, and that it would pay the present mine-owners to pay the Midland Railway Company for the transit of that coal from Brunnerton to the Canterbury Plains and into Christchurch at a rate of 11s. 6d. a ton.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—What about the Grey-mouth Harbour?

Mr. GUINNESS.—I will speak about that when I come to that question. I do not want to be led off the track I am on now. Mr. Kennedy also contrasts that with the freight paid from Grey-mouth to Lyttelton, which is only 7s. 6d. a ton, and he states that it would pay the proprietors better to pay 11s. 6d. per ton freight than to send the coal by sea. If they sent the coal from Brunnerton to Grey-mouth they would have to pay freight from Brunner-ton to Grey-mouth, 2s. a ton. That is for the first handling, and putting the coal into the steamer at Grey-mouth. Then it is to be taken to Lyttelton, and taken out of the steamer and put into the railway-trucks at Lyttelton; and then you have to add the railage from Lyttelton to Christchurch. There are, consequently, five handlings of the coal, whereas, if it were put into the trucks at Brunner-ton and sent direct across the line to Christchurch, to Ashburton, Kaiapoi, and Lyttelton, there would be only two handlings, and in Mr. Kennedy's opinion the saving that would take place in the loss of the coal that necessarily occurs through these several handlings would amount to such a sum as would pay the company to give 11s. 6d. a ton freightage across the Island, instead of 7s. 6d. by steamer. That, I think, is a very strong argument to show that his opinion is well founded, and that there would be a large mineral traffic which would connect the coal-mining industry with the large district of Canterbury, where so much fuel is required, because timber is not to be found upon the Canterbury plains for firing purposes, and for all industrial purposes a large quantity of coal is consumed in that province. With regard to the timber traffic, what are the results that have come about since this company first started—that is, on the two lines from Brunner-ton to Jackson's, thirty miles, and from Reefton to Brunner-ton, forty miles? At the present time no less than eleven different sawmills have been erected on these lines of railway, and the result is that these sawmills at the present time are actually cutting and sending down to the Port of Grey-mouth for export upwards of between 75,000ft. and 100,000ft. of timber per week. What does that mean? It means that an enormous export of timber has been developed by the construction of these small portions of the line, and that naturally goes to show that there necessarily would be a large amount of mineral and timber traffic over this line.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It could always go by sea.

Mr. GUINNESS.—We have seen since the railway was commenced, with regard to the export of timber, that the West Coast has taken up a position which no other place has taken, and when the railway is completed I say that timber can be carried by railway to other parts of the colony. We shall be able to send our timber from the West Coast to such an extent that we shall get a large amount of traffic by it. There is another great advantage if the line is completed. It will open up the mining industry to capitalists and speculators, many of whom are now loth to invest in it because they have a difficulty in getting to the locality where the mining is carried on, and capitalists do not like to trust to others to any extent, and they have to go to the fields and the different mining districts of Reefton and other places to look after their interests, and to conduct mining operations in those districts. This railway will also be an advantage to the Canterbury Province, and particularly to the provinces in the South Island on the eastern coast, and to the large towns where labour gets congested and employment cannot be found for the unemployed when the harvesting and shearing seasons are not on in those districts. Then is the time when the surplus labour has no outlet, and if the railway is made there will be abundant work for these men to do. They can go over to the West Coast, and would be able to get enough gold to maintain themselves without clamouring for work, and an advantage would also be that when labour was required for the harvesting and shearing seasons in Canterbury it would be plentiful, for we should have these men going back to that work, because of the means of communication that this railway would afford to them. Then, there is another point—and this point I do hope that honourable members coming from the Auckland District, and those coming from the Taranaki and Wellington Districts, and some of the southern provinces, will bear in mind. That important return that the Premier quoted from when moving the second reading of the Bill, I think, is a return that ought to be well looked into, and ought to be well considered. What has Canterbury got? It is one of the wealthiest provinces in the colony; and what has it got as a return for what it has added to the consolidated revenue of the colony? Why, the Hon. William Rolleston, when he was Superintendent of that province, handed over to the colony out of the Canterbury chest something over £800,000—nearly a million of money.

Mr. CROWTHER.—We did not get the same chance.

Mr. GUINNESS.—Well, they did get the chance of doing it; and I ask, what did the Province of Auckland, or Wellington, or any of the other provinces hand over to the chest of the colony? Otago might have handed over a little, but Canterbury handed more money over to the colony out of the Canterbury provincial chest than any other province, and I think that is a fact that honourable members should take into consideration when dealing with this question. And I think the statement of the Premier that Canterbury has had nothing given to it in the way of public-works expenditure deserves consideration. All that has been given is the shutting-up of this land, in common with Nelson and Westland, in connection with the construction of this line. Speeches have been made against this measure by honourable gentlemen who ought not to have made them. I allude particularly to the speech made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). Why, in this House on one occasion he described these lands as worthless that were going to the company; and that opinion was quoted in the London money-market as the opinion of an eminent authority. It was the authority of the Prime Minister of the colony, and I say it had a tendency to prevent, and did prevent, the company from raising what they would have raised otherwise. And if the company has not had capital to complete the line, is it not fair now that the company should have an opportunity of carrying out the completion of that section of the line which the financiers at Home are willing to advance the money to complete? It has been said, "Why not complete the whole of the contract?" but I ask, can you make a company that has no means to carry out the work do so? They would require about two millions and a half to carry out the whole of the work; and if the company say they can find the money to carry on one section, because the financiers can give the money on Government security, so that the line will pay, I ask, ought we not to give that security for the line that has been locked up so long? Another point we ought to bear in mind is that the people of Canterbury and Nelson and Westland have suffered considerably owing to these lands being locked up for settlement under the liberal land-laws which have been passed by the present Government for the occupation, sale, and disposal of the waste lands of the Crown. I say emphatically they have; and is it not then right that these lands should be let, if there is not to be a further charge upon the colony? I maintain we are not putting a further charge upon the colony, because we are setting free to the colony large tracts of land, which will leave a large sum over and above the six hundred and eighteen thousand pounds' worth of debentures. Then, again, it is said that these lands are not valuable. Why, the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) tells us that those lands are valuable lands; and he is one of the few members in the House who have been over them. It is a fact that in Westland District alone there are over three hundred applications lying in the Land Office, and the number has been accumulating for years, from people who want to take up land in blocks of from five hundred to two hundred acres. In the Nelson District there are upwards of eight hundred applications to the Land Board and the company for land in that district; and yet it is said that these lands are not valuable, and not fit for settlement. If they are not, how is it that we have these accumulations of applications in these districts for these lands? I ask this question of honourable members: Are we getting nothing back for giving to the company this £618,000 of debentures? What I have stated I declare to be facts; and ought we not to allow those lands to be placed in such a position as to let the Minister of Lands settle them, and secure their permanent occupation, instead of driving our population away? Sir, we should attach them to the soil, and make them permanent settlers. As the diggings are worked out so must we settle a population on the land. Then, honourable members have the Premier's statement that the company has a right to come to the colony and ask for an extension of the contract. If the contract is extended in one direction the locking-up of lands must be continued. If it is extended for two or three years that locking-up will be continued for that time. You say, "Let them complete the contract." They cannot do it; and what is to happen? We shall have the railway-lines lying as waste stock, and of no use to those who have waited patiently for them. If there is any justice in the House—and I think there is—I say that sense of justice should give to the Canterbury residents that which they have a right to expect. Canterbury, Westland, and Nelson are not to derive any advantage from this work because the company cannot get the money to make the Nelson connection. That is the position the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) advocates, and the position the honourable member for Waima-Sounds and the honourable member for Nelson City are advocating. And I ask those honourable members, if they want the Nelson connection, will they be any more likely to get it if they prevent the other part of the line from being made for the benefit of the colony? If the other portion of the line is made, is not the Nelson connection more likely to be finished—the ninety-seven miles from Reefton to Belgrove? I ask honourable members if they have considered that point, and if it is not better for one connection to be made rather than none. I have a good deal more to say on this question, but I regret that the time limit prevents my doing so.

Mr. Guinness

Mr. PIRANI.—I should not have risen, Sir, to speak to-night had it not been for the misleading statements put forward by the honourable member for Riccarton. It struck me at the time he was speaking that his fluency actually overcame him, and he therefore made such rash statements that I do not believe he could really remember now what they were. He stated that the Public Works Statement would show that most of the expenditure on roads and bridges had been for the North Island. After hearing him speak I took the trouble to look up the figures, and I find that exactly the contrary is the case, and that most of the money in that Statement is to go to the South Island, and not to the North Island. For roads and bridges and mining-works in all classes in the South Island there is £175,740. For roads, bridges, and mining-works in the North Island there is £165,506. Then, taking out of that sum the amount that is going to the North Island under the "loans to local bodies" conditions, we find the total amount is only £120,000; and, taking the same fund for the South Island, we find that it totals £165,000, or a balance of £35,281 in favour of the South Island.

Mr. SEDDON.—That is not correct.

Mr. PIRANI.—That is including all classes in the Public Works Statement with the exception of railways, and I am surprised that the Premier is not more acquainted with his own figures. Another misleading statement made by the honourable member for Riccarton was that if the railway were made they would be able to utilise these lands, and they would be able to utilise to the colony those lands in the Westland District that they were unable to sell at the present time; and almost in the same breath he said that the railway would enable the Westland people to get their food-supplies from Canterbury. Well, if the lands in Westland are to be made so valuable and fit for settlement by the opening of the railway, I ask, what advantage would there be in having their food-supplies carried from Canterbury? I think that is an evidence of the manner in which we are misled by statements. In regard to this Bill, I was elected, in common with almost every member in the colony, to oppose borrowing for the making of railways, and I call this Bill neither more nor less than a borrowing proposal to the extent of £618,000, and not to make a railway for the colony, but for a private company. All this "buncombe" and nonsense that is talked about getting our lands back, and getting money for them, is worth very little, because we know well that the change is made because the debentures will be of more use to them than the land itself. Therefore we must conclude that they are making a better bargain than they have made at the present time, and the colony must be the losers. With regard to the necessity of obtaining this land for settlement, it strikes me that the colony is doing quite enough in getting land for settlement by spending half a million of money in purchasing Native land and private lands besides, and in opening up Crown lands, including the Awarua Block, for settlement for a year or two; but if this company is compelled to open these lands before the end of the year, or the Government can resume them, I do not see what benefit can accrue to the colony from paying the company to relinquish them before the two months and a half have expired. I trust the good sense of the members of this House will prevent them from saddling upon this colony another burden of nearly three-quarters of a million. Surely we have done enough this session to burden the colony. Surely we have placed a heavy enough millstone already around the necks of the taxpayers, without going the extreme length we are going in this Bill. Surely, if we are to help a private company in this way, the next thing will be that all the private companies will come and ask the colony for relief from the burdens they have placed on their own shoulders just because they want to benefit the colony! I should be very sorry indeed to support this measure simply on the ground stated by the Premier, that the Province of Canterbury did not get its fair share of public-works expenditure. What is that principle that is laid down but the principle of log-rolling—the old game of, "You help my district and I will help yours?" And it seems to me such a cry should not come, at any rate, from the Ministerial benches. If Canterbury has not had her expenditure 11.30. in the past days, and other districts are now having theirs, is it because she should have had it? No, Sir, it is because the other districts of the colony have needed this expenditure, and that Canterbury was so well looked after in the provincial days that she has no present need of an expenditure of money on public works. Why, Sir, who have been the strongest in this House in advocating that Canterbury men who were unemployed should be allowed to get work in any other part of the colony where work was to be got, and which, I say, they had a right to get? The very supporters of this measure. They advocated it; and if that principle is right and proper, why try to mislead the public by saying that enabling this contract to be undertaken, and employing men in that part of the colony, is a work that is in the interests of the colony as a whole? Is it not cheaper for the men themselves, and is it not cheaper for the country, for the men to be taken where work can be provided which is profitable? And, if they are compelled to do their share in opening up the country by the construction of necessary roads in the back-districts, it is likely to be as profitable to the settlers, instead of opening up country by a railway which will run through the barren waste that we have heard described on all sides of the House. I have not the least doubt that the company have picked the best of the land—that they have left what is almost worthless; and, although it is very large in area, there is not the least doubt the greater part of it is of very little value. I say the effect of passing this Bill will be to take over what is next to worthless as an asset, and to compel the colony to bear the burden of constructing a private railway, while all the benefits of this railway will be conferred simply upon private individuals. If this contract should not be a profitable one—if it should not pan out according to the estimate—then it is they who should be the sufferers, and not the colony, and I hope the House will not place this heavy burden on the taxpayers of the colony in the way that is proposed. Why, what will be the next move if this is carried? There is not the least doubt we shall have a proposal brought down to take over the assets of the New Zealand Bank Company; and, if that is the position, and it is fair and right to take over this landed property for the farmers of the colony, it is just as right and fair that the colony should take over those enormous assets of the bank company, and give it debentures or cash, for the purpose of promoting settlement.

Mr. Pirani

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, the whirligig of time brings about strange things. I had not expected to hear the speech I have just now listened to from the honourable member for Palmerston. I had thought that, at all events, he would have some fond recollections of the spot which at one time was near and dear to him, and to some one I know who has recently passed away, whom I do not like to mention; he was a respected West-coaster and a very old personal friend. I should have thought that, at all events, the honourable gentleman would have been the last to have cast the reflections he has cast upon the West Coast—its people, its soil, and its productiveness. Sir, it appears hard, but I should like to point out that a speech of the kind we have just listened to is simply the speech of one who has been seeking for some excuse for the vote he was about to give; and looking round he has discovered—what shall I say? He fancies he has discovered good and sufficient reason. Now, as to what the honourable gentleman says as regards the question of the expenditure in the North Island as compared with the South Island, I say that the statements made by the honourable member for Riccarton are absolutely correct—that if you take the Public Works Statement as it is now before the House, if you take the whole of the allocations on railways and roads—

Mr. PIRANI.—Oh, no; take the expenditure on roads and bridges.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member says “Oh, no,” you are not to take the railway expenditure. I say it is grossly unfair to take the expenditure in one class and leave out altogether the expenditure on other things. I say you must take the expenditure as a whole; and on the Public Works Statement what do you find? £167,000 for the Auckland Provincial District, £146,000 for the Wellington District, and £165,000 for the Otago District, whilst you have only £25,000 for the District of Canterbury. I say, when there is for each of these districts the amount of money that is given in the present Public Works Statement, and that all that is asked under this proposal is to pay the first issue of debentures, it is but little to ask. It is unfair to say that Canterbury shall have no advantages at all—that she shall be simply the milch-cow for the rest of the colony, that she shall continue to produce and pay revenue, and when there is a necessary public work, which will help the well-being of the people of that part of the colony, and the prosecution of which is but right and just, it shall be denied to her. That simply means this: If that course is to be pursued in future it will recoil upon the other districts. It will make the people of that part of the colony agitate, and it will exactly bring about what the honourable gentleman said was an improper thing to do—that members must combine to get justice. Again referring to the whirligig of time, who was it introduced the Bill that first gave power to the syndicate to go Home to raise the money for this railway? Why, Sir, it was Sir Robert Stout, the Premier of New Zealand at that time. He it is, Sir, who is responsible for the first contract, and, if a difficulty has arisen, he is the one who is responsible therefor. And, Sir, what has been the position right through? If honourable members will take up Hansard for 1884, 1885, and 1886 they will find that the position is exactly reversed since then. They will find that the then member for Kumara was contending for the West Coast gold-mining interests as against the proposal that was made; and what was the reply given by the honourable gentleman's colleague, Sir Julius Vogel? That what they desired was to promote the interests of the West Coast, and that to enter into this contract would prove beneficial alike to the whole colony and to the several districts. If honourable members will look up Hansard they will see that what I have said is absolutely correct. Well, all that I am now called upon to do is to insist that justice shall be done to the company, which, up to the time I came upon these benches, I was in opposition to and which I, in the interest of the mining industry on the West Coast, had to fight: in fact, at one time it seemed, so far as I was concerned, almost like personal persecution. But I lay all these matters aside when it comes to a question of public duty. Being here on these benches, and finding what are the terms of the contract and what is the condition of the company, I am bound in duty—and it is a duty I believe I owe to the whole colony—to submit these proposals which are now before the House.

Mr. CROWTHER.—What has the colony got to do with the condition of the company?

Mr. SEDDON.—It may be asked, What has the Government got to do with the condition of the contractor who has got the Helensville Railway, who has met with unforeseen difficulties in the work of piercing a tunnel through? Am I to say to him and his sureties, “Because unforeseen difficulties have occurred, I will stand on the contract. Away you go; bring forward your securities”? I am not called upon to do that; and there is the Public Works Statement, which was presented the other night, to show what we are going to do. I say, under such circumstances a Minister for Public Works who knows his position and his duty to the colony and the contractor who is confronted with any such unforeseen difficulties has a right to use common-sense fairness and to do what is right and just. That, Sir, is the position. To-day the question was raised, and I was challenged by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) to say what has caused the change as regarded the alternate blocks, and the necessity for the first change in the contract which he himself has condemned. I say he has no right to condemn it, as he was responsible. He, in passing that law, was responsible primarily for the defects in the law. If members will turn to Hansard, Volume 55, June–July, 1886, they will find the following, page 29, of date the 22nd June:—

“Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I may say that the Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker kindly interpreted this language for me, as follows:—

““Lands now used for mining purposes” would include only lands so used at the passing of the Act—not now used. “Used” means, I think, actually occupied. “Gold-workings” would probably be held to mean much the same thing, and to include only land actually worked at the passing of the Act.”

That is of the very clause quoted by the honourable gentleman to-day, in which he said mining land was protected. That is, Sir, the opinion that was held by the Attorney-General, Sir Frederick Whitaker. He, Sir, supported what I contended for when the Bill was going through in 1884. I say the responsibility for the new contract, and for the abolition of the alternate-block system, rests on the shoulders of the then Premier, Sir Robert Stout, now the senior member for Wellington City. That, Sir, is where the responsibility rests, and the whole of the trouble there has been with the company from that time to the present has been owing to the defect in the first contract which was given to the company. And Sir Harry Atkinson and his Government must take their share of the responsibility; and I say that it is to their credit that, when they found the condition in which the colony was owing to the defects in the contracts, they adopted the same course that I am taking to-day—granting concessions, to rectify mistakes and errors, and to rectify the wrongdoings of the senior member for Wellington City and of the Stout-Vogel Government. That is the true position of affairs, and there is no getting over that. Then, Sir, the senior member for Wellington City said to-day that the speech I made in introducing the Bill was misleading. He made that statement at the commencement of his speech, but he never attempted to show any one single case in which I had misled the House; and what I said at that time has been corroborated by others who have spoken on this Bill. I was almost amused when he was exaggerating what was the effect of our proposals. He said there is a £21,000 liability upon the colony annually. What did he propose? What, Sir, were the words used in support of the Meiggs proposals submitted by his Government? Let honourable members turn to Hansard for 1885, and what will they find? They will find that the Meiggs proposals were these: That £97,000 a year was to be paid for a period of twenty years. In addition to this £97,000 for twenty years, there was the condition—which could not be denied, and which Sir Julius Vogel had to admit—that there had to be paid the net amount receivable by the syndicate. Turning to page 558, Volume 52, of Hansard, this passage occurs:—

“Net amount receivable by syndicate must be ninety-seven, Government also paying any deficit in working expenses. All profits from land must belong to the syndicate, these profits being chief inducement investors. Payments under guarantee during twenty years recouped from profits line. Probably built three or more portions by separate issues, land being allocated here rateably; therefore necessary provide guarantee divided rateably, and failure one portion not entail forfeiture others. Saving clause present contract also necessary. Nothing less than these terms any use whatever.”

I say here, in a nutshell, was the proposal which the honourable member submitted to this Parliament: £97,000 a year for twenty years, and in addition to that the Government to make up any deficit in working-expenses. He complains that we to-day ask Parliament to grant £21,000 a year as interest upon the debentures proposed to be issued under this Bill! Compare what we are now doing with what he himself proposed to Parliament, and I say the comparison is in favour of our proposals. We are to-day called upon to rectify the errors and blunders committed by the honourable member and his Government. When he considered that the company had entered into the proposal, and there was no power to recede, he went to Napier and made a speech. The contractors had sent their agents to London with documents in support of their concessions, when the honourable gentleman told the people at Napier that the land consisted of glaciers, snowy mountain-tops, and that there was little or no timber—that the land would not feed a goat to the acre. Yet he himself had been a party to making this contract! The statement of the honourable gentleman at Napier could have no other effect than to prejudice the position of the company in London. I trust that the position taken up by the honourable member on that occasion is one which no other statesman or politician will ever take up again in this country. But the honourable member is not satisfied with having done that on that occasion; he is doing the same thing now. The honourable gentleman has practically said that within the five-million-acre limit in Canterbury there is no good land. As to the West Coast, I may say that there are large tracts of good country there. The applications prove that. There are thousands and thousands of acres in Canterbury which will be taken up if this embargo is removed. To say you could not get three hundred thousand acres of fairly good land out of the five millions is to make a statement which is entirely at variance with the facts. The honourable member for Auckland City read the contract to-night. There is only one interpretation of the clause he referred to, and that is that, if the B1 value of the area set apart would not come up to £618,000, there is power given to enlarge the area of selection so as to make it come up to £618,000. There is no doubt as to that being the correct reading of the contract. The honourable member said the honour of the country was involved so far as the Nelson connection is concerned. It is only under circumstances which are beyond our control that I should be one who would ask Parliament to leave Nelson out in the cold whilst we made the Canterbury-Westland line. But the company is not in a position to make the whole line. It is said that Mr. Brodie Hoare and others had their eyes open when they undertook this contract including the extension to Nelson, but they could not have known so much of the country as I do, or as the senior member for Wellington City and other honourable members do, because, taking the portion of the country which this branch would go through, there is no chance for some years of settlement in that part. I say we are not responsible for that. We have to look at the position as business-men would do. Has the company, so far as it has gone, done its best in regard to the construction of this line? I say it has. Hence, I ask, why should we insist upon the company doing that which we know it is impossible for them to do? Shall we as prudent men take what the company can do? Under the circumstances, which are extraordinary, I say in doing that we should be reflecting credit upon ourselves as an Administration. The position of the Nelson people would not be at all improved. It would have been much better to have had the railway constructed to Norris's Gully. Looking to the future, the line might have to be constructed a few miles further ahead. There is a point to which Parliament would be justified in voting money for an extension; and I wanted, as a settlement, to get the line completed by the company to Norris's Gully. But it appears to me, no matter how far one endeavours to look ahead, or endeavours to befriend people, they will take their own wayward course, and that course I unhesitatingly say here, so far as the people of Nelson are concerned, will be to their detriment. It will not profit them one jot; while, in the course they have taken, they have done an injury to their neighbours, who would have profited had our proposals been carried. I must take exception to a statement made by the honourable member for Nelson City (Mr. Graham) when he said that it would have been a good thing for the colony if the manager of the company had been deprived of his liberty during the session. The honourable member may laugh, but, when he is dead and gone, some one may rise in this Chamber and quote that statement from Hansard, and members of the House of that day may not know the circumstances. They may put a different construction upon the statement. Still, this will be a matter of record, and, where we have a gentleman whose honour and integrity are undoubted, and who has not been guilty of lobbying, as the honourable gentleman stated, to have such a statement recorded against him as that made by the honourable member for Nelson City is not right. The remark should not have been made. What has the honourable gentleman himself done? Has he been lobbying? Has he been asking honourable members to sympathize with him and his troubles? Yes; morning, noon, and night, whenever he has had an opportunity, he has been impressing upon honourable members the desirability of voting against this Bill, because, he says, there has been a serious wrong done to Nelson; and perhaps more than one honourable member has been ably assisting him in lobbying. But those honourable gentlemen have been sent here for the purpose of impressing upon honourable members the necessity of opposing this measure—at all events, of maintaining the position of Nelson. Do I say that, because of that, an insult should be offered to them? I simply say they have done what they, in accordance with their lights, conceived to be their duty, and have acted within their rights as colonists. But the honourable member made a remark this afternoon which he ought not to have made, and when the honourable member gets his Hansard proof I think he will agree that he ought never to have made such a statement, and that such a remark ought not to be recorded. I simply call attention to this to show the length to which extremists will go, and to show that they must have a very bad cause when they resort to such means to further that cause. The senior member for Wellington City said that the information given as regards the expenditure is entirely misleading. The following are the figures: There is for Auckland, since 1886, £1,085,000; Wellington, £931,000; Otago, £1,000,000; whilst for Canterbury there has only been £268,000, whereas their own land, to the value of £184,733, has gone for the construction of this work, making together the small total of £452,956. These figures speak for themselves. During that time, whilst this railway was supposed to be under construction, practically nothing has been going to Canterbury in comparison with that spent in other parts of the colony. I say that is a very strong argument in favour of justice being done to that district. Taking the proposed expenditure last year, what do you find? Wellington, Auckland, and Otago have practically had amongst them, in round numbers, above the amount we are asking now for—£618,000; and if you take four years ahead at the present rate of expenditure each of these districts will receive more than the money that will be given to the Canterbury, Nelson, and Westland Districts. Then,

Mr. Seddon

12.0. we were challenged about the relative amounts here. The total amount here for the colony is £901,000, and I say here, again, taking Auckland, Taranaki, Hawke's Bay, and Wellington, the total amount was £426,488. Where, now, are the statements of the honourable member for Palmerston? Sir, I am sorry that the time-limit exists. The honourable member for Auckland City said he approached this matter as a jurymen whose mind was unbiassed, and that he was determined to give a verdict on the case in accordance with the evidence submitted. If he has considered the evidence submitted during this debate I say that he should vote for the Bill before the House, because the evidence and facts given have been in favour of the Bill. I am afraid that what biassed him when he came to the front was the feeling which, I fear, exists on the part of some members in this matter. He said it was the policy of the Government that had destroyed the value of this land. I say that the policy of the Government has not destroyed these land-values. It has not destroyed the land-values of Canterbury, it has not destroyed the land-values of Westland, and it has not destroyed the land-values of Nelson. Why should he say, in a debate of this kind, that the company could not get their money for the land, and so we were issuing debentures in lieu of the land-grant? There was only one reason for his saying that, and that was to bring discredit upon the Government for bringing forward these proposals. No other meaning could be attached to that statement, when the fact was patent to him, with the documentary evidence on the desk before him, that all the company's troubles arise from the want of capital. It is not a question of land-value, for, by the sale of land, the company prove that they have obtained 83 per cent. profit on the sales up to to-day. It is not because the land-values have fallen in the area set apart for the railway, it is because the company cannot find the necessary means to complete the contract, that it asks the Government to deal with it fairly and justly, and as, I think, it is entitled to be dealt with. Under all the circumstances, I say to members representing each and every part of New Zealand, if you carry these proposals you will find that they will be in the interests of the colony, you will remove a serious difficulty, you will leave untarnished the honour of the colony, and you will prevent litigation. Otherwise you will have the position of matters brought before the world by our friends at Home, who, instead of being our friends and assisting us to maintain our credit in the future, will say that they cannot trust us, for when the opportunity was given us we failed to do what was right in the case of this company. I say that justice should be done, and if justice is done this Bill will be read a second time.

Sir R. STOUT.—I rise to make a personal explanation. The Premier has introduced matter in his reply which I had no means of speaking on when I spoke on the Bill. There are two things I wish to refer to. He said the Government of which I was Premier agreed, under the Meiggs proposal, to an expenditure of £90,000 a year. There was no such proposal by the Meiggs Company. The company asked £90,000 of a guarantee for a number of years, but the suggestion of Sir Julius Vogel was a guarantee up to £30,000 a year, which would have amounted to £348,000, as will be seen in Hansard, page 52, in Sir Julius Vogel's speech when considering the proposal; but no proposal was adopted. The honourable gentleman himself voted for the appointment of the Committee to consider the Meiggs proposal. The second point was, that I was responsible for the present contract. I say there was no such contract made when I was in office, and no such contract was ever accepted by the company when I was Premier. The contract now sought to be altered was made on the 3rd August, 1888, in pursuance of an Act passed in 1887. I was not in the House at the time, and if I had been in the House I should have opposed it.

Mr. SEDDON.—I quoted from the Meiggs proposals, and the speech made by Sir Julius Vogel when he introduced those proposals to the House. Subsequently the Government did deal with the proposals.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—I say again that the reference made to the Meiggs contract was correct, and that the first contract was signed in 1884, and that Mr. Matson, Mr. Taylor Weston, and Mr. Hart, of Christchurch, did enter into a contract with New Zealand while the honourable gentleman was Premier, and it was with that contract in their pockets that they went Home to London.

Sir R. STOUT.—That is not the contract now in existence. The company never accepted that contract.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be read a second time."

AYES, 26.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	McLachlan
Carroll	Larnach	Meredith
Collins	Mackintosh	Mitchelson
Hutchison, G.	McGowan	Montgomery
Joyce	McKenzie, J.	O'Regan

Mr. Seddon

Parata
Reeves
Saunders
Seddon

Smith, G. J.
Stevens
Steward
Tanner

Ward.
Tellers.
Guinness
Russell, G. W.

NOES, 32.

Allen
Buchanan
Buick
Button
Carnecross
Carnell
Crowther
Earnshaw
Fraser
Hall-Jones
Harris

Heke
Hutchison, W.
Kelly, J. W.
Lang
Mackenzie, T.
Massey
McGuire
McNab
Miller
Morrison
Newman

Pinkerton
Pirani
Russell, W. R.
Smith, E. M.
Stout
Te Ao
Thompson
Wilson.
Tellers.
Graham
Mills.

PAIRS.

For.

Cadman
Duthie
Flatman
Pere.

Against.

Green
Maslin
Duncan
Lawry.

Majority against, 6.

Motion negatived.

The House adjourned at twelve minutes past twelve a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 17th October, 1894.

Second Reading—Third Readings—Destroying Useless Documents—Ministerial Residences Sale Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Criminal Code Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READING.

Tongariro National Park Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Trustees Bill, Mining Companies Bill.

DESTROYING USELESS DOCUMENTS.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE moved, That it be left to the discretion of the Clerk of the Council at the end of each session to destroy petitions relating to public Bills passed, and also all proofs of compliance with Standing Orders relative to local or private Bills passed during such session, and all petitions presented to the Council prior to the last three years, together with such other documents as in his discretion may appear useless, or have no historical value.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN moved, That all the words after the word "years" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY moved, That the following words be added: "That a list be prepared by the Clerk of Parliaments during the recess of all further documents which may not be considered necessary to be preserved, and that such documents be destroyed, if no resolution is passed objecting thereto within four weeks after the list has been laid on the table."

The Council divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 15.

Baillie	Jennings	Rigg
Barnicoat	Kelly	Shrimski
Buckley	Kerr	Stewart
Feldwick	Montgomery	Swanson
Jenkinson	Richardson	Taiaroa.

NOES, 17.

Aeland	MacGregor	Reynolds
Bolt	McLean	Walker, L.
Bonar	Oliver	Whitmore
Bowen	Ormond	Whyte
Mantell	Peacock	Williams.
Morris	Pharazyn

Majority against, 2.

Amendment negatived, and motion as previously amended agreed to.

MINISTERIAL RESIDENCES SALE BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said it was a simple measure, and he had very little to say about it. It authorised the Government to sell the pieces of land, and the buildings on them, known as the Ministerial residences. The houses were not suitable for the purposes for which they were originally intended. Take the Tinakori Road residence: he did not suppose any one would care to live there, and he did not think it was fair to ask Ministers, in the circumstances in which they were placed, to reside in establishments of a character much beyond their means. The object was to dispose of these residences in the way indicated in the Bill, and in the meantime they could be leased for a term not exceeding one year. This was not the first time on which this matter had been brought before the Council. In 1887 a Bill was passed dealing with the residences, but unfortunately it did not go far enough. The question, therefore, was not a new one. It was thought desirable to sell them because they were costly, and considerable expense was incurred in keeping them up. He thought, himself, it would be a very wise thing to sell these residences.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI thought it would be far more beneficial to the Government and the country if these residences were let for a short term.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said there was provision for that.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI said, Yes; but he dissented from the proposal to dispose of the residences altogether. He agreed with the honourable gentleman that the salaries which Ministers received did not justify them in living in palatial buildings like these, and incurring large expense. At the same time, Wellington was a place in which there was very little space and accommodation; and in view of the possibility of such buildings being required hereafter by other Ministers who might succeed the present ones, and who might not care to live in hotels, as most of the present ones did, he thought under the circumstances they should retain these buildings and let them for a short time. With all due respect to the Government, he could not see his way clear to agree to these buildings being sacrificed at the present time; and he felt sure they would be required sooner or later. While staying in hotels a Minister's life was not a happy one, for there he was approachable while asleep or at meals. He therefore begged to move, That the Bill be read the second time that day three months.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON was very sorry to see that the Government had brought forward this proposal, because he thought it would be a very great mistake to part with these buildings. Two of these residences were comparatively small buildings. They were certainly not houses which anybody with a small family would find too large. The house in Tinakori Road, of course, was another matter altogether; but, if he was not mistaken, more than one promise had been made or implied that this place should be handed over at some time as an endowment for a university for Wellington. But putting that aside, he thought it would be a great mistake to sell these buildings. Perhaps he spoke somewhat feelingly, because when he was asked to join the Government in 1872 he made inquiries and found that he could not get a house at all in Wellington, and the only condition on which he came up to Wellington was that they should find him a house. He was kept some three or four months living in a hotel with his family until the house in Molesworth Street was secured. That house was certainly not too large. Since that time there had been other Ministers who had found difficulty in procuring houses, and who had made it a condition before coming to Wellington that a house should be obtained. He hoped the Government would not press this Bill. If they did, he would certainly oppose it.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY could not vote for the amendment, because that would be discourteous to the honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill; but his feeling was that the Bill should not be dealt with this session. The salaries of Ministers were too low to justify them in occupying these residences; but, being public property, the residences should not be hastily disposed of. He entirely disagreed with the tendency nowadays to get rid of every bit of land which the Government possessed. By-and-by they would have to buy land in cities for public purposes, and then would have to pay big prices for it. Even if the Government lost a little every year through holding this land, he thought there should be some reserves kept in the town for public purposes; and he therefore objected to the sale of this land, and would vote against it if it proceeded further than the second reading.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN hoped other honourable members would not follow the lead of the Hon. Mr. Kelly, who looked upon this matter as one of courtesy. The honourable member was prepared to vote for the Bill because he thought it would be discourteous to the Attorney-General if he voted for the amendment. He (Mr. Pharazyn) could see no discourtesy whatever in it. Possibly the Attorney-General himself was not in favour of the proposal. The honourable gentleman might perhaps have moved the Bill in a merely perfunctory manner. At any rate, the question was one of business, and of due regard to the future interests of the district, and of the colony generally. In the first place, it had always been the practice of the Council to carefully guard public reserves. They had always been very unwilling to part with public reserves, no matter of what kind. As far as he could see, under this Bill the money would only go into the consolidated revenue, and would be spent—nobody knew how. He thought it would be very much better if they retained these properties. It was quite possible that at some future time Ministers might require houses of this kind. All Ministers did not care to live in lodgings or publichouses. With regard to the question of reserves, even supposing these properties were not used as Ministerial residences, they might possibly become exceedingly valuable for other purposes at some future time. He would be glad to see a portion of one of these properties used as an endowment for a university or other public purpose. He was quite convinced that we were a great deal too ready to part with every scrap of land in those towns which were growing in size. He thought it was a great misfortune that they to a certain extent had parted with the Botanic Gardens. It was true they put it under the charge of the town, but still they did part with it so far as the colony was concerned, and it was very likely that at some future time they might have to buy the property back for colonial purposes. At any rate, in this particular case it appeared to him that it would be exceedingly unwise to adopt the proposal made to sell these properties. He would support the amendment.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE thought that, whatever they did with these residences, they should cease to be Ministerial residences. He thought the system of Ministerial residences and also of Ministerial house-allowances was bad, and had worked badly. The residences and house allowances should be done away with, and the salaries of Ministers raised proportionately. Each Minister should then be allowed to do as he pleased. The existence of these residences was very often an embarrassment to particular Ministers, who did not wish to occupy one, and who yet drew their house-allowance: they were accused of meanness and of all sorts of things. It did not always suit a Minister to occupy a residence, and he thought it would work much better if they were paid higher salaries and allowed to do as they pleased.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN said it was all very well to say that there were plenty of houses in Wellington, and that any Minister coming into office could do as he liked. Speaking from experience, he could say that houses were not to be got, and a Minister coming into office, and having a family, would often be absolutely without any house to live in at Wellington. It was very often the case that a house was required suddenly on the formation of a new Government. There were only three of these residences, as it happened, and that was, he thought, not too many. He also considered that the Government should not alienate any of their public lands, as they could not know what the future exigencies of the colony would be, especially as in the political capital the Crown possessed very little land for any public purpose. He thought Wellington had some right to claim, after all that had been proposed indirectly, that one of these properties, if it was determined to dispose of them, should be utilised for a university college. Wellington had some future claim if these properties were not to be retained as residences. He thought there were sufficient reasons of public interest to prevent them from hurriedly and recklessly alienating at a low price what might some day be of great value to the State.

The Hon. Mr. KERR would point out that there was a clause in the Bill empowering the Government to lease these properties until the market was in a better state, so that they might be realised upon. He could not see the use of keeping buildings and grounds, which required constant expense in repairs and maintenance. It was, he thought, also unfair to ask a Minister, with the salary he at present received, to live in one of these Ministerial residences, where he would, no doubt, be expected to entertain; and, as the buildings could not be made use of, it was time they were disposed of. He therefore hoped the Council would pass this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR did not consider this a very material question, because the amount of money involved was very trifling. He thought it was inadvisable for the Government to part with these properties, but, if it were thought that retaining them led to a certain amount of expense, that expense might be covered by letting the houses on short leases. However, he thought that in the future some men might be induced to take part in the government of the country who might require some residence where they might have privacy for themselves and their families. He thought it was absurd to think that because a man lived in one of those residences he should therefore be called upon to entertain, as Ministers were expected to do in former times. That time was past. Whatever trifling expense there was in connection with keeping these three residences in repair he was sure could easily be covered by letting them at a moderate rental, so that neither the Government nor those who might wish to occupy them should be put to expense hereafter.

The Council divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

AYES, 13.

Baillie	Kelly	McLean
Barnicoat	Kerr	Stewart
Buckley	Montgomery	Walker, L.
Jenkinson	McCullough	Whyte.
Jennings

NOES, 21.

Acland	Morris	Richardson
Bolt	MacGregor	Rigg
Bonar	Oliver	Shrimski
Bowen	Ormond	Swanson
Feldwick	Peacock	Taiaroa
Kenny	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Mantell	Reynolds	Williams.

Majority against, 8.

Motion negatived.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be read the second time that day three months.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 16.—Appointment of sittings.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN moved, That the word "Minister," in the second line, be struck out, for the purpose of inserting the words "Chief Judge."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 14.

Barnicoat	Jennings	Montgomery
Bolt	Kelly	Rigg
Buckley	Kerr	Taiaroa
Feldwick	McCullough	Whitmore.
Jenkinson	McLean

NOES, 12.

Acland	Morris	Shrimski
Bonar	Oliver	Swanson
Grace	Ormond	Whyte
MacGregor	Pharazyn	Williams.

Majority for, 2.

Word retained.

Clause 115.—Dealings with Native lands prohibited, except under certain circumstances.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA moved, That the following words be added to the clause: "or any land held by a Native in severalty in any part of New Zealand."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

AYES, 19.

Acland	MacGregor	Pharazyn
Barnicoat	McCullough	Richardson
Bonar	McLean	Swanson
Bowen	Morris	Taiaroa
Feldwick	Oliver	Whyte
Grace	Ormond	Williams.
Jennings

NOES, 6.

Bolt	Kelly	Montgomery
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg.

Majority for, 13.

Amendment agreed to, and words added.

Clause 116.—Bona fide transactions may be completed under certain restrictions.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND moved the following new proviso:—

"Provided that, in the case of any block in respect of which it has been ascertained and certified to by a Judge that not less than one-half of the shares have been lawfully acquired, or negotiations entered into in respect of a lease of any of the remaining shares, such transactions may be completed although such shares or interests may not have been under negotiation prior to the passing of this Act."

The Committee divided on the question "That the proviso be added to the clause."

AYES, 18.

Acland	Kelly	Richardson
Barnicoat	MacGregor	Swanson
Bonar	McLean	Taiaroa
Bowen	Oliver	Whitmore
Feldwick	Ormond	Whyte
Grace	Pharazyn	Williams.

NOES, 6.

Bolt	Jennings	Montgomery
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg.

Majority for, 12.

Proviso added.

Bill reported, and read the third time.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the Managers appointed by the Council for the Conference had met the Managers appointed by the other House to consider the amendments made by the Council in this Bill, but had been unable to arrive at any conclusion.

The Council adjourned at twenty minutes past five o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 17th October, 1894.

Second Reading—Third Reading—Divisions in Hansard—Mining Bill—Post and Telegraph Department Bill—Beet-root Sugar Bill—Coal Bonus Bill—Land and Income Assessment Bill—Post and Telegraph Department Bill—Sea-fisheries Bill—Land and Income Assessment Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READING.

Wilson Land Bill.

THIRD READING.

Wilson Land Bill.

DIVISIONS IN HANSARD.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Chairman of the Debates and Printing Committee, If means can be devised whereby accurate reports of divisions may in future appear in Hansard? He asked this question in consequence of having looked up the division in which he certainly voted on the Government Advances to Settlers Bill on the 25th September. The motion was to strike out £500,000 for the purpose of reducing the limit of borrowing to £1,000,000. He found he was not recorded as having voted on that occasion. He did vote in favour of the amendment. He believed this was not a solitary instance of mistakes occurring in divisions.

Major STEWARD said the difficulty did not arise with the reporters, but rather with the tellers of the House, who were sometimes very careless in marking the names of honourable members who had voted, their marks not always being opposite the names, but sometimes between two names. Therefore it became very difficult indeed to say which member had voted.

MINING BILL.

Mr. CADMAN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he proposed, after the second reading, to send it to the Goldfields Committee. The main feature of the Bill was to make more suitable regulations to control and safeguard the expenditure of money voted on the estimates under the head of "Development of Goldfields." Honourable members were aware that of late years the areas of the richest and most available portions of our gold-bearing districts had been considerably reduced. Our system of mining had been almost entirely revolutionised. We had yet, of course, much to learn in the way of dealing with our mining industry: at the same time, when we came to look back on the good work which had been done by our schools of mines, he thought honourable members would agree with him that the expenditure on those schools had been one of the best investments which the colony had ever made in respect to the mining industry. He was very glad to notice that the students from one of the leading schools—that at the Thames—were all able to obtain positions directly they left the school. To keep pace with science we should have to alter our system of working. In quartz-reefing districts different classes of machinery and processes were absolutely necessary, in accordance with the nature of the ore to be treated. Then there was a consensus of opinion that, on alluvial fields, we must go very largely into the question of hydraulic sluicing. On the northern goldfields of late years there had been a very strong cry in favour of deep-level mining; and a cry had come up from the South Island and the West Coast respecting the question of getting more water for sluicing purposes. Of course all this would cost money. After careful consideration the Government had decided to render assistance to this industry on these various lines. He might say that any help which was given to the industry would be in the way of pound for pound—that persons interested would have to provide one-half the money. Then, again, so far as geology went, the reports they had they found were all exceedingly favourable to explorations at greater depths. But it was utterly impossible for the Government to aid deep-sinking in a large way, and under the Bill it was proposed to give Government aid to one deep shaft in each portion of the goldfields of the colony—namely, one in Auckland, one on the West Coast, and one in Otago. Again, so far as hydraulic sluicing in the South Island was concerned, there was the question of the proclamation of the rivers and watercourses, which must necessarily follow; and, of course, with the increased volume of water to be used in the hydraulic sluicing, there no doubt would be injury done in the course of time to the low-lying lands. Provision was made under the Bill to meet that. He might say, further, that, although injury would arise in course of time, it would take a great many years before it would arrive at that stage when the expenditure need cease. Clause 2 provided for regulations regarding the matters he had explained. Under clauses 3 and 4—"Water-races"—there was simply an extension of the powers already given in the Mining Act to enable County Councils to deal with those people who were using the water. Section 5 made provision for dredging below low-water mark. Hitherto, on the sea-coast there was no power to give suitable authority to those who required dredging claims below low-water mark. The rest of the Bill dealt with other matters legislation on which was necessary for the North Island goldfields, and provided that managers must hold certificates where the cyanide process was being used. Under the present law the mine-manager was responsible where this cyanide process was used, but it was absolutely necessary that the battery superintendent should be in charge of the plant, and the mine-manager could not be held responsible. The Bill was intended to meet cases of that kind.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Sir R. STOUT did not object to the various clauses of the Bill except in regard to clause 2, which seemed to him to conflict with itself. That clause said that the aid to be given for deep-sinking was to be apportioned and applied as the Minister might approve; and then it went on to say, "For the purposes of such assistance as aforesaid the Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing," et cetera. He thought the whole thing should have been simply in the terms of the regulation. There was also a clause that required amending which he had mentioned to the honourable member, but he should refer to that in Committee, as he did not wish now to take up the time of the House.

Bill read a second time.

POST AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT BILL.

Mr. WARD said this Bill contained amendments in the Post and Telegraph Department in several important matters. In the first instance, it proposed to legally amalgamate the two departments. They had been amalgamated, he might say, so far as the working of the departments was concerned, for some time, and it was now necessary, in order to properly conduct the administration, to have them connected by statute. In the proposal they would see that the Secretary of the department took the position formerly occupied by the Superintendent, and exercised control over both departments. He would direct the attention of the House to the fact that instead of two officers being in the First Division there were now three. This had been rendered necessary because the departments had grown to an enormous extent during late years, and in consequence of the retirement of Dr. Lemon an opportunity was taken of strengthening the executive staff so as to overtake the increasing work of the department. He might say that although there were three officers in the first division, as indicated in the Bill, the changes made had resulted in a saving to the colony of £275 a year. Honourable members would also notice that section 5 set up a Court of Appeal in connection with the classification of the service. This was necessary, in his opinion, as the officers in the service, if they felt they had a grievance, might submit it to a Court of Appeal and have it properly investigated. Here the right was given to officers to elect one of their number to the Board of Appeal; and it was further provided that the head of the departments—the Secretary of the Post and Telegraph Department—should be one member of the Board, and the Superintendent of Electric Lines the other. Another important alteration in the Bill was in regard to officers in the Sixth Class who had now the £180—the maximum. To some extent a block took place in this class, and it appeared to him the best way of meeting that difficulty would be by giving two additions of £10 to officers who had been over twenty years in the service. This would enable a number of deserving officers to get an increase after twenty years, and, when promoted, to start in the Fifth Class at £200 instead of £190. These were the principal alterations in the Bill, and he hoped they would commend themselves to the House: they were proposed with the view of making the service more workable than it was.

Mr. DUTHIE said that, having brought the grievance of the telegraph operators under the notice of the Minister, he was glad to find him making some provision for it. The point, however, to which he wished to draw attention was this: The amount proposed for cadets was too high, and, consequently, the service was besieged. Every one wanted to get cadets into the service. There was not sufficient difference between the cadets' last year of service and the officers' service. He thought it was the high scale of the cadet service which made the cost of the service so great. The payments ran up to £100 per annum for cadets, which was out of proportion to the salaries of officers in the service, and exceeded the remuneration paid in commercial or in banking offices.

Dr. NEWMAN only wanted to say a word or two on this Bill, which he was supporting. The honourable gentleman said that a block took place in the Sixth Class, but he thought the block was a little lower down. He had had several appeals from members of the Post and Telegraph service, and from what he had heard they were rather apt to stick in the higher ranges of the cadets, and before they were transferred to the higher class. He thought the Minister was aware there was a block in that respect. He might say, with reference to the Board of Appeal, he thought it was a very good thing; but, as they were having Boards of Appeal now all over the place, in every department of the State, probably it would be better to have one Board of Appeal instead of dividing it up in this way. And he would point out that a Board of Appeal which consisted of two of the highest officers—who would probably dismiss a man—and one outsider was not much of a Board of Appeal.

Mr. WARD.—He can appeal to the Minister.

Dr. NEWMAN said that might be so; but it appeared to him that the Board as proposed to be constituted was an exceedingly weak one. A person who was dismissed would have to appeal to the persons who had dismissed him and to one other person; but the two would have absolute control, and therefore, unless the Board was altered a good deal, it would be almost a sham. The Railway Board of Appeal, which the honourable gentleman brought before the House some time ago, was, in his (Dr. Newman's) opinion, much preferable to this one, which, he thought, should be altered.

Mr. PIRANI trusted that this Bill would not be allowed to go through in its present form. It seemed to him that the higher officers of the Post and Telegraph Department were taking advantage of the fact that there was a legitimate grievance in that department in reference to the Sixth Class so as to get promotion for one of themselves. If honourable members would look carefully at the Bill they would see that there was one officer, who held the post of Inspector of Post-offices, who had only been twenty years in the service, and he was jumped over the heads of officers who had been twenty-nine and thirty years in the service in the First Class; with the result that if there was a vacancy in the Secretaryship—of course, that was not likely; it was not an immediate contingency, but it might be a remote one—if there was a vacancy in the Secretaryship that officer, who had been only twenty years in the service, could be jumped over the head of the present excellent Superintendent of the Telegraph Department, and over the heads of many officers who had more claim than himself to the position, owing to their length of service. Then, the present Inspector, who was to be jumped, in that way, had been imported from Home because he had special knowledge with reference to postal business, and were he removed from that position in which his special knowledge was available, and put into another position, the reason for his appointment would vanish altogether. That, he thought, would be a calamity, and it would be doing a very unfair thing to other officers in the service who were more entitled to promotion to higher grades from length of service and, he might say, from ability to serve the colony. The Colonial Treasurer, in introducing the Bill, had told them that the rearrangement consequent upon the retirement of Dr. Lemon saved the colony £275 a year, but forgot to tell the House that Dr. Lemon's pension was not reckoned in that rearrangement at all. If they reckoned in that pension they would find that there was a very large loss to the colony by the rearrangement of the service, instead of the saving mentioned. He also thought that the Court of Appeal as constituted was hardly a fair one. If there was any necessity for a Court of Appeal at all,—and the Postmaster-General said there was,—then that Court of Appeal must be impartial. If they took, for instance, the Railway Court of Appeal, they would perceive that it was constituted very differently from the Court of Appeal constituted under this Act, and it was very much fairer. He thought that the Postmaster-General ought to reconsider having what was practically a nominated Court of Appeal, and allow the officers to elect those who they thought would best serve them on a Court of Appeal. That was allowed to be the rule in connection with the Railway Department, and he did not see that there was any special reason in connection with the Post and Telegraph service why the same provision should not be allowed. If it were left to the officers at the head of the service it was only natural to suppose they would uphold their own decisions, and would uphold the officers who were associated with them in work, and therefore it would not be anything like the impartial tribunal they had in connection with the railway system. He trusted the Postmaster-General would think the matter over and see that it was advisable, if they were going to have a Court of Appeal at all in connection with this branch of the service, that it should be a Court of Appeal more than in name.

Mr. GUINNESS agreed with the measure in setting up a Court of Appeal, provided the Court was one that persons wishing to appeal could appeal to with confidence. He thought the constitution of the Court should be considerably altered, and, as he would not have the opportunity when the Bill was in Committee to move in that direction, he would suggest for the consideration of the Postmaster-General that the Court should be constituted in this way: The Stipendiary Magistrate for the City of Wellington, an officer elected by the postal branch, and an officer elected by the telegraph branch. That was the Court he would suggest. There was an objection to having a general election from amongst all the officers of the service, because they would include all in the telegraph branch and all in the post-office branch. As the telegraph branch was much larger than the postal branch, it would be unfair to leave the whole of the power with the telegraph branch to elect a person to sit on the Court. He thought there should be, so to speak, two electoral colleges, the telegraph and postal branches each electing one man. If the Minister in charge thought that any of the head officers should be called upon to sit on the Court, he thought that, in the case of appeals in the postal branch, the Secretary should be the Chairman of the Board; and, in the case of appeals by members of the telegraph branch, then the Superintendent of Telegraphs should be the Chairman of the Board. That would, he thought, be a much fairer and better Court of Appeal than the one attempted to be set up by the Bill. With regard to the question of classification, a great deal might be said. It seemed that some officers in the department appeared to be able, although they had only served for a few years, to jump into salaries in excess of the salaries received by those who had served for eighteen or twenty years. How it was done the Postmaster-General ought to know. Whether he took sufficient cognisance of the working of the department to be able to tell them he (Mr. Guinness) could not say; but if members looked at the list they would see numerous instances of officials who had been appointed for a few years, but who yet held positions far superior to, and who were getting larger salaries than, officers who had been in the service for eighteen or twenty years. That was a matter which should be reviewed, and that sort of thing should not be allowed. He cordially supported the Bill, with the amendment he had suggested in reference to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Pirani

Mr. J. W. KELLY was pleased to hear the honourable gentleman speak as he had with regard to the Court of Appeal. Such a Court was very much required in all the departments, and he thought the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman was a very fair one. There was another matter—with reference to the Assistant-Inspectorship. He really thought that the proposal, if carried out, would be unfair to the present Superintendent, seeking as it did to put Mr. Rose, who was many years junior to Mr. Logan, on an equal footing with the Superintendent—for what reason, of course, no one could understand, but there was evidently more than what appeared on the face of the Bill; and he hoped that when in Committee some steps would be taken to see that justice was done to Mr. Logan, and that if Mr. Rose was raised, as it was proposed to raise him by the Bill, some substantial justice would be done to Mr. Logan. He appealed to honourable gentlemen to stand by Mr. Logan when the Bill was in Committee and see that justice was meted out to him. It was proposed to add something like £100 a year to Mr. Rose's salary, and put him on an equal footing with Mr. Logan, who was many years his senior in office.

Mr. BUDDO had no objection to the Minister in charge of the department making any fresh departure he might think for the benefit of the working of this portion of the Civil Service, but he strongly objected to any further increase in the salaries of the officials. No doubt there might be a necessity for the clause which affected the appointment of special officers in the department, and no doubt the Board of Appeal might be very necessary for a judicial manner of dealing with questions that might come forward when there was any friction between the employés and heads of departments. In clause 6, however, there was a schedule which practically raised the salaries of officials who, he considered, were at the present time very much overpaid. If any small advance was to be given to those in the lower grades of the service, he would make no objection. He considered the State should not only be a model employer, but should also pay standard wages—if anything, a little in advance; but he considered it the duty of the House, and particularly of the democratic element in it, to see that nothing was done at the expense of the many for the express benefit of the few who were benefited by the Bill. He would point out that there was no special rise in the wage of the average artisan or clerk in commercial houses, or, at any rate, very little. They obtained a position in their service which entitled them to a certain wage, and they received that wage, and it was only in very exceptional cases where a large rise was given, where especial ability was wanted for a special post. Artisans were in the same position: they attained a certain position, where they got a standard wage. But here there seemed to be a special Conservative element, and they were to bolster up this service—and he specially mentioned this part of the Service, as it was well known that those in the railway service complained bitterly that they were not put in an equal position with those dealt with in this Bill. He did say that they were making this special branch of the Service specially attractive, and the attractiveness of the Civil Service was drawing people from employment in the country districts. He knew for a fact of one young man in this city, who had been four months in the town, who came from the country with £40 or £50 to wait for a position in the Civil Service, and he was now penniless; and he (Mr. Buddo) supposed he would have to go back to the country and earn some more money. And so the thing went on. They had to see that the good of the country generally, and of the working-classes, was not thrown away for the purpose of bolstering up one special department in the Civil Service. There were many reasons why they should try to adjust these things; and one, in particular, was the appreciation of gold. It was a well-known fact that 7s. a day would now purchase as much as 10s. would, say, eight years ago; and yet what did they find? This schedule was being constantly altered, and they were raising the rates of wages paid to employés in this department. This was wrong; and so long as they went on tinkering and patching up one special branch of the Civil Service so long would there be friction between them and the artisan and commercial classes throughout the colony. He trusted that when the Bill was in Committee the House would see that the matter was adjusted, so as to make the annual rises consistent with the salaries of the rest of the Service.

Mr. PINKERTON was somewhat surprised to hear that a certain individual was put over the heads of certain others, and put alongside of the Superintendent. He saw that in the First Class there was an Assistant Secretary and Inspector with the same rate of pay as the Superintendent. Some time ago he took occasion to mention in the House that there had been various rumours that classification was not properly attended to. Now, of the person mentioned by several speakers as being the Assistant Secretary, he thought it was only fair that the House should know what his former position had been. It had been said that they should get an answer from the Postmaster-General in Committee; but he thought they were entitled to it before that, and they were entitled to a full explanation of the position of the three officers in the First Class. He intended to vote for the Bill, but would like to see it amended in Committee; and they should certainly have the fullest possible explanation in regard to the classification.

Mr. HALL-JONES did not mean to say anything about the increase in the salary of the Assistant Secretary and Inspector; he looked upon the Post Office as one of the best-conducted departments in the Civil Service, and he believed Mr. Rose to be a very good officer, entitled to some increase. He wished to draw the special attention of what was sometimes called "the labour party" to the fact that the Second Schedule of the Act of 1891 was repealed. Under that schedule distributors came under the classification, and their salaries were fixed in the Act; and those of night-watchmen were also fixed—the distributors from £50 to £80 a year, the night-watchmen 8s. a day, and telegraph messengers £26 to £36 a year. Had honourable members seen the effect of the Third Schedule of this Bill? The salaries were to be fixed by regulation made by the Governor in Council: that was very unfair. The classification, which fixed the salaries, and the annual increase of salaries, should apply to every employé in the department. There could be no good reason why the salaries of the higher-paid officers should be fixed by the Act, while the salaries of those who received the lowest rate of pay were left to be fixed by Order in Council. If provision were not made in Committee for all employés to be brought under the one classification, he would vote against the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL thought it was improper that the Board of Appeal to be set up should consist of two head officials of the department and only one outsider. He did not agree with the suggestion made by the honourable member for the Grey, that the Stipendiary Magistrate should be brought into the matter. There should be a head of one of the other departments, who could act as umpire with the Superintendent, and one person elected by the officers. If something of that kind were accepted, they would have a far better Board than the one proposed. As it was, of course the heads of the department worked together, and they would hardly be likely to alter any decision they had previously arrived at. He would like to call attention to the fact that the Bill did not contemplate the Board reviewing dismissals.

Mr. WARD.—No.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL said this Bill did not contemplate anything of the kind. The Board would deal only with classification, status, or salaries; therefore there was no appeal on the part of officers who might have been unjustly dismissed. He suggested that might be included. Regarding the status of the officers, it appeared to him that the Bill before the House was intended to definitely fix the Secretary of the Postal Department as the superior officer of the department, and that should not be the case. That had not been the case in Dr. Lemon's day, and the Superintendent of the Telegraph Department should, at any rate, stand on equal terms with the Secretary of the Post Office. He would therefore be glad to assist any honourable member, when the Bill was in Committee, or the Government, in placing the Superintendent of the Telegraph Department on an equality with the Secretary to the Post Office.

Sir R. STOUT thought there was some misapprehension as to the change made in the First Division of the schedule. The salaries fixed in that schedule contained a minimum and maximum, but still the vote had to come before the House. The salary of the Assistant Inspector this year was only £525; and, in respect to increment, he could get none unless it was voted by the House, and at present he received £100 less than the Superintendent of Electric Lines. He disagreed with the honourable member for Riccarton as to the Secretary not being the head of the department. That officer should be the head of the department, as they must have one head to communicate with Ministers, and if they had two heads it would cause a great increase in the clerical work of the office, and they could carry on the work cheaper by having one definite head. He would also like to say that the salaries in the schedules were quite different from those appearing under the Act of 1891, and he regretted exceedingly that some increases were not given to the Judicial Department. Considering the important work the officers of that department had to do, in deciding between people, and between the Government and the people, they ought to be placed in a far more independent position. The Judicial Department was the worst-paid department in the Service, and not only the worst paid, but it had the least security of office of any department of the State; whereas it ought to be the best paid, and it ought to have greater security. He hoped that before long the whole of the Civil Service would be placed under another Bill, as this was only a measure to slightly increase the salaries of one particular department. Regarding the question of the Board of Appeal, in his opinion it would be a mistake to constitute a separate Board of Appeal. There should be one Board for the whole of the Civil Service, and not one for each portion of the Service. The Board under the Industrial Conciliation Act should do the whole of this work for the State. That was the plan applied in the State of Massachusetts—namely, one Board to settle industrial disputes. He had made the suggestion to the Minister of Labour, but he did not see his way to accept it. He thought there should be a judicial Board to deal with all disputes in the Civil Service, and they would have a far better Board than to have this movable Board, or each department having its separate tribunal. In reference to this Court of Appeal, which had only to deal with questions of classification, status, and salary, he apprehended that the officers' salaries were subject to the review of the House, and the Board of Appeal could decide whether a higher salary should be paid to an officer than was appropriated by Parliament. He did not intend to oppose the Bill, but merely wished to say that, if it should ever come about that a reduction had to be made in the salaries in the Service, it would be unfair to say the salaries in the Post and Telegraph Department should not be reduced as well as those in other departments. That, however, could be met by amending the Act.

Mr. G. W. Russell

Mr. JOYCE would not have risen had it not been for the remarks of the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Pinkerton) and the honourable member for Invercargill, who cast some reflection upon Mr. Rose.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—No, I did not.

Mr. JOYCE said, at any rate those honourable gentlemen spoke in such a way as to indicate that Mr. Rose should not receive the same salary as the Superintendent of Electric Lines, and he thought that if honourable members reflected for a moment, or waited for the Minister to reply,—who, he trusted, would put the matter very clearly before the House—they would find that Mr. Rose had something to show why he should be in the position of second and not third in the First Division. Mr. Logan had only recently been appointed to the position of Superintendent, and his salary had been raised. Mr. Rose had quite as important duties to discharge as had Mr. Logan.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. JOYCE said honourable members might laugh, but, notwithstanding, they would hear what the Minister had to say. He thought Mr. Rose should be in the second position and not in the third, and he trusted the Minister would make the matter clear when he replied.

Mr. PINKERTON desired to make a personal explanation. The honourable member for Lyttelton had stated that he (Mr. Pinkerton) had made a personal reflection on Mr. Rose. He wished to say that he did not know anything about that gentleman. What he stated was that several members had referred to the fact that he had been put over the head of another officer, and he thought it was right that they should have some expression of opinion from the Postmaster-General as to whether that was the case or not. He had not cast any reflection whatever on Mr. Rose.

Mr. J. W. KELLY said the honourable member for Lyttelton had also done him an injustice. He did not know Mr. Rose, and had never seen him, and he could not say anything against him. He simply wished to point out to honourable members the position of the matter, in Mr. Rose being placed over the head of the Superintendent of Telegraphs, which, in his opinion, was utterly unfair.

Major STEWARD said he had not been aware that this Bill was coming on, or else he would have had with him the file of papers which showed the position as between the officers of the Post and Telegraph Departments and the officers of the railway service. His remarks were based on what had been stated by the honourable member for Kaiapoi when he pointed out that it was very desirable that a system should be brought into force in regard to the railway service such as prevailed in the Post and Telegraph Department. There was no doubt whatever that the latter department was largely advantaged by the fact that the honourable gentleman at the head of it had had practical experience in that department, and if the positions of the officers of the two departments were compared it would be found that the Postal Department officers had a very great advantage as against the railway officers. He would very much like to see a similar system to that in force in the Post and Telegraph Department introduced in regard to the railway service. He had not the papers with him, otherwise he would have been able to show the number of officers and their rates of salary in each department. It was perfectly clear, however, from the evidence shown to him, that the officers in the Post and Telegraph Department had a large advantage over the officers of the railway service, and he hoped the Ministry would not end their good work in regard to the classification of the service at the Postal Department, but bring in a Bill to enact a similar system in regard to the railway service. Now the railways were back in the hands of the Government it would be possible to bring in a fair system of annual increment in the salaries of the officers of the railway service, similar to that proposed in this Bill in respect of another department.

Mr. EARNSHAW said that at one time when any movement was taking place for increasing the salaries of the upper circles in the Civil Service the Liberal party had been very great on amalgamation and reduction, but now it seemed that the Government was bent on increasing the salaries. He certainly objected to the increase proposed in the Bill for the Assistant Secretary, as it was a most improper one, and in Committee he would move to strike out the maximum. He thought the £525 the officer was now receiving was quite sufficient for the office: and he would like to point out that in the labour world wages were steadily going down. There was no doubt about that, and to-day the rate of payment for labour in New Zealand was at least 15 per cent. less than it was eight years ago. He also thought the same decrease had taken place with regard to the employment of labour in the public service, in the Railway Department and in other services. That being the case, while he had always held that the Civil Service should be well paid, and a fair margin given above the rate of pay ruling outside, still he did not think that the time was opportune for the Government to make such an increase as was proposed to the Assistant-Secretary. The House knew that in New Zealand we were having and were still going to have bad times, and he hoped it would see fit to strike out the increase. He wished to say one word with regard to the Board of Appeal. He altogether differed from the honourable member for Riccarton in this matter. The House had now passed an Arbitration Act, and it was not wise that there should be any public servants on any Board of the kind, except a Stipendiary Magistrate or a Judge of the Supreme Court. There should be a permanent Board entirely outside the Service. He did not object to one of the officers going on the Board, but it would be unjust, as there was a possibility of the Board agreeing to the suggestions of the head of the department. He held that the time had come when they should have one Board alone to deal with the whole of the disputes which arose in the public service. The Civil Service was, of course, going to increase year by year, as every successive Parliament would take upon itself more functions regarding the State. The time had now come when it was opportune that they should have one Board that would be continually moving through New Zealand to finally adjudicate on all grievances as they arose.

12.30. He trusted that the Minister would see fit to alter this Board, because many cases would arise and come before this Board of Appeal in which he did not think it would be at all fair to have these officers on the Board to judge the cases. He strongly objected to the Government, as they had done in many cases, proposing an increase in the salaries. This was not a year in which they should make increases in salaries. They had taken good care not to increase the wages of the working-men who were working for them, and he did not think they should begin to increase the salaries of the heads of staffs. Those who were in the Service were better paid than the people in outside services, and it was not at all carrying out the spirit of the policy upon which this Government had been mainly returned in 1891. That was on a question of retrenchment, and on very many occasions since then they had departed from what they had been returned to do.

Mr. DUNCAN would like, when the Minister in charge of the Bill replied, that he would explain the matter with regard to this reversing of the position of the Superintendent and the Secretary. Were there two staffs, as it were, one for the Telegraph Department and one for the Post Office, so that alternately the head of one came to the top, and then the head of the other? Why were the two combined in one Bill, instead of being as they were formerly? It required explanation, because they found that in the last Bill, of 1890, the Superintendent was put at the top with a salary of £700, and the Secretary came next with a salary of £650. In this Bill the position was just reversed, for they found the Secretary was put at the top with a salary of £700, and the Superintendent, with a salary of £650, was put under him. It seemed to him that that wanted some explanation, because an outsider could scarcely know how it worked at all. Was this principle carried as a rule right through the service—that telegraphists only were moved up to the position of head of their department, or were they transferred from one department to another—from the postal to the telegraph, or vice versa? He thought there should be some rule laid down as to which one of these officials should be at the head of the department. Unless there was some powerful reason for altering it, he thought it was very unfair that the officials of either department should have to depend upon a Bill being brought in to have things of this sort done when a change had to be made, and in order to allow of promotion taking place. There should be some settled rule to meet the case. It did not appear to him that they could work the thing at all well without something of that kind.

Mr. WARD said that, in reply to the point raised by the honourable gentleman who had just spoken,—which, perhaps, it would be better to clear away first,—he would like to point out what was the position. If the honourable gentleman would look up the Post Office Act and the Electric Lines Act he would see that these were the two Acts under which the departments were administered, and that, practically, there were two Ministers in one, if he might be allowed to say so. The office of Postmaster-General was created in the Post Office Act, and there was a Commissioner of Telegraphs created under "The Electric Lines Act, 1884," who had the administration of the Telegraph Department, and in the administration of both departments these two offices were kept perfectly distinct. The Superintendent exercised his functions so far as the technical administration of his branch was concerned. The Postmaster-General exercised Ministerial control over both departments in every matter; and the Secretary also exercised administrative control where his doing so did not conflict with "The Electric Lines Act, 1884." Now, that necessarily demanded that there should be at the head of the technical branch of the Telegraph Department an officer who had technical knowledge. No one without technical knowledge could be placed at the head of that service, and the reason for that was obvious. There must be a man in charge who understood everything about electricity, and consequently no one but an electrical expert could be placed in that position. The remarks of the honourable member for Oamaru showed that he entertained the idea that something was done in the nature of a transference from one department to the other which was unnecessary; but it was not so. The original Superintendent of the two departments was a telegraph expert. He was one with expert knowledge, and he held the superior position—that of head of the postal and telegraph services. Nominally, he was over the head of the officer in charge of the Postal Department; but the actual officer at the head of the Postal Department was the Secretary of the Post Office, and he it was who administered the whole of that department. The Superintendent, in exercising control over the whole of the Telegraph Department, was the technical officer in charge of the telegraph branch. When the retirement of Dr. Lemon took place, and it became necessary to fill up the position, it was felt that, in justice, it should be conferred upon the chief controlling officer of the Postal Department, who before Dr. Lemon's retirement was second on the list. As a matter of fairness and justice it was right that when a change took place he should be advanced to this position. He had been in the service from boyhood, and, he (Mr. Ward) thought, fulfilled his duties very ably, and, in his opinion, deserved all he had got so far as position was concerned.

Mr. Duncan

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is he?

Mr. WARD.—Mr. Gray. He was trying to explain to honourable members how the change took place. As he had said, when it became necessary to make a transference this officer passed to the first position. He had pointed out to the honourable member that under the Electric Lines Act no one but an officer possessing technical knowledge could be placed in charge of the telegraph service. That Act provided that his position should be that of Superintendent of Electric Telegraph Lines; consequently, as the officer at the head of the service, he could not be put in charge of the electric telegraph lines unless he had expert knowledge. Therefore it became necessary to transpose the office of Superintendent, which Dr. Lemon had filled; and, as a result, the officer who formerly was Secretary of the Post Office, while still carrying on the ordinary duties of that position, was passed on to be head of the two services. As a matter of fact, if the Electric Lines Act did not provide that the office of Superintendent must be held by an officer possessing technical knowledge there would be no reason whatever for the proposed transposition of the designation of Superintendent at all. It would remain for both services, and Mr. Gray would be entitled to hold it. He would have been Superintendent, as the next officer on the list. He (Mr. Ward) might be told that the Act provided that that title should be conferred on the officer who was in charge of the telegraph branch: that was so, and consequently the transference of the title was unavoidable, and it was done so as to comply with the Act. He hoped he had made that point clear.

Mr. DUNCAN said that one point which he wished the Minister to make clear was this: Supposing that the necessity should arise for another change, and that a new Superintendent was to be put at the head of the department, would it necessitate another Bill to accomplish the purpose?

Mr. WARD said if what the honourable member wanted to know had reference to the supposition that the present Superintendent might be entitled to be placed at the head of the service, there would be nothing whatever to prevent that from being done; but, in the ordinary course of things, the title would require again to be changed, as it was under this Bill. That would be so unless they repealed "The Electric Lines Act, 1884," altogether, or amended it. It would be necessary to again change the title. That was the position. The department was being administered under two heads, and, having to conform to the provisions of the law in both cases, no alteration against the law could take place, so far as the title was concerned, without parliamentary assent.

Mr. DUNCAN said that seemed to him to be where the difficulty lay.

Mr. WARD said this was owing to the combination of the departments he had referred to, so as to enable the officer at the head to have the same control as the former Superintendent had. And it was unavoidable unless they did something unjust. The only way was by saying that the present Superintendent should be placed at the head of both services. That would not be fair or right, because he was not entitled to it. Whenever the necessity arose Ministers had to consider the service as a whole, as they did now. He passed from that to the case of the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Rose, whose salary, as honourable members must admit, was properly proposed to be raised. When Dr. Lemon retired from the position of Superintendent the officer who was next to the Secretary of the Post Office in administering the Post and Telegraph Department was the Inspector of Post Offices (Mr. Rose), and he was in receipt of a salary of £550 a year at that time. When Mr. Logan, who was Inspector of Telegraph Lines, was selected to fill the position of Superintendent, which post he was entitled to have, from his expert knowledge, he was in receipt of £50 a year less than Mr. Rose—namely, £500 a year. Now, as a matter of fact, the Government, while recognising that Mr. Logan was entitled to the position of Superintendent of Electric Lines under the Act of 1884, and therefore to be second in position on the classification list, saw that an injustice would be done to the other officer, who had been next in order to Mr. Gray, who had held a position for ten years in the Imperial Post Office, and who was in receipt of a salary of £550. In accordance with the spirit of the classification, had he been possessed of technical knowledge he was entitled to pass to the next position. But he had not the technical knowledge required for the position of Superintendent of Electric Lines. As Postmaster-General, he (Mr. Ward) could not but recognise that Mr. Rose had a right to some recognition. Whoever was responsible for the position given to Mr. Rose twenty years ago, it had resulted in his being placed third on the list.

Mr. PIRANI said it was a very wrong thing.

Mr. WARD was not saying anything about that. He was dealing with the service as it now was. But, in consequence of the retirement of Dr. Lemon, when it became necessary to appoint a technical officer, when Mr. Logan was to take charge of the telegraph branch, that gentleman was accordingly passed to the second position; but if the Inspector of Post-offices had had this technical knowledge he would have been fairly entitled to be passed on. This was in accordance with the classification list; but, as he said, the Government had selected Mr. Logan to have charge of the telegraph branch as being the officer who was entitled to the position from his technical knowledge and long years of service. Therefore, in view of these circumstances, and having regard to the fact that he was an able officer, they had appointed him to the position indicated, at a salary of £650, and that was the minimum salary at the time. The Government felt that, under the peculiar circumstances, as there was another officer who had been long in the service, and whose duties required him to be continually moving about the colony, it would be an injustice to leave him in the First Class of the Clerical Division, and they accordingly promoted him to the First Division. He was not going to make eulogistic remarks about any officer in the service, and he wished merely to say that this officer, to the raising of whose salary exception was taken, was now debarred from receiving some of the increments of salary to which he was formerly entitled. It was only fair that the increments which he received formerly when continually moving about should now be made good when, by the change that had taken place, these increments were curtailed. Although he had been promoted, the increase of salary which had been given him made very little difference in his ordinary receipts.

Mr. PIRANI.—Does he profit by the travelling-allowance?

Mr. WARD said that if the honourable member looked at the service generally in the colony he would see that the object in the past had been, in making these allowances, to enable their officers to move about without having to do what he might term mean things. And he might say, further, that in the allowances made to these officers for this purpose there was a margin left if a man liked to be careful, and every one would admit that it was a good thing to be careful. No fault could be found with a man in reference to that. In his position now this officer would not receive much more than he received before, and it was the fact that he had been at the top of the First Class, and was in receipt of £50 a year more than was formerly received by the present Superintendent of Electric Lines, which had induced the Government to place him in the First Division, and in doing that they were only performing an act of justice. As to Mr. Rose occupying the second position, he might say that Mr. Rose himself was very strongly of opinion that he ought to have had that position, and he put it on record that he believed an injustice was done to him by his not being put there. The Government believed, however, that the Superintendent should occupy the position he did, and that he had been put there rightly.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why did you not do it at once?

Mr. WARD thought it would have been most unfair and unjust to an officer who had been practically the head of the service for twenty odd years if he had been overlooked when a vacancy took place. It would have been most unjust, and demoralising to the whole service. He thought they had to deal with these affairs in a just manner, and that was exactly what the Government had done in this matter. In connection with the Board of Appeal, he admitted that there was a great deal in the arguments which had been used on this point, to the effect that persons outside the service should be on the Board of Appeal; but there was a difficulty in the way. The difficulty was to arrive at something workable and which would be advantageous to the colony and would not entail additional expense. The Secretary of the Department was the officer who was responsible for the settlement of any question which might arise; he was the officer to whom a subordinate would appeal if he had a grievance. He (Mr. Ward) was himself prepared to say this: that he believed, as the Secretary's decisions would be the principal matters for appeal, and, where questions closely concerning him were to be dealt with, it would be better he should not be on the Board of Appeal. The Secretary himself entertained this opinion strongly, and he (Mr. Ward) now thought he was right.

Mr. PIRANI.—That he should not be his own judge.

Mr. WARD said Yes, he was prepared to have a change made in that respect. He wished to point out that the whole service was a large and growing one; it was a most responsible one; and, in addition to that, it was only right that what was fair and just should be done as between the various officers. In Committee he would be prepared to substitute another officer in the department in lieu of the Secretary of Posts and Telegraphs, to be placed on the Board of Appeal. He thought it would be a mistake to select an officer for each branch, because it was an amalgamated department, and he did not think any line of demarcation should be drawn between the officers, because every position should be open to all—to the telegraph operator as well as to others. If they were to have two officers for the two departments they would draw a line of demarcation between the Postal and Telegraph Departments on the Board of Appeal. The Secretary of Posts and Telegraphs represented the telegraph service in all matters of administration, and if they combined the departments they would get a very fair Board of Appeal. After all, when this Board of Appeal had been in operation for a year or two, if it did not work well it was quite within the power of the House to alter it. An honourable gentleman had said that they should have one Board of Appeal for the whole colony; but the difficulties in connection with that were very great. Here was one; if an officer was going to appeal, say, in Dunedin, the head of the department would have to go to Dunedin in order to hear the evidence. Instead of that, it was proposed that the Board of Appeal should be where the heads of the departments were. If they could get an absolutely independent Board of Appeal outside the service it would, no doubt, be better, but he said again that gentlemen who were in the position of a Board of Appeal would require to have some knowledge of what was going on in the various departments. He would just like to say, in answer to the honourable member for the Grey, in reference to the question he raised about the 3rd Grade in one of the classes, that that was not necessary to be provided for in the Bill. Everything which he had suggested in the matter which could be done had been done. With regard to what the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) had said in making his strictures about the large salaries which he said the Government paid, and his statement that it had passed over the workers, he seemed to have entirely overlooked the fact that it was proposed to give an increase to the workers in one class alone. In the Sixth Class an increase of £20 in two years was provided for, and that meant an expenditure of about £1,000. He (Mr. Ward) said it was deserved, in his opinion, as the officers in that class ought to be paid up to £200 a year, and the honourable member, in raising his objection, should have remembered that. The honourable member for Timaru raised a point in reference to the repeal by clause 6 of this Bill. The enactment repealed prevented legitimate increases, and the officers were consequently blocked; and the object of putting the clause in was to enable those men in the lower grades who were blocked year after year to get increments of salary where they were deserved.

Mr. GUINNESS asked, Why not put it in the schedule?

Mr. WARD said it could not conveniently be put in the schedule. There were quite a number of those men—counter-clerks, despatch-clerks, and others—who would require to come in. The regulations should provide that those men should have some hope of promotion, and the Bill was quite in the opposite direction to that which the honourable gentleman thought. He (Mr. Ward) thought he had met the whole of the points which had been raised by honourable members, and he would now move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

BEET-ROOT SUGAR BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The Committee divided on the question, "That leave be given to introduce this Bill."

AYES, 40.

Buddo	Graham	Mackintosh
Cadman	Harris	Maslin
Carnocross	Hogg	Massey
Carroll	Houston	McKenzie, J.
Collins	Joyce	McKenzie, R.
Crowther	Lang	McLachlan
Duncan	Larnach	McNab
Flatman	Lawry	Meredith

Miller	Pirani	Ward
Montgomery	Seddon	Willis.
O'Rorke	Smith, G. J.
Parata	Stevens	Tellers.
Pere	Steward	Mills
Pinkerton	Tanner	Smith, E. M.

NOES, 15.

Buchanan	Hutchison, W.	Saunders
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Stout.
Button	Kelly, W.	Tellers.
Fraser	McGowan	Allen
Green	Russell, W. R.	Earnshaw.
Hutchison, G.

Majority for, 25.

Bill introduced, and read a first time.

COAL BONUS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The Committee divided on the question,
"That leave be given to introduce this Bill."

AYES, 20.

Cadman	Mackintosh	Pirani
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Reeves
Duncan	Millar	Seddon
Harris	Montgomery	Ward.
Houston	Morrison	Tellers.
Larnach	O'Regan	McKenzie, R.
Lawry	Pinkerton	Mills.

NOES, 31.

Buchanan	Kelly, J. W.	Newman
Buddo	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	Maslin	Steward
Duthie	Massey	Tanner
Flatman	McGowan	Te Ao
Fraser	McGuire	Thompson.
Green	McLachlan
Hall-Jones	McNab	Tellers.
Heke	Meredith	Allen
Joyce	Mitchelson	Earnshaw.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Buick	Russell, W. R.
Carroll	Bell
Graham	Wilson
Hall	Mackenzie, T.
Hogg	Button
Pere.	Carnecross.

Majority against, 11.

Motion negatived.

LAND AND INCOME ASSESSMENT BILL.

Mr. WARD wished to state to the House the alterations proposed by this Bill, and would explain its various clauses. Clause 3 was to remedy a technical defect in the definition of the word "assessment." It was proposed to add the words "or of any mortgage," in order to extend the meaning of the term. Clause 4 was to provide for the case of two Tax Acts being passed in one year. As it read in the original Act, the clause referred to the singular, whereas it should be plural. Clause 5 dealt with returns of land mortgages and income. The clause proposed to require owners to send in returns of land and mortgages annually, instead of triennially. Clause 6 fixed the 31st day of March as the day on which returns were to be made. Subsection (2) of the same clause provided that returns of income were to be based on the previous year's income, but the Commissioners might accept returns to the date of the nearest balance-sheet if more convenient. That, he thought, was a condition that would commend itself to members. Subsection (3) of the same clause dealt with returns already sent in, which might be revised in accordance with the provisions of this Bill. Subsection (4) provided for the date of sending in returns being advertised. Subsection (5) repealed certain provisions in previous Acts for making returns and assessments of land and mortgage and income. Subsection (6) had reference to the word "triennial" being no longer necessary, this alteration being in consequence of the provision in clause 5 for making annual returns. Clause 7 provided that existing assessments should remain in force until new ones were made, subject to objection and review in the manner to be notified. Clause 8 gave the Commissioner power to have assessments of particular districts or particular lands or mortgages made, as might be required. Clause 9 gave power to the Commissioner to make valuations for assessment purposes. Clause 10 provided for giving notice of new assessments. Subsection (1) of clause 11 provided that the Stipendiary Magistrates should hear appeals instead of the Boards of Review. Boards of Review had not been satisfactory, and it was hoped this change would make the working of the department very much better. Subsection (2) of the same clause provided that appeals in connection with income before the Stipendiary Magistrate were to be heard with closed doors. Clause 12 dealt with assessing for duty on deceased persons' estates, which was rendered not compulsory on the part of the Commissioner. Clause 13 referred to making default in assessments of income. That clause would not be exercised harshly, but it was only fair that the Commissioners should have power, in cases where difficulty was experienced in obtaining satisfactory returns, to make up the amount on which a person should be taxed, and if the person objected he had the power of appealing in the ordinary way. There were many persons who failed to send in their returns at all, and, that being so, it was necessary that assessments should be made for them. Clause 14 provided that interest on mortgages was neither returnable by the mortgagee nor deductible by the mortgagor in the returns of land and mortgages made by them. Clause 15 was to enable the mortgagor to compel a bank to register a mortgage the deduction of which had been refused because it was not registered. This could not be done formerly, and it was necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON asked if this abolished the mortgage-tax.

Mr. WARD said it did not. With regard to clause 16, the section of the Act which it sought to amend did not clearly say that unregistered mortgages could not be deducted, and this clause put it beyond question. Clause 17 was an alteration in connection with the assessing of banks for income-tax, and was a much fairer method than that which already existed, and was the result of a number of proposals which had been made in order to arrive at a satisfactory method of assessment. The proposal was to charge the banks 7s. 6d. on every hundred pounds of their assets and liabilities, and then charge 1s. income-tax in the ordinary way. This was a fair way, and applied to all banks, and removed entirely the objectionable features of the existing law. All banks were now on the same footing under this proposal, and he thought it was a very fair and equitable way of getting the tax, in addition to which it would increase the revenue to the extent of about £1,500 a year. Clause 18 dealt with the depreciation of machinery. Some allowance had to be made for depreciation of machinery, and the Commissioner, under the provisions of this Bill, could, with the assistance of an expert, determine the amount to allow. The person who would be the best judge as to what should be allowed for depreciation would be the Inspector of Machinery. Subsection (2) of the same clause provided that premiums on accident-insurance policies were not to come under the same category as life-insurance premiums. Subsection (8) dealt with the question of companies and others carrying on a mixed business, and provided that, in such cases, losses and expenses incurred in the production of income that was not subject to taxation should not be deducted from income that was subject to taxation. Subsection (9) provided that interest on mortgages was not to be deducted from income unless the mortgage was secured upon business premises. It had been contended by some that the law as it now stood allowed the interest on all mortgages the proceeds of which were invested in business to be deducted. This provision was to make it certain that it applied only to interest on mortgage of premises used for the purposes of business or employment. Clauses 19 and 20 were merely formal. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Sir R. STOUT wished to point out two or three points. He did not think the honourable gentleman had fairly stated to the House what the effect of the Act would be. He would take section 7. The effect of that would be that, supposing land fell in value, the Government need not revalue it, but if it increased in value they could raise the valuation. He submitted that a triennial valuation was a fair thing, and it ought not to be in the power of the Government to say that if land fell in value they would not allow any revaluation.

Mr. WARD.—Within what period?

Sir R. STOUT said there was no period fixed in the Bill. He said that triennial valuations should be maintained. This was what would happen: Suppose land fell in value—as he believed it had done since the last valuation—the people would have to pay taxation not on the value of the land, but on the value of the land three or four years before. That was not fair;

it was a means of keeping up the land-tax although the price of land might have fallen. It was a new way of getting additional taxation from the people. Now, he would point out what was the meaning of section 18. Honourable members would have to refer to the Act of 1891. Schedule F of the Act of 1891 said, "In estimating the balance of the income liable to tax in the case of any business employment or emolument no sum shall be deducted therefrom for . . ."; and then this clause said, "nor by reason of any such implements, utensils, or machinery being obsolete, useless, or superseded." That was, you could not estimate that the machinery was obsolete; you had to put it down in your balance-sheet at a value it did not possess. If the machinery was obsolete, why should you be called upon to return it at a value it did not possess? The honourable gentleman said, to get rid of this, that the Commissioner might allow such deduction as he might think just; but why should you have this at all? If the machinery was obsolete and useless, why should your balance-sheet not show it? Section 18 was entirely unfair. The next was subsection (3), section 18. Paragraphs (8) and (9) were both increasing the existing taxation. He would take paragraph (9) first. Suppose a man was a merchant, and had a farm, and also a business place in one of the cities: his business place might be leasehold, and he could not borrow money on that, but he could borrow on his farm and put the money he borrowed on his farm into his business. Ought not he to be allowed to deduct from his income the interest which he paid on that mortgage? If this Bill were carried he would not be allowed to do so. The mere fact of his not being able to say the mortgage was secured on the premises used for his business would prevent it; but, if the mortgage-money was used in his business, why should he not be allowed to deduct the interest from his gross income? It was not fair at all. The money was put into the business, and the interest he had to pay was a legitimate charge. He did not think that subsection should be carried. Nor did he think paragraph (8) was a fair one. He would point out again that if a man's land fell in value

3.0. he had a right to have a triennial assessment, and a right to apply within three years. If the Colonial Treasurer chose he could make it every four years, but no longer; and that was entirely unfair, because the State under the Bill had the right to have a revaluation if it so pleased, and could demand any additional taxation from the person whose land was increased in value. If the land had decreased in value, then the man who owned the land had no chance whatever. And therefore he hoped that the Minister would not ask that the Bill be committed at once. It bristled with points, and it amended section after section of the Act of 1891. He was sure there were very few members of the House who had read the Bill and compared it with the Act of 1891 in order to see its effect, and he would ask the honourable member to postpone it. No doubt some sections were necessary. He would not vote against the second reading, but it would have been better if it had been sent to the Statutes Revision Committee.

Mr. Ward

Mr. THOMPSON said that, in reference to clause 7, he thought the difficulty might be met if the Colonial Treasurer would agree to provide that the owner of a property should be allowed to call upon the Tax Commissioner at any time for a revaluation. That would place property-holders in the same position as the Tax Commissioner.

Mr. WARD.—Look at the last three lines of the clause.

Mr. THOMPSON did not think that provided for the difficulty. If they did away with the triennial valuation it was necessary that holders of property should have the same right as the Tax Commissioner, and if the honourable gentleman would provide for that it would meet the whole difficulty. This was only a Committee objection, and he did not see any reason why the Bill should be kept back, as they could amend it in Committee, now he had called attention to the point. He hoped the Colonial Treasurer would see the necessity of providing for placing the holders of property in the same position as the Tax Commissioner, so far that they should have the right to call upon the Tax Commissioner at any time for a revaluation.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the Colonial Treasurer should have referred this Bill to the Public Accounts Committee. There were a variety of these Bills, and they were drawn up by the various departments, no doubt in the interests of the office, but they did not always further the interests of the people taxed. With reference to clause 7, this was not an improvement. There were many small country townships where land might be in some years worth a good deal, but at the present time the values had fallen to one-half, and in some places to one-third, and if the people were called on to pay without a revaluation it would be exceedingly heavy, and he hoped in this respect the Bill would be altered. Referring to clause 18, in the earlier English Land-tax and Income-tax Acts he thought there was a clause which referred to houses, and 5 per cent. was allowed to be deducted from the income for repairs; and he would suggest that 10 or 15 per cent. should be allowed on all classes of machinery. This would save a good deal of trouble, because the Commissioner and the Inspector, who went round to inspect the various factories, would have a better basis for making a revaluation. If they took machinery worth, say, £5,000, a deduction of 10 per cent. would mean £500. In a few years there was a great depreciation, and the machinery became worth little more than scrap-iron; and if this deduction were provided it would save conflict between the Commissioner and the people. The Minister had stated that in regard to clause 17—the one dealing with banks—there was an increased taxation of £1,500 a year; but he would like to ask what the total effect of this Bill would be—whether it would bring in £2,000, £3,000, or £5,000 a year more in land-and income-tax, or whether it would in any way alter the gross returns. He thought the House should know how much was to be acquired.

Mr. BUCHANAN agreed with the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) in what he had stated with regard to triennial assessments. The change had been made at the instance, and for the convenience, of the Tax Department, without anything like due consideration for settlers all over the country; and unless different provision was made in the Bill much injustice would be done, and settlers compelled to pay tax year by year on values which had long ago ceased to exist. He would like also to draw attention to clause 15, because, in common with other members, he had not had time to compare the existing statute with the Bill before the House. He had not been able to catch the honourable gentleman's explanation as to whether an unregistered mortgage could be deducted under the Bill. It would be a great benefit to the taxpayer if the necessity to register were done away with. Anything that would save expense to the business public would be a great boon; and he did not see that the Tax Department would lose a shilling, because the property was there, and, if either the mortgagee or the owner of the property paid, what did it matter so far as the department was concerned? With regard to clause 18, referred to by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), he (Mr. Buchanan) thought that the 10-per-cent. deduction mentioned by the honourable gentleman would, in many cases, be altogether insufficient. In the case of freezing machinery, for example, every one knew that, on account of modern improvements, some of the older machinery was now, as the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs had put it, not worth more than scrap-iron. If an Inspector of Machinery or other competent person were employed by the department to value periodically, justice would be done, but not otherwise. He hoped the Colonial Treasurer would postpone the commitment of the Bill. He believed it was necessary to pass such a Bill, but it had been impossible to give it sufficient consideration.

Mr. BUDDO considered this one of the most important Bills of the session, and he might say there would be very strong feeling throughout the country unless a fair and reasonable adjustment were allowed to be made between the taxpayers and the Assessor—there would be trouble. Clause 7 merely provided for the continuing of existing assessments until new assessments were made; and no further objection could be taken: that was to say, if the Assessor once reviewed the assessment that was at present in force, there could then be no further objection whatever, and that assessment might run on for ever and act detrimentally to the tax-paying community, and more especially to those who were interested in land. Of course, it was a well-known fact that land had depreciated very much in value during the last three years, and the country was urgently looking forward to a very great reduction in the present assessment. It was also a well-known fact that the State had a perfect right to impose any rate of taxation, so long as it was fair and reasonable; but in regard to the existing assessment of land the farmers should have a right to say that their property should be valued according to the marketable value, and on the basis of what it would produce per annum. It was the only practical basis on which property could be valued. There was another clause in the Bill dealing with the depreciation in the value of machinery in any factory. He thought it would be only reasonable that a reduction should be made, as it was very clear that machinery from year to year fell in value. In ten years probably the machinery now in use in some of the principal factories would be absolutely useless; and a deduction should be made for an annual depreciation, and the valuation should be fairly adjusted and a reasonable amount be set aside to provide for new machinery which the Inspectors, and managers of the factories, might consider necessary. He did not wish to say anything more on the second reading, but in Committee he would move such an amendment as to make the Bill in this respect fair and reasonable.

Mr. WILSON asked if the Minister would explain why land returns had to be sent in every year. He would also like to ask the honourable gentleman if he would make arrangements so that the department could not collect the land-tax twice in one year.

Mr. WARD said the bulk of the arguments might fairly be termed Committee objections only; and, with all due deference to the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), he thought there was nothing to prevent the Bill's being committed that day. He would point out that the Government were desirous of pushing on the business, and they were quite able to discuss any clause in Committee to which there was objection. The Bill had also been circulated for over a fortnight. In reply to the objection raised in regard to clause 7, he was quite prepared to have an amendment introduced to enable landowners to have a revaluation of their land, as those whose land had depreciated since the former assessment no doubt had a right to have a revaluation. He was quite prepared to meet the wishes of honourable members in this matter, as it was only fair that landowners should have the same right as the department to a revaluation. In regard to clause 18, referred to by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), in connection with the deduction for machinery, the procedure was practically that in force in England, and it was now proposed to introduce it here by this Bill. Moreover, the system they were asking the House to approve was the system which had been carried on ever since the department had been taxing income, and it was desired to put the system on a proper footing, so that the officers should know what the system was. As to the suggestion made by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs in regard to allowing a fixed percentage by way of deduction for depreciation of machinery, in practice that would not work very satisfactorily; otherwise he would be glad to agree to it. There were some classes of machinery which became absolutely obsolete in a few years, and in this case a deduction of 10 per cent. would not be enough, while in the case of other classes such a deduction would be too great. The system also would not operate in the case of the machinery referred to by the honourable member for Wairarapa, which might rapidly become obsolete; and under the circumstances he did not think the percentage system would work. In the clause referred to by the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout),—subsection (9) of clause 18, dealing with the deduction from income of interest of mortgages on business premises—the honourable member mentioned the case of a person who had a mortgage on a farm, and having invested the money in business the honourable gentleman claimed he should have the right to deduct the interest as though the mortgage were one that was on his business. He might point out to the honourable member that in the case of a mortgage being on land the mortgagor was not called upon to pay tax on the land mortgage at all. It was the mortgagee who paid.

Mr. Buddo

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. WARD said, Yes. The interest paid by the mortgagor was exempted in that particular case.

Sir R. STOUT said it was not a question of the principal; this was a question of the interest only. The mortgagee did not pay the interest.

Mr. WARD said, under such a system as that which the honourable gentleman suggested, if a mortgagor having a mortgage on his farm did not invest the money in his business, what was to prevent his saying he had invested the money in his business when in reality he had invested it in improving his farm? There was no system he could think of that in practice would prevent that from being done; and that was the difficulty in the way. If there was any reasonable solution of the difficulty he was prepared to hear it, but he thought there was none. Now, a point had been raised by the honourable member for Wairarapa, and he was sorry the honourable gentleman was not present. The point he referred to was in connection with the provision in the Act of 1891 which compelled a man who took a mortgage to register it if called upon to do so by the mortgagor, but did not compel a bank in the same way. A bank might hold an unregistered mortgage, and might decline to register it. The provision in this Bill compelled the bank to have it registered if called upon by the mortgagor, so that the man might be in the same position as a registered mortgagor would be in the ordinary way. In reply to the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, he might say that the difference in the amount of taxation to be collected from the banks under this altered system would be this: Last year the total amount received from the banks was £5,650; under this altered system it would be from £6,800 to £6,500. He had said the difference would be £1,500, but it was not so much—about £1,000 was the difference in the amount. It was a much fairer method, and it was a very difficult matter to arrive at an equitable and satisfactory system, but this appeared to be as fair a method as could be devised in order to levy taxation on the banks. He thought these were the whole of the points raised by honourable members.

Dr. NEWMAN asked, what was the total amount of the difference in the land- and income-tax revenue under this Bill—the amount of the increase or decrease in the taxation?

Mr. WARD might tell the honourable member that there would be no material increase whatever under this Bill, and no material decrease. The slight increase in connection with the system of levying the tax on banks was the only one so far as he knew. There was a provision in the present Act that the Governor in Council might make regulations so as to adjust the taxation on shipping. It might be that another £1,000 or £1,500 would be brought in from that source, but he was not in a position to say positively, because it was a most difficult thing to place on a satisfactory system, and up till this time they had not been able to get a satisfactory system. Annual returns of the land were just as necessary as the annual returns of income. This was a statistical department, and the taxing officers must be placed in a position to know the variations that were continually going on in every part of the country, such as the change of owners, for instance. Everything of that nature which transpired during the twelve months must be recorded. The object was to make the work of the department as easy as possible for the taxing officers. People did not like to send in these returns, but it was unavoidable. In reply to the honourable member for Otaki, he might say, as to his question about introducing a clause to prevent two taxes being collected within twelve months, he trusted the good sense of the House would see the advisability of leaving that to the judgment of the Ministry of the day in its ordinary administration of the department. He did not think it was desirable to have the hands of the Government tied in the direction which the honourable gentleman suggested.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Does the honourable gentleman say that an unregistered mortgage can be deducted?

Mr. WARD.—No; I do not.

Mr. BUCHANAN would point out to the honourable gentleman that many advances were made for short periods,—that it would be a heavy expense to have the deeds registered in such cases; and, as long as the taxing department was secure, why should the borrower be compelled to register? He understood the department was quite favourable to this.

Mr. WARD would point out to the honourable member that, of course, if a mortgage were not registered it could not be deducted, and he would point out why the system the honourable gentleman suggested could not be assented to. Take the case of a person lodging securities with a bank, and having in the ordinary course an understanding that when registered it should be for a mortgage for £3,000. Supposing he got £10,000, what was to prevent the bank saying they had registered a mortgage for the £10,000? How could one disprove that? The department must be able to prove it. There would be a possibility—he did not say it would be done—with unscrupulous people of having large sums set down as mortgages which were not mortgages at all.

Bill read a second time.

POST AND TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 5.—Board of Appeal.

Mr. WARD moved, in the constitution of the Board, to strike out the word "Secretary," and substitute "Commissioner of Taxes."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6.—Repeal.

Mr. PIRANI moved to strike out the words "First and," with a view to the omission of the First Schedule of the Bill.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 31.

Allen	Larnach	Russell, W. R.
Buick	Mackintosh	Saunders
Cadman	McGuire	Seddon
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Fraser	McLachlan	Ward
Hall-Jones	Mitchelson	Wilson.
Harris	Newman
Heke	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Parata	Lawry
Joyce	Pere	Mills.

NOES, 28.

Buddo	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Button	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Carncross	Massey	Tanner
Carnell	McGowan	Te Ao
Collins	McNab	Thompson
Crowther	Meredith	Willis.
Earnshaw	Miller
Graham	Montgomery	Tellers.
Green	Morrison	Kelly, J. W.
Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton	Pirani.

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Reeves.	Mackenzie, T.
Majority for, 3.

Words retained.

Mr. EARNSHAW moved, That the heading "Clerical Division" be inserted between "Superintendent of Electric Lines" and "Assistant Secretary and Inspector."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

AYES, 24.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Saunders
Carncross	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Collins	Maslin	Stout
Crowther	Meredith	Thompson
Duncan	Millar	Willis.
Graham	Morrison	Tellers.
Green	Pinkerton	Earnshaw
Heke	Pirani	Russell, G. W.
Hogg

NOES, 39.

Allen	Kelly, W.	O'Regan
Buchanan	Larnach	Parata
Buick	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Button	Mackintosh	Seddon
Cadman	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Carnell	McGuire	Stevens
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Flatman	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Fraser	McLachlan	Ward
Hall	McNab	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Harris	Montgomery	Joyce
Hutchison, G.	Newman	Mills.
Hutchison, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Massey
Reeves.	Mackenzie, T.

Majority against, 15.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL moved to strike out "£650," opposite "Assistant Secretary and Inspector," with the view of inserting "£550."

The Committee divided on the question, "That '£650' be retained."

AYES, 27.

Buchanan	McGuire	Smith, E. M.
Cadman	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Carroll	McKenzie, R.	Steward
Flatman	Mitchelson	Stout
Fraser	Newman	Ward
Hall-Jones	O'Regan	Wilson.
Hutchison, G.	Parata	Tellers.
Larnach	Russell, W. R.	Joyce
Lawry	Seddon	Mills.
Mackintosh

NOES, 32.

Allen	Harris	Montgomery
Buddo	Hogg	Morrison
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Pinkerton
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Saunders
Carnell	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Collins	Maslin	Tanner
Duncan	McGowan	Thompson
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Willis.
Graham	McNab	Tellers.
Green	Meredith	Pirani
Hall	Millar	Russell, G. W.

Majority against, 5.

Figures struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That '£550' be inserted."

AYES, 17.

Buddo	Crowther	Graham
Collins	Earnshaw	Green

Hogg	Meredith	Tanner.
Lang	Russell, G. W.	Tellers.
Maslin	Saunders	Kelly, J. W.
McNab	Smith, G. J.	Pirani.

NOES, 43.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	O'Regan
Bell	Kelly, W.	Parata
Buchanan	Larnach	Pinkerton
Buick	Lawry	Reeves
Button	Mackintosh	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Massey	Seddon
Carroll	McGowan	Stout
Duthie	McGuire	Te Ao
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Fraser	McKenzie, R.	Ward
Hall	McLachlan	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Mitchelson
Harris	Montgomery	Tellers.
Heke	Morrison	Joyce
Houston	Newman	Mills.

PAIR.

For.	Against.
Mackenzie, T.	Reeves.

Majority against, 26.

Amendment negatived.

Figures "£600" inserted.

Mr. PIRANI moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 24.

Allen	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Buick	Mackenzie, T.	Smith, G. J.
Duthie	McLachlan	Stout
Earnshaw	McNab	Tanner
Fraser	Meredith	Te Ao.
Green	Millar	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	O'Regan	Duncan
Heke	Parata	Pirani.
Kelly, J. W.

NOES, 43.

Bell	Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton
Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Buddo	Larnach	Russell, W. R.
Button	Lawry	Saunders
Carncross	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carnell	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Carroll	Massey	Stevens
Collins	McGowan	Thompson
Crowther	McGuire	Ward
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Willis
Graham	McKenzie, R.	Wilson.
Hall	Mitchelson
Harris	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hogg	Morrison	Joyce
Houston	Newman	Mills.

Majority against, 19.

Motion negatived.

Mr. EARNSHAW moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 13.

Carncross	Millar	Tanner.
Duncan	Pirani
Green	Russell, G. W.	Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.	Smith, G. J.	Earnshaw
Lang	Stout	Heke.

NOES, 51.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Morrison
Bell	Joyce	Newman
Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Parata
Buddo	Larnach	Reeves
Buick	Lawry	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Collins	Massey	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGowan	Stevens
Duthie	McGuire	Steward
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Fraser	McKenzie, R.	Ward
Graham	McLachlan	Willis
Hall	McNab	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Mitchelson	Button
Hogg	Montgomery	Mills.
Houston

Majority against, 38.

Motion negatived.

Mr. HALL-JONES moved to strike out the Third Schedule in clause 6.

Motion agreed to, and schedule struck out.

Sir R. STOUT moved to add the following new clause:—

“In the Clerical Division no cadet shall be promoted out of the cadet class until he has passed the junior Civil Service examination; and no one shall be promoted out of the class above that of cadet until he has passed the senior Civil Service examination.”

The Committee divided on the question: “That the clause be read a second time.”

AYES, 27.

Allen	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Bell	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Buddo	Massey	Te Ao
Buick	McGowan	Thompson
Crowther	McNab	Wilson.
Duthie	Meredith	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Mitchelson	Russell, G. W.
Green	Montgomery	Stout.
Heke

NOES, 33.

Button	Houston	Parata
Carncross	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carnell	Larnach	Seddon
Carroll	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Mackintosh	Stevens
Duncan	Maslin	Tanner
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Ward
Graham	McKenzie, R.	Willis.
Hall	McLachlan	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Joyce
Harris	O'Regan	Mills.
Hogg

Majority against, 6.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. PIRANI moved the following new clause:—

“In the absence of the Secretary from the Head Office the Superintendent shall be deemed to be the officer in charge of the Postal and Telegraph Department.”

VOL. LXXXVI.—56.

The Committee divided on the question “That the clause be read a second time.”

AYES, 10.

Allen	Parata	Tellers.
Duncan	Stout	Kelly, J. W.
Green	Te Ao	Pirani.
Heke	Wilson.

NOES, 54.

Bell	Hutchison, G.	Morrison
Buchanan	Hutchison, W.	Newman
Buick	Joyce	O'Regan
Button	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Carncross	Lang	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Larnach	Russell, W. R.
Carroll	Mackenzie, T.	Saunders
Collins	Mackintosh	Seddon
Crowther	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Duthie	Massey	Smith, G. J.
Earnshaw	McGowan	Stevens
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Tanner
Fraser	McKenzie, R.	Thompson
Graham	McLachlan	Ward
Hall	McNab	Willis.
Hall-Jones	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Mitchelson	Lawry
Hogg	Montgomery	Mills.
Houston

Majority against, 44.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported.

On the question, That the amendments be agreed to,

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked if he would be in order in moving the recommittal of the Bill for the purpose of adding a small sum to the Second Schedule.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it something beyond what was set down in the Bill as sent down by message from the Governor?

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER said in that case it would not be in order to increase the item.

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked if Mr. Speaker ruled that this was an Appropriation Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was a money Bill so far as it affected certain salaries; therefore an item in it could not be increased by a private member without the consent of the Crown.

Sir R. STOUT.—Will you allow me, Sir, to say something on a point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER.—On what I have decided?

Sir R. STOUT said he did not know that Mr. Speaker had decided the point.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes.

Sir R. STOUT.—You have decided this is a money Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had ruled that any amendment to increase salaries could not be made by the House without the recommendation of the Crown.

Sir R. STOUT wished to point out to Mr. Speaker that these items were not salaries. Salaries were provided for in the Appropriation Bill. These were only limits within which the estimates were to go.

Mr. SPEAKER said the items fixed the maximum and minimum rate of pay, and clearly affected salaries.

Sir R. STOUT said there was one salary in regard to which he wished to have the decision of Mr. Speaker, and that was the item that all the discussion had been about.

Mr. SPEAKER asked if the point was raised in Committee.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SPEAKER said if the point was raised in Committee, and decided by the Chairman, it could not be reviewed by the Chair.

Sir R. STOUT asked, if the Chairman ruled in a certain way, had not members the right to appeal to the Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No.

Sir R. STOUT said Mr. Speaker ruled in 1887 that there was power on the part of the Committee to take the opinion of the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Not of an individual member.

Sir R. STOUT said, No, but the Committee. That was the point. They admitted that no individual member could take the opinion of the Speaker. The question was, whether the Committee could take the opinion of the Speaker if they carried a resolution to that effect. Last year there were no less than three resolutions moved in Committee, which would be found at pages 147 and 235 of the Journals of the House. He understood the practice was, if a Committee carried a resolution to the effect that the opinion of the Speaker be asked, that it was the duty of the Chairman, if the majority of the Committee were in favour of it, to report the matter to the Speaker and ask his ruling on the point. He could only say that used to be the practice. When he was formerly in the House he had seen it done. He found that Mr. Speaker had ruled in 1888, and that it appeared in Volume 60, page 352, of Hansard to the following effect—this was from the "Decisions of the Speakers" collected by Mr. Barron: "Speaker does not interfere with the decisions of the Chairman unless the Committee express a wish to take his opinion. An individual member cannot appeal from the Chairman to the Speaker." That being so, in Committee the Chairman had prevented them from taking the opinion of the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the Chairman had decided the point the Speaker would not review it.

Sir R. STOUT.—Then, what was their right? The Speaker having ruled that the Committee could appeal to him, was the Committee to be deprived of that? and, if so, what rights had the Committee?

Mr. SPEAKER said it was most distinctly laid down by the highest authorities that from the Chairman of Committees there was no appeal to the Speaker.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Even by the Committee?

Mr. SPEAKER said he understood the Committee did not direct the Chairman to ask the Speaker's opinion. If the Chairman had given his ruling on the point there was no appeal from the ruling of the Chairman of Committees. He must say it was not customary to attempt to argue points of order with the Speaker. He had given a distinct decision on the matter, and it was not in order to dispute the Speaker's decision in an irregular way, as was now being done. He had now stated what his decision was on the matter, and if the honourable gentleman wished to contest it any further there was a proper mode of doing it.

Sir R. STOUT said he did not wish to contest it; he only asked the question so that Mr. Speaker should direct them what to do in the event of the Chairman refusing to allow the Committee—not an individual member—to take the opinion of the Speaker. If the Chairman would not allow them to do that when the majority of the Committee were in favour of it, what was their remedy?

Mr. SPEAKER said the Chairman of Committees had the same authority of ruling points of order in Committee as the Speaker in the House, and his ruling must be obeyed. If his decisions were unsatisfactory there was a way of dealing with the matter. He would not say anything further than that.

Mr. ALLEN wanted to know how the Committee was to give effect to its wishes. Was it to be done on a motion to report progress?

Mr. SPEAKER said that was a question for the Chairman, not for him, to decide.

Mr. ALLEN said he was not referring to the Chairman; the point was not raised in the Committee; but he wanted to know, for the information of the House, if the Committee wanted to take the opinion as to whether the Speaker was to be consulted or not, how were they to do it?

Mr. SPEAKER said that was a point on which the Chairman would rule.

Mr. PIRANI moved, That this Bill be read a third time that day three months. He thought that they had every reason to stop the progress of this Bill, considering the manner in which it had been pushed forward. He thought, if the House was denied every other right of interfering with this Bill, the only way was for them to put down their foot and decide that the Bill should not go through at all. In consequence of the way in which the Bill had been pushed forward, in consequence of the manner in which every attempt to get justice done in the schedule of the Bill had been, he might almost say, burked, it was best for the House and for the country that a motion be passed that the Bill should be read that day three months, instead of passing into law.

Mr. J. W. KELLY seconded the amendment. It seemed to him their liberties were being curtailed to an extraordinary extent. He must say the action of the Government in pushing this Bill through met with his entire disapproval. After they had succeeded in carrying £50 addition to a salary of £550, the Committee had attempted to get an addition made to the smaller salaries, and no sooner had they done so than the Colonial Treasurer rose to a point of order, and the Chairman decided it was impossible to do what was proposed. Under the circumstances he thought nothing they could do to stop the progress of the Bill was too much.

Mr. SEDDON asked the mover and the seconder of the amendment whether they did not think they were punishing deserving officers, and at the same time would not be a jot further forward in the object they had in view. There was a way, if either the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees did not do justice to the House or to the Committee, as the case might be, and only one way—by resolution—to question what they had done. The object of the amendment was to prevent the passing of the Bill, as a protest against the decision. Was the House to be put in this position? Were a majority prepared to take such a course? It would be a reflection on the House, and he would ask those honourable gentlemen, now they were brought face to face with the true position, to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Sir R. STOUT did not intend to oppose the passing of the Bill. On the contrary, he had voted with the Government on the division which led to all the trouble, and it could not be said that he had opposed the Bill through Committee. But he exceedingly regretted that the Committee, being desirous of having an important question decided, was denied the privilege, and denied by the Government. The Government ought to have aided them to get the question settled, and if that had been done they would have got through two or three more Bills that night. But business had been blocked. It was always best to yield to members in order that a difficult question might be cleared up. He meant no reflection on the Chairman of Committees: his conclusion might be right; but he regretted that an opportunity was not given to the Committee to have the question thoroughly decided in the House. As to the Bill itself, he looked upon it not as an Appropriation Bill at all. It was simply to say what might be the possible salary—not what was to be the salary, but what was the minimum and what the maximum salary. The salary that had led to so much trouble had been voted this year at £550, and the Bill allowed that that salary—not for any one officer, but some officer—might reach £600; but it was not an appropriation at all, because the salary had been already appropriated. They, in Committee, could not understand why the Chairman did not allow them to vary small amounts of possible salaries—not of the appropriations at all—and he certainly could not understand the point.

Mr. DUNCAN said the position appeared to be that a minority had a gag placed upon it, and he saw nothing else in it but an attempt to take away the privileges of the minority, when a Chairman of Committees refused to put a motion when moved by that minority. They had only to get a pliable Chairman of Committees, and there was no appeal; he was master of the situation, and might rule as he liked; and if the Government did not take the matter up and get redress honourable members were completely at their mercy. He thought this ought to be known, and that the Standing Orders should be altered next session, so that the difficulty might be in future averted. In reference to this matter, he had no feeling as against the Bill—not the slightest—but he felt sure that the position they were placed in that night was a very unfortunate one indeed, and one he individually would resent. It did not matter what Government might be in office; for as far as he could see the only way out of the difficulty was that they would have to submit in the meantime, and make an effort to have the Standing Orders changed in some way, so as to enable them to get decisions in Committee reviewed. Especially if the Chairman acted in any way contrary to the spirit or form of the procedure as conducted by the Speaker in the full House, then those aggrieved should have power to get his decisions reviewed. He hoped it would be a warning to the House in regard to the Chairman of Committees, and that when members returned next session the first thing they would do would be to rescind any appointment that might have been made, or, at any rate, to amend the Standing Orders in such a way that members would have the opportunity of being heard and getting a decision in accordance with what they thought was fair-play to both sides of the House.

Mr. WARD thought that the speech of the honourable member who spoke last was very much to be regretted, as it referred to a decision of the Chairman of Committees, and, in justice to the Chairman of Committees, the position ought to be placed before the House. What was the position? In Committee on this matter the honourable member for Chalmers desired to move an increase in one vote.

Sir R. STOUT.—Not a vote.

Mr. WARD said he desired to move an increase in one of the items in the classification attached to the Bill—to increase the limits within one division by £10. He (Mr. Ward) had risen to a point of order, and had asked the Chairman of Committees whether an honourable member could move an increase in the direction proposed by the honourable member for Chalmers, and the Chairman had ruled that such a motion was not in order. The Speaker's ruling had now been asked on the same point, and he upheld the ruling of the Chairman of Committees. The Chairman was now absent from the House, but he had done his duty in the matter; and he was sorry to hear the honourable member for Oamaru make a serious reflection upon that officer simply because he had done his duty, and say that next session they should put him out of office. That was not fair.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is not for what he has done to-night.

Mr. WARD said, how was it not for what he had done that night? The Chairman of Committees was a responsible officer, and if any fault was to be found with him on a particular charge members could sheet it home to him in a proper way if there was any foundation for it; but on the case that had been reported from Committee that evening the ruling had been thoroughly impartial as far as the Chairman was concerned. On the same point of order a ruling had been given by the Speaker in the House exactly the same as given by the Chairman of Committees; yet the honourable member for Oamaru had stated he had done something wrong. It was just as well, as the honourable member for 12.30. Invercargill had made an accusation against him (Mr. Ward), that he should refer to it. He was not going to be attacked by the honourable member, or by any other member of the House, without defending himself. He had said that he (Mr. Ward) had opposed some small increase on small salaries.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—I said you rose to a point of order, and so prevented our carrying it.

Mr. WARD said that some of the smallest salaries in the service had received the greatest consideration from him, without his being prompted by anybody, and these salaries had been materially increased since the department had been under his control. The senior member for Wellington City had said that the whole Bill was blocked because the Chairman of Committees had acted in a particular way.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. WARD said he understood him to say that.

Sir R. STOUT.—I meant that a great deal of time was wasted that ought not to have been wasted.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member said that the cause of the blocking of the Bill was the ruling of the Chairman of Committees in connection with the point raised by the honourable member for Chalmers.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The refusal of the Chairman of Committees to take the opinion of the Speaker.

Mr. WARD asked, when did that occur? It was after the Bill had been blocked and debated for some five hours. That point was raised five hours after the Bill had been under the consideration of the Committee.

Sir R. STOUT.—It was not blocked.

Mr. WARD said it was in some cases blocked. That was his opinion, and he was entitled to hold his opinion. And, when the honourable member for Invercargill said that the liberties of the House had been curtailed in connection with this Bill, he (Mr. Ward) was surprised at such a statement. Here was a Bill of seven clauses taking six hours to discuss, and it was said that the liberties of the House were being curtailed. He had never seen a Bill more freely debated in that House, and he had never seen honourable members talk so freely as some did on that Bill since he had been a member of the House. There had been no such thing as curtailment of their liberties. They moved amendments; and there was no attempt made to curtail their liberties. Some honourable gentlemen took exception to an increase in a particular salary. They were within their rights in doing so, and he found no fault with them for doing that and endeavouring to get it reduced; but, after the matter had been finally fixed in Committee, he did not think it right, fair, or reasonable to have the matter discussed by the honourable member for Palmerston. That honourable member had put his view of the matter on record, and ought to have been satisfied with that. It was not fair to blame the Chairman of Committees in the matter. He (Mr. Ward) was not there to stick up for any member of the House, and the Chairman of Committees was able to take care of himself; but he had given his ruling quite impartially, and correctly, in his (Mr. Ward's) opinion. They had had the Speaker, whose opinion no one in the House would question, confirming what the Chairman of Committees had done on this Bill, and it was not right to make imputations upon any one because honourable members had not been able to get a reduction in this particular salary. There had been six hours of free talk flowing in Committee on this Bill—a whole six hours. There was no gag about that. All the talk came from a few members, and they talked very fully, and—he would not say fiercely, but—very strongly, on the appointments. There was no such thing as a gag. Honourable members put their views on record, and there was nothing in the shape of a gag in connection with the matter. He could only say that the whole Bill was debated fully and freely; and he did not think now, when they had got to the third reading, the amendment of the honourable member for Palmerston was seriously moved. He therefore suggested to the honourable gentleman that, having put his protest on record, there was no use in going to a division, and that he might as well withdraw his amendment under the circumstances. He regretted, himself, that the debate upon this matter had taken place. There were a good many points about it. However, he did not want to again go over the position of the Government in connection with these appointments. He would merely say that while honourable members were no doubt anxious to do what was right, and while they were probably anxious to help an officer in the service, their anxiety seemed to him to be of a mistaken character. As for the course pursued, he would say that the officer would think it was a case of "Save me from my friends." That was the plain meaning of it. And he hoped the honourable member for Palmerston would now see fit to withdraw the amendment. He had merely wished to say that he could not stand by and allow reflections to be cast upon the Chairman of Committees, who had been improperly blamed for blocking the business, when the Bill had been debated for some five hours before this particular point of order was raised.

Mr. Ward

Mr. EARNSHAW thought the Colonial Treasurer was hardly right in stating they had been debating the Bill for five or six hours. The point at issue was not debated very long. It was a very short debate, and this particular point was as to the manner in which he put it before the House. He did not dispute the Chairman's ruling with regard to the Bill. It was upon his resolution that the whole question arose, and where members felt that they had been—"gagged" was not the right word to use—where they had not been able to get the opinion of the Chair. According to the ruling that had been laid down in the House, although a private member might not challenge the ruling of the Chairman of Committees, the Committee as a whole could challenge his ruling in order to get Mr. Speaker's ruling. That was where the conflict came in, and he understood the amendment of the honourable member for Palmerston to be simply a protest against the course pursued;—that while the Chairman of Committees might or might not have been right in his ruling, yet, as they could not get a review of his decision,—which appeared to be right according to the ruling that had been given now,—they set to work to block the Bill in Committee. He thought it was a most unpleasant position for members to find themselves in. They felt that they were aggrieved that the ruling was not carried out according to their idea of what was right, and according to the past ruling of Mr. Speaker O'Rourke. Their only mode of redress appeared to be to stonewall the Bill. That was an unfortunate position to find one's-self in, and he certainly did not believe members had a right to do so—because they could not get their way on an item that they must then challenge all the items. That was not a proper way to do business. Each item should be fought out on its merits. While he thought the salaries to be paid the officers were not proper ones, yet he felt that they had a right to deal with other questions, and he would support the honourable member for Palmerston only and simply as a protest against the position in which the House had been put.

Amendment withdrawn, and Bill read a third time.

SEA-FISHERIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 20.—License not to exceed five years.

Mr. MILLAR moved to strike out "five years," and insert "three years."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 21.—Governor may grant exclusive licenses for taking oysters from natural beds.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the word "fourteen" be inserted in line 4 of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 24.—Rights of the occupier.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the word "twenty-one" be inserted in line 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 48.—Prohibition of the use of dynamite in fisheries.

Mr. HOUSTON moved, That the words "or any whale" be inserted in the second line.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 70.—Proceedings against Natives to be taken only when authorised by Native Minister.

Mr. WARD moved the addition of the following paragraph:—

"The aforesaid authority of the Native Minister may from time to time be signified by him to any person either generally or specifically, and shall be valid if signified by telegraph or telephone message."

Agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to add the following new clause:—

"Every person who obstructs, hinders, or prevents any person from lawfully taking oysters from any oyster-bed is liable for every such offence to a penalty of not less than twenty shillings nor more than twenty pounds.

"Nothing in this section shall be deemed to protect such first-mentioned person from any other punishment to which he may have rendered himself liable by any offence against this section."

Agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to add the following new clause:—

"Only a Stipendiary Magistrate shall have jurisdiction in respect of any offence under this Act which entails a fine or penalty exceeding fifty pounds in amount."

Agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Mr. HEKE wished to place his protest in reference to this Bill on record. There were clauses in the Bill which, it was quite clear, were inconsistent with the treaty that was made between Her Majesty the Queen and the Native chiefs of New Zealand. This, of course, related to any property the Natives might hold either individually or in common, which were confirmed to them by Article 2 of that treaty. It was his desire to send a protest to Her Majesty through the Governor in respect to all Bills appertaining to the property of Natives, so as to get an understanding as to the real effect of this treaty. It seemed to him that the whole treaty, according to the action of the House, was being treated merely as waste-paper, and he wished to come to an understanding, not for himself, but for the Natives of New Zealand as a whole. It did not appear to be out of place for him to assume that the Natives had been deceived in the first place in 1840 into signing such a document as that, if it was not to be recognised by the Government or Parliament. If that was so, it would be far better that the Natives should come to an understanding as to whether Her Majesty on the one part or the Government of New Zealand on the other part should recognise that treaty, which was made in good faith, and which was signed by the chiefs of New Zealand in 1840 in good faith. The whole thing meant nothing more than this: that it would be far better for the Natives to come to a distinct understanding that the treaty was neither more nor less than waste-paper, or else it was something. If it was nothing, all he could say was that the Natives had been deceived by Her Majesty's representative who came to the Bay of Islands and induced the Natives to sign that treaty. Under the Instructions that were issued in 1892 to the Governor of New Zealand, under the heading of Bills not to be assented to by the Governor in Her Majesty's name, no Bill that should be inconsistent with any obligation imposed on the Queen by the treaty was to be assented to by the Governor of New Zealand, but such a Bill was to be sent Home for the direct assent of Her Majesty before the Governor could do anything in the matter. If the Bill was urgent the Governor could give his assent, but he must immediately notify the fact to the Secretary of State. It was his desire that the Natives should come to a better understanding in reference to this treaty. He must again repeat that it would be better for the Natives to understand thoroughly whether they had been deceived in the first place or not. Under this Bill, if the Natives wished to sell oysters they had to obtain a license, and that provision was contrary to an article in the Treaty of Waitangi.

Mr. WARD had one word to say in reply to the honourable gentleman who had last spoken. This Bill was a consolidating Bill, and the clause objected to by the honourable member was the law at the present time. He had explained the position to the honourable gentleman in Committee. If what the honourable member asked were done, they would have to cancel the granting of licenses to Europeans. The honourable gentleman must not expect impossibilities to be done.

Bill read a third time.

LAND AND INCOME ASSESSMENT BILL.

Clause 5.—Annual returns of land, mortgages, and income.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved, That the words "land, mortgages, and," in line 4, be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 21.

Carncross	McKenzie, R.	Seddon
Carnell	Millar	Smith, E. M.
Carroll	Montgomery	Stevens
Collins	Morrison	Ward.
Duncan	Pinkerton	Tellers.
Hogg	Reeves	Harris
Lawry	Saunders	Mills.
McGowan

NOES, 23.

Buick	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	Maslin	Stout
Duthie	Massey	Tanner
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Thompson
Flatman	Meredith	Willis.
Green	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Newman	Mackenzie, T.
Kelly, J. W.	Pirani	Wilson.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Bell
Graham	Buchanan
Hall	Russell, W. R.
Mackintosh	Hutchison, G.
McKenzie, J.	Allen
McNab.	Te Ao.

Majority against, 2.

Mr. Heke

Words struck out.

Clause 6.—Subsection (1): As to annual returns of land and mortgages.

Sir R. STOUT moved to strike out the subsection.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the subsection proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 24.

Carnell	McGowan	Reeves
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	Millar	Stevens
Hall	Morrison	Ward.
Harris	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Mills
Houston	Pere	Pinkerton.
Lawry

NOES, 27.

Allen	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Buddo	Maslin	Stout
Buick	Massey	Tanner
Crowther	McLachlan	Thompson
Duthie	Meredith	Wilson.
Flatman	Montgomery	Tellers.
Fraser	Newman	Earnshaw
Hall-Jones	Pirani	Mackenzie, T.
Heke

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Mitchelson
Carncross	Te Ao
Kelly, W.	Green
Larnach	Button
Mackintosh	Hutchison, G.
McNab.	McGuire.

Majority against, 3.

Subsection struck out.

Progress reported.

The House adjourned at one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Thursday, 18th October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Third Reading—Major C. Brown—Wilson Land Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Wilson Land Bill, Post and Telegraph Department Bill, Sea-fisheries Bill, Counties Vehicle-licensing Bill, Tongariro National Park Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Tongariro National Park Bill, Wilson Land Bill.

THIRD READING.

Tongariro National Park Bill.

MAJOR C. BROWN.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY moved, That the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of Major Charles Brown be referred to the Government for their consideration. It was only by a motion of this sort that the report of the Public Petitions Committee on Major Brown's petition could reach the Government and be considered. The Committee had not pronounced judgment on the petitioner's case, but had come to the conclusion that, under all the circumstances, he was entitled to be tried by an independent tribunal. He concurred with that opinion, that any officer charged with an offence should have such a trial. He did not blame the Government in the matter, as no doubt they acted in good faith; but he hoped that they would now refer the matter to the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court for final decision. This would do justice to the petitioner, and would satisfy the public that the Government were not averse from any course which tended to protect the rights of individual members of the service.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI did not think the gentleman referred to was entitled to any further consideration. As a Justice of the Peace he had appended his signature and certified to the correctness of a document which had been proved to be incorrect, and he (Mr. Shrimski) considered he was not entitled to any further consideration than he had received.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said the honourable member who had last spoken was labouring under a mistake. Major Brown was not acting as a Justice of the Peace. A Justice of the Peace named Ward appended his signature to a document interpreted by Major Brown. But Major Brown was not the Justice of the Peace referred to.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said that, in answer to the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, the Council should be informed of the position of the matter. The position was this: One Meringa, a Native woman, owned a piece of land, and her son, for her, agreed to sell the land to a man named Cunningham, through a man named Humphries, for the sum of £40. Humphries's position was somewhat ambiguous, and it was doubtful whether he acted as agent for Meringa or for Cunningham; but he (Mr. Stewart) was inclined to think he was a go-between for both parties, and that his leaning was perhaps in favour of Cunningham. The position, so far as Major Brown was concerned, had been entirely misunderstood, and in his (Mr. Stewart's) opinion had been grossly misrepresented. Brown was called upon, in the discharge of his duties as an interpreter, to interpret a declaration which Meringa made in reference to this sale. There was no doubt whatever that Brown had interpreted the declaration correctly when the matter in dispute came to be considered; but a difficulty arose on this question. The declaration stated that £40 had been paid to Meringa. The agreement to sell stated that it was a sale for £40—£25 to be paid in cash, and £15 to go towards making Meringa's title to the land good. Kawatiri, her son, by whom the sale was effected originally, received the £5, and the sum of £15 was paid to Meringa. Brown stated that he believed Humphries had been paid the balance of the purchase-money at the time the declaration was made, and that, as far as he was concerned, the transaction was a bond fide and straightforward one. It turned out, however, that Humphries had not, in point of fact, received from Cunningham more than £20: that was to say, the difference between £20 and £25 had not been paid to Humphries. What understanding had existed between Cunningham and Humphries it was impossible to say, but Brown stated emphatically that he believed that Humphries was Meringa's agent. The matter went before the Native Commissioner, Mr. Stuart, who investigated the matter, and came to the conclusion that the purchase-money ought to be raised to £70. This was after the time Brown made the declaration. Cunningham, in order to complete the sale, did, in point of fact, pay the £70. Humphries got, on the 22nd of July, he (Mr. Stewart) thought, an order from Meringa to receive all moneys coming to her in respect to this sale. But the declaration had been signed before that, and that was why he thought Brown was in no way affected by this question, because he was not concerned about the value of the land, and had no special knowledge of the transaction. But the Native Commissioner, Mr. Stuart, held that £70 ought to be paid, instead of £40; and Humphries made what seemed to be a very exorbitant demand for his services—£13 some odd shillings. Meringa sued Humphries for the moneys he received on her behalf from Cunningham, and the case came before Judge Kettle and a jury, when the jury found that Humphries had been overpaid to the extent of £10, and judgment went against him for that amount. But so far as the petitioner, Brown, was concerned, he was no more liable than the man in the moon for this transaction. The Committee were unanimous in their opinion that Brown was entitled to an inquiry, on the assumption that he had been unfairly treated. The question arose as to what his duties were as an interpreter—whether he was to interpret documents and not concern himself as to whether there was any dispute whatever as to the facts alleged. But Judge Kettle seemed to think it was his duty to satisfy himself that the statements in the declaration were correct, and that Meringa had received this £40. He (Mr. Stewart) thought that was a view of the duty which no one for a moment would maintain. He himself maintained that so long as Brown made what was a true declaration he was not in any way responsible. The real fact of the matter was that this man Humphries, about whom he did not wish to say anything unpleasant, seemed to have been acting in such a way as to get himself clothed with authority from Meringa to receive this money, and, having got the money, he had deducted too much of it, to the extent of about £10, in payment for his own services in the matter. Judge Kettle said that in his opinion Brown had acted negligently in not seeing that the statements in the document were correct; but Mr. Ward, the Justice of the Peace, seemed to know all the circumstances, and nothing was said by him to this effect, as far as the Committee could understand. The fact of the case was that Meringa was a woman apparently of weak intellect, and, as far as the Committee could gather, she was not what might be termed a woman quite alive to all that was going on; but, so far as Brown was concerned, he had believed that the money had been paid honestly by Cunningham, and he stated so. The Government then stepped in, in consequence of the trial before Judge Kettle, in which it appeared that the money had not been paid over to Meringa by Humphries at that time. They did not ask Brown to give any proper reason or any real explanation of the circumstances. They said, "We dismiss you, for misconduct, from your office, and for having been a party to a declaration which was untrue; and we dismiss you from your position as a Justice of the Peace." He (Mr. Stewart) had no hesitation in saying that ninety-nine men out of every hundred would not have been similarly treated under the circumstances. The attempt made to make Brown responsible for any mistake was wrong. The charges were utterly erroneous and quite unfounded, and Brown was, in his opinion, under the circumstances, absolutely free from blame either as a man of business or as a man of honour. Brown was not a mere adventurer in that district. He was a man well known, and had a good reputation in the district, and yet suddenly he was dismissed, without proper warning, under a charge which, if true, ought to have committed him to gaol. He (Mr. Stewart) thought that Major Brown had been most unfairly treated. He was absolutely innocent of all the imputations that had been cast upon him, and, instead of being dismissed, he ought, at most, to have been called upon to make an explanation, for any person of ordinary business intelligence would be satisfied that he was quite innocent of the charge that had been made against him. The matter was considered by the Committee, and attempts were made to bring in foreign and irrelevant matter in connection with Major Brown's conduct in the distribution of moneys many years ago to the Natives under the authority of the Government of the day. At the time referred to the Government were carrying on its sugar-and-blanket policy, which led to Major Brown's distributing the money for purchasing what was called "the mana" of the chiefs. That was done under the authority and with the sanction of the Government of the day, and Major Brown, in doing that, was doing, as far as he (Mr. Stewart) could see, only what he was bound to do under the circumstances. To attempt to fasten discredit upon him in a matter like that, which had to be regarded in the light of the circumstances of the time, was entirely wrong. It was all very well now, when they were at peace with the Natives, to say that Major Brown was responsible for what was done by the Government then in power, but he maintained that Major Brown was not more responsible for those transactions than the Ministry or the Parliament was. He was sorry to see that attempt made to connect Major Brown with transactions which might have been proper at the time, but which might not be repeated now. The charge against him was that he was responsible for the accuracy of the statements in the document; but Major Brown stated that he believed that they were correct, and he (Mr. Stewart) believed that Major Brown was entirely exonerated from the charges made against him.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE would be sorry to allow a charge like this to pass against a brother officer, whose conduct in connection with the Natives he had known for the last twenty-four years, without saying a few words. He knew there was never a more single-minded man in the Province of Taranaki, or a man who more resolutely did his duty, or who conducted himself better, in very trying circumstances sometimes, than Major Brown. He was one of the most unfortunate of men, for he did not get what he was justly entitled to. At one time, when military officers and Civil servants sat in Parliament without question, he was a member of Parliament. He was dismissed from office because he had voted against the Government under Mr. Fox. There was a Parliamentary Committee appointed, and eight gentlemen were upon it;—and in those days they considered that the privileges of military officers were the same as they were in England, where the military and naval officers, as a rule, voted against the Government. When the eight gentlemen referred to were appointed it was a question as to who should be elected Chairman. One member, Mr. Carleton, he thought, was put in the chair, three voting on one side and four on the other; and it was because of Major Brown's voting on that occasion that he suffered at the hands of a spiteful Government; and with that misfortune, he believed, his military career at that time came to an end. When wanted particularly—at the time that Titokowaru was the cause of the trouble on the West Coast, and afterwards Te Whiti—one of the first persons who came forward and gave assistance to the Government was Major Brown. He (Sir G. S. Whitmore) remembered that he went on one occasion with a very small party to one of the most dangerous parts of the colony, a part not known at all, and conducted himself with extreme bravery, and to the satisfaction of the Government. He was employed afterwards in giving certain sums to certain Natives for the purchase of the tribal mana—if that was the way to properly paraphrase it—giving money to certain Natives for losing their land, and he gave large sums to certain chiefs to pave the way out of the West Coast difficulty. In doing that he was single-handed, and carried out his duty as honestly as it was humanly possible to do, and his conduct was appreciated by the Natives. Knowing that Major Brown had done good to the country, and that he was suffering under an unmerited charge, he hoped the vote of the Council would go in the direction of giving Major Brown some chance of vindicating his character, for when a man came to seventy years of age he naturally hoped to go down to his grave without dishonour. He had honestly and faithfully interpreted to the Natives the document which was given to him for signature, and, in doing so, Major Brown fulfilled the whole of his duties. He was quite willing that the proposition should be submitted for consideration, that persons acting in Major Brown's position should be sufficiently acquainted with Native customs; but, in relation to the sum of £40, it was quite clear to him that in the performance of his duty Major Brown had no occasion whatever to satisfy himself that the money had been paid. His duty was confined solely to the interpretation of the document, and he certainly interpreted that document honestly—he had faithfully performed the whole of his duty. Supposing that the woman did not get the money, or that she was an imbecile, the law had provided ample security against insufficient payment in such cases, owing to the fact that no title became validated until submitted to the Frauds Prevention Commissioner. In relation to the statement of Judge Kettle that it was part of the duty of Major Brown to satisfy himself that the amount of £40 had been paid, he could only say that that was a perfectly new doctrine—new in law and in morals; and, seeing that the Native Land Act had clearly defined the duties of the separate officers, it would be absurd in effect. He was aghast at the indignities and injuries put upon old public servants. He remembered the time when Major Brown was a gallant soldier in the field, offering his breast to danger every day and every hour, when many men were skulking in holes and corners, and hiding in their camp. Major Brown had been a forward man in the colony—a man of unblemished honour, of the highest character and reputation, and one this colony ought to be proud of. The people who knew him marvelled at the charge that had been made against him. How had this matter come about? Simply owing to the fact that the Minister of Native Affairs knew no more about Native-land customs, usages, or laws than the man in the moon; and it arose purely and simply from the fact that the Native Minister was ignorant of what devolved upon him as Minister of Native Affairs in such respects.

Hon. W. Downie Stewart

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, as a member of the Committee, desired to say a few words. He was sorry he had not the evidence there, as he would have liked to refer to a portion of it. That evidence was very conclusive. Judge Kettle had stated that Major Brown was guilty of gross irregularity in the transaction—that a swindle was the result; and in the evidence it appeared that the woman Meringa was of very weak intellect—almost imbecile, in fact—and she signed a declaration that she had received the money when she had not received it. There was no doubt of that. The Hon. Mr. Stewart had stated that Mr. Humphries was authorised to receive the money; but he was not authorised, and it was not until nearly three weeks afterwards that he had been authorised to receive the balance. The honourable gentleman would acknowledge that the matter was reported to the Government and the Government asked Judge Kettle to report upon it. He did so; and, after entering fully into the question, and after due consideration, the Government decided that Major Brown was not a fit person to be an interpreter. He was not speaking as a Minister at that moment, and he might also say that an interpreter was not a Civil servant, but he was licensed to occupy the position. And, considering that the woman did not receive the money at the time, and considering that Judge Kettle had stated that it was a grossly irregular proceeding, and that he considered another was a party to the swindle—

An Hon. MEMBER.—There was no evidence of that.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said there was no evidence that Major Brown had committed anything more than a gross irregularity, nothing to show that he was more culpable in what he did. He had certified that the woman had got the money when she had not got it, and when she could not have said she had got it. If, however, he had had the evidence before him he would have read it to the Council, and it was rather a pity that they had not the evidence,—which had been taken down carefully by a shorthand-writer, and typewritten,—as it would show that the attack the Hon. Mr. Stewart had made upon the Government was unwarrantable. His own impression had been, after reading the evidence, that Major Brown was guilty of gross irregularity, an irregularity which had enabled a swindle to be perpetrated of a grossly culpable nature, though he was no party to the swindle; and it also showed, consequently, that he was not fit to be an interpreter. If he had been dealing with a quick, sharp-witted person it would have been a different thing; but he was dealing with an imbecile woman, who had only received £20 of money she ought to have been paid. She had got £5 after the deed was completed, but when the case came before a jury it was decided that she ought to get £10 more, making it £35. There was also a sum of £13 for commission upon that little transaction, and he would like to see it go into the papers, so as to show the people of the colony how these transactions were conducted. Although he exonerated Major Brown from anything but culpable negligence in the matter, and from any intention of doing anything morally wrong, the evidence showed very clearly that, from want of due care on his part, from the fact that the woman swore that when she signed the document she had not received the money, a wrong had been done. The Committee had taken further evidence since the Government had given its decision, and had gone into the whole matter very carefully. Naturally, they felt that, as Major Brown was advanced in years, it would be a pity that he should go down to his grave with this slight upon him. He did not blame the Committee for having feelings of kindness and humanity, but, as for Major Brown being removed from the position of interpreter, he thought the Government was perfectly justified in that; but, with regard to his removal from the Justice of the Peace list, if he was removed, then it was a question whether the Justice who signed the document ought not to be removed also. He did not object to the motion, but would rather have seen a tribunal that Major Brown had not chosen himself. He had no doubt that the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court would do what was fair. He had been led to make these remarks on account of the Hon. Mr. Stewart having referred to one point of the evidence only. The honourable gentleman did not say one word upon that part of the evidence where it was stated that the woman was an imbecile. The honourable gentleman did not say a word about Judge Kettle's statement that this gross swindle could not have happened if Major Brown had taken care, when the woman signed the document, that she had actually received the money.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN thought that what the honourable gentleman had said really amounted to this: that some person named Meringa was swindled out of a certain sum of money, and that apparently somebody else obtained possession of that sum; but he did not in any way prove that Major Brown was responsible for this. He had simply acted as interpreter, and unless they could show that it was the duty of an interpreter to know that everything he interpreted was correct the interpreter was not responsible, and no wrong had been done by Major Brown whatever: that was the point the honourable gentleman had entirely missed. He had assumed that an interpreter should know the true facts of what he was interpreting, and that was a doctrine which, he thought, would utterly astonish all the interpreters in the colony. There were hundreds and thousands of cases in which the interpreter could not possibly be acquainted with the facts of what he was interpreting, and if he had the knowledge, and used it, people would decline to employ him. Interpreting was a mere mechanical operation, as an interpreter simply put one language into another; and to say it was the duty of an interpreter to ascertain the true facts was an argument entirely beside the point. Major Brown was in no way responsible for the facts, and he had done no wrong. It was quite clear that, although the Government was open to fair attack on most occasions, in this case they were not much to blame, however, as, apparently, inquiry was made: still, he thought they were to blame, as they ought to have given Major Brown an opportunity of defending himself in the first instance, and of arguing his case further. The Government had behaved in the harshest possible manner to a man of Major Brown's character, but he supposed that arose from the fact that the present Ministry were totally unacquainted with the antecedents of the old settlers, and especially with the antecedents of a large number of persons in the North Island. It was inconceivable that Major Brown could have been a party to a swindle, or anything of a dishonourable character. He was a man who had done good service to the colony, and one who was universally respected. He had known him a great many years, and had never known him to do any wrong, nor was he likely to make a mistake. He was an intelligent man, who had had a great deal of experience in the colony, and no doubt he fully believed that this woman had actually received the money which she was to receive, or that for all practical purposes she had obtained the sum she was entitled to. It would be grossly unfair for the Council now to refuse to allow Major Brown the opportunity of having his character reinstated and put right in the eyes of the country.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said that, before the motion was put, he wished to say, in connection with the reference that had been made by the Hon. Mr. Montgomery as to the necessity for having the evidence before the Council, that a very gross attack had been made upon the Government by the last speaker, who generally characterized the Government's action as being very harsh.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said he rather defended the Government.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY did not understand the honourable gentleman to do that.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said he had stated that generally the Government were open to attack, but that in this case it was only very much to be deplored that they had not granted Major Brown a fuller inquiry into the matter. He thought they ought to have given Major Brown a further opportunity of stating his side of the case before taking action.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the Government were not going to be advised by the honourable gentleman as to what action they should take; but, seeing evidence was required on this, and that a similar motion appeared on the Order Paper in the name of the Hon. Mr. Mantell, he thought it would be only fair to all parties that the debate should be adjourned. He had no desire to do anything harsh to Major Brown, but the Government, in what it had done, had arrived at its decision only after mature deliberation; and he would move, before proceeding any further, That the debate be adjourned. He would like to say something on the motion.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL asked if the Minister was jumping his claim, as he wished to speak.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he would be very glad if the honourable gentleman would move the adjournment himself.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL wished to draw the attention of the Council to the fact that the Public Petitions Committee appeared to have overlooked the prayer of Major Brown's petition, as he had not applied for a parliamentary inquiry. The circumstances complained of were that he had been summarily removed from his office without being informed, or having an opportunity of an investigation before an impartial tribunal. He had named the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court for the reason that an indignation meeting was held at Taranaki, at which it was unanimously requested that the Government should allow Major Brown an opportunity of being heard before an impartial tribunal, and where evidence could be taken on oath. They considered that the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court was the best person to hold the inquiry. The question was, Was Major Brown rightly removed from his office, and had he asked for an investigation before an impartial tribunal, and had he hitherto been refused that opportunity? As all details of the matter and the evidence would be placed before the tribunal, he (Mr. Mantell) would not refer to the details of the matter, or to the evidence given before the Committee, but he would only say, with regard to what had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Montgomery, that the District Judge seemed very much attached to the words "grossly irregular," as he had repeated them frequently; but if they had the evidence given by Judge Kettle himself they would find, if he was correctly reported, that these words were distinctly inappropriate, for the Judge's evidence was strongly in favour of Major Brown, with the exception of the two words "grossly irregular." It, unfortunately, appeared that Judge Kettle held different views in regard to the duties of an interpreter from those contemplated by the statutes or Courts. He held that the duty of an interpreter was to refuse to interpret anything which he did not know to be true; but, to his (Mr. Mantell's) mind, that would lead to a pretty embarrassment. The Judge held that an interpreter's duty went even beyond that, and that he should be something like a Protector of Aborigines of the olden times. He was entitled to entertain those views, but, at the same time, they were views not generally entertained, and would not be tolerated from interpreters in the Courts or in the Council. He wished to say these few words, as he considered Major Brown was entitled to a fair investigation before being degraded in this manner.

Hon. Mr. Montgomery

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT thought it would be very inadvisable to adjourn the debate, as there was abundance of evidence before the Council to settle the question whether or not Major Brown was entitled to be heard. In his petition he had prayed that he might be heard, and that was all the Committee recommended in its last report. They did not attempt to go into the justice of the case that the Council was now trying. Major Brown had hitherto borne a high character, and the question was, whether he should be refused, when ignominiously removed from office at a moment's notice, the opportunity of clearing his character. He thought that required no time to decide.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART did not see any use in the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had moved that motion in order to get further information that the Council desired, without having any desire to reflect upon the character of Major Brown, but simply to place the whole of the facts before the Council.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said that, whether Brown was guilty or not, the Committee had recommended that the report should be referred to the Government for consideration; and, with the exception of the Hon. Mr. Montgomery, they were unanimously in favour of that decision.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY desired to repeat that his only reason for his motion to adjourn had been that he might place before the Council the facts which had induced the Government to come to the conclusion they had arrived at. As a gross attack had been made upon the Government by members of the Council, it was only fair that they should have an opportunity of showing upon what their decision was arrived at.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the honourable gentleman should bear in mind when he made that statement that, on the petition being referred back to the Committee, the Government had been represented. The Hon. Mr. Seddon, and Mr. Sheridan, of the Native Department, had appeared, and had given evidence and stated the reasons of the Government for dismissing Major Brown from his office; and the motion for adjournment was simply beside the question. The Committee had found that Major Brown was entitled to the inquiry asked for. He agreed with the Hon. Mr. Mantell in saying that Judge Kettle's evidence was really in favour of Major Brown. The Committee had examined the witnesses with regard to the facts, and he thought the opinion arrived at by the Hon. Mr. Montgomery was an erroneous one.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY thought the Council ought to have before it the reasons that had induced the Government to come to this decision. He only wished to see fair-play between Major Brown and the Government.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART understood that the evidence given by Judge Kettle at the inquiry had been sent to him for correction, and might not be back before the close of the session.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT said that was the case. Judge Kettle's evidence and also the evidence of Major Brown had been sent to them for correction, and he could not say when it might be expected back.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY desired to say, in reply to the Hon. Mr. Stewart, that he knew nothing of the circumstances, but simply went on the evidence.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE considered the Government was entitled to an adjournment. Major Brown's character had been amply vindicated, and he would lose nothing by a postponement of the further consideration of the matter.

An Hon. MEMBER.—For how long?

The Hon. Dr. GRACE did not care whether it was for twelve months. What was entirely clear was that Major Brown's character had been re-established in that Council. Time would put him right, and the Government would make the amende honorable to him. He was certain the matter would work out right for Major Brown.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said that in the meantime Major Brown was deprived of his license as an interpreter and his living, and he might be placed in unfortunate circumstances while the time referred to by the honourable gentleman was elapsing. He quite approved of the adjournment, if it did not prevent the matter from being settled that session.

Debate adjourned.

WILSON LAND BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the object of this Bill was to do an act of justice to Mr. Wilson, who was the survivor of a family the remainder of which was massacred at Poverty Bay. Under the Pensions Act of 1869 certain provisions of a very peculiar character were made in reference to this man. He was allowed an annuity of £50 a year, and also under the Act it was provided that a section of land should be given to him. But it was tied up in a very peculiar way. He could take possession of it only at a very late period of his life, and the trustees appointed at the time were authorised to lease it for a period of twenty-one years. He was now thirty-three or thirty-four years of age, and was desirous of settling on the land. The lease terminated in about a year, and it was proposed that he should be the absolute owner of the land, subject to the lease and any encumbrances incurred under it under the provisions of the Act. It was curious that, although he was not entitled to receive the title from the trustees, yet in the event of his making his will he could do what he pleased with it. The provisions of the Bill entitled him to receive this land in fee-simple, so that he might make his home upon it. He (Sir P. A. Buckley) was anxious that the Bill should pass its second reading and go before the Waste Lands Committee, so that the matter could be inquired into. Mr. Wilson was an infant when he escaped the massacre at Poverty Bay, and all his people were killed. The Government gave him an annuity of £50 for his support, and provided that this 100 acres of land should be given to him on the conditions referred to. He moved, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE hoped that the Bill would receive the approval of the Council. Mr. Wilson's father was one of those unfortunates who died bravely at the Poverty Bay massacre, and had done a great deal of service before that occurrence. His wife and most of his children were killed, and the present Mr. Wilson was the sole survivor. At the time a great deal of sympathy was expressed for him, and this land and annuity were voted to him. He (Sir G. S. Whitmore) hoped that the services of Mr. Wilson's father to the country would not be forgotten, and that this gentleman would be provided for.

Bill read the second time.

The Council adjourned at twenty minutes to five o'clock p.m.

Hon. Dr. Grace

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, 18th October, 1894.

First Reading—Second Readings—Third Readings—Bills discharged—Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill—Diseases in Stock—Southern Railway Bridges—Counties Vehicle-licensing Bill—"Police Reform"—Waihaio and Waitaki Natives—Dunroon-Livingstone Mail and Waimate Post-office—Westport and Koranui Coal-leases—Horowhenua Post-office—Middle District University College—Gore Traffic-bridge—Kauri Land—Old Soldiers' Claims—Taipu-Peria Telephone—Whangarata and Paikara Railway-stations—G. W. Ell—Pohangina "Thirds"—Mountain Hut Water-race—Local Bodies' "Thirds" and "Fourth"—Small-farm Associations' Roads—Ministers' Travelling-allowances, &c.—Licenses—Awarua Block—Charitable Aid to Chinamen—Railway Plant, &c.—Customs Tariff—M. Tautari—Junction Road and Zigzag—Mining Industry—R. C. Majoribanks and Others—Legislative Council—Seaward Bush Settlers—Fruit-evilaporators—Native-land Purchase—Revenue and Expenditure—H. Maioha—Gisborne-Opotiki Mail-service—Wairoa Natives—Lyttelton Tunnel and Sumner Estuary—Chinese, &c., Poll-tax—West Harbour—W. Whiterod—New Zealand Cross—Amalgamation of Bank of New Zealand and Colonial Bank—Assets Company—Closure—Tophouse Tragedy—Patea Railway Refreshment-rooms—North Island Trunk Railway—Eel-weirs on Whangape Lake—International Cable Conference—Bank of New Zealand—Recapturing Prisoners—Compensation for Military Service—Hemi Pareara—Dunedin Cement—Woodville Co-operative Works—"New Zealand Year-book"—Southern Bridges—Privilege—Adjournment—Criminal Code Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Government Life Insurance Bill—Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill—Railways Authorisation Bill—Land and income Assessment Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Horowhenua Block Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Public Trust Office Consolidation Bill, Post Office Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Public Trust Office Consolidation Bill, Government Life Insurance Bill, Unclaimed Lands Bill, Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill, Railways Authorisation Bill.

BILLS DISCHARGED.

Supreme Court Bill, Public Reserves Sale Bill, Animals Protection Bill, Newspaper Libel Limitation Bill, Debts Recovery Limitation Bill, Shearers' Accommodation Bill, Patea Foreshore Vesting Bill, Waimea and Inangahua Counties Boundaries Alteration Bill, Dunedin Public Abattoirs Bill, Invercargill Race-course Trustees Empowering Bill, Workmen's Wages Bill, Distillation Bill, Betterments Bill, Undesirable Immigrants Exclusion Bill.

LITTLE BARRIER ISLAND PURCHASE BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON brought up the report of the Native Affairs Committee recommending that this Bill be proceeded with.

On the question, That the report do lie on the table,

Mr. HEKE said he had a great objection to this Bill. In the first place this Bill had been brought forward at a very late stage of the session, and the Natives who owned the Little Barrier Island had not been informed of it. They did not know anything about the Bill, or of the intended action of the Government in reference to their interests, until he had wired to them. He thought this very unfair. One of the reasons put forward by the Government for bringing this Bill down at this late stage of the session was that one of the Natives interested in the Little Barrier Island intended to rear bees on the island, and that if this were allowed it would lead to the destruction of the birds on the island.

Mr. HOUSTON rose to a point of order. He thought the discussion when the Bill was under consideration—

Mr. SPEAKER said that it was within the honourable gentleman's power to take advantage of the question, "That the report do lie on the table."

Mr. HEKE said he had mentioned on the second reading that he objected entirely to the provisions set out in this Bill. The intention was to take away the interests of the Natives whether they liked the price offered to them for their interests or not, and it was his intention to oppose the Bill in every shape and form. The Bill was very unfair; but he thought the Natives would come to some reasonable agreement with the Government if they would only be content to meet the Natives fairly in respect to their interests. There were many other reasons why he had a right to object to such procedure as was proposed in the Bill on the part of the Government. The main reason was that if they desired to take away the interests of the Natives the Government should have informed them long before, and therefore it was only proper that the Bill should be held over till next session; and the duty of the Government was to try to meet the Natives and come to some satisfactory arrangement respecting their interests. He would take a division on the matter, and when the Bill was in Committee he should oppose it in every shape and form.

Mr. J. McKENZIE was not at all astonished at the honourable gentleman's opposition to this Bill. It was on a par with his opposition to everything in connection with Native matters that had come before the House. The honourable gentleman had, however, put the matter wrongly. He had stated that the owners of this Little Barrier Island had no knowledge of the intention of the Government to carry this Bill, and that justice was not to be done to them. It was a doubtful matter many years ago whether the Natives had any claim to the island at all. For many years it was thought that the purchase of it had been completed when other lands had been purchased in the Auckland District. Afterwards it was discovered that the Natives had some claim to the island, and negotiations were set on foot for the purpose of purchasing it. The Natives themselves agreed to the sale, and the purchase-money had been agreed upon, and everything completed in connection with it, with the exception that one chief claimed that the whole of the £3,000 for the purchase of the Little Barrier Island should be paid to him alone. The Government refused that, and sought authority, as set forth in the preamble to the Bill, to find out who were the Natives entitled to the money. The Government were quite prepared to pay for the island; but, respecting this one Native chief who was causing the whole disturbance in connection with the matter, he had a telegram, which he would read to the House, as it showed that there was a very great danger that the whole value of this island would be destroyed by this Native chief, who had threatened to set fire to the island. This was the telegram: "Hope Little Barrier Bill will be put through this session. Natives in district, for malicious purposes, will probably set fire to the island if the Bill is not passed." That was from Mr. Henry Wright, of Auckland.

Mr. HEKE said he supposed Mr. Wright was a member of the Acclimatisation Society.

Mr. J. McKENZIE thought that it would be a very great disaster to the colony, and also to the Natives themselves, if the island were destroyed as threatened here. There was nothing in the Bill to show that the land was to be taken from the Natives in any way without giving full value for it. The honourable gentleman was entirely wrong in supposing that any injustice would be done to the Natives. He would not say more, but when the question came up again he would go fully into the matter. He simply told the House these facts, so that the statements made by the honourable gentleman should not go unchallenged.

Sir R. STOUT did not think the honourable gentleman was acquainted with the whole history of this Little Barrier Island. It had been before the Native Land Court seven or eight times, and there had been a great struggle over it amongst the hapus. The Native chief the honourable gentleman had referred to, he believed, had expended several hundred pounds in fighting for his hapu, and the result of the division of the money set out in the Bill would be that all the money he had expended to get the island for his hapu would be lost. That was really at the bottom of his fighting against the sale of the island; and, if there was a compromise that there should be paid to him a sum of money sufficient to repay what had been expended by him in fighting to retain this island, he thought justice would be done. That was, he believed, the way for the Government to get over the trouble. This had been one of the hardest-fought titles, perhaps, in the whole of New Zealand; and that was the trouble now with this Native chief.

Mr. SEDDON said he had gone very carefully into the matter, and could tell the honourable member and the House what was at the bottom of it. It was simply a question of trying to levy blackmail. There were certain people who had got this matter in hand, unfortunately for the Natives, and it was they who were doing this, and not the Natives themselves; so that it was certainly a case for the Government to ask the House to resist. There was no doubt whatever that the Natives, by an agreement which was given to Judge Fenton, had agreed to sell the island, and the Government, acting on that, had years ago purchased the island for very much less than they were now paying for it.

Sir R. STOUT.—Not from the same Natives.

Mr. SEDDON said that did not matter—they had bought it.

Sir R. STOUT.—From people who were not entitled to it.

Mr. SEDDON said it was bought, and, if such was the case, he was afraid it was not the only case in the colony; but, even if that was so, this Native's signature stood against him, and there was no doubt he ought to be compelled to take the same as the others, and the Bill provided for that. The purchase was a fair transaction from beginning to end. It would never do to encourage these Natives to back out of an arrangement, and assistance to them in this matter simply meant that those who were the last to sign should receive an enormous sum for their signatures. When he was in Auckland a deputation of chiefs had come to him; and he believed if this chief had been left to himself the whole thing would have been settled long ago, and the island would have been bought. The Government did not desire to ask the Legislature to deal unfairly with these three Natives, but if they were supported by others so as to make a large sum out of the transaction wrong was being done. It was the right and proper thing to pass the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Premier had omitted to mention one fact. He (Mr. Mitchelson) had commenced the negotiations for the purchase of this island, and he quite agreed it was desirable the purchase should be made complete. The chief referred to by the Premier, Tenetahi, was one of the principal owners, and, as the Premier had said, had signed the deed, and therefore, so far as he was concerned, he was out of court. But there were two other Natives who had not signed the deed, and he would suggest to the Government that before taking such an extreme step as that proposed they should first ascertain whether the two Natives who had refused to sign had any land other than that they now lived upon on the Little Barrier Island. If they had no other, he thought it would be unfair for the Government to deprive them of their land unless they were prepared to give them a piece of land in some other place.

Mr. THOMPSON said, so far as he was acquainted with the history of the purchase of this island, the whole trouble had been caused by this Native chief, Tenetahi. The general opinion in Auckland was that far too much had been paid for the island—that it was not worth £3,000. But the trouble commenced in this way: After this chief had sold his interest in the island he sold the timber growing on it to certain parties, who paid him in advance for it, and the Government had to step in and prevent the felling and removal of this timber. Then the whole influence of these parties was brought to bear to encourage this chief to resist the purchase of the island, owing to the dispute about the timber. The whole trouble was caused by the people who bought the timber illegally from the chief. He trusted the House would insist on passing the Bill through. So far as he knew, no injustice was intended to the Natives, who were receiving far more than the island was worth, and unless the purchase was completed the chances were that the bush would be fired and the island rendered useless.

Motion agreed to.

DISEASE IN STOCK.

Mr. LAWRY brought up the report of the Agricultural and Pastoral Committee stating, inter alia, in connection with a report from the Secretary of the Agricultural Department on sheep disease in the Tauranga district, that they had come to the following resolution:—

"That it is most important that the department should during the recess have the whole subject of the great mortality in sheep, especially in young sheep, examined into by the most capable experts the Government can employ, and that the fullest report on the subject should be laid before Parliament during next session."

He moved, That the report be printed, and be referred to the Government for their most favourable consideration, especially the part referring to the appointment of experts to deal with disease in sheep.

Mr. BUCHANAN was not to be deterred by the lateness of the period from making a few remarks on this subject. He felt very strongly on the question dealt with in this report, and greatly regretted that so important a question should have been deferred to this late period of the session. He could scarcely blame the Minister, because he believed that honourable gentleman had got his business pushed forward at the earliest opportunity; but if they looked at the very heavy losses sustained by settlers, especially in the North Island, and at the national importance of the stock industry to the colony, he submitted to the Government, and to members of the House, that no reasonable expenditure that the Government could make in this direction should be grudged by the colony. The colony had been in the past, and must be in the future, largely dependent upon its live-stock, and if they neglected such an important matter they might some day find that the resources of the colony might be very severely crippled by the development of disease. They need only look at what had been done in other countries to see the importance attached to this subject. France had saved millions of money by the appointment of experts to deal with the diseases which affected live-stock; and for all branches of industry in the United States scientific departments were set up, and thousands of pounds were spent, to enormous advantage. And what had been the result? The result had been that America, in the matter of live-stock and their products, occupied a position unparalleled in the world's history. We should do well to follow such an example. If the Minister of Lands looked back at the several sessions during which he had occupied that position he would see that they had all carefully abstained from making this a party question. On the opposition side of the House they had been first and foremost in supporting expenditure in this direction; and he would submit to the Minister that he could leave no better record of service to the colony than the appointment of a really good scientific department to look after this branch of our industry.

Mr. Seddon

Captain RUSSELL wished to urge on the Minister to place a sum of money on the supplementary estimates to enable him to give effect to the report of the Committee. It was very well to be impatient, but the question of the live-stock was the most important matter, from a practical point of view, of any which could occupy the attention of the colony, and it was no exaggeration to say that year by year disease was spreading amongst the flocks, and unless they obtained high veterinary knowledge and skill there might come infectious disease that would be a most serious disaster to the colony. Under these circumstances all they urged was that the Minister should take steps to place sufficient money on the estimates to be able to obtain what was recommended in the report—the very highest veterinary expert knowledge that could be procured. Even though it cost £10,000 or £20,000 the money would be very well spent. Because, if that occurred which had occurred in other countries, and virulent disease became established, national ruin must follow. It would be surely wise to spend even £10,000 or £20,000, and let us know we were safe from such a possibility. He did not wish the House to suppose there was anything imminent on the colony, but they had seen in other parts of the world contagious diseases spread like wildfire throughout different countries, and unless they had sufficient expert veterinary knowledge to guard against it it might end in appalling disaster to the colony.

Mr. J. McKENZIE would just like to say two or three words in connection with the subject. First of all, he had no intention of treating it in the manner referred to by the honourable member, but he thought it very inconvenient that important reports of this sort should be discussed before the House when only a few of those on the Committee were present, and when the large majority knew nothing of the subject. He was just as alive to the great necessity which existed for something being done in connection with the subject as the honourable gentlemen opposite. The Government had been doing a little. They had been endeavouring, as far as possible, to find out the causes of these various diseases, and for that purpose the Government had equipped what was known as the experimental farm at Waverley. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of some members because this experimental farm was not established in some other part of the colony; but they could not have an experimental farm in every corner of the colony, and, in selecting Waverley, they selected what he considered to be a very suitable place for making experiments of this kind. They had thoroughly equipped it for the purpose; and nothing would be spared, with the talent at their disposal, to find out the causes of these diseases, and, if possible, to remedy them. If it was the intention of the Committee to ask the Government to bring out the highest veterinary talent from the Old Country, it would entail a very serious expenditure of money, such as the honourable member for Hawke's Bay had referred to. Whether the House was prepared to go so far, he was not aware.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Yes.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the honourable gentleman said "Yes"; but he did not even know whether it was so or not. At any rate, if the Government decided to ask the House to vote a large sum of money for the purpose it could be discussed by the House, and its opinion could be expressed on the subject, and if the House were prepared to go to this length of finding a large sum of money for the purpose the Government would be only too glad to meet the request and do what it could in the matter. At any rate, the subject was not being lost sight of, and they would endeavour during this first year to do what they could in connection with that experimental farm, and, if the results were not satisfactory to the House when they met again, then, of course, something further might be done.

Mr. BUDDO might say, referring to this question of the inspection of stock, and the increase of inspection for the purpose of keeping out any contagious disease that might happen to be imported into the colony, he was not aware of any contagious diseases being at present in existence in the more thickly-populated districts of the colony that required any attention to speak of. He spoke more particularly of the South Island, and he might say there were no diseases there that local knowledge could not cope with. It was only in some particular parts of the North Island where some unknown disease to which a name had not been given was troublesome, and where great loss occurred. However, he believed the Agricultural Department had made the fullest provision to find out all that was possible in the way of scientific knowledge as to the nature of the disease. Hitherto, he was sorry to say, these efforts had been unsuccessful. If serious trouble arose, he anticipated that the present law relating to the importation of stock dealt fully with that question. He objected to any further taxation being imposed upon those who were going to great expense in introducing fresh blood amongst the stock of the colony. He thought the provisions in the existing law were ample, and he did not wish to see any further taxation put upon these people. If any solution of the difficulty were offered with reference to this disease, the nature of which was unknown, but which existed amongst the sheep in the North Island, he was sure the department would be prepared to meet it with the means at their disposal at the present time.

Mr. WILSON understood that the discussion was with the view of a sum being placed on the estimates for the purpose indicated.

Mr. LAWRY had nothing to say beyond entering a most emphatic protest against the impatience displayed by the House in discussing a matter of so important a character. They were quite ready to spend a great deal of time in discussing questions of abstract theory, but when important questions affecting the interests of every settler throughout the length and breadth of New Zealand came on there was a manifest impatience against taking up time in discussing them. It was scarcely possible to overestimate the importance of the recommendations contained in the report. He might say that these recommendations were adopted, after careful and mature consideration, by a Committee which understood the questions. For the information of the House he might explain that the report was drafted by the Hon. Mr. Ormond, a gentleman who perhaps knew more about the questions than any other man in New Zealand, and yet, from the reception they met with when he brought down a report of this important character, he was beginning to realise that, so far from the House taking an interest in country matters, the feelings of the House had entirely changed. He might refer to the time when Mr. J. D. Lance was Chairman of the Stock Committee: when he brought down a report the matter was discussed throughout a whole afternoon; and yet now, when he (Mr. Lawry) brought down a report which was unanimously passed by a Committee composed of gentlemen who knew everything pertaining to the matter, there was manifested a singular impatience throughout the House, and objection was shown to taking up time over it. He would resume his seat with an emphatic protest against the impatience exhibited when a question of this vast importance was brought down from the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY BRIDGES.

12.30. Mr. SEDDON moved, That the following order of the day be discharged: "Southern railway bridges—adjourned debate on the question, That the report of the Railways Committee do lie on the table and be referred to the Government."

The House divided.

AYES, 41.

Allen	Green	McKenzie, J.
Buddo	Hogg	McKenzie, R.
Cadman	Houston	McLachlan
Carnell	Kelly, W.	Meredith
Carroll	Lang	Mills
Collins	Larnach	Montgomery
Crowther	Lawry	Morrison
Duthie	Mackintosh	Parata
Fraser	Maslin	Pinkerton
Graham	McGowan	Reeves

Mr. Buddo

Russell, W. R.	Stevens	Willis.
Saunders	Steward	Tellers.
Seddon	Thompson	Hall
Smith, E. M.	Ward	Harris.

NOES, 28.

Buchanan	Joyce	Pirani
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Mackenzie, T.	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	Massey	Stout
Flatman	McGuire	Te Ao
Guinness	McNab	Wilson.
Hall-Jones	Miller
Heke	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Newman	Earnshaw
Hutchison, W.	O'Regan	Tanner.

PAIR.

For. Against.
Pera. Ball.

Majority for, 13.

Order of the day discharged.

COUNTIES VEHICLE-LICENSING BILL IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 8.—Provisions as to traction-engines. Mr. McLAHLAN moved, after the word "Act," to strike out all the words down to "offence," for the purpose of inserting the following: "and the provisions of subsection one of section two of 'The Police Offences Act Amendment Act, 1890,' shall not apply within the district of a County Council or other local authority having power to make by-laws for regulating the conditions on which traction-engines shall be allowed to pass along roads or over bridges."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUDDO moved to add the following new clause: "In any county where the average rateable value of land held in fee-simple exceeds two pounds an acre this Act (with the exception of section eight) shall not apply."

New clause agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved to add the following proviso: "Provided that, notwithstanding the average rateable value of lands held in fee-simple exceeds two pounds per acre, it shall be competent for the local authority, by special order, to make by-laws relating to vehicles other than traction-engines should the said local authority be petitioned by a majority of the ratepayers so to do."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

"POLICE REFORM."

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Minister of Defence, Whether he has received any report from Inspector Broham in reference to the charges contained in a letter appearing in the Christchurch Star of the 1st instant headed "Police Reform," signed "Bull's-eye"? If so, will the Minister state whether the report admits the correctness of the charges, or any of them, and whether any steps have been taken by the police since the appearance of the letter with reference to the alleged breaches of the licensing law? Since giving notice of the question a few days ago he had seen that certain proceedings were taken by the police in connection with the letter. He now wished to know from the Minister in charge of the department what action had been taken.

Mr. SEDDON said he had received a report from Inspector Broham in reference to the charges contained in the letter referred to, signed "Bull's-eye." The report was somewhat lengthy. There was also a report from the police at Lyttelton in reference to the public-house there. With regard to the bars, there was more than one bar, and that was in accordance with the law. Then, as to the connection between the hotel and the tobacconist's shop, the report of the police was that that was also in accordance with law. There was a defect in the Act at the present time. Certain places were prohibited from being connected with hotel premises—such premises as were used for public entertainments, or as refreshment-houses; but tobacconists' shops were not prevented from being connected with hotels. Notwithstanding that, the Inspector had given instructions to close the connection. With regard to illicit distillation, the Inspector said there were a number of Donegal men somewhere about Timaru. There was some illicit distillation going on in the Timaru district years ago, but he had suppressed it. Every precaution was now taken, and so far as he was aware there was none going on now. With regard to the sly grog-selling, Cheviot was forty-five miles from the nearest police-station, but instructions had been given to suppress as far as practicable sly grog-selling in that part of the colony. The writer of the letter under the nom de plume "Bull's-eye" was a canvasser for the New Zealand Government Insurance Department, named Theophilus Wicks. He might say that he intended to lay the two reports on the table; and it was satisfactory, he thought, to the House to know that, at all events, the reflection cast upon the police was not warranted by the facts.

WAIHAO AND WAITAKI NATIVES.

Major STEWARD asked the Native Minister, Whether he has concluded arrangements for providing medical assistance for the Natives resident at Waihao and Waitaki; and, if so, will he state the nature of those arrangements, and the names of the medical men appointed? Some weeks ago his honourable friend the member for the Southern Maori District brought under the notice of the Native Minister the desirableness of making some provision for medical assistance for the Natives resident at Waihao and Waitaki. Some correspondence, he believed, had taken place since then with certain medical gentlemen; and he would like to know what arrangements had been made, and what gentleman had been appointed.

Mr. SEDDON said negotiations had not yet concluded, but were still proceeding.

DUNTROON-LIVINGSTONE MAIL AND WAIMATE POST-OFFICE.

Major STEWARD asked the Postmaster-

General,—(1.) Whether a tender has been or will be accepted for a tri-weekly mail-service between Duntroon and Livingstone? (2.) Whether it has been decided to paint the roofs of the post-office buildings at Waimate? He believed tenders were to be called for within a week or ten days. Earlier in the season he had asked the honourable gentleman to whom this question was addressed if he would endeavour to give further postal facilities to the residents at Livingstone and in that part of the country. There was a semi-weekly service between Duntroon and Livingstone; and, as he had told the honourable gentleman, he believed a tri-weekly service could be obtained at an additional expenditure of £10. The second point was with regard to the post-office buildings at Waimate, regarding which he believed an officer of the department had made a report more than a year ago.

Mr. WARD said the acceptance of the tender had been deferred till after the House rose. The matter would then be gone into, and a decision arrived at. In regard to the second portion of the question, instructions had been given to paint the roof of the new portion of the building.

WESTPORT AND KORANUI COAL- LEASES.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Mines, Whether, in the amalgamation of the Westport and Koranui coal-leases, there was any limit to the time when the fulfilment of the labour clauses should be deemed satisfactory while complied with by one lease only; and, if so, when does that time expire?

Mr. CADMAN said there was no lease in existence known as the "Koranui" lease, as the ground held by the Koranui Company was formally surrendered, part of it being subsequently taken up by the Westport Coal Company. There was, accordingly, no question of amalgamation of leases by these two companies ever under consideration.

HOROWHENUA POST-OFFICE.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Postmaster-General, If he has yet determined as to the course of action he will take in reference to the Horowhenua Post-office?

Mr. WARD said the matter had not been definitely disposed of, but inquiries would be made during the recess.

MIDDLE DISTRICT UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Minister of Education, What steps, if any, have been taken to appoint a Council for the Middle District of New Zealand University College? The Act provided for the Council being elected by members of both Houses, and if the matter were not set about at once it would be impossible to get the Council elected. It was a purely administrative matter, and the Minister of Education could do it without referring the matter to the Cabinet. He hoped, therefore, that honourable gentleman would say that he was now taking steps to have it carried out.

Mr. REEVES said he had been waiting for two things. One was that, with all due deference to the honourable gentleman, he would like to have the matter discussed in the Cabinet, and hoped to have it discussed on the following day. The other matter had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, and he was waiting for their answer, which he also hoped to get on the following day.

GORE TRAFFIC-BRIDGE.

Mr. McNAB asked the Government, — (1.) Whether they propose to act in accordance with the opinions expressed by Mr. Commissioner Hawkins regarding the Gore Traffic-bridge, and give effect to his recommendation? (2.) When they intend to authorise the Gore Borough Council to execute the work, in accordance with section 15, subsection (5), of "The Public Works Act Amendment Act, 1889," and to declare that a proportion of the cost shall be borne by the other parties mentioned in the report of the Commissioner? (3.) Whether they propose to contribute the £1,000 mentioned by the Commissioner; and, if so, what provision is being made to supply that amount when required by the Gore Borough Council?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the Government were prepared to carry out the terms made last year in connection with the matter when the local bodies were prepared to find their portion of the money. He was not aware that the local bodies had signified their intention of raising the necessary funds to provide for the erection of the bridge, but whenever that was done the Government were prepared to carry out their promise.

KAURI LAND.

Mr. HOUSTON asked the Minister of Lands, if he will give instructions to the Crown Lands Board at Auckland, when any land with kauri growing on it is disposed of, that the land and the kauri be sold together, in order that the local bodies may get the benefit? He was understood to say that if the Board sold the kauri the result was that the local bodies received no benefit, the land remaining in the hands of the Board. The local authority did not receive the "thirds." A block had been sold in the Whangarei district, and the result had been that the traffic on the road had completely destroyed the road for a distance of twelve miles; and he understood that the Board contemplated selling another block in the same district. He thought, therefore, that in selling the kauri the land should be sold at the same time.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said he did not deem it advisable to interfere with the Board in this matter. He thought the Board's local knowledge of the district over which they had to administer the law would lead them to do what was best in the interests of all concerned. He understood that their objection to selling the land with the kauri was that large areas of kauri-land contained gum, and they wanted to retain it for gum-digging purposes. However, now that attention had been drawn to the matter, it was possible they might find it advisable in some cases to dispose of the land with the timber. While in no way dictating to the Board as to the course which should be pursued, he would make representations to it that he thought it advisable some steps should be taken so that the local bodies might get the necessary revenue to keep up their roads.

OLD SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Minister of Defence, Whether, in dealing with old soldiers' claims, he will rectify the injustice to Volunteers who were on active service and under fire at various times from 1860 to 1870, but who, through the disbandment of their corps or otherwise, were unable to complete five years' continuous service?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the existing Act was specific in determining the period of service which was recognised, and there was no power to vary it without fresh legislation. There was at present a return on the table showing the whole position; and the whole question would have to stand over to another session.

TAIPU-PERIA TELEPHONE.

Mr. HOUSTON asked the Postmaster-General, if he will make provision during the recess to extend the telephone from Taipu to Oruru, and thence to Peria, in the County of Mangonui? When the line was extended from Mangonui to Kaitia he had pointed out to Dr. Lemon that the line should go by Oruru and Peria, as these were settled districts, and there would be a larger revenue. He hoped the Minister would consent to make the connection now.

Mr. WARD said he would have another report furnished on the matter. As it stood at present the cost would be rather too much to warrant the department in constructing the line. According to the present report the cost was estimated at £370, and the revenue at £13 per annum. If it were possible for the contribution of £106 to be made by the people in the locality the line would be proceeded with. This estimate was on the basis of the information in the last report; but he would have another report made, to see if business had increased, or if there was anything fresh to warrant the extension.

Mr. HOUSTON asked how the estimate of revenue was arrived at.

Mr. WARD replied that there was a process in connection with the service upon which the estimate of revenue was based, and which had proved very reliable, and it worked out in nearly every case. It was based on the amount of mail-matter circulated within the area over which the line was to be erected, and the proportion of telegraph and telephone business was arrived at under an estimate of 5 per cent.

Sir R. Stout

WHANGARATA AND PAIRATA RAILWAY STATIONS.

Major HARRIS asked the Government, If they will approach the Railway Commissioners with a view of causing the stoppage of passenger-trains at Whangarata and Pairata Stations, on the Auckland and Waikato Railway?

Mr. SEDDON said that a reply was given to a similar question on the 3rd August, as follows:—

“The present time-table provides for stoppage of trains at these stations twice daily each way. The Commissioners do not see their way to stop the through trains, as there is not sufficient traffic to warrant it.”

G. W. ELL.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Government, If they will give effect to the report of the A to L Committee on the petition of G. W. Ell? The petitioner referred to had a petition before the House last year, and received a favourable report from the Petitions Committee, but the terms of the receipt drawn up in connection with the report were such that the petitioner was advised not to sign it, as it would preclude him from taking any further steps he thought he was entitled to take. He had petitioned the House again this year, and he (Mr. Smith) believed the Committee had again made a favourable recommendation, and had altered the terms of the receipt. He wished to know whether the Government proposed this session to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee.

Mr. CADMAN said the Government had not yet been able to consider reports of the Committees. Personally he would be very glad to give a reply in the affirmative, but the matter was of so intricate a nature that they had to act on the advice of the Crown Law Officers all through, and the Government were advised that the receipt proposed by the Committee would not do. The sum of £200 had been available whenever Mr. Ell chose to sign the receipt drawn up by the Solicitor-General.

POHANGINA “THIRDS.”

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, If he has received a reply to his promised inquiry as to the liability of the Wanganui Harbour reserves at Pohangina to contribute “thirds” to the local body of the district?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said that section 4 of “The Wanganui Harbour Endowment Borrowing Act, 1887,” under which most of the Wanganui Harbour endowment was disposed of, provided that, after deducting the cost of survey only, the whole of the proceeds should be paid to the Wanganui Harbour Board Fund; and section 3 of “The Wanganui Harbour Endowment Sale Act, 1892,” specially exempted the block taken up by the special-settlement association from the payment of “thirds.”

MOUNTAIN HUT WATER-RACE.

Major STEWARD asked the Minister of Mines, Whether he has considered the petition of J. J. Ardagh and sixty-five other miners and others of the Maerewhenua district, praying for assistance towards the completion of the Mountain Hut Water-race, which was referred by the Goldfields Committee to the favourable consideration of the Government; and, if so, what he proposes to do in regard to this matter? This was a very important matter to a considerable number of his constituents in connection with the Maerewhenua goldfield. They were badly in want of a supply of water. A number of miners had, during the last two years, been busily engaged in bringing in a race to the western portion of the field. They had expended some £6,000 in the construction of about eight miles, and had arrived at the end of their funds. They had now to cross a gully over which a fluming would cost about £2,500 more, and if this were completed they would be able to deliver a supply of water which would command a large area of auriferous country. They did not ask for any money except in the shape of a loan, which they wished to be able to obtain at the lowest possible rate; and he thought, under the circumstances, as the goldfield was capable of providing employment for thousands of persons, the Native Minister might step forward to assist the miners in question. The petition had been referred to the Committee, and they had taken the evidence of his honourable friend the member for Oamaru,—who, with himself, had visited the race and inspected every inch of it,—and, as he had said, the Committee had recommended the matter to the favourable consideration of the Government.

8.0. Mr. CADMAN hardly knew what reply to give to the honourable gentleman, because, although the Committee had reported favourably on the petition, still at the same time they had had a communication from some of those whose signatures were appended to the petition, asking to have their names excised, and stating that they had foolishly signed blank sheets of paper on the verbal statement of those who went round with the petition, and stating further that the petition contained untrue statements. A Government officer had reported on this work, and his report was rather unfavourable as to the constructing of the work. However, he proposed visiting the Otago goldfields during the recess, and he intended visiting this district if he were able.

Major STEWARD said the information which had just been given to the House was entirely new to him. It had not been communicated to him, and had it been he would have stated it to the House.

LOCAL BODIES’ “THIRDS” AND “FOURTHS.”

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Lands, If he has yet received, or is likely before the end of the session to receive, the opinion of the Law Officers on the point as to whether the moneys deposited on the selection of unsurveyed land on account of the survey-fees, and afterwards credited to the selectors against the payments by them under the various tenures (other than cash purchases), should not be subject to the "thirds" or "fourths" payable to the local bodies? Some time ago he had put a question to the same effect to the Minister, who was not then in a position to reply. He hoped the honourable gentleman would be in a position to reply to-day, because it was just probable this was the last opportunity that he or any other member would have of raising this question, which was somewhat important to local bodies. He had previously pointed out that there was a provision in the Land Act which provided that "thirds" or "fourths" of "the price or value of the periodic payments and rental of land under the various tenures" should be paid over to the local bodies for the purpose of spending the money on roads leading to or opening up the lands from which those payments accrued. It was a matter of settlement, and he hoped the Minister would find himself justified in making provision for such a desirable object.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said he had not received a reply from the Law Officers. He had given instructions that the opinion should be given before next Monday.

SMALL-FARM ASSOCIATIONS' ROADS.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, Whether the 5s. per acre loading on small-farm associations' lands for roads is intended to complete and metal the said roads, and how long the settlers alluded to have to pay 4 per cent. interest upon the 5s. per acre loading? He would like to point out to the Minister of Lands that in regard to the deferred payment and perpetual-lease and lease-in-perpetuity lands the "thirds" would only be payable for a certain period—in the case of deferred-payment land for fourteen years, and fifteen years in the case of perpetual-lease lands; but in the case of lease-in-perpetuity lands those unfortunate people, whose lands were loaded with the cost of roading, on the same principle the "thirds" would not be paid until 999 years. He would like to know whether that was correct, or whether it was merely an oversight.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the honourable gentleman had put an entirely wrong construction upon this matter. The money added to the value of this land for roading purposes was not in the same position as a grant for roads. It was added to the capital value of the land, and, as the land was disposed of, from the capital value of the land was taken the amount required for roading, and it was considered, as these people got roads made for them to improve their lands, and as the loading for roads was part of the capital value of the land, seeing that they would only have to pay rent upon that capital value at the rate of 4 per cent., no injustice was done to them. The adding of the roading to the land was quite fair, more especially as large sums were spent outside of the sums put on for loading.

MINISTERS' TRAVELLING-ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Premier, If he expects before the end of the session to be able to lay before this House the return ordered more than three months ago of the particulars of the travelling-allowances and -expenses drawn by each of the Ministers during the last financial year?

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. SEDDON would make inquiries into the matter, and give instructions to have the return ready as soon as possible.

LICENSES.

Mr. WILSON asked the Government, If the Licensing Bill is not passed, will they bring in a short Bill of one clause prohibiting the transfer of a license from one township to another?

Mr. SEDDON thought it was rather soon for the honourable member to presume that this Bill would not go through. He might say it would be as well for the honourable gentleman to wait and watch; and in the meantime he would say it was undesirable for Licensing Committees, and it was against the spirit of the law, to consent to these removals long distances.

AWARUA BLOCK.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Minister of Lands, Upon what date the Awarua Block, to be traversed by the North Island Main Trunk Railway, will be open for selection by the public? He asked this question because a large number of people were anxious to know when this land would be opened up.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the portion of the Awarua Block purchased by the Government contained 140,000 acres, and, as a large portion of it was bush-land, to make sure that they should get the best possible grades for the roads it would take some considerable time to have the lines graded, and until this was done they could not proceed with the surveying of the land into sections. It was desirable, he thought, that the surveys should be made before the land was disposed of. The department had not been idle in this matter. As soon as the Court affirmed the Crown's right to the land they took action at once for the purpose of getting the land into the market, and at the present time six survey parties were on the block, and two more were about to start, so that within the next eight or nine days they would have eight survey parties on the block for the purpose of getting it surveyed and put into the market as soon as possible. He hoped by the first of the year to have the new township which would be necessary at the place called Three-log Whare in the market as the first instalment.

Dr. NEWMAN said the Minister had not stated when the land outside that would be ready. Would it be ready in six months, in a year, or in two years?

Mr. J. McKENZIE hoped there would be some in the market in February, in March, and so on. There would be, as he had already stated, eight survey parties employed next month, and as soon as the survey parties came in and their maps were prepared the land would be brought into the market. They had no intention of keeping the land back.

CHARITABLE AID TO CHINAMEN.

Mr. HOGG asked the Premier, Whether he is aware that the Inspector-General of Hospitals is collecting information from the Benevolent Boards of the colony concerning the amount of charitable aid dispensed to Chinamen? (2.) If so, will he ascertain for what purpose or at whose instigation this information is being obtained? (3.) If the information is considered desirable, will he direct the Inspector-General to obtain statistics of the persons of various nationalities who have received charitable aid from State institutions? He noticed from the newspapers that the Inspector-General under the Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act had written to the Masterton Benevolent Trustees asking for a return of the number of Chinese and other Asiatics who had received charitable relief during the year ending the 31st March, 1894. Now, at the present time there was an agitation going on pretty well all over the colony against the influx of Chinese and other Asiatics, and he would like, therefore, to know what was the meaning of this movement on the part of this officer of the Government—whether it was intended as a counter-move in defence of Chinese immigration.

Mr. REEVES was about to confess his absolute inability to see how, under any circumstances, it could be a counter-move in defence of Chinese immigration. That probably was due to want of perception on his part; but, at any rate, this was being done not only in the case of the Masterton Benevolent Trustees, but in the case of all Charitable Aid Boards, and was being done at the instigation of no less a body than that honourable House, which ordered a return, on the motion of the honourable member for Ashley, some time ago, that had caused the collection of this information, relating not only to Chinese, but to other Asiatics.

RAILWAY PLANT, ETC.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government,—(1.) Whether they propose to have an examination of the railway plant, permanent-way, and bridges made prior to taking over the lines from the Commissioners? (2.) Will they appoint a competent Inspector for each Island, who shall be independent of local control, and whose duty shall be to report in detail from time to time to the Minister on the state of the bridges, permanent-way, and plant? The second part of the question was a most important one.

Mr. SEDDON said that, as to the first part of the question, the answer was in the affirmative: they did intend to do this. They did not think they would be justified as a Government in taking over these lines unless their condition was shown. They thought it necessary this examination should be made, both in fairness to the Commissioners and in justice to the Government and the House. As to the second part of the question, that was a matter of detail which the Government could determine when they took over the railways.

CUSTOMS TARIFF.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, If they will, early next session, lay before this House proposals for a revision of the Customs tariff in the interests of local industries? With that view, will they collect information during the recess supplementary to that obtained by the Tariff Committee, and be prepared with the proposed revision when Parliament next meets? Of course it was hopeless for anything to be done this session, but he would ask for a clear and emphatic promise from the Government that they would be ready to deal with this question next session, in view of the necessities of the local industries.

Mr. WARD said every effort would be made by the Government to compile the necessary information to enable this to be done.

M. TAUTARI.

Mr. HOUSTON asked the Minister of Lands, If the Government will give effect to the report of the Public Petitions M to Z Committee on the petition of Mere Tautari? It was unnecessary to go into particulars in reference to the question. He might state that the Committee which considered the matter, after taking the evidence of the departmental officers, unanimously came to the decision to recommend the Government to grant the prayer of the petition. The petitioner was a respectable woman, living in the Bay of Islands district, and he hoped the Government would accede to the prayer of the petition.

Mr. J. McKENZIE had not had time to bring this matter before the Government since the report of the Committee was made, but careful inquiry would be made into the whole question, and the Government would then consider it, and no doubt justice would be done in the case.

JUNCTION ROAD AND ZIGZAG.

Mr. McGUIRE asked the Minister of Lands, If he will place a sufficient sum on the supplementary estimates to allow the Junction Road and Zigzag to be placed in sufficient repair to allow the Crown tenants and special settlers an outlet to their market town and to the railway?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said this was one of those roads that were under the control of the local authority of the district, and the Government was therefore under no obligation to find the money for repairs. However, knowing as they did from reports received by the department that the road was in a very bad state, and that there were a number of Crown tenants and settlers upon the lands in the neighbourhood, the Government had put a certain sum on the estimates for doing something to these roads. He would ask the honourable member to inform the local authorities that they would be expected to keep these roads in repair for the future. These roads had been a considerable expense to the Government, owing to the neglect of the local authority, on account of their being allowed to get out of repair.

MINING INDUSTRY.

Mr. McGOWAN asked the Government, If their attention has been directed to a paragraph in the New Zealand Times of Saturday, referring to the indignation felt by the Auckland and Thames people at the neglect of the Government in not making sufficient provision for aiding the mining industry? (2.) In view of the aid given to banking interests and the provision by legislation for aiding the settlers in the colony by cheap money, expert advice, and encouragement generally, will the Government at once recognise the hitherto-neglected deep gold-mining in the North by substantially subsidising any company prepared to undertake this important colonial work? (3.) Are they aware that many of the best-skilled young miners are leaving that part of the colony owing to the apathy of the Government towards this industry? Out of consideration for the House, and owing to the late period of the session, he had refrained, when the Public Works Statement came down, from moving the adjournment of the House to bring up the question of the very small amount that was to be devoted to this important industry of gold-mining. Not only did this question affect a considerable portion of the northern district, but it affected the colony as a whole. With regard to the deep gold-mining, he thought, considering the amount of interest that was being taken in other colonies in this matter, New Zealand was taking what appeared to be a very suicidal course in not devoting more attention to these processes. He hoped the question would be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. CADMAN said, in regard to the first part of the question, his attention had been drawn to the paragraph mentioned. Some uneasiness seemed to have been caused in the goldfields districts as to the amount of the vote. But people did not seem to understand that the amount appropriated was for expenditure during the year. If certain work would cost, say, £100,000 or £150,000, it was of no use to vote all this money at once, as it could not be expended during this financial year. They must place on the estimates only what was expected to be expended during the financial year. The Government would be prepared to go into the individual cases and make proper business arrangements, so that negotiations entered into might be continued. However, the vote was considered sufficient for the year, because it would take some time to start preliminary operations, even to sink the deep-level shafts on the goldfields. If the people in the various districts were prepared to put their own shoulders to the wheel the Government would be quite ready to grant them substantial assistance in every reasonable way.

R. C. MAJORIBANKS AND OTHERS.

Mr. McNAB asked the Minister of Lands, Whether he will give the necessary instructions to the officers of the Forest Department in Southland to carry out the recommendations of the Petitions M to Z Committee on the petition of R. C. Majoribanks and others?

He said the question arose out of a petition presented to the House by himself. The petitioners referred to were bushmen residing about Hokonui and Gore, and the petition related to some hardship which they suffered in connection with the State forest there. The petitioners prayed,—

"1. That licenses should be granted for a certain time, instead of for a certain quantity of material.

"2. That, in case of disputes with the department having control of the forests, the bushmen should not be required to attend the Stipendiary Magistrate's Court at Invercargill, but at Gore, in the immediate locality.

"3. That fines should only be inflicted before a Stipendiary Magistrate.

"4. That the regulations should permit of standing timber being cut."

The petition was referred to the Public Petitions Committee, and that Committee had given a favourable recommendation. He regretted that they were unable to give a more favourable recommendation with regard to the first portion, but with regard to the second and third their recommendation was a favourable one. He hoped the Minister of Lands would give the necessary instructions to have the prayer of the petitioners carried out. The bushmen resided six or seven miles from where the sitting of the Board was held, and when any difficulty arose they had to go past Gore to Invercargill, a distance of some forty miles. Complaints had been received by him from all sides; and he hoped the Minister would give a favourable reply.

Mr. J. McKENZIE thought that, instead of this petition being referred to the Public Petitions Committee, it should have gone to the Waste Lands Committee, as it certainly related to a subject that came under the jurisdiction of the Lands Department. The Commissioner of Crown Lands at Invercargill was also Commissioner of State Forests. He (Mr. McKenzie) had not seen the petition or the report of the Committee, but any recommendations made by the Committee would receive his careful consideration, and, if he could see that these recommendations could be carried out without detriment to the interests of the colony, he would give the necessary instructions accordingly.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, If they propose to make any appointments to the Legislative Council during the recess? If so, how many?

Mr. SEDDON would have no difficulty in replying to this question. The action of the Government would depend upon circumstances, and he thought none of the circumstances would warrant the Government in doing what was mentioned in the question.

SEAWARD BUSH SETTLERS.

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked the Minister of Lands, If he has received any report from the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Invercargill, against the further expenditure of money for the benefit of village settlers in Seaward Bush Township? If not, will the Minister explain the reason why the vote of £200 granted to the village settlers mentioned for the last three years has been stopped this session, notwithstanding the very large increase in the vote for roads throughout the colony generally?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE had not received a report from the Commissioner of Crown Lands against any further expenditure. The reason for the amount not appearing on the estimates this year was that it was not considered desirable to spend further money in the construction of roads in this district. The fact that for the last three years the sum of £200 had been voted was no reason why it should be placed on the estimates this year. But further inquiry would be made, and, if necessary, the sum would be voted.

FRUIT-EVAPORATORS.

Mr. J. W. KELLY asked the Minister of Agriculture, if he will consider the advisability of importing, during the recess, one of the latest and most improved fruit-evaporators, and exhibit the same in various parts of the colony, for the purpose of encouraging the fruit-growing industry by showing those interested a more profitable method for disposing of their surplus fruit?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said some of the Inspectors had already given information on this subject; also the question of importing a fruit-evaporator had been considered, and a machine had been sent for.

NATIVE-LAND PURCHASE.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, if the amount of £300,000 under the Lands Improvement and Native Land Acquisition Bill, mentioned in the Public Works Statement as intended to be appropriated this year, includes the sum of £50,000 for which debentures have been already issued during the current financial year under "The Native Land Purchases Act, 1892"; and, if not, to what purpose such last-mentioned sum is to be applied? There would be found on page 4 of the Public Works Statement, under the head of "Appropriations proposed," two items of £150,000 each, under the Lands Improvement Account and Purchase of Native Lands Account—these made up the £300,000 referred to in the question; the other amount of £50,000 appeared by Return H. 167, under the head of "Native Land Purchases Act, 1892," as already raised by debentures issued between the dates 1st April and 30th June, 1894.

Mr. WARD said Yes, this sum of £50,000 was included in the amount of £300,000 under the Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, if the return of revenue and expenditure for the quarter ended 30th September last will appear in this week's Gazette? The Gazette was due that day, and he hoped his honourable friend would state that the returns would appear in the Gazette, because, according to precedent, the returns were now due.

Mr. WARD said the returns would appear in this week's Gazette. Instructions had been given to that effect before the honourable gentleman gave notice of his question.

H. MAIOHA.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Native Minister, if he has considered the petition of Henana Maioha, such petition having been referred by the Native Affairs Committee to the Government for consideration; and, if so, what action he proposes to take upon it?

Mr. CARROLL said the report referred to had not yet been received.

GISBORNE-OPOTIKI MAIL-SERVICE.

Mr. W. KELLY asked the Postmaster-General, whether, considering the growing importance of the East Coast and Bay of Plenty districts, the rapid spread of settlement in each respectively, the vast area of land being acquired therein by the Crown for settlement purposes, and the urgent necessity for proper and efficient communication between Gisborne and Opotiki via the Motu Township, the Government will at once establish a weekly overland mail-service in provision thereof? He wished to prevail upon the Government to have some means adopted at once whereby the settlers in the Motu district could get their letters sent to them regularly. The Motu Township was some fifty miles from Gisborne and fifty miles from Opotiki, and the Government had acquired large areas of land between Opotiki and Gisborne, and the settlers there found it very difficult to keep up communication. He hoped the Government would endeavour to have the mails sent regularly—say, once a week—to the Motu Township, which was about half-way between Opotiki and Gisborne.

Mr. WARD thought the order was rather a large one. To meet the requirements of the honourable gentleman, and give the service asked for between Gisborne and Opotiki, would cost about £200, and the revenue from it was estimated at only £38 per annum. It would therefore not be possible for so expensive a service to be authorised, when the returns would be so small. A service to Motu Village, about half-way, would cost £78; and a service already existed to within twenty miles of Motu Village, for which they were now paying £52 a year, and it could be extended to the village for an additional payment of £26, and this was as much as could be done at present.

WAIROA NATIVES.

Captain RUSSELL asked the Premier,—(1) If he is aware that the potatoes sent to the Natives at Wairoa by the Government were distributed to men many of whom are wealthy, and not in need of such assistance; (2) whether he is aware that many of the potatoes were immediately sold in the neighbouring township; (3) whether any other Natives were treated with the same disregard of prudence; and (4) on what system, and on whose recommendation, the distribution was made? He had received letters from the district assuring him that all these were facts, and it seemed to him, if it was desirable that these persons should be relieved, a certain amount of prudence should have been exercised.

Mr. CARROLL might say, in regard to sections (1) and (2) of the question, the department had heard nothing of the kind. In regard to part (3), the department was not aware that

380. there had been any disregard of prudence in this or other cases. In reference to No. (4), Mr. J. Hunter Brown, Chairman of the Wairoa County Council, Mr. Thomas Carroll, a member of that Council, and the Rev. Tamihana Huata, Native clergyman of the district, undertook to see that the potatoes were properly distributed. This course was adopted on his (Mr. Carroll's) recommendation, after receiving advice from the district; and the distribution of the potatoes was made as follows: Te Whakaki, 10 sacks; Korito, 10 sacks; Ngamotu, Kihitu, and Ahaka, 35 sacks; Whakaahurau and Pukepoto, 10 sacks; Teuhi and Mangatutu, 20 sacks; Waihirore Makea Kea, 15 sacks; Tokiahi, Whakapau, and Parara, 15 sacks; Ruataniwha and Matiti, 15 sacks; Hikawai and Temira, 15 sacks; Ramoto, Pakowhai, and Mangaruke, 20 sacks; Arimawha and Te Waiata, 30 sacks; Te Paina, 5 sacks; Nuhaka Natives, 2 sacks; Mohaka, 2 sacks; Te Reinga, 2 sacks. He regretted this question had been put on the Order Paper without the honourable gentleman first making himself thoroughly sure of the facts.

Captain RUSSELL. — I am sure of the grounds.

Mr. CARROLL said he had wired to the Chairman of the County Council, and he had received a reply stating that there was no truth in the allegations. He regretted what the honourable gentleman had done the more because an insinuation had been cast on the character of those who were intrusted with the distribution of the food.

Captain RUSSELL asked if potatoes were distributed in any other part of Hawke's Bay.

Mr. SEDDON said No, but food had been sent to Natives at two or three other places.

LYTTELTON TUNNEL AND SUMNER ESTUARY.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Premier, Will he take the earliest opportunity of ascertaining from the Government Civil and Marine Engineers the probable cost of duplicating the line of railway through the Lyttelton Tunnel, and obtain an approximate estimate of the cost of opening the Sumner Estuary and of the formation of a ship-canal from such estuary to Christchurch? There had been considerable agitation at Christchurch and in the surrounding district in reference to this matter. This question must be faced shortly. The trade of Canterbury had so largely increased that it was necessary something should be done to relieve the pressure.

Mr. SEDDON said that to provide for a double line of railway through the Lyttelton Tunnel it would be necessary to increase the width of the present tunnel by 8ft., which would involve a considerable enlargement of the whole section of the tunnel; and, as the traffic on the present line would have to be kept open during the progress of the work of enlarging the tunnel, it would cost as much as an entirely new tunnel for a single line—probably, from £80,000 to £90,000. An approximate estimate of the probable cost of constructing a harbour for large ships at the Sumner Estuary and connecting it by canal with the City of Christchurch could be made without survey, but extensive surveys would be necessary before any practical scheme of the works could be devised. The Government had not yet received any information that the tunnel was not of sufficient capacity for the traffic. In other places if the goods-traffic became very great they generally ran trains at night. So far the Government had not received any information that any inconvenience had been caused in this respect. Inquiries would be made. For his own part, he thought it was rather too soon to think of a canal.

CHINESE, ETC., POLL-TAX.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Premier, Will the Government, in case the Undesirable Immigrants Bill should not be reached this session, bring in a short Bill raising the poll-tax on Chinese and other Asiatics to the sum of at least £50? It would generally be conceded that this question was one of very grave importance; and as this would be the only opportunity the House would have of dealing with this matter, and as it was probable a short Bill would meet with the general approbation of honourable members, he hoped the Government would give a favourable reply to the question.

Mr. WARD said, in view of the Bills which had been struck off the Order Paper that day, honourable members would see that it was unlikely that what the honourable gentleman asked could be done.

WEST HARBOUR.

Mr. MILLAR asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will place a sum on the supplementary estimates to pay the claim of the West Harbour Borough Council for land taken for a railway? He had been asked by the West Harbour Borough Council to put this question on the Order Paper. Last session when this matter came before the House it was favourably recommended to the Government. It seemed that a sum of £10,000 which ought to have been paid for this land had not been paid. While in Dunedin the Colonial Treasurer promised the Council that a sum would be placed on the estimates for this purpose.

Mr. WARD said what the honourable member had stated was quite correct. When the estimates were under the consideration of the Cabinet he submitted a recommendation, but, as a result of the deliberations of the Cabinet, the recommendation he had promised to make was not assented to. He might say that he would again submit the matter to the Cabinet when the supplementary estimates were under consideration.

Captain Russell

W. WHITEROD.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will make inquiries from the Railway Commissioners whether they have received the report of the Railways Committee on the petition of W. Whiterod. If so, do they propose to carry out the recommendation of the Committee?

Mr. SEDDON said the Commissioners replied as follows:—

"W. Whiterod is in the employ of the Manawatu Railway Company, in a position fully equal to the one recommended by the Railways Committee; but the Commissioners—irrespective of the Committee's recommendation—are of opinion it would not be advisable to re-employ him in the Government railway service, as by so doing he would be in the way of the promotion of the younger men who have gone through all the training of the two grades at small pay."

NEW ZEALAND CROSS.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Premier, Will the Government, during the recess, take into consideration the advisability of providing a Civil Division of the New Zealand Cross, to be awarded for acts of bravery in saving lives from fire, shipwreck, drowning, &c.? This question was brought before the House in 1891, when the late Mr. Ballance said that the Government sympathized with the object of the question, and that he would take the matter into his serious consideration during the recess. Owing to Mr. Ballance's illness and death the question was not dealt with. At the present time we were depending on Australia for such recognition of acts of bravery. Surely the time had arrived when this colony should do something in the direction suggested in the question.

Mr. SEDDON said this matter had his entire sympathy, and he was at one with the honourable member in thinking that the time had come when we might deal with matters of this kind in New Zealand. He would go into the matter during the recess, and see what could be done. He did not think it would detract at all from the rewards simply because they were New Zealand rewards.

AMALGAMATION OF BANK OF NEW ZEALAND AND COLONIAL BANK.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Colonial Treasurer,—(1.) Would the power of veto possessed by the President of the Bank of New Zealand be sufficient to prevent an amalgamation of that bank with the Colonial Bank during the recess and without the consent of Parliament? (2.) Is any change contemplated in the banking arrangements of the colony by which the Colonial Bank will receive any share of the Public Account, or participate in any beneficial interest in the colony's business?

Mr. WARD, in reply to the first part of the question, thought the President could stop anything of the kind; but the honourable member would see when the Bill was circulated that afternoon that in this respect the whole matter was put perfectly clear. Beyond that, there could be no doubt whatever as to what that power would be. In reply to the second part of the question, he might say that no change was contemplated. There had been no representations made for some time. The representations made were made before the last proposals of the Government. There had been nothing since.

ASSETS COMPANY.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Minister of Lands, Will he, during the recess, consider the desirability or otherwise of formulating a scheme to lay before next session of Parliament by which those estates belonging to the Assets Company which are suitable for settlement may be taken over by the Crown on the principles of the Land for Settlements Act? It had occurred to him that possibly the unloading of the Assets Company, so far as its land was concerned, might be taken advantage of in connection with the Land for Settlements Act.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the desirability of formulating any special scheme in connection with this matter had not yet been considered by the Government. As honourable members were aware, the Government had many things to attend to every day, and this was a question which required a large amount of consideration. However, he thought, if the company offered land to the Government in the same way as other lands were offered, and if the land was suitable for purposes of settlement, and the price was reasonable, something might be done. He hoped during the recess to see some of these estates, now that the colony was interested in them, and he might be in a very much better position next year to tell the House whether he thought it was desirable that the colony should take over some of these estates for settlement purposes or not.

CLOSURE.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Premier, If the Government will this session add to Standing Orders of this House the closure rules in use by the House of Commons? He thought the closure rules in force in the House of Commons would be exceedingly useful if they were adopted here. The House of Representatives had had two or three striking object-lessons this session of the necessity for some such new rules.

Mr. SEDDON was not at all in favour of the closure. There was no doubt that this session some legislation which was wanted by the country had been obstructed, and the people had thus been denied legislation which they were entitled to, owing to that obstruction; but he did not think, himself, that it required the closure to deal with the difficulty. The present Standing Orders allowed every member to speak forty minutes in Committee upon every amendment, in periods of ten minutes. He thought the time so allowed should be reduced. He would prefer that that should be done by the Standing Orders, rather than to give the power to any Chairman, or even to the Speaker of the House itself, of preventing any man from speaking.

TOPHOUSE TRAGEDY.

Mr. GRAHAM asked the Government, Whether, in view of the awful tragedy which has been perpetrated at the Tophouse Telegraph-station, in the Nelson District, by which the late telegraphist, Mr. W. Wallis, who was only promoted to the position some five months ago as a mark of appreciation of his conduct and services at Cable Bay Station, fell a victim to a foul murderer on the night of Thursday, the 4th instant, simply, as is evident from subsequent disclosures, to prevent him from performing his duty by conveying to town information concerning a previous terrible murder which had been committed there on the same night, they will place a sum upon the supplementary estimates as some poor compensation to his unfortunate widow for the sudden and terrible loss of her husband under these circumstances, and also ask this House to express its sympathy with Mrs. Wallis and the young woman, Miss Wylie, who was with her, upon their most trying experience and helpless condition throughout the dreadful time referred to?

Mr. WARD said the lamentable circumstances surrounding this tragedy had received the consideration of the Government. Of course, Miss Wylie, who was referred to, was not in any way connected with the Postmaster at Tophouse, and, much as one regretted the unfortunate position in which this young woman was placed, the honourable gentleman would see that the sympathy of the Government could not go beyond sympathy. So far as Mrs. Wallis was concerned, instructions had been given to offer her the position of Post-mistress in some part of the colony, at a salary of £70 a year. If she did not accept that offer the Government would recommend that the usual allowance should be paid to her which was paid on the death of officers in the service.

PATEA RAILWAY REFRESHMENT-ROOMS.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Premier, Whether alcoholic liquors are sold at the Patea Railway refreshment-rooms, and, if so, at what hours and under what authority? He was informed that alcoholic liquors were being sold at these rooms at all hours, not merely when trains arrived and left—in fact, that it had simply become a drinking-place. If this was true it ought not to be permitted. If alcoholic liquors were to be sold at railway refreshment-rooms, which he very much regretted, they should only be sold when passenger-trains were arriving or leaving. The place should be open only during certain hours.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Railway Commissioners was as follows:—

"The refreshment-rooms at the Patea Railway-station have just been reopened in consequence of a demand for refreshment accommodation at this part of the line. The rooms have been let to the 31st December, 1895, and a license issued by the Commissioners in terms of sections 83 and 84 of 'The Government Railways Act, 1887.'"

Mr. Seddon

He had given, he thought, his views on the question to the House in the Licensing Bill.

Sir R. STOUT said this was not an answer to the question. The Commissioners had not fixed any hours, but had simply given an open license. Now that the Act was repealed the license would lapse. They had no business to give a license, with the fact known to them that there was a repealing Bill before the House.

Mr. SEDDON said this showed the wisdom of bringing the lines under the Government.

NORTH ISLAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) If any compensation has been paid for land taken for railway purposes on the Rangitira-Mangaonoho Section of the North Island Trunk Railway? (2.) Had the Government not the right of taking the land without compensation out of the 5 per cent. set aside in Native lands for the purpose of roads and railways?

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was as follows:—

"This refers, apparently, to Mr. Dalziel's land. A claim for £3,348 was received from Mr. Dalziel: and the question of the right to take the land without payment of compensation was referred to the Law Officers, who advised that, although the Government was entitled to take 5 per cent. of the area granted without paying compensation, there was no warrant to take an excessive width of land, or to take a block for station purposes, without payment; and, further, that all substantial damage must be paid for. The line runs for more than four miles through Mr. Dalziel's land, and occupies seventy-eight acres, and for a considerable distance a width of more than 3 chains is taken. An area of eight acres is also taken for a station. The awkward manner in which the railway cuts through the property, running as it does for nearly a mile in a horseshoe curve, rendered it necessary to rearrange a number of paddocks; fences had to be moved and re-erected, provision made for supplying water to paddocks cut off from water, and fresh sheep-tracks, with bridges over gullies, had to be made by the owner. The cost of working the farm has also been materially increased. Some loss accrued to Mr. Dalziel also through the sheep being disturbed by the railway-works during the lambing season. After a good deal of negotiation the claim was settled for £800, to cover everything. This amount included also payment for an additional fifteen acres purchased from Mr. Dalziel."

He might say this was a matter that had given a considerable amount of anxiety, but an arrangement ultimately was made which he thought was a very fair one for the colony and a just one for Mr. Dalziel. In this matter Mr. Dalziel had behaved very well. Had he gone to law he (Mr. Seddon) believed the Government would probably have had to pay more, besides a considerable amount in expenses.

EEL-WEIRS ON WHANGAPE LAKE.

Mr. LANG asked the Premier, if he will take the necessary steps to have the obstructions in the shape of eel-weirs removed from the navigable creek flowing from the Whangape Lake into the Waikato River, so as to enable the steamers now running on the Waikato River to carry goods for the settlers in that district? Some weeks ago he had forwarded a letter to the Premier giving full particulars of this matter, but he had received no reply. The settlers were very anxious to have the matter arranged, and he had put the question on the Order Paper in order that it might be settled before the end of the session.

Mr. SEDDON said it was proposed to make inquiries as to what were the actual legal rights of the Maoris to eel-weirs in the stream forming the outlet to Lake Whangape. In case it was found they had any claim to this right, then arrangements could be made by which the entrance to steamers into the lake would be facilitated.

INTERNATIONAL CABLE CONFERENCE.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Postmaster-General, What steps he has taken to protect the public against the decisions expected to be agreed to at the International Cable Conference in 1896 to enforce the use of the official vocabulary for extra-European telegrams? He had already drawn attention to this question in the early part of the session. Since then a communication had been received making it certain that the associations proposed to enforce this code on the colonies. There would probably be a much better chance of the thing being stopped if active steps were taken at once. He would be glad to learn if the Government had made representations to prevent this code from being forced on the colony.

Mr. WARD might say that strong representations had been made to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, protesting against this code being enforced. In addition to that, the next representative to the Intercolonial Cable Conference would be instructed to protest; and, if that was not sufficient, he thought the colonies contributing towards the maintenance of the cables should seriously consider whether they should not withdraw from the whole thing. Of course it required consideration whether they should do that or not, but he thought there could be no doubt that the introduction of a cable code such as the company was desirous of pressing upon everybody was not right. People should be allowed to use their own codes. It seemed to him wrong, when they were paying the companies to carry their messages, that they should be told by the company what cable code they should use. The Government would do all they could to prevent the introduction of the cable code; he could assure the honourable gentleman of that.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will lay before this House a copy of his instructions to the President of the Bank of New Zealand, and whether it is his intention to insist that the business of the bank will be reduced as speedily as practicable to within such volume as can safely be conducted on the shareholders' available paid-up capital; further, will the Treasurer also definitely state the terms and conditions of the President's appointment? He recognised that the colony was associated with this bank for the future, and he had refrained from taking any part in connection with the question that would be likely to prove disturbing. If the bank was to be a success under its new management the less it was before the House the better. It could not be a success if it was constantly before the House. But at this stage, when a fresh departure had taken place, he thought they should have an explanation of the policy of the Government on the matters indicated in the question. If a satisfactory answer was given to this question he believed the matter might be allowed to lie dormant in future. He trusted, therefore, that he should receive an explicit statement from the Treasurer, and also as to the terms of the appointment. The Colonial Treasurer had said that the latter was during good behaviour; but that was exceedingly vague, and his subsequent remarks had not conveyed a lucid idea of what the terms really were.

Mr. WARD said that perhaps the more convenient way of answering the question would be to read the letter of appointment, which was as follows:—

“Wellington, 12th October, 1894.

“SIR,—I have now the pleasure to hand you herewith a warrant of appointment under the hand of His Excellency the Governor wherein you have been appointed President of the Bank of New Zealand, in terms of section 12 of ‘The Bank of New Zealand Share Guarantee Act, 1894.’ The appointment dates from the 6th instant, during good behaviour and efficiency, and the salary is to be at the rate of £2,250 per annum, to be paid by the Bank of New Zealand.

“You will understand that, as the appointment has been made entirely in connection with the colony's guarantee of two millions to the bank, which said guarantee ceases at the expiration of ten years from the date of the issue of the guaranteed stock, the Government do not in any way bind themselves to a continuance of the appointment after the expiration of the term of the before-mentioned guarantee; and, of course, your appointment will end should the statutory Board of Directors cease to exist. It is almost unnecessary for me to refer to what, in the opinion of the Government, your duties should be. Section 12 of the Act under which you are appointed recites that you ‘shall have and shall exercise all the duties, powers, and responsibilities of a director, and shall also have the power of veto.' It is in connection with this power of veto that the Government are most anxious that you should use the utmost discretion, so as to prevent any interference with the legitimate business of the bank.

"I also desire to draw your attention to section 15 of the Act, which provides that if, upon the report of the Auditor, confirmed by yourself, I shall be of opinion that the affairs of the bank are in any respect being improperly or unsafely conducted, it will be my duty to call the attention of the directors thereto. As the action of the Colonial Treasurer in such case must of necessity be guided by the opinion and advice you will be called upon to offer, I need hardly state that your first duty will be to see that the interests of the colony, as represented by their guarantee of two millions, are always safeguarded, and it will be imperative upon yourself and co-directors to manage and conduct the affairs of the bank so that on the one hand the best interests of the shareholders shall be preserved, and on the other there shall be no danger of the State making any loss in respect of its guarantee.

"In case it becomes necessary to appoint a Receiver, as provided by section 9 of the before-mentioned Act, the duties of the Board of Directors will cease in the ordinary course, and your office as President of the Board will thereupon be determined.—I have, &c., "J. G. WARD.

"William Watson, Esq.,

"Bank of New Zealand, Wellington."

That was the letter of appointment, and it constituted a reply to the first portion of the honourable gentleman's question. In reply to the second part, as to whether the Government would not interfere with the administration of the bank as suggested,—whether it would not insist that the business of the bank be reduced as speedily as practicable to within such volume as can safely be conducted on the shareholders' available paid-up capital,—that was a point on which the Government would not dictate to or interfere with the executive administration of the bank; neither did he think it was right or proper that they should do so.

RECAPTURING PRISONERS.

Mr. R. McKENZIE, for Mr. E. M. Smith, asked the Government, If there is any system by which rewards are given to persons who recapture prisoners who escape from Her Majesty's gaols; and, if so, will they grant rewards to Thomas Partington and Thomas Hargreaves, who captured the prisoner Wallath in New Plymouth while the warders were firing at him?

Mr. SEDDON said the reply to this was,—

"There is no system by which rewards are given to persons who recapture escaping prisoners, unless they are specially recommended for a reward by the Judges, Magistrates, or Visiting Justices. In the case of the escaping prisoner Wallath no recommendation for rewards was made."

Mr. Ward

The persons named must have had a very narrow escape. He would make inquiries into it.

COMPENSATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. HALL asked the Minister of Justice, Seeing that many petitions have been presented to this House this session by claimants for compensation for military service, and that these petitions have been referred to the Government for consideration, will the Government inform the House whether they have considered the claims, and whether they, or any of them, have been sustained as deserving of compensation; and, if so, will the Government make provision for satisfying them?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said there had been no time for the consideration of the various petitions referred to the Government respecting this matter. Moreover, as he had said already, there was no power to deal with unsatisfied claims without legislation. During the recess the matter would be carefully gone into, in the hope that a decision would be come to next session.

HEMI PAREARA.

Sir R. STOUT, for Mr. Heke, asked the Native Minister, Whether the Government will give effect to the report of the Native Affairs Committee of last year on the petition of Hemi Pareara? He might say that the report recommended that this petition should be inquired into, he thought, by Mr. Fenton. If that was not to be done he would like to know what the Government intended. These Native matters were coming up continually year after year, and he thought it was far better they should be dealt with, if possible, by a Magistrate. There were very great complaints that when Committees reported nothing came of it. He hoped this would be inquired into.

40. Mr. CARROLL said, after looking into it, the Government had decided not to take any steps in the matter.

DUNEDIN CEMENT.

Mr. PINKERTON said a question had been asked some time ago by the honourable member for Eden about the quality of Dunedin cement, that of the Milburn Lime and Cement Works having been rejected by the Government. The question and the answer given had very seriously affected the company. After the question was asked it was agreed by the department and the company that the cement should be submitted to a test by an expert not connected with either the department or the company. He had reason to believe the test had been made, and a report received by the department a fortnight ago. When would that report be laid on the table?

Mr. SEDDON said he had inquired of the department, and had received a reply that the report of the expert had been received. He hoped to be able to lay it on the table the following day. He was not in a position to say whether the report was favourable or not, but he thought the company was entitled to have it made public.

WOODVILLE CO-OPERATIVE WORKS.

Mr. HALL asked the Minister of Labour, If he will inquire into the allegation of four gangs of co-operative labourers employed at the Woodville end of the Woodville-Eketahuna Railway, under Messrs. Joyce, Ellery, Dumphy, and Wilks,—(1) That they have been set to work on sections of stumping and formation without being informed of the price to be given; (2) that they have been paid in some instances for formation only; (3) that no plans and specifications have been given them by which to carry on their work? (4.) If all or any of those allegations are correct, will the Government see that in the future these matters shall be remedied?

Mr. SEDDON said inquiries had been made, and the result had not yet been received. When received the result would be made known to the honourable gentleman.

"NEW ZEALAND YEAR-BOOK."

Mr. SEDDON laid the "New Zealand Year-book, 1894," on the table. He said this book was year by year improving. Although a superficial observer might think the contents very similar to those of the book for 1893, there was really a great deal of new, besides revised, matter, and all the figures were brought on a year. Section 1 of the special articles, which exhibited the trend of the recent legislation under the heads of Land-laws, Labour Laws, Co-operative Public Works, State Farming, Direct and Graduated Taxation, the Franchise, Licensing, et cetera, was quite new, and these subjects were made to take precedence of the articles on the resources of the colony. He thought they would be found well timed. In Section 2, Mr. Sladden's excellent article on frozen meat was a good instance of completely new matter under an old title. A good deal of what was fresh had been introduced into the statistical report—remarks on birth-rate, cancer, wool-production, cost of living, average incomes and earnings from wages, banking legislation, et cetera.

SOUTHERN BRIDGES: PRIVILEGE.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked Mr. Speaker's ruling on what he considered to be a question of privilege. Some little time ago the Railways Committee laid on the table of the House a report dealing with the southern bridges. He understood that that Committee had that day, by resolution, decided not to lay on the table of the House the evidence they had taken. He wished to know whether the Committee had power to do that—to retain the evidence in its own possession, and retain it from the possession of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER said that no Committee had power to keep in its own possession papers of the kind referred to. They should be handed over to the Clerk of the House, who was the custodian of all records of Select Committees, as well as of those of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McNAB desired to move the adjournment of the House in consequence of the unsatisfactory answer he had received to his question with reference to the Gore Traffic-bridge. Owing to the advanced period of the session he would not detain the House at any great length. He had asked the Government three questions that afternoon. The first was, "Whether they propose to act in accordance with the opinions expressed by Mr. Commissioner Hawkins regarding the Gore Traffic-bridge and give effect to his recommendation?" He might mention that the circumstances surrounding this question were as follow: For some considerable time the people of Gore had made every effort to secure a traffic-bridge over the Mataura, and last year the sum of £1,000 was placed on the estimates to be granted in the form of a pound-for-pound subsidy. This amount was not expended; and towards the latter portion of the year action was taken by the local authorities there in order to saddle the different bodies with a certain proportion of the cost, as it was utterly impossible that the Gore Borough Council alone could bear the whole cost of this bridge. Proceedings were commenced by the Government appointing Mr. Commissioner Hawkins to take evidence and send in a report. That report had not yet been made public; and what he (Mr. McNab) wanted to point out was this: that under section 14, subsection (4), of "The Public Works Act Amendment Act, 1889," as soon as the report was in, the section stated, "It shall not be obligatory upon the Government to act in accordance with the opinion that may be expressed by such Commissioner or Commissioners, nor to give effect to any recommendation that may be contained in his or their report." Now, he understood that the opinion expressed by the Commissioner was that the £1,000 should be granted by the Government, or he expressed his approval of the grant which had already been passed, and indicated his opinion that the Gore Borough Council and the Southland County Council ought to share the remainder of the cost between them. Hence he (Mr. McNab) asked that portion of the question which he had just quoted—namely, whether the Government proposed to act in accordance with the Commissioner's opinion. Now, the answer which he received from the Minister, evidently not understanding the full tenor of his question, was that, as soon as the local authorities were prepared to find their portion of the money, the Government were prepared to grant their share of it. Now, the section of the Act which he had quoted went on to say,—

"If no objection be lodged within the two months aforesaid, or if, although an objection be lodged, the Governor is of opinion that the work should be done, he may, if he think fit, by warrant under his hand publicly notified and gazetted, authorise any local authority to execute such work, and may declare that a proportion of the cost thereof, to be mentioned in such warrant, shall be borne by any other local authority or local authorities, and such proportion shall be paid by such local authority or local authorities accordingly."

The result of that section was that until the warrant under the hand of the Governor was issued the Gore Borough Council could not compel the other local authorities to contribute to the cost of erecting the bridge. Hence he asked the second part of his question—namely, "When they intend to authorise the Gore Borough Council to execute the work, in accordance with section 15, subsection (5), of 'The Public Works Act Amendment Act, 1889,' and to declare that a proportion of the cost shall be borne by the other parties mentioned in the report of the Commissioner?" No answer had been given to that question, and, although the Gore Borough Council in this case had a favourable report from the Commissioner as the result of his investigation, still, until the warrant was issued under the hand of the Governor, they were utterly unable to enforce his recommendation or judgment upon the other local authorities; and the answer they had received to the question did not bring this difficulty one bit nearer to a termination. Then, the third part of the question, which, from the local authorities' point of view, was the most important of all, was "Whether they propose to contribute the £1,000 mentioned by the Commissioner; and, if so, what provision is being made to supply that amount when required by the Gore Borough Council?" The advance of £1,000 was recommended by the Commissioner, and he would point out to honourable members that in last year's public-works estimates it was agreed to pay a pound-for-pound subsidy to the extent of £1,000. In answer to that, he understood the Minister to say that the Government would carry out the promise. The question was, What was the promise? They had the pound-for-pound subsidy to the extent of £1,000 on last year's estimates, and he presumed that the fulfilment of the promise would be the reinstatement of that subsidy. Now, looking at the public-works estimates, the amount did not appear there, and the promise could hardly have been said to have been carried out; otherwise the matter would have been brought before the Government in another direction. He understood that one member of the Government actually gave a promise that he would undertake that the sum should be reinstated—namely, a subsidy of £1 for every £2 contributed by the local bodies, but not to exceed £1,000 in all. This promise was given by the Colonial Treasurer to a deputation of the Gore Borough Council which waited on him in Invercargill in February last. The questions which he asked were not particularly in regard to the giving of that £1,000, because he had no doubt that if the £1,000 was put on the estimates, and the bodies constructed the bridge, they would then get that £1,000. But the £1,000 was not on the estimates, and the position of the matter was such that until the Government took some action in regard to it the Gore Borough Council could not possibly enforce the contribution of the remaining £1,000 from the Southland County Council. He would not detain the House any longer, but he had laid before it the facts of the case so far as he was aware of them, and he thought it would have been better had the Minister answered categorically the various questions asked him. At the present time, the Gore Borough Council was absolutely powerless, and the answers given to the questions did not advance the position of the local authorities in the slightest degree.

Mr. McNab

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the honourable gentleman had no doubt gone into the matter of this bridge very fully, with the evident idea that he was the only one who knew anything about it; but he could assure the honourable gentleman the Government knew all about the matter. They were quite aware that this warrant would have to be issued before the Gore Borough Council could force the other bodies to provide the funds necessary for their share of the cost of the erection of the bridge. But they had heard it stated in the House time after time that it would be tyranny on the part of the Government to force any local Board to do anything that was not approved of by themselves. What would it mean if this warrant were issued and the Gore Borough Council were placed in the position of being able to call upon another local body to find a large sum of money—say, £3,000? It might put the finances of that local body in a very peculiar position, and the people who had to find the funds might have a good claim against the Government for issuing the warrant for one local body to force the other local body to find such a very large sum of money. This report only came up lately from the Commissioner who was appointed to inquire into the matter, and surely before being called upon to say whether they would take any action in the matter they might claim the right to have time to consider it, and to communicate with the local bodies that were interested, in order to see how far it would involve their finances, and how far they were prepared to go towards meeting the request. That was the reason why the authority which the honourable gentleman had spoken of had not been issued, and he was sure honourable members would agree with him it was a wise course for the Government to pursue not to issue a warrant of that nature, which would enforce upon the local authorities the necessity of finding money which they might not be prepared to find. His answer was this: that the Government would carry out the promise as regarded the £1,000, and would pay that amount whenever the local bodies interested were in a position to find the balance of the money. He thought that, as it was a matter in which two local authorities were concerned, and as they now knew what the report of the Commissioner was, and also knew the position of the Government, all they had to do was to consider among themselves the best way of finding the money for the purpose of erecting the bridge. He thought all that the Government had to do was to find the money when the local bodies interested were able to do their share in the matter.

Mr. J. W. KELLY said it was all very well for the Minister of Lands to stand up and try to find some excuse for the Government not placing this sum on the estimates, as was promised by the Colonial Treasurer to the people of Gore, but the explanation which the honourable gentleman had put forward was, in fact, nothing more than drawing a red-herring across the scent. There was no doubt about that. He thought it was strangely suggestive that the sum of £1,000, as promised by the Colonial Treasurer, should be kept off the estimates, considering the way the honourable member for Mataura had acted towards the Government during the present session. It was much on a par with the manner in which they treated his (Mr. Kelly's) constituents in a matter with reference to which he put a question on the Order Paper. When he was a loyal supporter of the Government he was in a position to do a little more for his constituents whom he represented. It was strange to see that, although he would not for a moment say the Government had done it on purpose. He was not accusing the Government of anything unfair, because they were nothing if not magnanimous. It was, however, a strange coincidence that now, for the first time in some four or five years, this had happened, because the Atkinson Government, even at the time the district was represented by a member of the Opposition, had granted an amount to the village settlers of the Seaward Bush district for the purpose of giving access to their land. It was a strange coincidence that this session, when he had been compelled to walk into the lobby against the Government very often, the £200 vote had disappeared from the estimates. He was sure every member of the House sympathized with him very much; and no doubt his constituents, the village settlers, when they came to understand the position of affairs, would be very thankful for the way they had been treated by the Liberal Government now in power, which was prepared to punish them at any moment when their member did not vote straight according to the Government's ideas. Talk about 4.30. party government after that! He had never once, during the four years he had been in the House, voted with the honourable member for Waitaki on the Elective Executive Bill, but he would ask honourable members if the Government were not taking the very best steps possible to compel their supporters to walk into the lobby with the honourable member for Waitaki, by punishing members for not voting as the Government considered right. He did not know whether he would be allowed to characterize the action of the Government as contemptible. At any rate, he could not use the language he would like to use, for fear of breaking the rules of the House. He would have a favourable opportunity, however, in a few weeks' time, when addressing his constituents. He would be able to show the people of Southland their true friends at last. He thought there could be no doubt that the reason of this £200 being struck off the estimates this year was simply an endeavour on the part of the Government to make him (Mr. Kelly) unpopular in his district, and it was in order to put the electors against him. He could assure the honourable gentleman, however, that it would have quite the opposite effect. There was an old saying that curses, like chickens, came home to roost, and the honourable gentleman, in his effort to curse him over this little matter, would find that it would recoil upon the Government. He was glad the honourable member for Mataura had moved the adjournment of the House, because it would result in showing how the members from Southland who had occasionally voted a little crooked against the Government that session had been treated. The honourable member for Wallace had voted with the Government on almost every division.

An Hon. MEMBER.—How has he been treated?

Mr. J. W. KELLY would ask honourable members to look at the estimates and judge for themselves. He thought, if this was the principle upon which the different districts were to be dealt with, the sooner our political machine was reformed the better. He had very much pleasure in seconding the adjournment of the House. He hoped in a few weeks to have an opportunity of letting his friends the present occupants of the Government benches know in very plain words what he thought of them.

Mr. REEVES did not forget old times as quickly as the honourable member, and, in consequence, was not likely to say anything of an unpleasant nature in reply to him. He had, however, to assure the House that the honourable gentleman was entirely under a delusion in regard to this £200. He could assure the House positively that the Government had not struck this sum off the estimates on account of anything that either the honourable member for Mataura or the honourable member for Invercargill had done.

Mr. McNAB.—I did not insinuate it.

Mr. REEVES said the other honourable gentleman did not insinuate it either; he very plainly stated it. It was, however, absolutely incorrect. No doubt the honourable gentleman honestly believed what he said. If the public-works estimates were looked into it would be found that honourable gentlemen who had voted against the Government far oftener than his honourable friend the member for Invercargill had come out very well.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—That is what I complain of.

Mr. REEVES said it appeared to him that what his honourable friend was angry about was that the Government had given too much to its enemies.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—Then, of course, you punish your friends.

Mr. REEVES said of course the Government did their best for their friends.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—You have not done it for me.

Mr. REEVES said they did the best they could for everybody. They did their best, for instance, for the honourable member for Patea and the honourable member for Egmont, also for the honourable member for Marsden, who was a very warm friend of his own. They all came out of the little scramble tolerably well, and that was simply because it was the endeavour of the Government to be just to all districts, irrespective of what their representatives might do or say in the House.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE rose to speak.

Mr. REEVES could quite recognise the gushing gratitude which impelled the honourable member for Clutha to stand up to very warmly indorse what he had said. He thanked that honourable member, in anticipation, for the grateful thanks he was about to give to the Government for the even-handed justice with which they had treated his district.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE had to complain very bitterly that a number of important works in his district had not been attended to by the Government. There were bridges, post-offices—

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member was not entitled to refer to them if they were not the subject of any of the questions on the Order Paper, or of the Ministerial answers to such question.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE would not encroach any further in that direction, beyond saying that, considering the funds at the disposal of the Government, they had fairly attended to some of the requirements especially of the Catlin's district, and which might be taken as a reply to some who had opposed him there on the ground that because he was in opposition local wants would be ignored. What, however, amused him was the complaint of the honourable member for Invercargill; because if there was any district in the colony in which there had been expenditure from the colonial funds it was the Southland District during the last few years. Look at the railway to the dismal swamp called the Seaward Bush.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—There is no swamp there.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said, well, joking apart, if they read the Public Works Statement they would find that this railway had been completed to the Maitara Swamp.

Mr. J. W. KELLY.—That is not in the Seaward Bush.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the railway to the Seaward Bush had been prosecuted steadily from year to year, and when honourable members had seen the votes going in that direction every year they wondered what influence Invercargill had with the Government to secure such votes. He thought, therefore, it came with a very bad grace from the honourable gentleman to take up the attitude he had done, when the House and the honourable gentleman must know that the aid which the Government had given to that district had had a very great influence on his return to the House. Personally, he thought the Government had shown a want of regard for the district he represented, in connection with the Kelso and Waipahi Bridges. These were important works that had not been attended to, though he was in some hope, after the avowal of friendship which the Minister of Labour had made towards him that afternoon, that there might be something placed on the supplementary estimates.

Sir R. STOUT did not intend to deal with the local grievances of the honourable member for Invercargill or the honourable member for Maitara, further than to say that it was his opinion they would always have these complaints if they went on dealing with borrowed money as they had been doing. Their only chance of doing away with these complaints was, he believed, to have an elective Executive, and to have a Public Works Committee, who should report to the House, so that each item would be considered entirely on its merits. They could not then have these constant complaints and heartburnings. With reference to the question asked by the honourable member for the Northern Maori District upon the case of Hemi Pareara, that case was before the Committee last year. The Committee had investigated it, and they made the following report, which would be found in Parliamentary Paper I.—3, page 8:—

"I have the honour to report that the Petitions Committee is of opinion that the petition should be referred to the Government, with the recommendation that Mr. Clendon, Resident Magistrate of the district, should be appointed to investigate the matter referred to, with a view to having the question settled."

Now, it appeared that the Government had done nothing, and no wonder the Natives complained. It would have cost the Government nothing if they had asked a responsible Magistrate to examine and report upon the matter, and then the Natives would have been satisfied. Recommendations were made by the Native Affairs Committee year after year, on petitions and complaints made by the Natives, at great expense, and when they got the Committee to recommend in their favour they could get no relief. Here was a case where the Government could have carried out the recommendation of the Committee without any cost to the colony, and the least the Government could have done was to have made inquiries. The complaint was that certain lands had been taken from the Natives in a wrongful manner by Europeans, and he thought it was a great pity their petition had not been attended to. This was only a sample of others, and he thought the Native Department ought to attend to cases of this sort.

Mr. COLLINS wished to refer very briefly to the reply given to his question in regard to the poll-tax on Chinese. He had from time to time during the session endeavoured to force this matter on the notice of Ministers and the House, and if the adjournment of the House had not already been moved by the honourable member for Maitara, he should have moved it himself. He would not have done so had not this matter been one of national importance, and he thought that the House ought not to allow the session to pass by without endeavouring to deal with it. There was a great stream of human beings flowing from China to every part of the world, and it was a well-known fact that a stream of human beings would, like a stream of any other description, flow in the direction of least resistance or of greatest attraction, and naturally the Chinese would continue to flow in the direction of this colony when it offered such attractions as it did; and unless the House did something speedily they would find that within a very short space of time it would become a very large and difficult question to grapple with. He would ask honourable members to fairly endeavour to face this question. Was it not fair to ask the Government to promise to at least make some endeavour to deal with this real evil—an evil which the workers had had to put up with in every direction? There was scarcely any important industry which was not overcrowded by these undesirable people. He would be the last person in the House to say anything derogatory of any people, but he felt that the class of Chinese that were coming into the colony were not a desirable class. Latterly a large number of half-castes, owing to the intermarrying of the women of this country with the Chinese who had come to the colony, might be seen in all our large cities, and many of the industries of the colony were being menaced. These people were now competing with our miners in the gold-mining districts, with our gardeners, and even with our laundrywomen; and in a city like Wellington they were absolutely ruining the storekeeping business, so that it was absolutely impossible for people engaged in this class of business to earn a decent living owing to the competition of these Chinese. These people had no interest in our affairs or in our national business, and were never likely to become a part and parcel of the constituencies of the country. They took the bread from the families of the unemployed artisan and from the widow of the deceased artisan. He did not know whether he would be in order in referring to a previous question, but, if so, he might say that the Minister of Labour had stated that the number of arrivals just about balanced the number of departures, and therefore these people were not increasing in the colony. But that showed that they kept up their numbers. They gathered together a sum of money here, and then returned to China, and other poor Chinese came to take their places. As a matter of fact, China was levying an annual tax on New Zealand, and large sums of money were constantly flowing from this country to China. The Chinese gave us absolutely nothing by way of return. They did not assist us in maintaining the revenue of the colony, or in opening up the resources of the country. They simply bled us. He knew that some landlords in some parts of New Zealand were glad to have Chinamen as tenants, because they paid high rents; but that was simply because they were willing to live under conditions under which Englishmen would not live. A dozen or twenty men were often herded together in one small place. While we were talking about the loss of trade, and of the hardships which our own people had to contend with, and as to the "unemployed" difficulty, here was a very great evil, and one which should be dealt with without delay. If the Government desired to deal with the question they would find the House willing and ready to support them. If the Government wished to stop the influx of Chinese they could bring down a Bill of one or two clauses, and he was absolutely certain both Houses would readily pass such a measure into law. He thought he had a right to complain that in this matter the Ministry had not dealt with the House so candidly and straightforwardly as they should have done.

Mr. PIRANI wished to say a few words in reference to the reply of the Minister of Lands to his question about the "thirds" payable on the lands held by the Wanganui Harbour Board. If honourable members would look at the Act under which this endowment was given to the Wanganui Harbour Board they would see that clause 4 read as follows:—

"The Waste Lands Board may from time to time sell or otherwise deal with and dispose of such lands in like manner as other waste lands within the district may be sold, dealt with, or otherwise disposed of, and the Receiver of Land Revenue shall, after deducting the costs of survey of such land, pay the same into the Harbour Fund."

Honourable members would see that the Government had no power to pay the proceeds of these sales of land into the Harbour Board Fund. The only power given was to pay the costs of survey over to the Board. He had no doubt that was a mistake in the Act. The point the local body made was this: As the land had to be sold in the same way as other Crown lands, it therefore must be sold under the system by which "thirds" were payable to the local bodies upon deferred-payment land. That system had not been carried out in connection with these lands. The local bodies of the districts had been deprived of something like £2,000 in "thirds" on this land, and had to make many of the roads in connection with it. He thought, had the Minister given this question the consideration it deserved, had the Government made inquiry into the matter with the Crown Law Officers and examined the Act, they would never have said that the Act authorised the whole of the proceeds of the sale of the land to be paid over to the Harbour Board. Then, he desired to say something in reference to the loading of 5s. per acre upon lands sold under the lease-in-perpetuity system. Under the ordinary system of selling Crown lands, "thirds" were payable to the local bodies for fifteen or sixteen years; but under the system under which these lease-in-perpetuity lands were being sold there was a loading of 5s. and 7s. 6d. per acre put on the land, and the selectors had to pay 4 per cent. interest on those lands for 999 years. The difference in the treatment of these two classes of tenants was enormous. He was very much surprised that some measure had not been devised by the Minister of Lands to give relief to the settlers who had to pay for the longer period. He was surprised that the Minister, seeing the injustice which was being perpetrated, had not brought down legislation to relieve these settlers, and to limit the period under which interest on the loading on lease-in-perpetuity lands should be paid.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL desired to express his disappointment at the answer given to his question regarding the revision of the tariff. The matter of the revision of the tariff had now been for years before the House and the country, and it was to a large extent upon the promise that the tariff should be revised during the present session that Canterbury had returned so many members to support the present Government. During the whole session, throughout Canterbury, and particularly in Christchurch and its suburbs, extreme disappointment had been felt on account of the apparent inaction of the Government in this matter. It was quite true that a Committee was set up about the middle of the session for the purpose of collecting and collating information with regard to this matter, but the result of that Committee had been, of course, absolutely nil. He did think, on the strength of the information obtained by that Committee, that the Government would have been able to give a more definite assurance that early next session they would bring down proposals for the revision of the tariff, in the interests of local industries. That was the direction in which, he thought, the tariff should be revised. He did not ask for a revision in the way of abolishing duties on the necessities of life, because, however desirable that might be theoretically, they understood that practically it was impossible. What was desired was that the anomalies which now existed in connection with the tariff should be removed. A revision was required especially for the purpose of stimulating, promoting, and encouraging the industries of the colony. There could be no doubt that during the last month or two a very large number of the skilled workers of the colony had been compelled to leave. That unfortunate result had been brought about because we were importing boots, clothing, and other goods to the value of hundreds of thousands of pounds, which could be made in the colony out of our own raw material. Until we realised the importance of adjusting the tariff, so that it would not bear unduly upon the consumers, but so that it should be used as a means of assisting the industries of the colony, we should have from time to time, during periods of depression, numbers of departures of our skilled people who were unable to obtain work. Therefore he sincerely hoped the Government would take this matter fully into their consideration during the recess; and he would warn them—and he was not speaking without some consideration—that, if next session they were not prepared to deal with this question of the tariff in the interests of the local industries of the colony, they would probably be met with a danger the strength of which they would only appreciate when it came upon them. The country looked to the Liberal party to so adjust the duties on the articles he had referred to that such adjustment would help the private employment of the people. There was one other matter which he wished to refer to, and that was as to the inspection of railways and the bridges in connection with the railways. He referred more particularly to the second part of his question. So far as the first clause was concerned, the Government had given an assurance in the Public Works Statement that they would have an examination and inspection made of the plant, permanent-way, and bridges of our railways before they took over the control of the lines. With that he entirely agreed. But he thought also that they should appoint an Inspector for each Island, who should be independent altogether of local control—that was to say, not connected in any way with the local officers. He should be an officer from the central department, and it should be his duty to inspect all the bridges, and he should be thoroughly independent of the local officers. There was no doubt that as the age of our bridges increased there would be an increasing expenditure in connection with their maintenance. As the age of the bridges increased it would become necessary that the supervision should be more and more complete. He trusted that it would be regarded as a duty on the part of the Government that the very best form of supervision should be provided.

Mr. Pirani

Dr. NEWMAN wanted to take this opportunity, as it would probably be the last one, of referring to the question of the old soldiers' claims, because he thought these men had been exceedingly unfairly treated. Last session, honourable gentlemen would remember, about twenty-seven members met the Premier, and the honourable gentleman promised that Mr. Cadman should be appointed as a Minister to inquire into these claims. After his election Mr. Cadman was appointed, and an officer was selected to look into and to schedule the claims, indicating the good and bad claims. At the beginning of the session he (Dr. Newman) asked, in relation to the matter,—and that question had been repeated from time to time,—whether the Government were going to redeem their pledge. The honourable gentleman at last had put on the table a schedule of all the claims, but nothing further had been done. The House had not been afforded an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the matter. He thought the treatment of the claimants had been most unfair. They had already been put off for a considerable time, and there was no certainty that the matter would be dealt with even next session. It looked as if this delay would go on year after year till the claimants were all dead. The total number of claims amounted to 1,899; but an enormous number of the claims must be weeded out, because numbers of the men were discharged with bad records, and there were several de-

50. serters. One man applied because he had been cook on board one of the coastal steamers which conveyed the people to the seat of war, and there were a number of other sham and bogus claims; but if all these were taken out there would still remain, at the outside, four or five hundred justifiable claims made on definite grounds. They had in the past given grants of land and grants of money to the old soldiers; and he thought it was a most discreditable thing in every way to the Ministry that they should again shunt this question indefinitely and dismiss it; and it was all the more so because it was promised that something would be done. He thought the lists would show that there were something like two or three hundred deserving cases that were simply barred by technical reasons. Take the case of a man whose petition he had presented, and who had since died—Gerald Fitzmaurice. This man was in the war. He fought in all the branches of the service; and his claim was barred because he could not prove that he had completed service with Colonel Nixon's Force. The fact was that a certain number of Volunteers had been asked for, and this man had been picked among the number out of the ranks; and because he had gone on special service, and had left Colonel Nixon's Force in that way, his claim was barred, because the books had been imperfectly kept. He had been actually paid for the time he was on that special service, and yet it had been suggested that he might have been a deserter; and he had no redress, nor had his widow. Then, take such a claim as this: The man had fought at Gate Pa, at Rangiriri, at Meremere, and through the whole campaign. He had got the medal, and several distinctions, and "Very good" on all his discharges except the last, which was "Fair;" and yet his claim was barred after twenty-five years. He had assured these men that the Ministry would do what was just and right to them, and now he should have to tell them that the Ministry had no sympathy with these claims, and declined to do anything with them.

Mr. CROWTHER said it must now be apparent beyond all doubt that our railways would never be a success and that the bridges would never be safe until the honourable member for Riccarton was appointed Inspector. The honourable member had been set up to explain what the findings of the Railway Committee were. The findings of the Railway Committee had been furnished to the House, and had been discussed and accepted by the House several days ago; and what had been done since had been nothing more or less than that the Committee had agreed among themselves, by eight to three, that in the interests of the colony it was not advisable that the remainder of the evidence should be published to the world. That was all they had done. But the honourable gentleman's disposition was very inquisitorial, and it had got to this: that not only all the railways, but every bank in the colony, had to relate to this inquisitorial member what their private business was, what relations they had with the Government, and whether the Government were going to allow any business to be done except under the supervision of the honourable gentleman during the recess. He was quite surprised that the usual common-sense and good judgment of honourable members did not enable them to see that they could not get the information asked for in their questions that afternoon, and that the Government could not relate the knowledge they had on those questions. Surely private institutions that were doing business in connection with a colony like this were not to have their affairs dragged on the floor of the House through questions such as had been asked. He thought they were having a picnic or something of the sort, but it was not interesting to the country, and was simply wasting time.

Mr. E. M. SMITH was sorry he had not been present to ask the question which had been asked for him by the honourable member for the Buller. Had he been he would have explained the reason why it had been asked. The men had applied to the Prisons Department for the reward; and the reply from Colonel Hume, the head of the department, was that, as no Justice of the Peace, or Judge who tried the case, or Gaoler had recommended any reward, he could not see his way to recommend the Minister to pay a reward. Well, he looked upon that as an evasion of the question. The prisoner had escaped from gaol, was being fired at by the warders, and these men rushed in, captured the man, and handed him over to the prison authorities; and their services ought to be recognised. If this man had got at large, from the terror he had caused in the district to women and children when he was foolishly playing the part of a highwayman, the Government would probably have had to expend a good deal of money to capture him; and he (Mr. Smith) only asked that these men should get the reward that was usually given—some £5—which was only a very small sum. If it went forth to the colony that men were to get no reward for such services, they would be very foolish to risk their lives in capturing prisoners. That was the object of his question. He was glad to have the opportunity of referring to the question of old soldiers' claims, mentioned by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs. He had himself asked the Minister when he was going to pay the claims of the old soldiers who resided in Wellington, and the reply was that there was no Act of Parliament whereby he could satisfy those claims. As a member of that House he had taken, in common with other members, an active interest in endeavouring to wipe off these claims. He knew there was a large number of bogus claims, but he also knew there were many bonâ fide claims. He had not been connected with the Forces in New Zealand during the war, nor had he occupied the important position of Armourer and Inspector of Small Arms in Her Majesty's forces, and in the colonial forces, without knowing many of these men individually, and the engagements they had taken part in, and in many instances the noble deeds they had done, and their many acts of bravery. The men whose claims had been investigated, and who had been recommended by the Commissioner as having complied with the law, were entitled to the land-grants, in terms of the Act that had been passed a year or two ago. These claims were undisputed, and it was an injustice that they had not got their grants. He knew one man who had been in the Imperial and Colonial forces for upwards of forty years. He was now almost blind, and almost penniless: and he had this claim against the colony, and yet had to wait another year. Was that the way to deal with such claims? There were some of these claims that wanted closely looking into, and the Government had done well to appoint an officer to go into them. As it was now too late in the session to introduce a Bill, he would say he hoped the Government would next session bring in a measure that would wipe off these claims once and for ever. He would say nothing further at that late period of the session, but he thought he should fail in his duty if he did not express the indignation he felt respecting the delay that had taken place in this matter.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE said he fully indorsed every word that had been said by the honourable member for New Plymouth and the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs respecting old soldiers' claims. No doubt there was a good reason for the delay. They would probably be told that it was owing to the illness of the Minister of Justice that the matter had not been gone into; but, at the same time, the delay was a great grievance with many people in the colony, and the matter ought to be attended to. He also wished to say a few words respecting the question of the honourable member for the Thames, as to the indignation felt by the Auckland and Thames people at the neglect of the Government in not making sufficient provision for aiding the mining industry. He would supplement that by asking if they were aware of the indignation caused in every mining district of the colony by the way in which the mining industry had been treated during the session. Of all the interests in the colony the mining industry had received the worst treatment. In the Financial Statement there was an elaborate paragraph by the Colonial Treasurer saying, "In order to encourage the development of the mining industry, I am of opinion that further aid should be given towards inducing miners to settle on the land." That went in the right direction; and he might say that during the recess he had introduced several deputations to the Premier, to the Minister of Lands, and to the Minister of Mines, and each and every one of them had told the deputations that they were going to bring in a Bill this session to provide for giving permanent land-tenures in mining districts. A Bill had been brought in and read a second time six or seven weeks ago, but it had never appeared on the Order Paper from that day to the present time; and it was not amongst the Bills that had been ordered to be struck off the Paper. With reference to the indignation of the people at the Thames, so far as he could judge from the estimates they were not at all badly treated. He supposed the population of the Thames only represented about one-tenth of the total population of the goldfields districts; yet he found that, for deep-sinking, out of a £10,000 vote for the colony, the Thames got £4,000; the West Coast—where 75 per cent. of the gold of the colony was got—was to receive £4,000; and the other £2,000 went to Otago. They had room for indignation on the West Coast, for if they only wanted a few hundred pounds for a track they could not get it; they could not get the slightest assistance to develop the mining industry. He might also point out that the coal-mining industry had been dealt with somewhat unreasonably. That was not the fault of the Government, but was principally the fault of some members who represented the working-classes. He blamed those members most, and the member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) especially, for the treatment dealt out to the coal-miners on the West Coast. That honourable gentleman was responsible for a great deal of this; and no doubt the working-men of the colony, who had a great deal of sympathy with each other, would keep their eyes on the honourable gentleman.

Mr. E. M. Smith

Mr. HEKE wished to say a few words in reference to the answer given by the Hon. Mr. Carroll to his question. He was not at all surprised at the answer that honourable gentleman gave to the question. They all knew that the honourable gentleman represented the Native race in the Cabinet, and the least thing the Government could do for this Native, on the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee, was to allow inquiry to be made as set forth in the report. He understood the answer was that the Government did not intend to consider the report. He was quite aware of the reasons why the honourable gentleman had been so kind as to answer his question in that manner. They all knew that a certain division had taken place in the House on the Midland Railway question. It was only fair to himself and to the Native who petitioned Parliament last year, to whom the Native Affairs Committee gave their support, that inquiry should be made by the Resident Magistrate. He was told by one of the Native members in the House that after the division the honourable gentleman was so "riled" because one of the Native members voted against the Government and another did not come into the Chamber that he went so far as to make this remark to the honourable members for the Eastern and Western Maori District: that they would see, in reference to their petitions, that they would never be given effect to by the Government. After such remarks as that, he was not surprised at the manner in which his question had been answered.

Mr. CARROLL asked if the honourable gentleman was alleging this as a fact with reference to him (Mr. Carroll).

Mr. HEKE said he was. He could trust the word of the honourable gentleman who had informed him. So far as he himself was concerned, it did not harm him in any way. But he must say, if this kind of procedure was to be applied to a matter which had been brought before the House, and been considered by a Committee,—if a matter of petty jealousy was to be brought into anything of this kind—the procedure of Parliament would become a farce; it would be quite a farce if, instead of the merits of a case being gone into, one was cut short because he was not of "the right colour." Many members had expressed indignation at the manner in which the Government had answered questions or had treated them in reference to their own districts. He was not surprised, because ever since he entered the House he saw that promises made by any member of the present Government were not to be relied upon. He wished to refer, further, to the fact that in that evening's Post there was a reference to a certain matter which had been raised in the House. He referred to the Horowhenua purchase. They had had questions put in the House in reference to the moneys handed over.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman must not refer to anything not referred to in the questions on the Order Paper of that day, or in Ministers' answers to those questions.

Mr. HEKE said he would take another opportunity of referring to the matter. He supposed he could refer to the matter of the Little Barrier.

Mr. SPEAKER said that also could not be referred to unless a question had been asked about it on to-day's Order Paper.

Mr. HEKE said, then he only wished again to repeat that, if petty jealousy was to be brought into the House to oppose any matter an honourable gentleman might bring before the House, he thought Parliament was degrading itself, when a member of the House was cut short because he stood by his own conviction on any matter that came before the House.

Mr. CARROLL regretted very much to have heard the speech made by the honourable gentleman. There was a sad want of fairness in it. He did not think that the honourable gentleman was one who would perambulate the lobbies or frequent nooks and corners outside the House to pick up what information he could, and on such information level base insinuations against the Government. He gave an emphatic denial to the honourable gentleman's statement. He never spoke to either of the Maori members in the way referred to. He thought it "very bad form" to introduce into the debates outside talk of that nature. He thought the honourable gentleman's grievance was because his question had been answered in the negative. In the speech just made no word whatever was devoted to the question, which was not touched upon. The honourable member confined himself to the task of abusing the members of the Government and himself (Mr. Carroll) in particular. To set himself right, he might tell the House that he had in no way interfered with the honourable member for the West Coast so as to influence his vote. After the division he did say that he regretted, when members gave their word, they at times forgot the circumstance. With regard to the honourable the Maori member for the East Coast, he told him, in all good humour, that he thought his simplicity had made him an easy victim to the Whips, who were active on that occasion—that was, they had paired him with what was known as a "dead man." He would further state to the House that both of the Maori members referred to had, in the early part of the day, volunteered to him the information that they intended to vote in a certain direction, which gave grounds for these subsequent remarks. He made no complaints against those honourable gentlemen. They were all masters of their own actions. The honourable gentleman could go any way he chose. He (Mr. Carroll) would say nothing to influence him. He took this opportunity of telling the House and the honourable gentleman that he was always prepared to meet any legitimate charges brought against him, but he would never recognise anything gathered up from the street-corner. As one who represented an influential and important tribe in the North, it pained him to see the length to which the honourable gentleman's hostility carried him. He felt that, as they were representative men of the various tribes in this colony, they should not forget the old traditional reverence that their race had for honour. He himself was proud of his race, and would always assist in maintaining its good name. In regard to the question, he was sorry the senior member for Wellington City was not in the House. That honourable member had made it a complaint that all Native petitions were treated in the same manner. He contended that because a recommendation came from the Native Affairs Committee that the Government should inquire into a petition the Government should give effect to the prayer of that petition. He (Mr. Carroll) contended that that was not sufficient. The Government had to satisfy itself as to the merits of any petition, independently of the representation of the Committee. A Committee often gave a report without taking any evidence, and a Committee often disposed of a petition by simply referring it to the Government for inquiry or consideration; therefore, when the responsibility was thrown upon the Government, they had to be satisfied that something more was done than merely carrying out the report of the Committee. In many of these cases the Committee only heard one side—only heard what was alleged in the petition. The Natives would state that they had had land illegally taken—that they had been deceived and victimised by the Europeans or Government or by Government agents. As a rule, the Committee would not be in a position to decide the facts of the case, and they would refer it to the Government for inquiry. That was what happened, as a rule.

Now, in this case inquiries had been made by the Government. All the official records bearing on the matter had been carefully looked over. The matter of which the Natives complained had been settled in 1874 by an Act, which gave effect to a settlement arrived at by the Government and the Natives. It was settled that the Natives were to get two blocks of land in return for other land which had been wrongly awarded to them under certificate. The whole dispute between the Government and the Natives had been amicably settled. If grants had not yet been issued for the two blocks intended for the Natives, then they had a cause of complaint in so far as that was concerned; but when they attempted to go back and question the bona fides of the original transaction they were completely out of Court. The whole question had been gone into and investigated by Mr. Commissioner Bell under the New Zealand Settlements Act, and various awards were made to Natives north of Auckland as compensation. The Government did not see any necessity for reopening the case for the purpose of investigating the claims which the Natives had made, as such did not exist, according to the information at hand.

Mr. HEKE, as a matter of personal explanation said the honourable gentleman said he (Mr. Heke) went out of the House to gain his information. He wished to say he never did go out of the House for information. The information he referred to was given to him in that Chamber, and he had letters in his possession that would prove that the honourable member was fond of whipping for votes.

The hour of half-past five having arrived, Mr. SPEAKER left the chair.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

7.30. The Managers appointed by the House to confer with the Managers for the Council with reference to the amendments made in this Bill reported that the Conference had taken place, and that no agreement had been arrived at.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That a fresh Conference be requested. He thought the House would be justified in asking for this further Conference, because it would be a pity, in his opinion, that Parliament should dissolve without something being done in the direction of raising the age of consent. The Council's main reason for disagreeing was in respect of the amendment made by the House in reference to the case of the prisoner Chemis. He thought that those who had at heart that prisoner's case would, at all events, not be helping his case by preventing legislation from going through which would protect the now unprotected young girls of this country. He therefore asked that a fresh Conference should be asked from the Council. He hoped that honourable members who were interested in the case to which he referred would not make it a stumbling-block to relief of the kind he had indicated being given, and to legislation taking place which he said was imperatively necessary.

Mr. Carroll

Sir R. STOUT asked, could it be done by sending a message to the Council to say the House would waive its amendment as to the Chemis case,—as that was where the difficulty lay,—and asking the Council to give way on the subject of the other amendment raising the age of consent? He had seen such a form used before.

Mr. SEDDON said the point of divergence as to the age of consent was as to whether it should be fifteen or sixteen. The Council sent the Bill down with the age fixed at fifteen, but he thought, himself, that they could manage to retain the amendment made by the House raising it to sixteen if there were not the other question in the way. His object in asking for another Conference was to have the age of consent raised to sixteen years.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. SEDDON, Mr. Graham, Mr. Tanner, Sir R. Stout, and the mover were appointed Managers for the House.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

Mr. SEDDON brought up the following reasons for disagreeing with the Council's amendments in this Bill, and moved, That the reasons be agreed to and transmitted to the Council:—

"The Committee appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with amendments made by the Legislative Council in the Native Land Court Bill have the honour to report that this House disagrees with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in—

"Interpretation clause, page 4, line 2. In the past the law in respect to this matter has been proved to be defective, and the descendants of half-castes have suffered thereby and have been deprived of participating in lands to which they were, by relation or succession, entitled.

"Section 14, page 8. The proviso to subsection (10), clause 8, is restrictive in character and defeats the object of the subsection.

"Section 31. The amendment made in this clause unduly limits the order of the Court.

"Section 33. The original intention of this clause was to permit the Court to extend the time, notwithstanding that the time had expired. The amendment made by the Council would prevent effect being given to the original intention.

"Section 39, line 14. The amendment made, restricting the time in which the Judge may rectify any mistake, error, or omission, is too limited, and would, if retained, defeat the object of the clause. There is no reason why the amendment made in the other part of the clause should not stand.

"Section 46. The amendment made in this clause is restrictive in character.

"Section 52. There is no reason why the amendment made should be disagreed with.

"Section 53. The remaining portion of the clause being sufficient to give effect to what was originally intended, there is no objection to the amendment made by the Council.

"Section 56A is restrictive in character, and gives power which did not hitherto exist. The effect of the power given may be injurious.

"Section 56B. This clause would lead to the evasion of other provisions of this Act; and to declare that a half-caste shall have the same powers in respect to alienation as a European would be dangerous.

"Section 92. The amendment made in this clause defeats the intention of the Act, which was that the Appeal Court in this Act should be final. If permitted to stand it would lead to litigation, which it is wise to avoid.

"Section 115. The amendment made in the proviso of this clause would defeat the object aimed at, and would lead to Natives holding in severalty disposing of all their lands. Unless the proviso is safeguarded it would render them liable to become a burden on the State. The original scope of the proviso was restricted to the Middle Island, where the lands held by the Natives are somewhat different from the lands held in other parts of the colony. The sale of land is objectionable, more especially as the Crown has had to grant large areas of land to the landless Natives of the Middle Island.

"Section 116. The amendment made would lead to complications, and would enable very large blocks of land to be acquired for an indefinite period. It would tend to defeat the object of Division II. of this Act. The same objection as to Trust Commissioners (in section 56A) applies in the case of the last proviso of this section.

"Section 118. The extension of a lease of which only one-third of the term has expired is unjust to the Natives and against the public interests. It practically gives the right of renewal to all existing leases.

"Section 118B. This amendment may be used to defeat the operation of the Act by enabling Natives to transfer to other Natives, and thus bring land within the exception in section 115.

"Section 119. With the other limitation provided for in the Act there is no good reason for objecting to the striking-out of this clause by the Legislative Council.

"Section 129. The objection to striking out subsections (2), (3), and (4) should be withdrawn.

"Second Schedule. By the retention of this schedule the operation of the Act would be confined solely to the North Island, and would thus conflict with the portions of the Act having special reference to the Middle Island."

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said he agreed with most of the objections he had heard read out, but wished to know if the Premier had any good reasons for accepting one amendment made in clause 115. The Premier might remember that in Committee he had accepted an amendment of his (Mr. Hutchison's), exempting from the operation of the Act land granted under the New Zealand Land Settlements Acts. He noticed that the Council had struck that out.

Mr. SEDDON thought that that had been done at the suggestion of the department, which found that the matter had a much wider significance and greater application than was mentioned when the honourable gentleman moved his amendment.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON suggested that the whole of the section, including the proviso, should be excised, as a considerable amount of injury might otherwise be done.

Mr. SEDDON said they would have no difficulty in dealing with the section on the Conference if, after discussion, they found it was necessary. At the present time he did not want to be placed in a false position. The Attorney-General had no doubt been acting on the advice of the department in striking it out.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON understood the amendment had been made by the Legislative Council, but now the Premier said it had been made at the suggestion of the Attorney-General. He would like to hear some reason for the change.

Sir R. STOUT said there was more reason for striking it out than for doing anything else. The honourable gentleman had not explained to the House what it meant. It meant lands formerly in the confiscated territory. The territory of the Maoris was limited, and if the House opened up all the land on the West Coast granted to them the Natives might be left landless.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said that land was restricted. It could not be sold, mortgaged, or leased for a longer period than twenty-one years, without the consent of the Governor.

Mr. THOMPSON called attention to the reasons assigned under clause 115. He hoped those reasons were not in accordance with fact. The reason given for the proviso was that if the right were given to the Natives to sell their land they might become landless. He saw by clause 3 of the Bill that it was impossible for them to do so. They could not divest themselves of the whole of the land. If they wished to dispose of land the matter had to be brought before the Trust Commissioner, who must be satisfied that it was not wanted for their own use. If the Premier wished to get hold of the land in the North Island he would insist on the striking-out of that proviso. If he (Mr. Thompson) was not out of order, he would like to call attention to a telegram he saw in the newspapers a day or two ago, where it was stated that a large number of Natives in the North were actually dying of starvation, and yet it was well known that they were wealthy so far as being the owners of valuable blocks of land was concerned. They were made paupers by the land-laws made by the House, which prevented them from making use of their land, and it was stated that they were positively dying of starvation. If the proviso were insisted upon it would be the means of locking up the whole of the land in the North Island. He thought it was only right to call the honourable gentleman's attention to this fact, for he ventured to say that if he consulted any member of the House who had lived amongst the Maoris, and knew their customs with regard to the land, he would agree with what he (Mr. Thompson) said. He hoped the House would not agree to the proviso.

Mr. BELL understood that the Premier disagreed with the amendments made in clause 116. Did he wish to have the clause restored to its original form?

Mr. SEDDON said according to the amendments made by the Council in clause 116 there was no limit whatever and no time fixed.

Mr. BELL asked if it was proposed to strike out the Second Schedule.

Mr. SEDDON said the Second Schedule required amendment, but in the meantime the Government objected to it.

Mr. BELL asked if the amendments in section 116 were Government amendments.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Reasons agreed to.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

8.0. Mr. WARD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it proposed one or two alterations in connection with the administration of the Government Life Insurance Department. Honourable members would see that it was proposed in the Bill that the department should have power under certain conditions to invest up to £10,000 on mortgage in individual cases; and not more than £10,000 was to be lent on mortgage to any one person or company. In explanation of this change, he might say that the department had been very greatly restricted in competing with other lending institutions which lent up to and beyond this amount, and it was frequently found necessary to pass by the very best investments, which went into the hands of other institutions. That being so, the department had felt itself hampered, and, in order to enable the administration to be carried on more efficiently, the department wanted to increase the maximum to £10,000. The former amount was £5,000. It was also proposed to decrease the margin from 50 per cent., and to advance up to one-half in cases where buildings formed the principal part of the security, and up to two-thirds where buildings did not form the principal part of the security. Another important alteration in the Bill was with regard to limiting the amount of money which could be invested by the department in Government securities to one-fourth, and the department would also be able to invest three-fourths in outside mortgages, and in loans to policyholders on the security of their policies. This was an alteration, he thought, which would commend itself to honourable members. Another important amendment was one to give the department the same powers and rights in taking proceedings for libel as private institutions had. This alteration was made in consequence of the very unfair and libellous strictures that were made occasionally by some newspapers, and by one in particular, upon the business of the Government Insurance Department. That liberty was taken because this was a Government department; and, while it was the province of any newspaper to criticize the Government as much as it liked, very great harm might arise from such articles and newspaper comment in the nature of unwarrantable implications upon an important institution; and this amendment would give the department, in its competition with other institutions, equal power to defend itself, and this was what was asked. They had a right to provide that this important office should have the same powers and privileges as any competing institution. These were the principal alterations in the Bill, and he begged to move the second reading.

Mr. Thompson

Sir R. STOUT did not object to the extension of the investments to £10,000, if the Board felt itself hampered; nor to section 4, giving power to invest not less than one-fourth of the moneys at the credit of the Government Insurance Account in Government securities; but the Colonial Treasurer would see that, if he meant that only one-fourth should be invested, instead of the Bill being an enabling statute it was really restrictive. He understood that the department was now investing more than one-fourth in Government securities, and three-fourths were to be free for mortgage; but under the Bill as framed the department would be forced to invest not less than one-fourth when they invested three-fourths on outside mortgages. He understood that the honourable gentleman did not mean that; as he remembered it had been stated in the Financial Statement, and repeated two or three times in the House, that he meant to restrict the investments on Government securities to one-fourth. If the Bill did not read in that way he apprehended the Colonial Treasurer would not object to the clause being amended. In regard to clause 5, he thought it was dangerous to allow the margin to be reduced by one-half—from one-half to two-thirds—as they should be anxious to keep the Government Insurance Department above suspicion, and if they meant to allow up to two-thirds instead of one-half they were bound to have losses. He did not think that was safe, and he hoped the honourable member would keep to the present limit of one-half, and not make it two-thirds as proposed. As to section 3, extending the power of the Commissioner to sue and be sued, that section also might have to be amended, as it would affect pending litigation if carried in its present form, and it would have to be limited in some way. He hoped the Bill would be sent to the Statutes Revision Committee, or, if not, that the honourable gentleman would agree to amend sections 3 and 4 in the way he had suggested, and not insist on the margin being changed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that when the second reading of the Advances to Settlers Bill was being discussed a great many members strongly objected to a maximum of £5,000. However, influences were brought to bear, and the Bill passed through the House with that limit maintained, but when it went to another place it was reduced by one-half. What a burlesque it was to find the Government now proposing to increase the limit from £5,000 to £10,000, so that necessarily a very large proportion of the amounts at the disposal of the Government Life Insurance Department would be absorbed by the larger borrowers! What could they make of the professions of the Government, who in their speeches in the House and outside of it pretended that their aim was to provide that the small landholders should be put practically on the same footing as those in a better position who wished to borrow large sums of money? The whole thing was political falsehood pure and simple. Far better would it be that the money paid into the funds of the Government Life Insurance Department should be lent to the small settlers, as had been advocated by many members in the House. As to the narrowing of the margin from one-half to one-third, he should oppose that in every way he could. It was entirely against the interests of the policyholders of the colony that the Government should be permitted to do what they proposed in this Bill. He therefore hoped that a large majority of honourable members would negative the proposals of the Government.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE could not agree with the last speaker with regard to the limit. He thought if the Government Insurance Department had large sums of money to advance, they were entitled to advance it if they could obtain good securities, and so long as the margin was safe; and he did not think that this fund was likely to be absorbed by all the large borrowers, so as to prevent the small settlers from getting any money. The Government Insurance Department never did profess to be a department for the advancing of money to small settlers. He could agree with the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that they had no right to lessen the margin to the extent contemplated in this measure. It was quite absurd to advance money to the extent of two-thirds on the town property of New Zealand. The Colonial Treasurer, with that sanguine temperament which always characterized him, some time ago declared that the values of New Zealand property had reached bed-rock; but he had seen during the last twelve months a considerable decline in values, and the chances were, if the department were not careful, they would have a considerable number of properties in their hands, and they would become a second "assets company." It was not to be expected from the Treasurer that he should limit the amount that could be absorbed by the Government in connection with that institution. He supposed the honourable gentleman would now have to pay off considerable sums of money, or, as he recollected, something less than £500,000 was advanced on freehold securities, whereas something like three times that amount was invested in stocks—not Government stocks, certainly—nearly a million, however, they had in that form. He should be glad to assist the honourable member for Wairarapa in making the margin much safer. In considering this Bill, he did not know that the House required to guard the interests of the insured in this office to the same extent as they were called upon to do with regard to State advances, but it was the interests of colonists they were called upon to guard in connection with the advances of money to borrowers. In one case they were simply dealing with money invested by insurers, and in the other they were dealing with moneys that were advanced direct by taxpayers.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON believed honourable members would hail with satisfaction the declaration of the Treasurer that he proposed to increase the amount to be made available from the funds of his department for land-mortgages; but the Bill as drawn did very little to require him to make any change of the kind. They were entirely dependent at present on his general promise that he would increase the amount on mortgages. Under the Act of 1886, as it at present stood, the provision was that not less than half the moneys standing at the credit of the Insurance Account should from time to time be invested in Government securities. Certainly the Government was taking a liberal interpretation of that provision when it had invested £926,843 in Government bonds, and only £490,145 on mortgages. He hoped to see the first item considerably reduced and the other considerably increased before they met again next session. He thought, if the Treasurer would only apply the same rule to the other two lending departments, he would have little or no need to go upon the London money-market for money to lend to settlers at a reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. WARD said both the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the honourable member for Patea had directed attention to clause 4, which said that not less than one-fourth should be invested in Government securities. He would like to say that this clause in the Bill was word for word the same as a clause which the honourable member for Wellington City had himself drafted in 1866, so that his honourable friend could hardly refuse to pass a clause similar to what was in his own Bill.

Sir R. STOUT said it was not then intended to limit the proportion. Now it was.

Mr. WARD simply wished to direct attention to the fact. However, in Committee, if it was not as clear as it ought to be, he was quite prepared to make it clearer, in order to give effect to what was intended—that was, that not more than one-fourth of the moneys in the Insurance Department should be invested in Government securities. With regard to the proposal to advance up to a value of one-half where buildings formed the principal part of the security, and two-thirds in other cases, he was quite prepared, in Committee, to put that part of the Bill on all-fours with the Advances to Settlers Bill, making it three-fifths all round, as it was in that Bill. That, he thought, would meet the wishes of honourable members, and remove anything in the shape of anomaly between the two systems. It was quite amusing to listen to the honourable member for Wairarapa talking about these advances up to £10,000 under the Bill. It was also amusing to listen to the honourable member for Clutha. He recommended them to take the advice of the honourable member for Patea, who gave utterance to sound opinions on this question a short time before. He struck the right chord in speaking on this question when he pointed out the desirability of rendering it impossible for any Government to obtain large investments from this source in Treasury bills. Then, the honourable member for Patea said the Government had been obtaining money for Treasury purposes from the Government Insurance and Public Trust Departments; and so had the honourable member for Wairarapa and the honourable member for Clutha been accusing the Government of doing that all the session; and now when he came down with a proposal to render that impossible the honourable members took exception to it! Then, with regard to these accumulated funds, what did those honourable members want to do with them?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Give them to the small settlers.

Mr. WARD asked how the honourable gentleman could propose that, when only the other day in the House he opposed such a proposal for advancing to settlers. The honourable gentleman was opposed to this advancing business. It seemed to him that the honourable member for Wairarapa and the honourable member for Clutha got up for the sake of talking. He hoped other honourable members would assist him, however, to get the Bill through Committee when it got there.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE wished to explain that he approved of the Government Insurance Department having the right to secure all good business up to as high a limit as possible.

Bill read a second time.

WESTPORT-NGAKAWAU RAILWAY EXTENSION BILL.

8.30. Mr. SEDDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, thought it was scarcely necessary for him to say much in reference to it. The matter had been before the Railways Committee nearly the whole of the session, and as a result of the investigations by that Committee they recommended that the Government should purchase the four miles of railway which was constructed by the Ngakawau Company, and which commenced at the terminal point of the Westport-Ngakawau Railway. The Government some two years ago spent £36,000 in making the railway to the Ngakawau Junction, and this line was an extension from that point. The railway in question belonged to the Mokihinui Company, and was originally connected with the company's mine, and was constructed for its purposes. There was a large field of coal outside the line held by the company. There was also another company called the Cardiff Company, and the two together sent a large quantity of coal over the line. There was a very large population settled at the end of the line. It was very necessary that the colony should acquire this Railway. He had referred this matter to the Railway Commissioners, and they had recommended the purchase, subject to the coal-mine owners having to make up the difference between the profits and 5 per cent., so that there must be 5 per cent. paid if the line did not earn it. At all events, the Harbour Board would get 5 per cent. upon the money invested in the purchase of the railway: it had this advantage over any other proposal. There was no doubt that by this purchase it would help the funds of the Harbour Board, because all the profits which were made would go to the Harbour Fund Account. He might say that the Government had had a valuation made. He had ascertained what was thought fair value for the line, so as to obviate—should he say?—any temptation to pay more than they ought. The Bill fixed the maximum amount which the colony should pay for the line. The company made the line for £20,000. They asked the Harbour Board originally £25,000. The offer to the colony was £20,000. He believed that £18,000 was a fair value for the line, and that was the amount in the Bill.

Mr. Ward

Mr. MITCHELSON quite agreed with the Premier that, in the interests of the coalfields of the West Coast, it was a proper thing to acquire the Mokihinui Company's railway-line. But he would have been better pleased if the Premier had given the House some information as to the amount of money now remaining to the credit of the Westport Harbour Fund. The House ought to have information upon that point; otherwise members would be voting in the dark.

Mr. SEDDON.—£54,000.

Mr. MITCHELSON was pleased that the Premier, after consultation with the Railway Commissioners, had provided that the companies interested in the coal-mines should be liable for any deficiency that might arise in the working of the line. The Westport Harbour Board, no doubt, would derive considerable benefit, in the shape of increased revenue, from the construction of the line. The Bill was one which had had the consideration of the Railways Committee; and, as the Premier stated, a great many disputes which had arisen between the two rival coal companies in regard to the carriage of coal over the line would be settled on the acquisition of the line by the Crown. There was no doubt the Government would have to make some concession on the haulage for the Cardiff Company, and if that were done it would certainly lessen the earnings of the railway, and as the earnings of the railway were lessened it would necessitate, of course, a higher rate of contribution to be made up by all the companies that ran their coal over the line, in order that the 5 per cent. interest, as provided in the original Act, might be secured, so as to prevent any loss accruing to the Harbour Board Fund. He would render every assistance in passing this Bill. He considered it was a measure which ought to be passed; and he held that all the railways in the colony should be owned by the State. At the same time, he thought that, in all fairness to the Mokihinui Company, the Government should satisfy themselves as to the real value of the property they were about to acquire. He did not think that any injustice should be done to the company, knowing the difficulties with which it had to contend when constructing the line. If the line cost the company so much as they said, he was of opinion that that should be paid; but he thought the amount—£18,000—mentioned in the Bill was a fair sum. The evidence that was adduced before the Railways Committee led him to believe that the amount stated was amply sufficient to cover the actual value of the line at the present time.

Mr. DUTHIE failed to see the necessity for purchasing this line. He did not see what benefit it was going to be to the colony. The present coal-mines were amply sufficient to meet the requirements of the colony. Four years ago there was a great amount of log-rolling over this railway. If this company had expended money on a work which proved ultimately unprofitable he did not see that that was a reason why the State should come in and relieve them of a bad bargain. The supplies of coal from the Westport and Greymouth mines were amply sufficient for the colony's requirements, and there was no need for this coal, and there was no market for it. That being the case, he could not understand why this railway was to be acquired, when a railway of far greater importance to the colony was not taken over. He referred to the Manawatu Railway, which was the key to the whole railway system in the North Island; but in regard to this line the Government would not entertain any suggestions for its purchase. In the case, however, of this West Coast line, for which there was no need, and which would not benefit the colony, the Government jumped at it, and were going to give practically the cost price for the line. For his own part, if the opportunity occurred, he would most certainly vote against any expenditure of this sort.

Mr. SEDDON desired to say that the honourable member was wrong in stating that there was no market for this coal. There was a market for the coal. This coal would help to break down the monopoly that existed so far as coal was concerned. Both the passenger traffic and the goods traffic would be large; and the railway itself, supposing there was no coal at all, would, in his opinion, pay. He believed it would pay the colony to acquire the line.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—What are the net earnings of the Westport-Ngakawau Railway?

Mr. SEDDON said he had not the figures with him. He might add, however, that the result of the carriage of coal on this line was very large. Anyhow, they had here what they had not in the case of any other line—namely, the actual guarantee of 5 per cent. In the case of some other lines it was only about 2-17.

Mr. DUTHIE.—The Manawatu line earns 6 per cent.

Mr. SEDDON said the company earned that; but would the honourable gentleman guarantee 5 per cent. to the Government? As far as log-rolling was concerned, he might say that there was no log-rolling about the matter. The colony's interests had been safeguarded by the maximum amount being stated, and also in providing for the guarantee. Under the circumstances the colony was perfectly safe. He believed it was a proper thing to do to acquire this line. It would stop the conflict between the rival companies, and would break down the monopoly in coal.

Bill read a second time.

RAILWAYS AUTHORISATION BILL.

Mr. SEDDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said there was a short extension required from Hikurangi, and also a slight extension from Kaukapakapa northwards. It was necessary that this Bill should be passed, because they had taken appropriations for them.

Mr. MITCHELSON would like to ask the honourable gentleman how far it was proposed to take the railway from Hikurangi. It was stated in the Bill that that point was to be determined by the Governor in Council.

Dr. NEWMAN would again bring under the notice of the Premier the desirability of adding the railway from Te Aro to Newtown. It would not at present mean any more expenditure. It would be a beginning of the work, and would give the honourable gentleman power in the recess to make a survey, and spend any further money in that way which might be necessary.

Mr. G. J. SMITH did not intend to oppose this Bill, although the treatment which a certain part of the colony received the other night, he thought, would probably justify them in doing so.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Log-rolling.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said it was not a question of log-rolling; it was a question of simple justice. But he would endeavour on this occasion to show the North how it ought to treat the South, and he believed the majority of Canterbury members would support the Bill, notwithstanding the treatment they had received.

Mr. DUTHIE said, with reference to the extension of the line beyond Whangarei, the Premier stated two years ago in the Public Works Statement that they hoped to discover a coalfield beyond that railway. He would like to know whether that field had been discovered, and also what chance there was of traffic on that line. He knew there was timber there; but there was plenty of timber nearer deep water.

Mr. SEDDON would be much pleased to give the honourable member the fullest information. He supposed that one of the finest coalfields in the colony was tapped by this railway. They were in a position now to send coal to deep water at a lower rate than in any other part of the colony, and they were doing that very successfully. It was one of the best brown coals in the colony. The extension of this line was necessary in order to get to the far end of the coal-bed. They desired also to bring the line to a point where they would tap the Puhipuhi kauri-forest. That forest in itself would, he should say, ten times more than pay the cost of the railway. At the present time there was great danger of millions of feet of kauri timber being burned. He believed they would now get the whole of that kauri timber brought to market; and that in itself would be a most profitable thing for the colony to do. Then he would come to the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs. Without referring to past transactions, or to his opposition to a Bill which would have done a great deal of good to the colony, he must advise that honourable gentleman to allow this extension from Te Aro to Newtown to remain until it could go with the other lines into the general pool. He did not think he could give him any further advice than simply to watch and wait.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Premier had not given him a reply as to where the terminus of the Whangarei-Hikurangi line was to be.

Mr. SEDDON.—About six miles from the present terminus.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Was that to be absolutely the end?

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes.

Bill read a second time.

LAND AND INCOME ASSESSMENT BILL.

Clause 6.—As to returns.

Subsection (4).—Date of annual return.

On the motion of Mr. WARD, the words "or biennial" were inserted after "annual."

Subsection (6).—"Sections five and eight of 'The Land and Income Assessment Acts Amendment Act, 1893,' are hereby amended by omitting the words 'triennial or,' 'triennial,' and 'as the case may be' wherever they occur."

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the subsection.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the subsection proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 46.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Buick	Larnach	Reeves
Cadman	Lawry	Saunders
Carncross	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carnell	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Carroll	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Crowther	McKenzie, R.	Steward
Duncan	McLachlan	Tanner
Flatman	McNab	Thompson
Hall	Meredith	Ward
Hall-Jones	Millar	Willis.
Hogg	Mills
Houston	O'Regan
Hutchison, W.	Parata
Joyce	Pinkerton

Tellers.

Harris
Morrison.

Mr. Seddon

NOES, 23.

Allen	Heke	Newman
Bell	Hutchison, G.	Russell, W. R.
Button	Kelly, J. W.	Stout
Duthie	Lang	Te Ao
Earnshaw	Massey	Wilson.
Fraser	McGuire	Tellers.
Graham	Mitchelson	Buchanan
Green	Montgomery	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 23.

Subsection retained.

Mr. WARD moved to add the words, "and substituting in each case the word 'biennial' for the word 'triennial,'" at the end of the clause.

Words added, and clause as amended added to the Bill.

Clause 7.—Continuing existing assessments until new assessments are made.

On the motion of Mr. WARD, the following words were added: "and any person or company may, by notice in the prescribed form, given not later than the thirty-first day of March in any year, require the Commissioner to make a new assessment of such person's or company's land and mortgages."

Clause 14.—Interest on mortgages not to be included in land-tax returns.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved, That the following words be added to the clause: "In the event of any person being liable under this Act to pay land-tax, and owning land to the extent of two thousand pounds the improved value, on which there may be a mortgage, he shall, in addition to any other exemption he may be entitled to, deduct a sum equal to one penny in the pound from any interest sum he may have to pay the mortgagee; and the mortgagee shall also be entitled to deduct any such deduction from the amount of his land-tax."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 14.

Allen	Massey	Saunders
Duncan	McGuire	Wilson.
Duthie	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Heke	Newman	Green
Lang	Russell, W. R.	Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 44.

Bell	Houston	Pinkerton
Buddo	Hutchison, W.	Pirani
Buick	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Cadman	Larnach	Seddon
Carncross	Mackintosh	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	Maslin	Stevens
Carroll	McGowan	Steward
Collins	McKenzie, J.	Stout
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Flatman	McLachlan	Thompson
Graham	Meredith	Ward
Hall	Millar	Willis.
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Joyce
Hogg	O'Regan	Mills.

Majority against, 30.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 18.—Deductions in respect to obsolete machinery, &c.

Mr. BUDDO moved to strike out, in subsection (1), the words, "nor by reason of any such implements, utensils, or machinery being obsolete, useless, or superseded."

Amendment agreed to, and words struck out.

Sir R. STOUT moved to insert at the end of clause the words, "or by the implements, utensils, or machinery being rendered obsolete or useless."

Amendment agreed to, and words added.

Mr. WARD moved to strike out subsection (2), providing that there be no deduction in respect of accident insurance.

Amendment agreed to, and subsection struck out.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved the following new clause:—

"When two or more persons, not being in incorporated under 'The Joint-stock Companies Act, 1892,' are carrying on business as farmers in partnership or co-ownership, each person so carrying on business shall furnish to the Commissioner of Taxes a return stating the proportionate share of which he is the owner where the land is jointly owned or occupied; and each person shall be subject to taxation and have the same right to claim exemptions as though he held his share of such land as a separate estate."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 19.

Allen	Lang	Steward
Bell	Massey	Stout
Buchanan	McGuire	Thompson.
Duncan	McLachlan
Earnshaw	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Pirani	Fraser
Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.	Mackenzie, T.

NOES, 36.

Buddo	Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton
Buick	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carncross	Maslin	Seddon
Carnell	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Crowther	McNab	Tanner
Flatman	Meredith	Ward
Graham	Millar	Willis.
Hall	Montgomery	Tellers.
Harris	Morrison	Joyce
Hogg	Parata	Mills.
Houston

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Larnach
Green	Lawry
Hutchison, G.	Mackintosh
Newman.	Reeves.

Majority against, 17.

Second reading negatived.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE moved the addition of the following new clause:—

"Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Assessment Acts, the land- and income-tax shall be payable in half-yearly instalments."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be read a second time."

AYES, 21.

Allen	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Bell	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Buick	Massey	Stout
Carncross	McGuire	Thompson.
Fraser	McNab	Tellers.
Graham	Mitchelson	Buchanan
Hall-Jones	Pirani	Mackenzie, T.
Heke

NOES, 33.

Buddo	Maslin	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	McGowan	Seddon
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Stevens
Crowther	McLachlan	Steward
Earnshaw	Meredith	Tanner
Flatman	Millar	Ward
Hall	Montgomery	Willis.
Harris	Morrison	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Joyce
Houston	Pinkerton	Mills.
Kelly, W.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	Cadman
Green	Lawry
Hutchison, G.	Mackintosh
Newman	Reeves
Te Ao	Larnach
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 12.

Second reading negatived.

Bill reported with amendments, and read a third time.

The House adjourned at a quarter past one o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Friday, 19th October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Third Reading—Balance Memorial—Criminal Code Bill—Railway Officers—Adjournment—Ventilation of Council Chamber—Railway Officers—Native Reserves Accounts—Major C. Brown—Shipping and Seamen's Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Land and Income Assessment Bill, Public-Trust Office Consolidation Bill, Government Life Insurance Bill, Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill, Railways Authorisation Bill, Unclaimed Lands Bill, Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation Bill, Native Land (Validation of Titles) Bill, Native Lands Claims and Boundaries Adjustment and Titles.

Empowering Bill, Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill, Sea-fisheries Bill, Post and Telegraph Department Bill, Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation Bill, Native Land (Validation of Titles) Bill, Native Lands Claims and Boundaries Adjustment and Titles Empowering Bill, Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill, Public Trust Office Consolidation Bill.

THIRD READING.

Shipping and Seamen's Bill.

BALLANCE MEMORIAL.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE brought up the following report of the Joint House Committee, on the application from the Ballance Memorial Committee for leave to erect a memorial to the late Mr. Ballance in Parliament Grounds:—

"The Joint House Committee have the honour to report that they have agreed to the following resolution, which they recommend for adoption by the Council—namely.—

"In the opinion of this Committee no monument should be erected in the grounds of the Parliament Buildings unless in the form of a statue of not less than life-size; but, if it be desired to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. Ballance by a bust, there is no objection to a suitable situation being given in the Parliament Buildings."

In moving, That the report be adopted, he might say there had been three very full meetings of the Committee, and, after consideration of the plan laid before them, the Committee had decided that the design was not a suitable one to be erected in Parliament grounds, and the report had been agreed to unanimously by the Committee.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said he had not been present at that day's meeting of the Committee, and did not know what had occurred. He had taken the trouble to attend two meetings, and he had expressed dissatisfaction with the manner in which the business had been conducted on both those occasions. Objection had been taken, so far as he could see, to a bust that was to be placed on the top of a group of marble columns erected on a pedestal highly enriched and ornamented. It had not seemed to occur for a moment to any of those present that any suggestion they made with reference to the bust would be considered by the Ballance Memorial Committee. The bust was an after-thought on the part of the Committee, and it was the architect's opinion that it would look very well where it was placed, as it was of such a size that it would not look insignificant, as was the opinion of the House Committee. With regard to the original design, the Memorial Committee had the opinion of two of the most competent architects in Wellington that it was of a chaste and beautiful kind, and that it should be placed in some position where there would be greensward, or some background of that sort to give effect to the artistic appearance of the monument.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is no artistic appearance about it.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said that was perhaps the honourable gentleman's opinion, but it was totally contrary to the opinion of men who should be qualified to express an opinion on its appearance. He was very sorry the Committee had taken up the position they had taken up. Had they suggested that the bust should not be placed on top of the monument, but that instead there should be an alto-relief or a bas-relief on one of the panels in the pedestal, that might have been accepted. But as to whether the monument in question was a suitable monument to place in the Parliament Grounds, his opinion was that it would really be an ornament to the grounds, and he would like to see more monuments of a similar class erected. But the Committee had gone further, and taken on itself to suggest that there should be a life-sized statue of the late Premier executed, and that then they would give the necessary permission. The Ballance Memorial Committee had called for a design, and designs had been sent in from all parts of New Zealand, and the design had been selected by competent men and on the advice of experts, and a prize had been awarded to it. Having rejected some life-sized designs, the committee could not now in honour, and in fairness to those who had entered for the competition, decide at this stage to put aside the design selected and select something else. The matter had gone too far for that to be done. He did not intend to oppose the motion, but, as a member of the Memorial Committee, he would simply advise them to insist on the erection of the monument as designed, with perhaps some alteration in regard to the bust. Then, as they were prevented from erecting it in what they considered a most suitable place, they would have to look elsewhere for a site.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said that the House Committee of the Legislative Council sat no less than three times to decide this matter. From the press of work in another place the Committee of the House of Representatives were unable to attend. The honourable gentleman did not attend that day, when the question was decided. In the absence of any member of the Memorial Committee, the House Committee asked the person in charge for the plan, and found it to be a high column, with a small bust at the top, resembling the stopper of a decanter. In the belief that the object was to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. Ballance by some personal representation, the Committee decided to allow the erection of a life-size figure in the grounds, or of a bust in the building. There was no question of the erection of an obelisk or monument. Probably, had there been, it might have been allowed. But, as neither the honourable gentleman nor any member of the Memorial Committee was present, it was not even hinted that an obelisk was intended. There was no desire to show anything like disrespect to the memory of the late lamented Mr. Ballance.

The Hon. Mr. L. WALKER, as a member of the House Committee, said it appeared from the Hon. Mr. Rigg's speech that the matter had resolved itself into a question of taste between the Joint Committee and the Ballance Memorial Committee. The Hon. Mr. Rigg thought the Memorial Committee knew more about the matters of taste. Well, let the honourable gentleman think so; he (Mr. Walker) did not. To his mind, the design submitted was absolutely hideous; and, were he asked his opinion as to the most suitable way of perpetuating the memory of Mr. Ballance, he would say, "Put up a handsome obelisk in the Wanganui Cemetery, with a proper inscription; and put up a bust in the lobby of the House."

The Hon. Mr. KERR thought it would not be treating the Ballance Memorial Committee with sufficient courtesy were the House to refuse to allow a memorial to the late Premier to be placed in the Parliament Grounds. If the memorial had met with the approval of the Ballance Committee he did not see that the House Committee had much to say in granting permission to erect it in the grounds. It could be no reflection on the House if it met with the disapproval of the general public. No doubt the Memorial Committee had fully considered the design before it adopted it, whether it was suitable or not, and, with due deference to the Council, he thought the Memorial Committee were in a better position to judge than they were. The Mayor of Wellington, and the Premier of New Zealand, and other people who were intimately interested in the Memorial Committee, had every wish to perpetuate the late Mr. Ballance's memory by some suitable design, and it seemed strange to him that the Memorial Committee would produce anything that would be an eyesore to the Hon. Mr. Walker or any one else. He would move that the report be referred back to the Committee; and they would no doubt take suggestions from members of the House, and endeavour to meet the wishes of both parties. That would be fair and reasonable, and would not be treating them in an offhand manner. He moved, therefore, That the report be referred back to the Committee, with a view to some alteration and suggestion being made that would be acceptable to the Ballance Memorial Committee.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI, as a member of the House Committee, wished to say that the Hon. Mr. Kerr was quite in error when he thought that due consideration was not given in the investigation of the matter. It had come before the Joint House Committee on three different occasions, and it had taken all that time to find those who represented the memorial fund to submit plans and give them some information. They even had to look for the Hon. Mr. Rigg in all directions to find him, as one who was most interested, in order to give the Committee some information. As to saying the matter should be referred back to the Joint Committee, and that the Mayor of Wellington and the Premier had agreed to the matter, it was on the Premier's proposal that the matter was put in this way: "That the plans and specifications should be submitted for approval to the Joint House Committee before they permit the memorial to be erected in the grounds." With regard to the memorial itself, they had, unfortunately, in the City of Dunedin, something similar. They had the memorial to the late Mr. John Macandrew, and there was no more disgraceful piece of work in any part of the world: it was an absolutely disgraceful thing to look at. And this memorial was of a somewhat similar nature: there was a large column, 29ft. high, with a little bit of a bust on the top of it, and the whole thing looked like a "Jack in the box," and its erection would be anything but respectful to the memory of the late Premier, nor was it creditable to those who were getting it up, and it would be much less creditable to the Committee of the House to allow it to be erected in Parliament Grounds. No one had greater respect for the memory of the late honourable gentleman than he had. He was deeply indebted to the late Mr. Ballance for the position he held in the Council, and it would ill become him were he to say anything that would in any way prevent his memory from being kept green in the minds of the people of the colony, and he would assist in any way he could in having anything erected becoming to his memory, and which would be looked up to with respect by the people; but this was a disgrace to every one, and ought not to be erected. The Committee were very unanimous, and had suggested that there should be either a life-sized statue, or a bust in the lobby; and he thought the Committee had shown very great patience in attending three times to the same thing without any alteration in the plans.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said the Hon. Mr. Kerr seemed to have very great confidence in the opinion of the Premier on a question of taste. All he (Mr. Pharazyn) could say, if they looked at Parliament Grounds as they were at present, was that they were a shocking example of bad taste. That was the opinion of every one who remembered the old grounds, and he was certain the vast majority of people were disgusted with what had been done to those grounds. For his part, he very much regretted that the power to alter them had ever been put into the hands of the Premier. The House Committee had endeavoured to save some of the trees, and had been promised that they should not be cut down. However, the whole thing had been made a hideous spectacle at the present time; and he would be very sorry to trust the Premier in any question of good taste.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The Premier objected to the proposal of the Memorial Committee.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it was all the more credit to him, and he was evidently improving. To his (Mr. Pharazyn's) thinking, —and he knew it was the opinion of very many, —the proposed memorial was exceedingly distasteful, and, with a sort of bust at the top, looked as if the late Premier had been decapitated, and had had his head stuck up there. The whole thing would be most discreditable to have near the Parliament Buildings, and he would be very sorry to see the name of the late Mr. Ballance associated with anything so absurd. As to architects having given their opinion on it, he would remind the honourable gentleman that architects might be very good judges of buildings, but they were not necessarily good judges of other matters which were not of a utilitarian aspect. It required a sculptor, or a person altogether of a different order and art from an architect's, to express an opinion. He had seen a good deal of architecture, and knew something of art, and he must say he would be exceedingly sorry to erect such a thing as the proposed memorial. He certainly hoped the Council would agree with the Committee, and refuse leave to put it up in the grounds.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE objected to the Hon. Mr. Kerr's amendment, as he did not think any good could arise from referring the report back to the Committee. The Committee had considered the matter on three occasions, and had a very long sitting that morning, and they had the artist who, he supposed, represented the Ballance Memorial Committee, but from him they were led to suppose there had been no undertaking given as to the construction of a memorial. There were gentlemen on the Committee who had seen works of art in Rome, Germany, and Paris, and were better judges on those matters than the Mayor of Wellington or the Premier.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said the Hon. Mr. Shrimski had stated that the Joint Committee had had to look for those who could give them information in regard to the memorial. Those persons who could have given the information had been in attendance on two occasions, but the proceedings were carried on in such a hurry-scurry that it was impossible for anybody to get an opportunity to give the information he possessed. They were told it was on the motion of the Premier that the refusal was arrived at; and the Hon. the Premier was a member of the Ballance Memorial Committee; Mr. Bell, M.H.R., was also a member, as were also the Mayor of the City, the editor of the Evening Post, and the editor of the New Zealand Times, who were both ex officio members; and altogether the committee was a very representative one. But it was left to the Premier, at the only meeting of the Ballance Memorial Committee he attended, to urge that a public meeting should be held in order to give everybody an opportunity of being represented on the committee and expressing his views on the desirability of such a memorial. The result of the honourable gentleman's interference was to land the committee in an expense of over £30. From that time to this the Premier had not attended a single meeting; and it was a hard blow to himself (Mr. Rigg), as a member of the committee, to think that opposition should have come from the Premier's hands, and not from those who might have been expected to oppose the memorial for other reasons. Reference had been made to the monument or bust erected to the late Mr. Macandrew. There was no comparison at all between the two monuments. If the bust were not taken into consideration, the Ballance memorial was one that would do credit to any city in New Zealand, and he invited those who thought otherwise to find one professional man who had a knowledge of architecture to say that that was not the case. The opposition was confined to the point that the bust which had been placed upon the top of this beautiful monument was considered to be utterly out of place. Had there been some suggestion that the bust should be removed it might have been done, and then the monument would have been an ornament to the grounds. His regret was that this had not been done. It had been said that the monument chosen was a disgrace to those who were instrumental in having it put up. Well, he would like to see the monument erected, in order to allow the public to judge for themselves on that point. It was all very well for people who looked at the thing on paper, and who probably did not understand a working drawing when they saw it, to express an opinion of that kind on the monument. He might say that the committee had had the very best advice on the question. They did not decide on their own opinion, but they took the opinion of experts—men who were competent to give a verdict on the question—and upon that they came to a decision. He was willing to admit that it was possible there were in Rome and other cities of the world more magnificent monuments, and he now said it was a disgrace to the Liberals of New Zealand that they had not subscribed more liberally, and that there was no better monument erected to the memory of John Ballance, who was head and shoulders above any statesman who had ever lived in New Zealand. So far as the committee were concerned, they had had to fight against political opposition from the start to the finish. One would have thought those people might generously have waived their political opposition and their objections to the late statesman. In every phase, in every stage of the affair, the committee were met by all sorts of difficulties, and this monument was subscribed for principally by the working-men of New Zealand, and more particularly by the working-men of Wellington. The monument was going to cost a sum of close upon £600, and he said, taking all things into consideration, it was to the credit of the Ballance Memorial Committee that they had done what they had. To those who had opposed this monument he would say that what was done in the matter of a memorial to the late Sir Harry Atkinson was not to their credit. It was a matter of disgrace to the people of New Zealand that men who had given the best part of their lives to the colony, and had done their best to make it prosperous and a shining light in the world, should be so soon forgotten. If he had spoken with warmth it was because he spoke as he felt. He thought those who had given their lives to the service of the colony should be remembered, and their services kept green in the memory of those who were to follow them.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 22.

Acland	Montgomery	Shrimski
Baillie	Oliver	Stewart
Barnicoat	Ormond	Swanson
Bonar	Peacock	Walker, L.
Bowen	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Grace	Reynolds	Whyte
MacGregor	Richardson	Williams.
McLean

NOES, 10.

Bolt	Kelly	McCullough
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg
Feldwick	Mantell	Taiaroa.
Jennings

Majority for, 12.

Amendment negatived, and report agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives desiring a second Conference on the subject of the Council's amendments in this Bill.

On the motion of the Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, the Hon. Mr. McLean, the Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, and the mover were appointed Managers on behalf of the Council.

RAILWAY OFFICERS.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT asked the Government, When they will be prepared to take the necessary steps to remedy the grievances supposed to be imposed on certain railway officers by clause 4, subsection (8), of the Government Railways Act passed this session? He would remind the Council that when section 4 of the Railways Act was passed it was generally understood by the Council that it was imposing a grievance on a certain number of railway officers; but it was found, as the section came down in an amended form by Governor's message, that the Council could not amend it, and he understood the Colonial Secretary gave some intimation to the Council that the matter would be rectified. He wanted to know what steps were proposed to be taken to rectify it.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he was not in a position to give the information now, but hoped to be able to do so to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved, That the Council, at its rising this day, do adjourn till eleven o'clock on Saturday, the 20th instant.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS moved, as an amendment, the addition of the following words: "but not after eleven o'clock p.m., at which hour the Speaker or Chairman of Committees shall leave the chair."

The Council divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be added be so added."

AYES, 15.

Acland	McLean	Stewart
Baillie	Oliver	Swanson
Barnicoat	Pharazyn	Walker, L.
Bonar	Reynolds	Whyte
Mantell	Richardson	Williams.

NOES, 17.

Bolt	Jennings	Ormond
Bowen	Kelly	Peacock
Buckley	Kerr	Shrimski
Feldwick	MacGregor	Taiaroa
Grace	McCullough	Whitmore.
Jenkinson	Montgomery

Majority against, 2.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

VENTILATION OF COUNCIL CHAMBER.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE moved, That the Government be requested to take steps to improve the ventilation of the Legislative Council Chamber. He might state that the matter was before the House Committee of the Council. He admitted that there was plenty of cool air coming through on to the floor of the chamber, but persons sitting in the galleries did not get the benefit from that, which they might do if the chamber were properly ventilated. In former days, when the lantern used to be lighted with gas the effect was to cause the foul air with the hot air to travel through the lantern, which had not now the power which it used to have. The atmosphere was now too hot, and, when the Council was sitting for an hour or two, became very foul. If honourable members would go up into the galleries they would see the effect which he spoke of.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT moved, That the words "and lighting" be added after the word "ventilation." Last year there was a circular light in the centre of the chamber, which was exceedingly useful to members sitting near the centre of the floor, but now that the light was removed to the walls of the chamber the central part of the chamber was dark.

Amendment agreed to, and motion as amended agreed to.

RAILWAY OFFICERS.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON moved, That a return be laid on the table giving a list of those persons now employed on the New Zealand railways who are entitled to retiring, superannuation, or pension allowance; stating also at what rate each man is entitled.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had received the following reply from the Secretary of the Railway Department in reference to this motion:—

"It would be impossible to give such a return as that asked for with any degree of accuracy. The amount of retiring-allowance to which an employé might be entitled can only be finally answered by a careful consideration of each man's service under the Government, and is affected to a considerable extent by the manner of his leaving the department. In any case the Railway Commissioners are not authorised to determine what persons are entitled to compensation. The Government Railways Act of 1887 merely preserves rights of those who were at that date Civil servants, and does not therefore affect the question, which is, strictly speaking, a legal one; but in practice the matter is decided by the Audit Department, after review of each individual case."

If he (Sir P. A. Buckley) could get any information for the honourable gentleman he would be very happy to do so.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON said it was to remove the difficulty in ascertaining who were entitled to retiring-allowances and who were not that he had moved for the return.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE RESERVES ACCOUNTS.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA moved, That the Paper No. 43, being the report of the Public Trustee—laid upon the table of the Council on the 26th June, 1894—relative to the Native reserves accounts, be printed.

Motion agreed to.

MAJOR C. BROWN.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday because of what he considered the unwarrantable attack made by one or two honourable gentlemen on the Government. At that time he was not in a position to state exactly what the real facts were. One or two honourable gentlemen were then good enough to say that the Government were hasty in coming to the conclusion they had come to, and that at any rate they were not warranted in the action they took on the occasion referred to. He had no desire to reflect in the slightest degree whatever on the character, ability, position, or courage of Major Brown. There was an action before the District Court, and that case disclosed such a state of affairs that, the attention of the Government having been called to it, the Under-Secretary for Justice thought it his duty to request Major Brown to make some explanation. He did so in a courteous manner in a letter which was on record, and which honourable members had before them; and Major Brown's explanation was anything but satisfactory. The Government, therefore, seeing the facts, and seeing that there was no satisfactory reply from Major Brown, had only one course open to them. The Hon. Mr. Stewart had said that an unwarrantable action was taken in referring to Major Brown's past record. If this had been the first occasion of Major Brown's committing an indiscretion the Government would probably have asked him to resign, but, seeing that his record was of such a character that he had been the subject of a parliamentary inquiry on more than one occasion, the only course open to them was to take the action they did.

Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley

What was the position? Major Brown, Mr. Humphries, and Mr. Ward, a Justice of the Peace, went to a place called Moturoa, for the purpose of getting the signature of a woman whose intellect was not of the keenest character. With a full knowledge of the fact that the consideration-money for the property was £40, he had made an interpretation to that woman by which it was declared that £40 was the amount received by her, when he knew that she had received only £15, and her son had received £5. If that was not an irregularity sufficient to warrant the Government in taking the action they had taken he did not know what would be sufficient. He wished to call attention to this point: The only explanation on the part of Major Brown was that he thought it sufficient if the agent of the woman had received the money. What took place ten or twelve days after? He again witnessed a document before the Trust Commissioner, by which Mr. Humphries was handed from this woman a certain instrument by which he was to be constituted her agent to receive the money. With the full knowledge of what had already been done he witnessed this document, well knowing she had not received the money. If that was not a false declaration, a false statement, and a deceiving of that woman, he would offer no opinion for the consideration of the Council. With regard to the printing of this paper, he was assured by the Premier that when he was examined there was no shorthand writer present. Mr. Haselden informed him his evidence was not taken down, and there was a motion to print the evidence, excluding the evidence of those witnesses whose evidence was of a most important character. That was not a fair way to treat the Government or these gentlemen. They had heard a good deal of the bravery of Major Brown. He had not a word to say against that; it was entirely beside the question. There were other men as brave as Major Brown—Major Brown's bravery was not before the Council. The question was, What had been his conduct on this occasion? The Government had no desire to do what was harsh, but the matter had been brought before them so forcibly—as honourable gentlemen could see by the papers in his possession, which they were at liberty to look at—that the Government were justified in the action they had taken.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT would like to say a word or two, as Chairman of the Petitions Committee. He did not know Major Brown personally. His name was first brought before him by notices in the Gazette of the 25th May last, in which "His Excellency was pleased to revoke the license of Major Brown authorising him to act as interpreter," and "to remove him from the roll of Justices of the Peace." In close contiguity to these notices was another revoking the license granted to William Williams authorising him to act as interpreter. The next time he had met with the name of Major Brown it was as a petitioner to the Council, asking to be granted an inquiry into certain charges in connection with his action as an interpreter before the Chief Justice of the Native Land Court, an officer of whose Court he was. This appeared to the Committee a very reasonable request, and they reported accordingly. The next time he saw the name of Williams it was attached to the report of a Commissioner who had been appointed to inquire into a charge against him, and the report was of the most unfavourable character. Now, these two names of Major Brown and Williams were brought together apparently in studied proximity. One of them was found guilty of fraud, treachery, and deceit, and fraudulent appropriation of the sum of upwards of $5,411; and against the other no charge was substantiated. Here were two instances in which this power of removing a man from office suddenly, and so of preventing his earning a livelihood and consigning him to obloquy, was exercised—in the one case justly, in the other case very unjustly and in such a manner as he thought would lead to the disapproval of the Council. He did not appeal on behalf of Major Brown, but thought that in his case, as in every other in which a person was suddenly dismissed with loss of character and livelihood, an opportunity should be given for defence and explanation. In that opinion the Committee was very fully borne out by some of the evidence taken. That of Judge Kettle included the following sentences:—

"Before the Commission of the Peace is taken from a person, and his license as a Native interpreter cancelled, I should certainly say it should be only for a very grave offence, and the person so deprived should have a full opportunity afforded him of answering the charge made against him. The charge should be made distinctly, and he should have the opportunity of adducing evidence to refute the charge. Moreover, the tribunal that would have to adjudicate should be absolutely free from bias, and thoroughly independent."

"I think the prayer of the petition is a reasonable one, and that Major Brown is entitled to a fair and full investigation of the charge made against him."

"I think the Government ought to court inquiry. If they have acted fairly, and on sufficient grounds, there is nothing to fear; and if any error has been committed, or injustice done, they should be pleased to be set right."

"I am inclined to think that the total cancellation of his license, and the withdrawal of his name from the roll of Justices, are circumstances that affect his character as a citizen, and tend to ruin his means of livelihood, which would in consequence be taken from him. All that, I think, is too severe a punishment for an act of negligence such as that complained of."

The Committee had brought forward their report in the interests of justice, and because they could not but feel that there should be an opportunity afforded of disproving the charges against him.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR knew nothing at all of the subject except what he had learned during the discussion, and he was bound to say that he was very much surprised at the attitude the Government had assumed towards the report of the Committee. He was also bound to say that the statement by the Hon. the Attorney-General he had just listened to still more surprised him. The report of the Committee was simply to the effect that the matter should be inquired into before an impartial tribunal. No request could be very well considered more reasonable than that, and he hoped the Council would abide by the report of the Committee. There was no question of making an attack upon the Government. He had heard no such attack made. It was a question rather of whether justice should be done to the man; and whether the Government considered that an attack had been made on them was nothing to the purpose. If no injustice had been done the Government had nothing to fear. If there was no appearance of injustice the Government were not concerned in the matter. If they had done wrong the sooner it was known the better. No one had said the Government had done wrong, so far as he was aware. It was a pity the evidence or documents had been referred to at all in the discussion. For his part, he did not attach the slightest weight to the ex parte statement that had been made. He found from the statements made that this man asked for an inquiry before the Chief Judge to whose Court he was attached as an officer, and no more reasonable request could be conceived, and a very strong case would have to be shown to justify the Council in refusing his request. The proper way to look at it was this: Here was this application: was it a reasonable one or not? It was not for the Council to say whether or not the charges made against Major Brown had been substantiated; the question was, whether the matter should be investigated by an impartial tribunal; and how any one could hesitate to grant such an application he could not conceive. It was a pity the matter had not been disposed of on the previous day, for it would have been better if the statement made by the Attorney-General had not been made. He thought a disposition had been shown to introduce into the discussion matters which, as far as he could gather, were not put before the Committee—matters which had not been suggested as a ground for Major Brown's removal, and which should not have been mentioned in the Council.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said an attack had been made by the Hon. Mr. Stewart on the Government for the action they took. He had said nothing to reflect on Major Brown, but had simply stated that there were facts which justified the Government.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said the proper way for the Government to justify themselves was to submit to the inquiry, and produce all the evidence which could be produced. It was impossible for the Council to judge on the ex parte statement; and it seemed to him that the wrong course had been adopted. The Attorney-General said that Major Brown's bravery as a soldier and his service in the field were nothing in point. He could not agree with that—it seemed to him a very harsh doctrine. But, apart from that, the mere suggestion of the possibility of injustice having been done seemed to him ample reason for granting the inquiry. The attack on the Government had nothing to do with the matter. If an attack had been made upon the Government it was entirely out of place. There was no occasion for going into the evidence at all. The Council had not the evidence before them, and it was impossible for them to constitute themselves judges in the case. He was bound to say, however, that the impression he received from the explanation made by the Hon. Mr. Montgomery was this: that the so-called gross irregularities relied upon by him as justifying the striking-off of Major Brown from the Commission of the Peace—

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I did not say that. I said, as interpreter.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR did not know, then, what justification there was offered for striking him off the Commission of the Peace. There was apparently none. At all events, the question whether this conduct of Major Brown amounted to irregularity or to gross irregularity depended upon the idea one formed of the duties of an interpreter. He was bound to say it seemed to him something more should be found before so extreme a step was taken. He did not think the Attorney-General was justified in saying that the report of the Committee should be in any way treated as an attack upon the Government.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had not said anything of the kind. He said a gross attack had been made by the Hon. Mr. Stewart. He did not refer to the motion before the House.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT had a few words to say in reference to the question. He could assure the Government and the Council that the Committee which drew up the report had no feeling whatever against the Government. The report was drawn up purely in the interests of justice to both parties. The Committee had felt that the question of this £40 might be looked at from two points—from the standpoint of the Government and from that of Major Brown. Major Brown had looked at it in this light: £5 was supposed to be paid to the woman's son—but he might mention there was no evidence to show this £5 ever was paid; £5 was to be paid when the transaction was completed, £15 to herself, and £15 she had to her credit for legal expenses in connection with the transaction. Major Brown looked upon this latter £15 as really a payment. On the other hand, as strictly interpreted by the Government and Judge Kettle, it might be said she only received the £15, and £5 which her son received; she had not received the £15 for legal expenses that had been deducted from the £40: but, so far as the Committee could see, there was nothing in any document to prevent her being sued again for the £15 for legal expenses. However, the Committee felt it was really a question for further investigation, and that the punishment the Government inflicted on this man was really a punishment for a crime and nothing else, and, that being so, it was deemed only fair that he should have an opportunity of answering the charge brought against him. The previous day the Hon. Dr. Grace, in a very passionate speech, had declared that the Council had re-established the character of Major Brown. He (Mr. Bolt) said that the Council had not done so, and that it could not do so. The Committee which had taken evidence and had inquired into the matter could not do that. The only thing that could re-establish Major Brown's character was for the Council to agree to the report of the Committee—nothing else; and for the Hon. Dr. Grace to defend Major Brown with the ardour he did testify, no doubt, to the earnestness of his own convictions, but in no way proved the correctness of his judgment. The whole matter, in the opinion of the Committee, deserved to be inquired into before a properly-constituted tribunal, and, when they said that, they had no wish to cast any reflection upon the Government at all. He believed the Government were justified in taking a very serious view of Major Brown's conduct in this question. But he thought the only way the Council could uphold Major Brown's character was by upholding the report of the Committee.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS did not blame the Government, for any action they had taken they had no doubt taken in good faith. At the same time it was possible they had committed an error of judgment. The Petitions Committee had considered the matter well, and had brought down a report, which he thought should be agreed to. They recommended that the matter should be referred to an independent tribunal,—to which he thought every man had a right if he demanded it. He would like to suggest to the Council to leave out the words "for their consideration," and to insert the words, "indicating that, in the opinion of the Council, early effect should be given to the recommendation contained in the report." He thought a man at Major Brown's age should not be placed in the position of being debarred from following his vocation, if the decision of the tribunal was in his favour, and he trusted the Colonial Secretary would not object to the amendment.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY asked if the honourable gentleman meant the report of the tribunal to which the case might be referred, or not. Unless this was made clear they might be placed in an awkward position.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said it was the report of the Public Petitions Committee that was referred to.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN thought the position taken up by the Hon. Mr. MacGregor incontestable, because the question to be considered now was, whether any Englishman who had been accused should be punished ignominiously for an alleged offence without being allowed a hearing, and without having an opportunity of making a statement in his own defence. He had not read through the papers, and so could not see exactly how the whole affair originated, but he had a suspicion, after glancing at some of the letters shown him, that there was a very strong departmental tinge about the whole thing. It appeared to him that the Government had been hurried into the position by departmental prejudice in the matter. They all knew that there was such a thing as too much departmental zeal in certain matters, and that a department sometimes wanted to deal precipitately with a matter without proper consideration. He would not say that it was so in this case, but that was the strong suspicion engendered in his mind on looking through these papers. Now, they had all felt, in reading old stories of men being imprisoned without being allowed to say a word in their own defence, the intense agony these men must have suffered from the hopeless inability of speech or action when their liberty and their character were at stake; and he could conceive that it would be equal agony to any man who was, as in the present case, ignominiously punished without trial. For it was ignominious punishment that was inflicted on Major Brown. He did not know him, nor did he profess to have mastered his case; but he must be suffering an intense sense of wrong, owing to the fact that he had been ignominiously punished without his being able to open his mouth—an agony similar to that of the man who was thrust into gaol without having an opportunity of speaking for himself. That was the point which they all felt to be a terrible thing, and he thought his honourable friends on that bench would not wish any man to be put in such a position as that. All that the report of the Committee, as he understood, said was this: that this man had not had a fair hearing, and that they asked that he should have a fair hearing. He took that to be the position.

Hon. Mr. MacGregor

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY quite approved of that.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN was glad to hear his honourable friend say so, because he had feared the Government was going to oppose the report of the Committee. He had given his reasons for supporting the amendment, and he hoped it would be unanimously adopted, because the point the Committee had affirmed was that sentence had been passed upon a man who it now appeared had not had a hearing, or an opportunity of speaking for himself.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY had explained his reasons for moving the adjournment of the debate; but it seemed that they were not understood. It was because of the fierce attack made by honourable gentlemen on the Government.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the honourable gentleman had put some new documents on the table.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had put no papers on the table whatever.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—Then, a report.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said no further report had been laid upon the table. He had handed the Hon. Mr. Bowen some papers of a confidential character, for his own perusal. If the Hon. Mr. Stewart wished to see them he could do so.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said that so much had been said on the question that he now felt it to be his duty as a member of the Committee to say something upon the matter. As regarded the matters referred to, he considered they were not trying this man for any past offence: this never came within the jurisdiction of the Council at all. They had to decide on a petition presented to them. He would say that his first vote was against the report submitted to the Council. On the second occasion, after hearing the evidence of Judge Kettle,—and this was the gentleman who brought the matter under the notice of the Government,—he gained sufficient knowledge to enable him conscientiously to reverse his previous opinion, and vote in favour of the report that was subsequently submitted. He thought that this Major Brown had been treated—to put it very mildly—in a most harsh manner. He did not think that the man had been treated as a man should have been, under the circumstances. Supposing he had been guilty, the punishment ought to be in proportion to the offence; but, as it turned out, he was not guilty of any dishonourable action, or anything but what nineteen out of twenty interpreters in the colony might have been guilty of through ignorance. He put the question himself to Judge Kettle whether the declaration that was submitted to the Trust Commissioner was literally and truly translated, and the Judge said it was. He asked him, Was it suggested that Major Brown was guilty of dishonest conduct, or of complicity in any dishonest transaction? and Judge Kettle said, “No.” He absolved him from any imputation of the sort. That being so, it was sufficient to satisfy him (Mr. Rigg) that the whole point at issue rested on a question of Judge-made law. The Judge had determined that an interpreter must give to his client the information which he possessed if that information was contrary to the facts stated in the declaration. Major Brown explained this by saying that he considered the payment made to an agent was payment made to a principal; and that was the way any man looking at it from a common-sense point of view would look at such a transaction. The whole question at issue was as to whether an interpreter was supposed to give his client other information in his possession, or whether it was his duty to properly and truly translate the document put before him: that was the point at issue, and that could only be decided by the inquiry asked for. He considered that the prayer of the petition should be favourably considered by the Council. It was not right that a man should be convicted under such circumstances without having an opportunity of defending himself.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said he was not present when the Attorney-General was speaking that afternoon, but he understood he brought further charges against Major Brown.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I did not.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—Or insinuations?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I did not.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—Then, I have been misinformed.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY had said he made no charges whatever, nor did he intend to make any.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—But you referred to some.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I referred to what the honourable gentleman said.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART understood that the honourable gentleman had said Major Brown had done something wrong on a previous occasion.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the honourable gentleman referred to evidence brought forward before the Committee, and the manner in which he characterized it he did not wish to refer to, but, at any rate, he said there was an unwarrantable means adopted of bringing this evidence before the Committee for the purpose of influencing them; and he (Sir P. A. Buckley) had said that subject had been inquired into on a former occasion. He would not have referred to it if the honourable gentleman had not done so.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said he referred to it because, as a last resource, the Premier had referred to it. He put the question to the Premier when in Committee, on what grounds he dismissed Major Brown, and the Premier said, "For giving a false translation, or interpretation, of the document." He then asked the Premier whether any further grounds influenced him, and after some hesitation he said there were further grounds. He (Mr. Stewart) asked him to satisfy them what they were, and the answer he got was that the man was of a very bad character. He asked him on what grounds he based the charge of bad character; the Premier then referred to somebody who was present—Mr. Sheridan, he thought—with reference to the report brought up by Sir William Fox, and, upon this report being examined, instead of its reflecting on Major Brown in any way whatever, if anything it tended in Major Brown's favour. He was extremely glad that the Premier gave his evidence, because the absolute hollowness of the whole proceedings were thoroughly exposed, and a more arbitrary and harsh proceeding he hoped, at all events, would never be committed in this colony, and he hoped the Government—he did not wish to give advice, because he knew the honourable gentleman would not take it—would not attempt any similar proceedings in this colony; otherwise the public service would be utterly demoralised. No man would be able to call his soul his own. He did not know Major Brown; until he came before the Committee the other day he had no knowledge whatever of him; but he was struck with the insatiable desire apparently manifesting by some parties who appeared there to crush this man, and the attempt made by one party who was present as a witness he thought was not at all creditable; but it was only an illustration of what might happen to a man who chose to assert himself. He hoped the lesson given in this instance would be of some benefit to other members of the community.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said the Hon. Mr. Bolt had put the case very fairly to the Council. It was a question about giving Major Brown an opportunity of having a trial before a Judge. He did not think the Hon. Mr. Stewart was doing the best in the interests of justice by prejudging the case. His honourable friend was prejudging the case, and that, he considered, was not in accordance with what was considered to be the best way of arriving at a just decision. His colleague (Sir P. A. Buckley) had referred to the language which the Hon. Mr. Stewart made use of yesterday. The honourable gentleman made an attack on the Government, and he had made another attack to-day, respecting the evidence given before the Select Committee of the Council on a former occasion, which he (Mr. Stewart) thought should never have been given at all. Now, he understood the whole of the evidence had not been taken down in shorthand, and was not available for the Council to make use of, or to justify the honourable gentleman in denouncing it as evidence that should never have been given. The Hon. Sir P. A. Buckley had referred to that evidence to-day as one of the matters which the Government would of course take into consideration when considering what to do with the interpreter who was the cause of the trouble. That was all he (Mr. Montgomery) had got to say about the matter. He had not prejudged the case. He understood that the consensus of opinion—the opinion of a very large majority of honourable members—was in favour of this case going to this other tribunal; and the Government did not intend to divide the Council on the question, because they only wanted to see the thing done fairly. The Government were quite able to show that in this case they did not act harshly or with cruelty, and that the statements to that effect were not warranted by the facts which had come within the knowledge of the Select Committee of the Council.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE thought it was reasonable in the interests of Major Brown that he should state that he had not the honour of the gentleman's personal acquaintance, and he had never spoken a word to him in his life. Therefore, in speaking as he had done yesterday, he was actuated merely by feelings of sympathy with an old soldier to whom he thought wrong was being done. His reason for making this statement was that it appeared some honourable members had thought that his exceptional warmth in speaking as he did was due to personal attachment to Major Brown. The fact was that they had been in the service together in the same country, but he had never spoken to this gentleman in his life; he had exactly the same interest in him as he would have in the commonest private soldier who had served anywhere. The whole thing seemed to him to be entirely simple. What was the custom in this case? Was an interpreter to interpret merely, or was he to perform every other part of an agency business? He was of opinion that it was an interpreter's business to honestly interpret whatever he was called upon to interpret, and that when he had done that he had done his duty. That was the source of his warmth. He spoke also from the conviction that this was one of those cases of which they had many illustrations in contemporary history—that this was one of those unfortunate men who were always trampled upon; and that kind of man always excited his sympathy.

Hon. W. Downie Stewart

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that, as the Hon. Dr. Grace had seen fit to explain the source of his warmth, he thought it was as well that he should explain the source of his (Mr. Mantell's) coolness. It was this: that, while the Hon. Dr. Grace had no knowledge whatever of Major Brown, he (Mr. Mantell) had known him for fifty years, and he had seen nothing at all to shake his confidence in him; and therefore it was that he not only wished him to have a fair trial, but that he was perfectly confident the result would be in his favour.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 7.—Number of hands for coastal or intercolonial-trade vessels.

"Nothing in this section shall be deemed to affect steamers plying within river limits only."

On the amendment made by the Labour Bills Committee by striking out the word "only" to insert "or extended river limits,"

The Committee divided on the question "That the word 'only' stand part of the clause."

AYES, 5.

Bolt	Jenkinson	Rigg.
Buckley	Montgomery

NOES, 21.

Acland	McLean	Shrimski
Barnicoat	Morris	Stewart
Bonar	Oliver	Swanson
Grace	Peacock	Taiaroa
Jennings	Pharazyn	Walker, L.
Kelly	Reynolds	Whitmore
MacGregor	Richardson	Whyte.

Majority for, 16.

Word omitted, and amendment agreed to.

Clause 14.—Wages on vessels on time agreement to be paid monthly.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR moved to strike out the words "on the first day," in order to insert, in lieu thereof, "not later than the seventh day."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 9.

Barnicoat	Jennings	Montgomery
Bolt	Kelly	Morris
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg.

NOES, 14.

Acland	Pharazyn	Swanson
Bonar	Reynolds	Taiaroa
McLean	Richardson	Walker, L.
Oliver	Shrimski	Whitmore.
Peacock	Stewart

Majority against, 5.

Words struck out.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR moved, That the clause be struck out.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 10.

Bolt	Jennings	Morris
Buckley	Kerr	Rigg
Feldwick	Montgomery	Stewart.
Jenkinson

NOES, 18.

Acland	Oliver	Shrimski
Barnicoat	Ormond	Swanson
Bonar	Peacock	Walker, L.
Bowen	Pharazyn	Whitmore
MacGregor	Reynolds	Whyte
McLean	Richardson	Williams.

Majority against, 8.

Clause struck out.

Clause 17.—Offences of seamen and apprentices, and their punishments.

Subsection (6).—Assault on officers; imprisonment not exceeding twelve weeks.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR moved to strike out "twelve weeks," with a view to insert "six months."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 9.

Bolt	Jenkinson	Morris
Buckley	Jennings	Rigg
Feldwick	Montgomery	Stewart.

NOES, 12.

Acland	McLean	Richardson
Barnicoat	Peacock	Swanson
Bonar	Pharazyn	Walker, L.
Bowen	Reynolds	Williams.

Majority against, 3.

Words struck out, and amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time.

The Council adjourned at twenty minutes past eleven p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, 19th October, 1894.

Second Reading—Third Reading—Bills discharged—
 Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill—Post Office
 Bill—Ballance Memorial—Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Bill—Native Land Court
 Certificate Confirmation Bill—Native Lands
 Claims and Boundaries Adjustment and Titles Empowering Bill—Native Land (Validation of Titles) Bill—Banking Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READING.

Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation
 Bill.

THIRD READING.

Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation
 Bill.

BILLS DISCHARGED.

Rating of Crown Lands Bill, Fencing Bill, Mining Districts Land Occupation Bill, Beet-root Sugar Bill, Employers' Private Benefit Society Bill.

LITTLE BARRIER ISLAND PURCHASE
 BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Mr. HEKE said he desired to raise a point of order. He contended that the Bill was a private Bill, and he asked the decision of Mr.
 Speaker in regard to the manner in which it had been introduced.

Mr. SPEAKER.—My opinion is that the system of private-Bill legislation does not apply, and was not meant to apply, to Native lands or Native persons. Their lands, generally speaking, are held under special tenure.
 The Crown, in assuming the sovereignty of New Zealand, undertook the guardianship and protection of the persons and properties of the Native inhabitants; and, in dealing with their lands, there has always been a special system of land-laws, altogether distinct from the system for Europeans. Consequently the system of private-Bill legislation does not apply. Parliament has delegated its powers to special Courts for the investigation of title to lands and the ascertainment of the rightful owners;
 but it has not, in my opinion, thereby divested itself of its supreme authority in relation to land held by the Natives whenever it chooses to exercise it. In the present case, it is a matter of public interest that this particular island should become Crown property; and it cannot be supposed that the Ministers of the Crown, who are the guardians and trustees of the Natives, would see them wronged in the slightest degree. I understand the great bulk of the owners agree to the island being purchased by the Crown, and that there is, as usual, a dissenting minority, which renders it necessary that Parliament should interpose, and, whilst recognising the rights of a minority, however small, it will also take care that the rights of the majority are not overborne by the minority. The power of Parliament is invoked not in aid of private parties, but in the interest of the public.

Mr. HEKE desired to say that the title of the land in question had been registered under
 "The Land Transfer Act, 1885."

Sir R. STOUT pointed out that this was not Native land, but land held under a Crown grant.

Mr. SPEAKER said the land belonged to the Natives, and, in his opinion, it was not a case for legislation by a private Bill. He had given his decision on the matter to that effect.

Mr. ALLEN wished to put on record in Hansard the promise the Minister of Lands had made in Committee in regard to this Bill.
 He had asked the Minister whether he had agreed to appoint a Stipendiary Magistrate—
 Mr. Northcroft—to inquire into any grievances that Tenetahi had in respect to this purchase, a special grievance being that he had not been paid certain costs in connection with the acquiring of the title, and, if it were found that these had not been paid, that Tenetahi should be recouped the money expended in acquiring the title. The Minister had answered him in the affirmative on that question, and he would like to have it recorded in Hansard.

Mr. BELL also wished to record his protest against the passing of measures of this kind.
 He did not dispute Mr. Speaker's ruling, but he thought the Standing Orders ought to be amended so as to give the Maoris the same protection as the Europeans had. Every statement made in the preamble to the Bill might or might not be true, but the recitals in the preamble to an Act of Parliament were conclusive evidence of the facts there stated, and the House was here accepting, without evidence, all the facts given. There were only one or two members in the House who knew anything as to the facts of the case, and, that being so,— he was speaking quite apart from the merits of the particular transaction, as he knew nothing whatever about it; but assuming as he did that the document recited what was true,—he protested against the precedent which was here carried to an extreme, and beyond any Bill he had ever seen in connection with Native matters. The House had provided a tribunal to which all Bills dealing with the private rights of Europeans must be referred, and he submitted that the sooner they gave the Natives in respect to their lands, property, and money the same protection as they gave to the other subjects of Her Majesty the sooner would they be doing what was just and right to their fellow-subjects of the Native race.

Mr. HEKE said he desired to protest against the passing of this measure, which was an extraordinary one. He did not agree with it at all, as no doubt this was a surprise sprung upon the Natives interested in the island.
 Undoubtedly a surprise was sprung on the Native owners of the Little Barrier Island by the introduction of the Bill before the House, and by its being forced through at such a late stage of the session. The owners had been put to the expense of fighting for the land in the Native Land Court. There had been several rehearings of the case. Tenetahi himself had undertaken to pay all expenses in connection with the rehearing, and he had lost the large sum in legal expenses and Court fees of £700. The offer made to him by the representative of the Government for his interest was only £3,000; and he might say that he agreed to sign the deed and to take the sum of £3,000 as purchase-money for the Little Barrier Island, under a condition which he would read. In the first place, Tenetahi was requested by Mr. Tole to sell the Little Barrier to the Government, and he agreed to do so for the sum of £7,000. Mr. Tole did not agree to give him that sum, but offered £3,000, and Tenetahi agreed to sell the island for that sum, on the following condition. He would read the condition:—

"It is hereby understood that in signing the deed transferring Haururu to the Queen no money (consideration) is to be paid to any of the owners until all of them sign the said transfer,"—he might say that this portion of the conditions undoubtedly led Tenetahi to believe that the representative of the Crown would fulfil the condition, and he (Mr. Heke) believed it was mainly on this condition that Tenetahi attached his name to the document. Then it went on to say,—“and that if all the other said owners consent to Tenetahi receiving the whole of the said money (£3,000) the same shall be paid to him for distribution amongst all of the owners according to their respective shares.”

He wished to tell the House that this Native was undoubtedly deceived by the Government agent when obtaining his signature to the deed of 1891, because, if it were not for this condition, Tenetahi would never have had his name attached to that deed, and if Tenetahi had not signed his name to any deed this Little Barrier Island would not have been sold to the Crown. He would like to inform the House that Te Rahui, who was one of the owners who did not receive a portion of the money, was Tenetahi's wife; and Ngapeka, who was also one of the owners, and who had not signed the deed at all, was Tenetahi's daughter. She stood out. The fact of Tenetahi not taking the £3,000 was quite sufficient to give the House to understand that it was on account of the Government failing to fulfil that condition; and that was the reason why he no doubt urged upon his family not to accept any moneys offered to them by the Government. He (Mr. Heke) thought it was a breach of faith on the part of the Government representative, and, if that was so, the whole agreement was neither more nor less than waste paper. He believed, himself, that the Native Land Court and the Deeds Registry Office considered the agreement signed by Tenetahi and other Natives in 1891 quite valueless. However, this Bill was inconsistent with the Treaty of Waitangi; and he intended to raise the whole point of that Treaty, as it was far better for the Natives themselves to understand whether the Treaty of Waitangi, which was entered into in good faith by the Native chiefs and Her Majesty the Queen, was to be respected or not. It would be better for the Natives to understand whether the Government of New Zealand or the Imperial Government considered that the Treaty was to be respected at all or not, and, if it was not, the whole thing from beginning to end was a sham and a delusion. In 1840, when the Treaty was brought before the Natives at Waitangi, every Native understood that the Treaty was to be respected by Her Majesty the Queen, by the Natives, and also by every representative of the Crown in New Zealand. Looking at the action of the Government with reference to this Bill before the House, and other Bills affecting the Natives which had been confirmed, he thought that the Government must consider that that Treaty was waste paper. Therefore he repeated that the Natives in 1840 were deceived by the representative of Her Majesty. He wished to say that the power lay with the Governor, although he might not use it, under the Instructions issued in 1892, not to give his assent to any Bill the provisions of which seemed to be inconsistent with the provisions of any treaty. Now, this was undoubtedly inconsistent with the conditions set out in the Treaty of Waitangi. Those Instructions stated clearly that before the Governor gave his assent to any such Bill he had to forward that Bill for the direct assent of Her Majesty. However, he would say nothing further except to express his intention of protesting in the direction he had referred to.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said, with regard to what the honourable member for the Northern Maori District had stated as to the Treaty of Waitangi, he had his own views on that, and he knew that many other members of the House had also their own views upon it. He thought, himself, that the Natives had been very well treated; and that fact was proved by the House having to listen to the honourable gentleman who had last spoken on the Bill. With regard to the question raised by the honourable member for Bruce, what he had stated in Committee he would state again in the House, and that was that he would appoint Mr. Northcroft, the Stipendiary Magistrate for the Auckland District, to make a full and careful inquiry into the amounts that this Native Tenetahi had paid for the purpose of securing the title to this Little Barrier Island, and, when the Magistrate had made his report, any proportionate share that should have been paid by the Natives who had already been paid by the Crown would be paid if any was found to be due.

Bill read a third time.

POST OFFICE BILL.

Sir R. STOUT brought up the report of the Statutes Revision Committee to the effect that at that late period of the session the Committee had not sufficient time to give this Bill careful consideration. He moved, That the report do lie on the table.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved, That the Bill be made an order of the day for next day.

The House divided.

AYES, 40.

Buddo	Joyce	Pinkerton
Buick	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Cadman	Larnach	Reeves
Carnell	Lawry	Saunders
Carroll	Mackintosh	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McKenzie, J.	Stevens
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Thompson
Flatman	McNab	Ward
Guinness	Millar	Willis.
Harris	Mills
Hogg	Montgomery	Tellers.
Houston	Morrison	McLauchlan
Hutchison, W.	O'Regan	Meredith.

NOES, 22.

Bell	Lang	Stout
Button	Mackenzie, T.	Tanner
Duthie	Massey	Te Ao
Earnshaw	McGuire	Wilson.
Graham	Mitchelson
Green	Newman	Tellers.
Hutchison, G.	Russell, W. R.	Allen
Kelly, J. W.	Smith, G. J.	Buchanan.

Majority for, 18.

Motion agreed to.

BALLANCE MEMORIAL.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON brought up the following report from the Joint House Committee:—

"The Joint House Committee have the honour to report that they have agreed to the following resolution, which they recommend for adoption by the House, namely: 'In the opinion of this Committee, no monument should be erected in the grounds of the Parliament Buildings unless in the form of a statue of not less than life size; but, if it be desired to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. Ballance by a bust, there is no objection to a suitable situation being given in the Parliament Buildings.'"

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the recommendation of the Committee be adopted. He believed there were sufficient funds to provide a statue of life size. In regard to the contract very little had been done, so far as he understood. He felt sure he was speaking the almost unanimous voice of honourable members in trusting that the managing committee would meet the recommendation of the Committee of the House, and change the memorial from the monument intended to a life-sized statue, and put it in the Parliament Grounds.

Sir R. STOUT was very sorry that the motion had been brought up in that form, because it was perfectly well known that the committee had gone carefully into the matter, and had selected a certain monument; and, not only did the present proposal set aside all the committee's work, but he questioned whether they could get sufficient funds to erect a statue. The result would be simply to exclude the monument from the Parliament Grounds. That was what the report meant, and nothing else. He did not think it should be excluded from the Parliament Grounds; there was nothing wrong with it, and he thought it ought to be allowed. He therefore should vote against the adoption of the report. He would also like to know whether the minutes of the Committee had been brought up, as was required to be done by the Standing Orders.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the minutes had not been brought up, because there was only one resolution proposed—that now reported—and it had been carried almost, if not quite, unanimously by the Committee. The opinion of the Committee was that the memorial proposed was quite unsuited for erection in the grounds of Parliament Buildings, and, indeed, was not worthy the memory of the late Mr. Ballance.

Mr. PIRANI did not think that anybody who had seen the design would think of recommending that the monument should be erected in the Parliament Grounds, especially when the Committee had an offer from a sculptor, who had done good work at Home, and who held the medal of the Royal Academy, to produce a life-sized statue for the memorial in question at exactly the same cost. He was very glad the Committee had refused, and he had no doubt the members, if they saw the proposed memorial, would back up the refusal of the Committee.

Mr. GUINNESS thought that the proposed refusal was the very best thing that could happen. He would, however, suggest whether it was not worthy that Parliament should vote such a sum as might be required for a suitable memorial in the Parliament Grounds to the late Hon. J. Ballance.

Mr. McGUIRE thought it was a pity that a statesman who had rendered such great services to the country as the late Mr. Ballance had rendered should not have a monument suitable to his merit to perpetuate his memory subscribed by the people of the colony. He believed it would not be right to take money from the public funds for this purpose, but thought that even now sufficient funds could be obtained to provide a suitable monument, and that it should be erected in the Parliament Grounds. He should therefore vote against the report.

Mr. SEDDON said he should be the last in the House who would do anything to prevent anything being done that would honour the memory of his late chief, whose memory should be deservedly revered. He had no objection to a memorial being placed in such a position as would do honour to his memory; but he did not agree with placing a bust upon the top of a monument, as was proposed. If that were done it would simply be an eyesore for all time; and he thought something better should be done, for in providing something better they would be only doing their duty. He could assure the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that the Committee had adopted the proper course. He had himself made inquiry of the contractors as to whether any expense had been already incurred, and was told that practically none had been; so that they would be able to change the contract and arrange for a life-sized statue which could be placed in the grounds: and if the friends of other eminent men who had passed away desired to do the same for those who had served their country well, that might be done. This was a new departure, and he thought it was well they should be careful to see that any memorial placed in the Parliament Grounds was suitable. He thought there was money available to do what was suggested, and, if there was not, he felt sure the people of the colony would not let the matter rest, but would give sufficient to do honour to their late chief. He hoped the motion would be adopted unanimously.

Motion agreed to.

HOSPITALS AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS BILL.

The House divided on the question, "That this Bill be discharged."

Ayes, 36.

Bell	Hall	Montgomery
Buchanan	Harris	Newman
Buddo	Hogg	Russell, W. R.
Button	Houston	Saunders
Carnell	Lang	Seddon
Carroll	Larnach	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	Maslin	Tanner
Duncan	Massey	Thompson
Duthie	McKenzie, R.	Wilson.
Flatman	McLauchlan	Tellers.
Graham	Meredith	Earnshaw
Green	Mills	Stevens.
Guinness

Noes, 25.

Allen	Lawry	Pirani
Buick	Mackenzie, T.	Reeves
Cadman	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McGowan	Stout
Hutchison, G.	McGuire	Ward.
Hutchison, W.	McNab
Joyce	Mitchelson	Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.	Morrison	Millar
Kelly, W.	Pinkerton	O'Regan.

PAIR.

For. Carncross. Against. Te Ao.

Majority for, 11.

Motion agreed to, and Bill discharged.

NATIVE LAND COURT CERTIFICATE CONFIRMATION BILL.

Mr. SEDDON said this Bill provided for two matters—first, that a Native Land Court Judge might be appointed a Judge of the Validation Court. Circumstances had arisen from time to time which made it desirable that this power should be given, as there were some Native Land Court Judges who were very competent for this position, and who could be trusted with the duties. With regard to the latter part of the Bill, a doubt had been raised as to the legality or otherwise of certain transactions on account of Judge Barton, who was appointed Judge of the Validation Court, having held at the same time the position of Judge of the Native Land Court, and to remove that doubt section 5 of the Bill had been drafted. He moved the second reading.

Sir R. STOUT hoped the House would not agree to the Bill. Last year it was agreed that a Validation Court should be set up, and after careful consideration it was provided that the person who had to undertake the duties of Judge should be one who was a thoroughly equipped and trained man. The Premier seemed to think that this validation business was like Native Land Court business; but they had no relationship at all. The Validation Court dealt with European titles, and had to see whether the law had been complied with, and whether good faith had been kept. Many of the Native Land Court Judges were incompetent to fill this position. He submitted that there was no need for the Bill, and that it would open the door to all kinds of transactions being dealt with, and to the law being evaded. He hoped the House would not consent to the second reading of the Bill, as he felt sure if it had been sent to the Native Affairs Committee it would have been put into a different shape from its present shape. In the Act of last year it was provided that no Judge should be appointed unless he had some security of tenure; and what was proposed in this Bill was an underpaid Judge, who might be removed by the Government at a day's notice. There was no security of tenure. He might be called upon to deal with hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of European property; and why should a Native Land Court Judge be appointed, who was entirely under Ministerial control? He submitted it was neither just nor right. He would not say that another Judge should not be appointed; but the person appointed should have a certain security of tenure, and be a thoroughly equipped and trained man. He trusted the Bill would not be proceeded with.

Mr. STEVENS hoped the Bill would be proceeded with. In the early part of the session he had asked the Native Minister whether it was his intention to establish Validation of Titles Courts on the west coast of the North Island and in other parts of the colony as well as at Poverty Bay. Considering the Poverty Bay district had had a Validation of Titles Court for the past twelve months it was the right thing to have them in other parts of the colony also, and the Minister would then only be dealing fairly and justly with other sections of the colony. On the west coast of the North Island, and in the Auckland Province, there were a large number of cases very similar to those at Poverty Bay, and which were of very great importance to the persons owning property, and it was a monstrous thing that they should have to go on from year to year without having that opportunity of redress the House could give them. There were Magistrates and Native Land Court Judges who would make good Validation Court Judges; and what was wanted was not necessarily a professionally-trained man, but one with a special knowledge, and one who would do justice both to the interests of Maoris and of Europeans. It was not wrong but in keeping with the business of a Native Land Court Judge that he should be empowered to validate titles, inasmuch as he occupied the position of having to pass any transaction in his capacity as Native Lands Frauds Prevention Commissioner. There was no difference whatever, and he hoped the Bill would be proceeded with and passed through all its stages this session.

Mr. MITCHELSON hoped the House would not agree to the passing of the Bill in its present form. So far as he was concerned, he did not see any serious objection to clause 5, but he did see very serious objection to clauses 3 and 4, and, if the Government did not agree to amend these clauses in Committee, they would do an injury to the colony, as the ordinary Native Land Court Judges were not competent to deal with complicated cases, or with the validation of titles. With regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Rangitikei, he was no doubt desirous that a Validation Court should be set up on the west coast of the North Island, and there might be a very large number of titles upon the west coast which required validating just as much as the cases on the east coast did; but at the same time there might be some titles that ought not to be validated, and, if there were such a large number as the honourable member stated, the Government ought to come down with a Bill empowering them to appoint another Native Land Title Validating Judge: but he would not be a party to the ordinary Judges of the Native Land Court being allowed to take the position of Judges of the Validation Court, as it was not in the interests of either the Natives or the Europeans that any person who had not had legal training should be placed in such a responsible position. He would ask the House to strike out clauses 3 and 4, as, if left in the Bill as at present drafted, they would do, he considered, a great injustice to the colony.

Mr. BUTTON hoped that the Bill would pass into law, as it had been desired for a long time, the benefit anticipated from the establishment of the Validation Court not being complete. To obtain that benefit, no doubt, it would be desirable, if practicable, to obtain the services of a gentleman acquainted with the law, and having a legal training. In many instances throughout the colony there were first-class men, Resident Magistrates for instance, who were quite competent to discharge their duties, but who had not had a legal training. Some 4.30. of them had been temporary Magistrates. He was not acquainted with the gentlemen personally, but he said if they were suitable for that position they were suitable for the other. He should support the Bill, because he knew how necessary it was that the Northern Division should have the benefit of a Validation Court. Looking to the large blocks in the Hawke's Bay District which the honourable gentleman had referred to, the Judge that had been specially appointed to that district had been dealing with those cases, which were of the greatest magnitude; and similar cases might very well be committed to those Judges. He hoped the House would support the Bill, which was urgently required.

Mr. Stevens

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said this Bill was entirely at variance with the reasons adduced for passing the Bill of last year. Every reason for passing the Bill of last year was a reason against passing this one. It was said, and rightly said, that the work of the Validation Court was work which required peculiar ability, not such as that of the ordinary Native Land Court Judge, but such as might properly qualify a Judge to determine the largest questions. It was in the interests of suitors that this Court should be presided over by men of eminence. If they were going to have an ordinary lay Judge of the Native Land Court to determine some of these questions the effect would be only to promote litigation. The whole scope of the Act of last session was to give this special appointment to Judges removed from the influence of Ministers. He pointed out that the Act of last session gave power to appoint any number of Judges necessary, and the Act contemplated that the Validation Courts should be self-supporting.

Captain RUSSELL would like to say a word or two with regard to the anxiety of those honourable gentlemen who desired that there should be more Judges of Validation Courts than there were at the present time. No one knew better than himself the difficulty there had been in obtaining a clear title, but the powers conferred under the Native Land (Validation of Titles) Act of last year were so very wide that they should only be vested in a person who was specially trained in both the law and equity Courts. It was paying no bad compliment to the gentlemen occupying the position of Judges of the Native Land Court when one said that they might prove entirely unfitted for the duties and powers conferred upon Judges under the Native Land (Validation of Titles) Act of last year. By all means let the Government appoint some person specially qualified to act, in addition to Judge Barton. He would have no objection to that, but, on the contrary, would be extremely pleased to assist the Government to adopt such a course as that. One knew that many of the Native Land Court Judges were no more suited for that position than the ordinary layman. Some of them were quite unfitted for it, at any rate. If honourable members would take the trouble to look at the 9th clause of the Native Land (Validation of Titles) Act of last year they would see what enormous powers were conferred upon this Judge. Power was granted there to accept or refuse evidence, in a manner not done by a Supreme Court Judge; and to perform such an office, or to hold such power as that, must require a man of very great prudence and discretion, and also of legal experience. He would not inflict upon the House the whole of the provisions of that law, but it would be found, from end to end, that it conferred such powers on the Court that it would be extremely injudicious to confer them on a Judge of the Native Land Court who had not had special training. Another serious objection was that any person holding such an appointment as Judge of the Validation Court ought not to hold that appointment at the will of the Government. Under the 8rd clause of the Bill before the House any appointments to be made under the Act might be at any time cancelled by the Governor. There was not the slightest desire on his part to impute any evil motives to any member of the Government, but the principle in regard to our Courts of justice should be that the Judges of such Courts should hold their office free from Government control in every respect. So long as there was power to cancel his appointment at any moment that the Government might choose, there was no doubt that the Judge would hold his appointment at the will of the Government. He would like the Premier to consider the objections raised; and, instead of allowing any Judge of the Native Land Court to become invested with the powers which, to his (Captain Russell's) mind, such Judge might possibly be unfit to properly exercise, he should appoint some person who was duly qualified by special training and status to occupy the position, and who should be named to the House before appointment.

Mr. R. THOMPSON said no doubt such a Bill as this was required, as the sooner all these doubtful titles were set at rest the better for everybody. He would, however, like to point out that the appointment of a Native Land Court Judge for such duties as were conferred by this Bill would not meet the approval of the public. If these titles were to be settled at all when there was any dispute, they should be settled by a Judge of the status of a Supreme Court Judge. Neither Natives nor Europeans would have confidence in the decisions of any Judge of the Native Land Court. What had really given rise to the necessity for this Bill was nothing but the blunders of those Judges. Of course he held that a great many of those Judges had probably acted with the very best intentions, but they had made blunders year after year to such an extent that the legislation of the colony had got into a regular muddle. And supposing any of these Judges were appointed under this measure, they might find themselves in the position of having to review some of their own blunders and decisions; and was it likely that any Judge of the Native Land Court would condemn any action of his own which he might have to review? He held that the success of the Bill depended upon the appointment of Judges that would have the confidence of both races. No matter what appointment the Government made, unless the gentleman appointed occupied such a position as that, the Bill would be a failure. That was the only fault he saw in the Bill, and he hoped the Bill would be improved in that direction in Committee.

Sir R. STOUT.—What you want can be done under the existing law.

Mr. R. THOMPSON hoped whatever was necessary would be done, and he hoped the Premier would not insist upon appointing Native Land Court Judges.

Mr. W. KELLY intended to support the Bill. He had presented a petition that year from residents in the Bay of Plenty district who were anxious to have a Validation Court established there as well as in the Gisborne district. There were many cases that required to be settled, and the sooner there was a Judge appointed to investigate these matters the better. There was nothing to prevent the Government from appointing a legal professional man both to the Native Land Court and to the Validation Court if necessary. With regard to what the honourable member for Marsden had said as to this legislation being necessary owing to the blunders of the Judges of the Native Land Court, he did not agree with that. He considered it was due to the blunders in the legislation passed by the House. In many cases one Act contradicted another; and the Government, as well as private individuals, got into trouble and difficulty in consequence of the defective legislation passed by the House. He trusted the Bill would pass, so that some redress would be afforded to many people who were suffering on account of the defective legislation of the past.

Mr. BELL was sorry the Hon. the Premier was going to spoil one of the measures which had brought credit upon his Government. The Act of 1893 was a credit to the Government that brought it in. Every care was then taken to escape the danger of any influence being brought to bear upon the Judge who was appointed. The honourable gentleman himself, or whoever had charge of the Bill of 1893, took care that the Judge should be appointed for a term of three years, that his salary should not be forfeited during his term of office, and that he should not be interfered with in any way, the object being that the Judge of this particular Court should be a man above suspicion. He did not say that a Judge of the Native Land Court was not a man above suspicion, but he asked the honourable gentleman why he wished to depart from the conditions which were considered necessary last year. He hoped the honourable gentleman would not press the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON desired to say that there was an absolute necessity for these Courts to be set up in different parts of the colony, and he considered, himself, that one of the standing blot upon the present legislation and upon past administration was that this had not been done before. With regard to the argument that the appointment of the Judge should be for a term of three years, this was not the case under the Act of 1892. It was not at all necessary; and the Bill now before the House did not contemplate any fixed engagement. Now, they had the Native Land Court Judges. One or more of them were barristers and solicitors.

Captain RUSSELL.—They have got more than they can do.

Mr. SEDDON said they had not got more than they could do. In one or two cases he could put them on the validation work tomorrow if this Bill passed. It was monstrous to say that if a man was not appointed for three years he would not do his duty honestly, and fearlessly and creditably. He did not think such a reflection as that should be cast upon gentlemen who were sitting on our bench. It also appeared to him that there were many of our Magistrates who were not solicitors who were just as competent as our Judges to decide what course should be taken in regard to the admission of evidence, and so on. He did not think the taxpayers of the country could afford to have a number of special Validation Court Judges appointed. Judge Barton was doing very good work. The present proposal was no reflection on him at all. Why should they not employ Native Land Court Judges? There were some Native Land Court Judges whom he would no more think of appointing Judges of a Validation Court than he would of cutting off his right hand; but there were others who might be appointed. The sooner the House backed up the Government and got these titles settled the better. If they did, they would help to promote settlement, remove difficulties, and get the work cleared off. That was what this Bill was intended for. He hoped the House would not embarrass the Government in its effort to settle this question.

The House divided.

AYES, 46.

Buddo	Houston	Pinkerton
Buick	Joyce	Pirani
Button	Kelly, J. W.	Reeves
Cadman	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Larnach	Saunders
Carroll	Mackenzie, T.	Seddon
Collins	Mackintosh	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	Maslin	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	Massey	Stevens
Earnshaw	McGowan	Tanner
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Graham	McLachlan	Ward.
Guinness	McNab
Hall	Meredith	Tellers.
Harris	Mills	Montgomery
Hogg	O'Regan	Morrison.

NOES, 13.

Allen	Green	Stout.
Bell	Hutchison, G.
Buchanan	Lang	Tellers.
Duthie	McGuire	Mitchelson
Fraser	Russell, W. R.	Wilson.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Carncross	Te Ao
Lawry.	Heke.

Majority for, 33.

Bill read a second time.

NATIVE LANDS CLAIMS AND BOUNDARIES ADJUSTMENT AND TITLES EMPOWERING BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEDDON moved the following new clause:—

"8B. The said Court is hereby empowered and directed to rehear the decision of the Court on the petition of the Aorangi No. 3 Block, so far as relates to the claim of

Mr. Seddon

Wi Mahuri Mataitana and those claiming in the same right with him to that portion of the said block named by the Court Aorangi No. 3G, hereinafter called 'the said land'; and to amend or vary the said decision, and any order made consequent thereon, or on the rehearing thereof, as if no such rehearing had been already had. And the District Land Registrar is hereby empowered and directed to amend any certificate of title issued under the Land Transfer Act for the said land as may be necessary to give effect to the decision on such rehearing, and, pending such rehearing, to enter a caveat against any dealing with the said land."

Clause added to the Bill.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

NATIVE LAND (VALIDATION OF TITLES) BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3.—Native Land Court Judges may be appointed Judges of Validation Court.

Mr. BUTTON moved to insert, before the words "of Judge of the Native Land Court," the words "or of Judge of a District Court or."

Amendment agreed to, and words inserted.

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the words "who is a barrister of the Supreme Court" be inserted after the words "Native Land Court."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 23.

Bell	Hutchison, W.	Parata
Buchanan	Joyce	Pere
Carncross	Lang	Russell, W. R.
Carnell	Lawry	Te Ao
Duthie	Massey	Wilson.
Earnshaw	McGuire	Tellers.
Green	Mitchelson	Hutchison, G.
Heke	Montgomery	Stout.

NOES, 40.

Buddo	Houston	Pirani
Buick	Kelly, J. W.	Reeves
Button	Larnach	Russell, G. W.
Cadman	Mackintosh	Saunders
Carroll	Maslin	Seddon
Collins	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Flatman	McLachlan	Ward
Graham	McNab	Willis.
Hall	Meredith
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Tellers.
Harris	O'Regan	Mills
Hogg	Pinkerton	Stevens.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Allen	Steward
Fraser.	Millar.

Majority against, 17.

Amendment negative.

Mr. SEDDON moved to add the following new clause:—

"5. The commencement in due form of proceedings in the Validation Court (hereinafter called 'the said Court') in respect of any claim, matter, or thing within the jurisdiction of the said Court shall operate as a stay of proceedings which may be commenced in any other Court in respect of the same claim, matter, or thing, or of any cause of action arising thereon. And after the commencement of any proceedings as first aforesaid no suit or action shall be commenced in any other Court in respect of the same claim, matter, or thing, or of any cause of action arising thereon:

"Provided that, if from any cause the proceedings in the said Court shall lapse or be withdrawn, or otherwise cease or be discharged from the consideration of the said Court, before final decision or determination of the matters at issue therein, the stay of proceedings or prohibition hereinbefore contained shall thereupon cease and determine."

Agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON moved to add the following new clause:—

"6. Section three of the said Act shall be read as if the words 'Native Land Court,' in the third line thereof, had been omitted therefrom."

Agreed to.

Bill reported.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT said he regretted that the Committee, in dealing with this Bill, had not made an amendment that should have been made in a Bill of this character. They had allowed power to the Governor to appoint for any period at will persons to deal with perhaps more important matters than a Judge of the Supreme Court had to deal with. Here was a Judge without any status, without any continuancy of office, and they had clothed him under the Act of 1893 with far greater powers than were given to a Judge of the Supreme Court. He had to decide on acts and awards worth thousands of pounds to people; and they had left this power in the hands of a judicial officer who might be dismissed at a moment's notice, who only held office at the will of the Government. It was simply a degradation, in his opinion, of the judicial functions, and he was surprised the House submitted to it.

Mr. SEDDON desired to say that the functions that would be performed by a Judge of the Validation Court were such as a man of good sound common-sense, who would see fair-play as between the parties, could fulfil. It was not a matter of law.

Sir R. STOUT.—It is, entirely.

Mr. SEDDON said it was not entirely, as he had to act where there had been a violation of law; otherwise, if the transactions were legal, there would be no Judge of a Validation Court required at all. It was a question as to whether the dealings had been fair and honest between the parties, though in some respects the law had not been complied with. If there had been fair and straightforward dealings between the Natives and the Europeans, all the Judge had to do was to say that that was so, and to give a certificate. That was all that was wanted. He felt sure that among the Native Land Court Judges—it was not for him to name them—there were men who would do this work as well as any barrister or solicitor who might be appointed. The honourable gentleman was quite consistent, but he might say that in bringing this forward the Government were not desirous of casting any reflection upon the Judge of the Validation Court, who at present was doing very good work. They were not at all lowering that gentleman's position. But they had in many parts of the colony many titles to land which were defective. The Natives could do nothing, and at present lessees, or those who had agreed to purchase, could do nothing, and there had been a deadlock for years, which had kept back settlement. They said that should be removed at once, and this would remove it, and without costing the colony too much in the way of expense, which he thought was a matter that they must take into consideration.

Bill read a third time.

BANKING BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I think perhaps it might be opportune or desirable that I should briefly review the circumstances that have led up to the banking legislation of the Government this session, and why it is found expedient to ask the House to assent to the legislation that is embodied in the Bill I am now introducing. I should like to point out to honourable members that ever since the present Government took office the Australian Colonies have been passing through a very severe financial crisis, and more or less that crisis has been very marked in those colonies; and I think honourable members will agree with me in saying that the financial upheaval that took place in America and elsewhere has also, during the same period, been very marked, and has added to the troubles that existed in Australasia. I desire now to refer particularly to the manner in which the Australian crisis affected business there, and it is needless for me to remind honourable members that the strain on business there was enormous; and what I wish specially to draw the attention of the House to is the very serious effect the crisis had upon the public revenue of those colonies. In fact, I may say that in Victoria alone the loss of revenue has been as great as or greater than the total amount of the guarantee we gave to a banking institution in this colony; and I merely wish to say that, while there may be a difference of opinion as to whether or not it was expedient to follow the course we took at that time—I wish now to express my opinion—an opinion that is shared by many people in the colony—that the Government acted wisely in the interests of the colony in promptly giving that guarantee; and I go further and say that had the colony, at the time that we gave the guarantee, believed that we were going to lose the total amount of that guarantee it would still have been a wise and judicious step to take. And I affirm, after careful consideration, as a result of mature reflection since that took place, that, in my opinion, if the same business had to be done again, I, for one, and the members of the Government, would act precisely as was done upon that occasion. I wish to point out to honourable members that while the other colonies were passing through a severe crisis we have fortunately in this colony been able to avert such a crisis. We have steered through most difficult and critical times, and I think every member in this House will agree with me in saying that the country is to be congratulated upon that fact. There is no doubt that, so far as the Government knows, we are right in believing that the crisis which has been so far averted has been effectually prevented. Therefore, so far as this colony is concerned, we have every reason to believe that we have obviated in every respect the worst features of a crisis which has so disastrously affected the Australian Colonies. I wish to say that the legislation now proposed is not in any way owing to any fear or supposition on the part of the Government that there is any possibility of immediate trouble arising in this colony. The reason why the Government deem it necessary to place legislation on the statute book is that there is a long recess between now and the next meeting of Parliament, and we should not be doing our duty unless we saw that effect was given to the Act we placed on the statute-book last year to avert a crisis if the necessity arose, and which the House by the legislation it passed wished us to prevent. In regard to the 2nd clause in the Bill,—with reference to the proposed issue of bank-notes,—I may say, as honourable members will see, that the change contemplated is the striking-out of certain words in the original Act which affect the issue of bank-notes. In this way the legislation, as we have put it upon the statute-book, practically compelled the responsible officers of any institution desiring to take advantage of that clause to certify that, in addition to the assets exceeding the liabilities, they exceeded the liabilities to the amount of the capital. In the original Act we have, in addition, included the reserves and capital, and honourable members will know that this session we amended the legislation, removing reserves, but we did not remove the amount of the capital. Now, I should like to say, in reference to this matter, that, if it is intended that this legislation should be of any service, honourable members will see that as it is it would not be workable; and it is because we find that the legislation as it stands at present would be unworkable, and that it would not be possible, under certain circumstances, to have a certificate given saying that, in addition to the assets exceeding the liabilities, they exceeded the liabilities to the amount of the paid-up capital; and, that being so, we wish to place on the statute-book a law for the purpose of preventing a crisis should such a thing threaten to arise here at any time; and what we now propose would prevent it. So far as we can gather, in certain cases it is an absolutely necessary amendment, and in these cases as the law now stands it would not enable the provision to be of the service it was originally intended to be. Now, Sir, in dealing with this matter, I should like to point out to the House what the position is at present; and, in the first place, I wish to say that there can be, I presume, no such idea passing through the minds of honourable members as to suppose that the change we are now asking the House to consent to is what can be considered an unlimited issue of notes by any banking institution in the colony. If any honourable member thinks that is the case, I desire to disabuse his mind, and to point out this fact: that in the whole of the institutions carrying on business in the colony, with one exception, so far as I know, the law in regard to note-issue is as follows: that it shall not exceed the amount of the coin, bullion, and public securities held by the banks in the colony; and that the reserve shall not be less than one-third of the amount of the coin, bullion, and public securities held by the bank within the colony. There is only one bank—I shall not give the name—which is an outside institution, and which carries on business on Royal Charter. What the terms that guide its note-issue are I am not prepared to say, because I do not know the terms of the Royal Charter; but I merely wish to say that, out of six banks carrying on business in the Colony of New Zealand, the position of five, so far as the note-issue is concerned, is as I have indicated. Therefore honourable members will see that there is no such thing in connection with the note-issue proposed in this Bill as giving unlimited license to issue. It is limited in all cases in the way I have stated. That is the law, and there can be no variation in it by the Government or by the Governor in Council in any way. The Act provides that the amount of note-issue shall not exceed the amount of coin, bullion, and public securities held by the bank in the colony, and that the reserve shall not be less than one-third the amount of coin, bullion, and public securities held by the bank within the colony. That is the law which is applicable to the whole of the banks. I see no objection to stating the names of the banks which come under the law; perhaps it is better I should do so.

Mr. Ward

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—We know of one only under Royal Charter.

Mr. WARD.—The bank carrying on business under Royal Charter is the Bank of Australasia; the whole of the others are carried on, as far as the law is concerned, as I have indicated, and I merely wish again to repeat that there is no such possibility as an unlimited issue in connection with this proposal. I desire to say further that our legislation in this respect, if amended as indicated in this Bill, is in a better position than the Australian legislation upon the same matter. That is a very material point. There, while the bank-notes are deemed a legal tender, and are a first call upon the assets of an institution, that call can only be made provided they go into liquidation.

In that case the whole of the bank-note issue is a first charge upon the assets of the institution. But here there is no such thing as compelling them to go into liquidation before the colony would be able to make a charge upon the assets; and by the legislation we have passed in that respect our position is a much sounder one, as honourable members will see, than that of the neighbouring colonies, because, if we compelled a banking institution to go into liquidation—which, in my opinion is not desirable—the provisions of this Act would be adopted so far as the note-issue is concerned. I desire further to say, in regard to the note-issue, that the legislation we have already is not altered by this amendment. While the note-issue is to be the first charge upon the assets of institutions in the colony carrying on business in the colony—and rightly so—I intend to ask the House to amend the proposals I have here intimated by making it clearer, and putting it beyond all question, that, in addition to the ordinary assets of any institution that avails itself of this legislation, the paid-up capital, the uncalled capital, and the reserve fund shall be included. Honourable members will see that, in addition to the assets of any institution carrying on business in the colony, it is proposed to make available for a first charge against the note-issue the uncalled capital, called-up capital, and reserve fund—in addition to the ordinary assets of a banking institution. The question may be asked, In the event of this note-issue being authorised in the way I have indicated, would it be necessary to call up all securities in payment of the note-issue? In reply, I say that our position in that case would be that the whole of the assets, including the uncalled capital, the called-up capital, and the reserves, would stand against, and be available by the colony for, any repayments, should such be necessary. In that case our position is very superior to that of the neighbouring colonies, because we should have the whole of the assets, including the capital and reserves, of each institution in the colony, and the colony might avail itself of the assets of the bank as security for the repayment of the notes which might be issued in this colony. I think I have stated the position in connection with the matter clearly. I hope I have made it clear to honourable members in respect to the question of the note-issue and to any question that might arise.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Would the honourable gentleman read the proviso that is to be added?

Mr. WARD.—If the honourable member will look at the Act of 1893, section 3, he will find that it reads as follows:—

“After the passing of this Act all notes payable on demand heretofore, or hereafter to be, issued, circulated, or reissued in the colony by any bank under authority of this or any other Act of this colony in that behalf, shall, to the amount of the issue authorised, be a first charge on all the assets and property. . . .”

Then the words of the amendment I have indicated will come in,—“including the paid-up capital, the uncalled capital, and the reserve fund.” And the section will read on, “of that bank being assets for the payment of debts or other obligations contracted or entered upon, or due and payable in the colony; and shall be payable in gold only at the office of the bank, at the place of issue of the said notes respectively, anything contained in any other Act notwithstanding.” That will be precisely as the clause will read. I might say that when the legislation of 1893 which I have read from was passed by the House there was an impression in the minds of some honourable members that that legislation was being asked for for the purpose of enabling an immediate issue of notes to be made by some of the banking institutions in the colony.

I stated at the time that the Government had no such intimation from any institution, nor did we believe that it was likely to be given effect to. The results have now borne out precisely what I then indicated. There has been, fortunately, no necessity since the passing of that Act for any banking institution in the colony to avail itself of the legislation. I now desire to repeat what I said on a former occasion—that, so far as the Government are aware at the present time, we do not know of, nor do we believe that there will be, any necessity for this legislation being put into operation during the recess; and I repeat the same arguments which I adduced on a former occasion—that our anxiety is to be forearmed in case of any emergency arising, and it would be only in the event of an emergency arising that the provision of the Bill which I have stated to the House would be called into operation. I merely wish to state that that is the position, and it is the duty of the Government to ask the House in connection with this matter to see that our legislation upon it is as perfect as we can make it. That, Sir, is the principal reason that has actuated the Government in asking this House to assent to this legislation. In connection with clause 3, that, I think, requires little or no explanation from me. That is a clause which honourable members will see provides that before anything in the shape of arrangement is made by the Bank of New Zealand, or any other institution, by way of purchase of its assets, or of the sale by the bank itself of its assets to any other institution, or by way of amalgamation in any way whatever, it shall first of all be necessary that legislation shall be passed by this House to the effect that such proposals may be assented to. I merely wish to say that there never would have been anything in the shape of amalgamation entered into by the Government, or any proposals of the kind assented to, without the House being taken into the confidence of the Government, and having an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it; and before the House rises the Government wish to show that they are quite earnest in the matter by asking the House to assent to the provision in clause 3—and before anything can be done the House will require to be consulted in this important matter. I hope I have made these two matters in connection with this legislation clear. The Government hold it is their duty to ask the House to make provision, under the peculiar circumstances which have been going on in the civilised world so far as finance is concerned, to place everything in as strong a position as we can, so far as our relations with the financial institutions carrying on business in the colony are concerned. It will be the duty of the Government, as representing the colony, on any emergency arising, to act with promptitude and decision, and with judgment. That is the course we have endeavoured to take in the past, and I believe, as the result of our efforts, a severe crisis has been prevented from sweeping this colony. I now simply wish to say that the Government believe this will have the effect of steadying matters further. That the former legislation had a very steadying effect on the financial world, I think, goes without saying, and I believe the effect of this legislation will be the same. In conclusion, I can only say that all matters in connection with finance are of a very delicate character, and there can be no question that they require very careful handling. We have had in the past put upon us enormous and grave responsibility. The members of the Government have had to face great responsibility, as honourable members must know, and I know there are honourable members in this House who have had also an anxious time of it, and I think it goes without saying that we have passed through a severe and difficult time, so far as the financial operations of the colony are concerned. I venture to affirm, Sir, that no Government has had a more difficult task to perform than we have had, and no House has ever had more difficult legislation in connection with financial matters to put through than the present House has had. Speaking for myself, I have to compliment the House upon the way in which they formerly dealt with this very important matter, and I feel persuaded in my own mind that, as a result of the very valuable efforts of honourable members in reference to this question, the colony has been saved from a severe financial crisis. This legislation is proposed to prevent anything like trouble arising during the recess. The Government has no occasion to expect that any trouble will arise, but I invite the House to join in passing this legislation in order to be forearmed, in the event of any emergency arising.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, with regard to the 2nd section of this Bill, I think it is a very grave responsibility that the Ministers are taking upon themselves in asking the colony to become guarantors in a case where an institution cannot show any margin whatever between its assets and its liabilities—in a case where the whole capital of the institution has been lost. If this clause were confined to the Bank of New Zealand I should not wonder at all at the necessity for it, and should feel anxious to support such a clause; but I do not like this "letter of license" to support by our guarantee institutions which can show no margin whatever. It may be the Colonial Treasurer is right in saying that, inasmuch as the bank-notes are by the Bank-note Issue Act made a first charge, the guarantee of the colony will be protected by the mortgage which it will so obtain on the assets; but I do not think he has sufficiently discounted the fact that our legislation cannot create a charge upon the assets outside the colony. Unpaid capital outside the colony will be in a process of liquidation very possibly, and the colony will have no charge upon that part of the assets. We can only give ourselves priority over assets within our own jurisdiction. When the honourable gentleman says that the whole of the assets of the institution will be charged as a security for a guarantee he is considerably exceeding that which I believe to be the fact. I know that, if he has made up his mind to pass this Bill, it is of very little use for me to sound any note of warning. We approved of the guarantee which we gave, and I took my part in that, and am prepared to take my share of the responsibility. I voted with the Government in giving that guarantee; but I think there should have been an end of it. For my part, I look upon the moneys of the colony as moneys which I, among others, am sent here to guard. I do not like this freedom of hand in guaranteeing the accounts of private institutions. For the sake of stopping a crisis we must have a Bank-note Issue Act. The honourable gentleman has told the House that in Australia it is a condition that an institution should go into liquidation. But here an institution may go on, we having the first charge, which is given to the notes which we indorse; and until the necessity arises with the private institution the power granted will not be used. When the necessity arises! Sir, the necessity has arisen, according to the Bill which we are now asked to pass, if the whole of the capital has disappeared. The institution ought therefore to go into liquidation: it has no right to continue as a solvent institution and take the moneys of the people of the country, or deal with the country as a solvent institution, when its assets are gone. Why was the Bank-note Issue Act passed by us? To show that it was intended to support, and keep from danger of collapse, institutions that were able and fit to carry on business. This Bill is one to enable the Government to prop up with our guarantee institutions which, if they did not get this Bill, would be liquidated. I trust there are none such in the colony. I do not pretend to say there are; but, if there are not, what is the meaning of this legislation? Why does the honourable gentleman bring in a Bill relating to all banks carrying on business in this colony, and saying that the colony is to prop up with its guarantee institutions which are not able to show a margin in their assets? Millions have become so familiar with him that a few hundred thousands here and there are nothing. However, they are something to me, because I confess that I have not dealt in millions before. I am new to this talking of hundreds of thousands of pounds as if they were so many pence, and as if we had not to find the taxation to meet them. With regard to this clause, I say it ought to have been confined to the one institution mentioned in the next clause. In clause 3 the Bill deals with the Bank of New Zealand, and I think clause 2 also should only deal with the Bank of New Zealand. We are behind that bank, and we must continue our guarantee, no doubt. We have two millions of money there in which we are interested. Whatever may be the position of that institution, we have declared that we will support it, and the honourable gentleman is, no doubt, only doing his duty in saying that if it cannot be shown that their paid-up capital is still intact we must nevertheless continue our support. But the clause should be confined to that institution, and we should not give the Treasurer the license he seeks. In regard to the next clause, I say that the honourable gentleman has now adopted the legislation which I ventured to press upon the House—namely, that no amalgamation should be carried out without the consent of Parliament. The honourable gentleman then told me I was entirely wrong, and quoted his Law Officers at me. I was satisfied when I brought in that Bill that I was right; but it was discharged from the Order Paper, and I then asked the honourable gentleman whether he would take up my Bill or introduce a Bill himself, and he told me and the House that he would not, and that he did not think it was necessary.

Mr. Ward

Mr. WARD.—I have not seen your Bill yet.

Mr. BELL.—I asked the honourable gentleman a question, Sir, which was on the Order Paper, and the honourable gentleman answered it.

Mr. WARD.—Yes, I answered it; but I have not seen the Bill.

Mr. BELL.—I asked the honourable gentleman a question with regard to it, so that the Government were aware of the Bill.

Mr. WARD.—I can assure the honourable gentleman that I have not seen the Bill.

Mr. BELL.—I congratulate the honourable gentleman upon having been convinced as to the correctness of the opinion which I expressed on a previous occasion. I shall support this Bill because of clause 3; but, if it were not for that clause, if I could get an honourable gentleman to tell with me I would divide the House against the second reading.

Captain RUSSELL.—I have very few words to say upon this Bill. The Colonial Treasurer told us that this is a question which requires to be dealt with with great care and delicacy. It requires a man with more knowledge of banking matters than myself to speak with any certainty upon it. Nor can it be denied that this is a matter which requires careful and earnest attention, when we remember that during last session we were constrained to pass the Bank-note Issue Bill, which was supposed to remove all financial troubles of this sort. This year we were told in His Excellency's Speech that the position of the colony was sound—perchance, the legislation which we had passed was having its desired effect; but a short time after a Bill was brought down to the House by which we were compelled to guarantee two millions to the bank, and we became virtually principal shareholders in the institution. We were told that would be final legislation; but immediately afterwards another Bill dealing with the Bank of New Zealand was introduced, and passed through this House, and once more we were told that there was finality in the legislation. Now we have another Bill introduced which will still further extend the power of assisting banks should emergency arise.

Mr. SEDDON.—Honourable gentlemen on that side have been asking for this Bill for the last month.

Captain RUSSELL.—No. We asked when the Bill we believed to be in type was to be introduced; but it was not this Bill, which is merely a Bill of one clause, for clause 3 I regard as mere padding.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) did not say so.

Captain RUSSELL.—My honourable friend is possibly far more competent to speak on this subject than I am, but I do not agree with him on this point. To my mind, this is simply a Bill increasing the powers in the Bank-note Issue Act. It is all very well to say that the colony will have no responsibility. Surely the introduction of such a Bill as this proves that grave apprehensions are felt by the Government as to the financial position of the colony during the recess. I do not see how it can be otherwise. The Colonial Treasurer told us that, while the other colonies were passing through a crisis, by the skill of the Government a crisis had been averted in New Zealand.

Mr. WARD.—I never said that.

Captain RUSSELL.—I said "the Government," but I will say "Parliament" if you like. Of course, the Government introduced the Bill, and was and is responsible for it. But the question one is compelled to ask oneself is, Does the Government believe that the danger has really been averted, or only postponed? Because it is reasonable to suppose, from their having to ask for additional powers, that there does lurk a suspicion in the mind of the Government that, though it has been averted for a time, trouble may still arise. If that is not so, why is there a necessity to introduce this further legislation and ask for further concessions to banks as in clause 2? If the honourable gentleman really believed that the danger had passed, still more drastic provisions than those already passed would be unnecessary. Then, when we trace step by step the way in which this has been done, it must lead us to believe that there is danger overhanging the colony, because the words "reserve funds" in the Bank-note Issue Act of 1893 were, by amendment, struck out of the Act, and now we are invited to strike out the words "by at least the sum of the paid-up capital"; and we are told, as the only reason for so doing, that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain that the assets exceed the liabilities and paid-up capital: but I think it is no more difficult to ascertain the one than the other. If it is difficult to ascertain the true position of the bank so far as its paid-up capital is concerned, why should it not be equally difficult to ascertain the relative proportions of the assets to the liabilities, more particularly when we remember the circumstances connected with the Bank of New Zealand? At the time when the Assets Company was floated we were told that by floating the Globo Assets Company the difficulties in connection with the bank were fairly passed, and that the bank in future would ride in perfectly smooth water. Not only this, but the shareholders of the bank were led to suppose that there would be sums of interest coming to the bank from the Globo Assets. That belief was impressed upon the shareholders for some time, and then by degrees the shareholders were informed that the interest to be derived from the Globo Assets was not coming in. Only a short time ago the chairman in England spoke to the same effect—that the position of the bank was a very sound one; yet shortly afterwards we were invited to pass the panic legislation which we have passed this year; and now we ascertain this fact: that the bank has actually had to find money in aid of the debentures of the Globo Assets Company. If that is the case, surely we must come to this conclusion: that all information of every kind derivable as to the position of the bank from first to last has been deceiving in the highest degree. If that is the case, is it not quite possible that in endeavouring to ascertain the assets and liabilities of companies we shall find ourselves quite deceived, as we have been as to the position of the Bank of New Zealand? We may be equally misinformed as to all the other institutions doing business in this colony. They may be perfectly solvent; their business may be carried on in the most prudent manner possible; but I, at any rate, shall not feel sure that the fact that certain assets are stated at a certain value can really be relied upon. From one cause or another there is no doubt about it there has been a large depreciation in the value of property going on for several years past, and it is quite possible that the assets of the banks and other institutions may have been steadily depreciating in value up to the present moment; therefore I feel, at any rate, that we do not know the truth in regard to the position of the banks; but we are asked to guarantee the payment of the notes of the banks if ever trouble should come upon them. The position, to my mind, is a most serious one, and one that ought to be considered with the utmost gravity and circumspection by every person whose duty it is to deliberate upon so important a question. I admit that what the Treasurer told us about the immediate liability of the colony for these bank-notes is more or less consoling. The amendment which it is proposed to insert in the 2nd clause of the Bill undoubtedly does fortify the position of the colony, because the amount of the reserved fund and the uncalled capital will, in all probability, be able to meet, in due course of time, any calls which may be made on the colony in case of the bank being unable to meet the note-issue. But we cannot ignore this fact: that, as in guaranteeing two millions to the Bank of New Zealand we were virtually creating a State bank, so now, by guaranteeing the note-issue of several banks, we are further intensifying the connection between the colony and the banking institutions in the colony. And that seems, to my mind, to be a very serious position. But not only that. In guaranteeing the note-issue of any banks are we not trending in the direction of floating upon this colony an inordinate amount of paper money? What effect that will have on the credit of the colony I feel I have not sufficient knowledge of banking matters to give a deliberate opinion upon. But, still, it does occur to my mind that in making a bank-note equal value under certain circumstances to so much coin we are in reality introducing into New Zealand a system of paper money which may be injurious to the last degree in the future. I think that the Government would have done more wisely if they had not introduced this Bill; or, having done so, I think they should have referred it to the Public Accounts Committee, so that the matter could have been exhaustively inquired into by men of technical knowledge, who would have been able to advise the House upon a point as to which an individual layman hardly dare express an opinion.

11.0. Mr. SAUNDERS.—Sir, this is at least the third time this session that the Colonial Treasurer has complimented this House upon its courage in dealing with public credit. I think, of all kinds of courage, that is the worst kind which enables persons to deal rashly and ignorantly with other persons' money; and especially with the public money, for which we are responsible in this House. When we were called upon suddenly, without an hour's notice, to guarantee two millions to the Bank of New Zealand I am sure I was not alone—I believe I felt very much as other members—in thinking that we had not sufficient knowledge to know whether we were wise in that step; and the reason why nothing was done in opposition to the proposals of the Government in that case was that we were not sufficiently informed on the position of the colony and of the bank to be able to take the responsibility of opposing what was proposed by the Colonial Treasurer with so much urgency. We have since had our knowledge very much extended, and I think we have, at least, found room for doubt as to whether we were wise in that respect or not. However, that is done, and it is not my intention to call that occasion into question at all. But now we are called upon to do, I think, a most unwise thing. We are called upon to guarantee not only the bank we have already guaranteed, but all the other banks in the colony, and upon information that certainly does not justify any Government in doing what is proposed under the Bill. I agree with all that has been said by the honourable member for Wellington City, and said so very modestly by the leader of the Opposition. Like him, I do not pretend to know anything at all about banks; but I do understand what we are asked to do, and if I do not vote against the second reading of the Bill I shall propose in Committee to strike out the last three words in clause 3, and insert "shall not apply to guarantee of bank-notes issued by the Bank of New Zealand,"—that is, the repeal shall not apply. This will guarantee what has become our own bank only on these new and too easy terms, and will leave the guarantee to other banks just as it was passed a year ago.

Captain Russell

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I for one cannot join in the congratulations the Colonial Treasurer has invited us to express with reference to the banking legislation of this session. I think it has been most unfortunate. The guarantee was given to the Bank of New Zealand in absolute ignorance of the true position of the case, and I think it must be now apparent that the Government did not know enough to be able to judge of the real surroundings of the matter at the time they induced this House to guarantee the two millions sterling. To acquit them of acting under dictation is to condemn them of culpable ignorance. They knew nothing of the circumstances. They were living in a fools' paradise, as indicated by their Speech from the Throne, and the demand burst upon them like a sudden storm. In the panic of the moment they would have rushed to any wild extreme that circumstances seemed to dictate. They have since then done much evil by copying Australian legislation on the subject of the note-issues, and threatening to reduce us, in that respect, to a level with the unfortunate experiences of the sister colonies. Now we are asked to go further in the same direction. I will, with the permission of the House, ask honourable members to realise what we are now invited to do. I doubt if the Colonial Treasurer has correctly informed himself of the position of the guarantee that might be given by Proclamation under the Act of 1893. He seems to suppose it might extend to all the banks carrying on business in the colony; but this is not so. A bank that is carrying on business here under an Imperial charter is not a bank that my honourable friend could by Proclamation cover. Clause 3 of the Act of last session makes this, I think, clear. It provides that—

"After the passing of this Act all notes payable on demand heretofore, or hereafter to be, issued, circulated, or reissued in the colony by any bank under authority of this or any other Act of this colony in that behalf shall, to the amount of the issue authorised, be a first charge on all the assets and property of that bank being assets for the payment of debts or other obligations contracted or entered upon, or due and payable in the colony; and shall be payable in gold only at the office of the bank at the place of issue of the said notes respectively, anything contained in any other Act notwithstanding."

Then we come to section 5, which gives power to the Governor in Council to make bank-notes legal tender. It should be remembered that the notes which the Governor may by this process make legal tender are those which have been issued under lawful authority, and, as the Colonial Treasurer pointed out, this could only extend to the amount of coin, bullion, and public securities held by the particular bank. Then, we come to the proviso, which, in the first instance, ran thus:—

"Provided that no Proclamation shall be made unless the Governor in Council is satisfied that as between the bank and its creditors its assets exceed its liabilities by at least the sum of the paid-up capital and the reserved profits."

We have already, on the invitation and under the guidance of the Ministry, by the Bank-note Issue Act of this session, struck out "the reserved profits," and now we are invited to strike out "the paid-up capital," so that the Government now propose to accept the position of a bank being able to show that its assets generally exceed its liabilities. But, as was pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), great part of the assets of most of the banks carrying on business in the colony are not within reach of any legislation we may pass. Their assets are outside the colony altogether, and entirely beyond our power. What I think should be done with reference to this Bill is to provide that a Proclamation making the note-issue of a bank legal tender should only issue where the Governor in Council is satisfied that the assets of the bank in the colony exceed the liabilities in the colony. That would be a fair and businesslike condition. I desire the attention of the House to the point that it is very important to safeguard this legal-tender business, because the colony is ultimately liable for these notes if from any cause the bank should not be able ultimately to pay them on demand. I ask the attention of honourable members to the 7th clause of the Act of 1893, which has been continued in force by the Bank-note Issue Act passed early in this session. It is,—

"At any time within six months after the expiration of the period limited by any original Proclamation under section five, or by successive Proclamations thereunder if there have been more than one, the Colonial Treasurer, on being satisfied that a bank-note covered by any such Proclamation has been duly presented for payment at the bank issuing the same, and has not been paid, shall, without further appropriation than this Act, pay the same in gold to any bonâ fide holder, not being a bank, who may present the same for payment at the Treasury."

So that we absolutely guarantee payment of the notes, besides making them legal tender. Now as to the clause in the Bill which deals with amalgamation. I think that the Government cannot be acquitted of very grave responsibility in connection with the negotiations set on foot with reference to amalgamation. No one can doubt that they were prompted by the Government. I believe, speaking entirely from outside information, that the Bank of New Zealand never desired amalgamation, and that amalgamation would not have been of any advantage to it. The suggestion of amalgamation came from another quarter altogether; and, in proof of that, I should like to read a passage from the remarks of Mr. John Murray at the special meeting of shareholders of the Bank of New Zealand held on the 26th of September last. He says this:—

"It has been asked why, when it appeared as if the Government really had no intention of allowing amalgamation to take place, the proposals in that direction had been published. Well, he was now in danger of saying things he ought not to say, but he believed, and still believed, that at first the Government were in favour of amalgamation; and certainly he should never have signed any provisional agreement unless he had been perfectly satisfied of that. However, circumstances arose which led the Government to alter its views. He could say no more than that."

It is perfectly clear there have been influences at work during the past few months which have not left the Bank of New Zealand the free hand that it should have had in the conduct of its own business. That is the reason mainly why I have given notice of a new clause, which would prevent any interference with the Public Account of the colony. The circumstances indicated by Mr. Murray which prevented amalgamation coming off have not been made known to us; we are left to surmise them; but it would seem, although no exact information was available, that, guided by the Press of the colony, public opinion became so strongly alarmed on the subject that the Government were unable to proceed as they had first intended. I think it cannot be doubted that the prudent course was to have referred the proposals as to amalgamation to some Committee of this House, which could have taken evidence on the subject and have found data to determine the question. That course, however, was refused, as it was refused in the instance of the two-million guarantee, and will probably be refused now. The Treasurer says this is a precautionary measure; but I cannot think these so-called precautionary measures are not hurtful in their tendency. This present proposal is one to whittle away part of the security which should be available in the event of the colony guaranteeing the note-issue of any bank in our colony. Such a course cannot but be more injurious than my honourable friend is willing to admit. I trust, Sir, in Committee an amendment such as I have indicated will be carried, as some safeguard if the colony is unfortunately called upon to make bank-notes the equivalent of gold. I also hope the new clause, as to preserving the Public Account intact to the Bank of New Zealand, will be added to the Bill. It is our duty to strengthen the bank in every reasonable way. To weaken it by dividing the Public Account would be nothing less,

Mr. G. Hutchison

I think, than a public wrong. We know very well that a claim has been put forward confidently by the Colonial Bank for a share of the Public Account. That such a demand should be resisted, I believe, is due to the Colonial Treasurer himself no less than to the colony. I have only one more remark to make with reference to the guarantee the colony has given the Bank of New Zealand. The Press has far and wide declared the position to be that, having guaranteed the two millions, the colony is now bound to see the Bank of New Zealand through any trouble that may arise. My honourable friend the member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) has expressed much the same view. Now, I, for one, desire to publicly state that I do not consider this colony is bound to give another penny towards rescuing the Bank of New Zealand; and unless circumstances are shown satisfactorily to justify further assistance such a step ought not to be contemplated. I believe that the information we have had since the Bank Guarantee Act was passed is such that, if we had had it when the Bill was before the House, the Bill would not have been allowed to go through without much opposition.

Mr. GUINNESS.—What information?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—"What information?" Well, it is perhaps not desirable to discuss the particulars on the floor of the House. I could give the very figures, but I doubt if that would be to the public advantage. I appeal to honourable members whether many are not satisfied that if the Bank of New Zealand Guarantee Bill were to be introduced to-night it would not be allowed to become law. And I protest against our action in that emergency, when we were suddenly confronted with a responsibility which perhaps none of us, under the circumstances, would have dared to face, being taken as committing the colony to anything further. Although we did not refuse the guarantee, we are not bound to more; and I, for one, wish to make it perfectly clear that, under similar circumstances, I would strive to keep the House from again doing as it did on that occasion.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Sir, I could not think it consistent with my duty as a member of this House to allow the second reading of this Bill to pass without stating my opinion upon the position, and I regret very much indeed that the Colonial Treasurer should have found himself under the necessity of bringing in a Bill containing such a clause as clause 2. I cannot understand any member of this House who realises the responsibility which should attach to his position agreeing to pass such a clause. Why, Sir, what does it really mean? That this colony is practically to indorse the bank-notes of any bank doing business in the colony, although the face-value of its assets is only sufficient to meet the apparent liabilities. The position seems to me to be a monstrous one, and I, for one, shall oppose its passing to the very utmost. Why, Sir, the Government, from the beginning of this business until now, have been plunging in the wildest manner possible.

In the first place, they were admittedly ignorant of the position of the Bank of New Zealand when they brought down the Bank Guarantee Act and insisted upon passing it at one sitting. Later on it was quite an open secret that they gave encouragement to the proposals to amalgamate the Bank of New Zealand and the Colonial Bank, and then, when they found that public opinion was very strongly against them, they withdrew their support at the last moment. It is also, I believe, a fact that within the last few days it was their full intention to take power from this House, if they could get it, to sanction the amalgamation of these two institutions during the recess, if they thought fit to do so, and also to dissociate the business of the Assets Company from the Bank of New Zealand. And now, as the final outcome of all this, we have a Bill put before us which goes much further, as I understand it, than any legislation ever passed in the colonies for such a purpose. The Colony of New South Wales, for instance, has got an Act on its statute-book which restricts the bank-note issue to one-third of the paid-up capital. Now, it is very difficult to make a fair comparison between the authorisation in New South Wales and that which we have here—namely, that the note-issue shall not exceed the total amount of coin, bullion, and public securities in the possession of a bank in the colony for the time being. I therefore think the Treasurer must admit that he is asking the colony to undertake a much greater risk than is borne by the Colony of New South Wales. I hope the honourable member, when he replies, will deal with this point. I think it is most important, and that the honourable gentleman will admit that it is so.

Mr. WARD.—What is the point?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The point is that, whereas in New South Wales the note-issue is restricted to one-third of the paid-up capital, and the law only makes them a legal issue in the country districts—not in Sydney—in the case of this colony, as mentioned by the honourable gentleman himself, the bank-note issue is already authorised, and is now proposed to be guaranteed up to the full extent of the coin, the bullion, and the public securities in possession of the bank for the time being.

Mr. WARD.—The things are different.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I stated that it would be difficult to make a just comparison between the two positions, but that I was satisfied the risk would be enormously greater under the Bill now before the House than is the case in New South Wales. Now, there is another important question not included in the proposed amendment of the honourable member for Patea, which only provides that no portion of the colony's business can be given to any bank other than the Bank of New Zealand. As I understand it, the agreement between this colony and the Bank of New Zealand does not in any way prevent the Government from making deposits with a bank other than the Bank of New Zealand. The Treasurer will, I suppose, during the recess, proceed to raise moneys under the Bills which we have passed during this session, and, as I understand it, there is nothing in the existing law, nothing whatever in the bank agreement now existing, to prevent the Treasurer from depositing some of the proceeds of these loans with a bank other than the Bank of New Zealand. I think this House should take effective steps to prevent this, because in the event of the particular bank becoming unable to meet its engagements we shall then be called upon to prop up still another bank with the guarantee of the colony. Dealing with such enormous risks as this can only end in disaster. Then, I wish to refer to another point. Taking the Scotsman of the 24th July last, we have a statement made there which has never been denied by the Treasurer, nor by any of the bank officials—namely, that £600,000 of the bank's moneys have been spent in improving the properties of the Assets Company since the formation of that company in 1890. Obviously, that must have depleted the bank's coffers to a large extent, while it correspondingly improved the securities for the million and a half of debentures held in England. Now, the honourable gentleman should take power to put an end to any further expenditure in this direction, because it would obviously weaken the position of the colony with regard to its two-million guarantee. I do not propose to say more at present, but when the Bill is going through Committee I shall endeavour, as far as I possibly can, to prevent clause 2 from passing in its present form.

Mr. DUTHIE.—The principal pretext for this Bill is that it will prevent amalgamation from taking place during the recess. I do not think that is any reason at all for introducing fresh bank legislation. I am sure the House would have been quite satisfied to take the word of the Treasurer that nothing of the sort would take place, and with the control which he has now got over the bank no amalgamation could possibly take place without his assent. Therefore so far there is no need for the Bill, and it is to be regretted that this subject is again before the House, because it is impossible to deal with banking questions again and again, in season and out of season, in this House, without much indirect injury resulting to the bank's interest. Since we are largely interested in the Bank of New Zealand the thing of all things now wanted of us surely is to let it alone and give the directors and the management an opportunity of putting things right. No such institution can succeed whose affairs are constantly brought before the House, as has been the case over the Bank of New Zealand; and I think the Colonial Treasurer was not justified in now introducing fresh measures affecting the bank unless under circumstances of the gravest necessity. Now, he does not pretend that there is any necessity for the Bill, beyond the reason just dealt with and the possible occurrence of a crisis during the recess, for which he says the banking legislation already on the statute-book would be insufficient, because it is alleged that to establish a bank's position as stipulated would take time, when to give time was impossible. It has already been pointed out, in regard to the excuse offered—that it would be impossible on short notice to show that a bank's paid-up capital was intact—that it was no more difficult than to produce a certificate proving that the assets exceeded the liabilities, and that therefore it was as difficult to satisfy the Government auditors in the one case as in the other. So that there is really no foundation for that pretext either, and we are thus driven to look elsewhere for the reason why this surprise is sprung upon us. These dangers as alluded to must have occurred to the Treasurer, and we have therefore to look further to learn why, in their presence, he introduced this Bill. Now, without pointing to any special bank, I cannot help thinking that it is with a view that advantage shall be taken of the Act by some bank or banks during the recess; and I fear that next session we may find ourselves so entangled with some bank, and their affairs so intermixed by this guarantee of notes, through moneys in its hands or otherwise, that, although the House would not now agree to assist such an institution, this entanglement will serve to drive the House next session into sanctioning an extension of assistance, for which there is no valid claim, and which will not be in the interest of the colony. I think that that is not a far-fetched argument, because we can now see quite well, despite the appearance of sudden emergency and haste with which the Bank of New Zealand guarantee was pushed through the House, that the step had been premeditated for months, that the whole scheme was laid by the London directors and management to be sprung upon us at the proper time, and we fell ready victims to that entanglement; and I do not think, from that experience, that I go beyond the mark in fearing that this is an attempt to get the colony entrapped in connection with another bank, and to assume another and an unknown liability. There is no justification for any Government coming to the rescue of a bank unless it first sees that the bank is solvent, and only when some grave crisis in public affairs had arisen which had brought it into temporary difficulties. It is only such circumstances that could justify the Government in coming to the aid of any such institution. It may then be done to avoid the disaster that overtakes a country through the failure of one of these institutions, but it is clearly only on some sudden emergency and when the bank can show that its position is sound that a Government is justified in stepping in to its relief. But here we are asked to agree to rescue or assist an unsound institution, because the bank we are providing for has admittedly lost its paid-up capital. If the working capital is lost, or even although only partially lost, and the assets still somewhat exceed the liabilities, it is in an insolvent condition, and the House has no right to undertake to come to the rescue of that bank; it should be wound up in the ordinary way. And, Sir, this quixotic assistance, this endeavour to save shareholders from the consequences of reckless trading, is bad; we are nursing certain banks into a chronic state of insolvency, and no colony can be prosperous with such insolvent institutions hanging over its commercial life. Danger lowers over it, since institutions of the sort, bolstered up in this weakly condition, are a great and increasing danger in the colonies. Then, the honourable gentleman, in speaking of the guarantee given by the Note-issue Act in New South Wales, kept using and repeating the word "Australia," thereby leading honourable members to suppose it was a general thing throughout Australia. Now, this measure is confined to New South Wales, and is there in force in the country districts only; the Act is not applicable to Sydney. A Bank-note Issue Act is in force in New South Wales, but there is nothing of the sort in the other colonies of Australia, and therefore the honourable gentleman should not have used terms which tend to mislead the House.

Mr. Duthie

Mr. WARD.—I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. DUTHIE.—Then my ears deceived me; but I have also seen the same language used in the morning paper.

Mr. WARD.—I have got the only Act here.

Mr. DUTHIE.—Unless my ears deceived me "Australia" was repeatedly used. The honourable gentleman also pointed to what had taken place in the early part of the session, in giving that guarantee for the bank, and he referred to it as a great success, and as having proved to be wise and judicious. Well, Sir, such a statement from the Treasurer cannot pass unchallenged, for, if it was the success he claims, members would feel justified, and would now be led to agree, and to go further in the direction proposed by this Bill. Now, I do not wish to say a word that would have the effect of injuring the Bank of New Zealand; but when so referred to, and to induce members to support this Bill, one at least is justified in briefly referring to what was said by the chairman of the bank at the meeting on the 27th August last in London, and when one looks at that speech it seems to me that the Treasurer surely cannot have read it when he tells this House and the colony that the Guarantee Act was a judicious step. We are aware that the Assets Company took over, for realisation, securities valued by Mr. Hean at £3,300,000 or £3,400,000 of the assets of the bank. The chairman on this question states,—

"Here I may say that the Board took office on the understanding that this report of Mr. Hean was to be accepted by the shareholders as a basis of what was practically the reorganization. Then, of course, the result of that was that in the balance-sheet of the bank there appeared in August, 1890, and has always appeared since, this large asset of £1,850,000 in the Estates Company's shares; and the bank, for the last four years, has really had a sort of dual existence. There has been the purely banking business of the concern, and there has been this lock-up of the assets. Now, the purely banking business of the concern has been good; it has been distinctly good. We have not only been able to pay a dividend of 5 per cent.—which, I admit, is not an exorbitant rate—but we have during the four years written off £60,000 of bad debts, and have put £45,000 into Consols, which still stand in the name of the Bank of New Zealand. But we have not been so fortunate with this huge lock-up of the assets of the company, and there are a great many reasons for it. We started well for the first two years, and we thought we should be able in a reasonable time to turn it into a liquid asset. But things have gone against us in the last two years, and especially during the last twelve months. The land policy of the Government of New Zealand, the special taxation, the low price of produce, and bad trade generally, have very much affected the returns from the Estates Company: indeed, we have not been able to realise the assets anything like to the extent we had anticipated, although we have done something in that direction. The total amount of sales to the end of March, 1894, realised about £730,000, and, of that, there is still owing from purchasers £156,000, which, however, is secured by mortgages on the properties. Then, we have paid off prior encumbrances and sundry calls to the extent of £200,000, leaving about £340,000 on deposit to the bank, and which belongs really to the debenture-holders. But within the last year or two our realisations have been very small, owing, in fact, to the causes which I have pointed out to you. Now, just consider for one moment what a load this lock-up in the Estates Company has been upon the bank. Here is £1,850,000 in this balance-sheet, on which, if it had been liquid, we could easily have earned 6 per cent. We have never got more on an average than $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as dividend from the Estates Company; so that the bank has always been working with a loss of profit of some £75,000 to £80,000. Had this asset been a liquid one, the bank could have earned easily 10 per cent., if not a little more. Of course, with so much money locked up, the bank, as I think I have remarked here before more than once, has been very much dependent for its dividends upon what it could get in the shape of dividend out of the Estates Company. I have told you how small it has been; but this year it has been worse than ever, and, instead of getting any dividend out of it, we have had to lend the company a considerable sum of money towards meeting the debenture interest: in fact, it has been worked at a loss. This, of course, is an exceptional year; I do not for a moment suppose that the same thing is likely to occur again for a long time; but, as a matter of fact, the bank has had to put its hand into its pocket and find a considerable sum towards the payment of the debenture interest of the Estates Company."

Honourable members will thus see that the net amount realised to the 31st March last was only £340,000. That was all the cash realised until the end of March of the present year. Let honourable gentlemen, all of whom have ordinary business experience, mark what this means, and consider, if the Assets Company in four, or, rather, nearly five, years has only realised that small amount of money, what can you expect of the balance? The colony is committed to the extent of two millions, with no possible escape from payment of that amount but on that realisation, and yet that is all that has been realised up till the end of March, 1894. I will not weary the House by reading extracts from Mr. Glyn's interesting and instructive speech at length; but what can we expect when so little revenue can be made out of these assets, insufficient even for the debenture interest? We must look this matter in the face. There is probably very little chance of these assets realising more than the secured debenture claim upon them. There is therefore at least a loss far in excess of the bank's capital on this asset. Then, if you look at the bank's balance-sheets, starting from 1888, you will find year after year that they have altogether written off over four millions of money, representing their loss during that period, but that does not in any way represent the full measure of their losses. We find from the balance-sheet laid before the meeting in London that, under the heading "Advances and other Debts due to the Bank," the amount is £4,855,569: that is the enormous amount to which these advances have again risen. After the Assets Company was formed this amount was under three millions, but it has crept up since most unwarrantably, until it is now nearly five millions. As the honourable member for Wairarapa pointed out, £600,000, according to a very reliable British paper, the Scotsman, has been advanced out of the bank's funds to assist the Assets Company in improving its properties. We already knew something of this expenditure. We know, for instance, that the Onehunga ironworks have been carried on at a loss of many thousands year after year, as well as other enterprises of that sort. I have no doubt that that item of £600,000 appears as an asset among the £4,855,569. The chairman, at that meeting to which I have referred, was pressed for an explanation as to the clause bearing on this report. The report says,—

"Mr. Snow: This last paragraph, sir—'There are certain accounts in the bank's books'—"

"The Chairman: I have replied as to that. You rather weary me.

"Mr. Snow: Will you kindly reply again?

"The Chairman: There are some accounts in the bank which were old accounts, taken over when we joined. They are not in so good a position as they were. They have not actually realised losses, but they are not so good owing to the same state of things as affected the Estates Company. We do not think we should make provision for that, but leave it to the new Board.

"Mr. Snow: What is the amount?

"The Chairman: I cannot tell you; and I would not if I could."

"Mr. Snow: Let us know exactly how we stand.

"The Chairman: How we stand is thus—we are practically handed over to the Government."

"A Shareholder: You have complained that you are moribund. You apply for an Act of Assembly authorising £2,000,000 of capital, and now you complain that by the passing of that Act you are in a moribund position.

"The Chairman: No; I said the Board was in a moribund position, with a new Board in Wellington. I think no better stroke of business was ever done than borrowing these £2,000,000. (Applause.) It is the strongest bank south of the equator."

Sir, there are in this item of £4,855,569 all the items carried forward, and doubtfuls arising during the four or five years since the clearing-up of the bank's affairs, when the Assets Company was formed. As I have said, it probably includes the £600,000 mentioned, but we shall have no accurate guide as to the extent of the loss on the item until the new Board reports next year. There is, however, an enormous loss, under this most injudicious guarantee, going to accrue to the colony. There is no use in blinking the fact, or shutting our eyes to it, and the sooner we realise our position the better. I make these remarks because I am told the Government, despite these facts and circumstances, have a majority for this measure, and I consider that in the interest of the colony it is a duty to point them out, so that members may vote with their eyes open, aware of the enormous loss we have to face by our recent unwarranted legislation, and warned of the risk we run of further loss from the Bill before us. I hope each member of the House will feel the responsibility that is upon him, and will act according to his judgment, and that members will not be called upon, or yield, and vote out of party allegiance in a question of this sort. We have no right to suffer the colony to be plunged into further entanglement in banking matters, and members ought not to be afraid to do their duty and reject this Bill, in the interests of the taxpayers. An honourable member has passed me a note dealing with the question of the right of the Government to give part of the Public Account to another bank. In that respect I hope the amendment of the honourable member for Patea will be agreed to. By the agreement in 1891 the Remittance Account was divided between the Colonial Bank and the Bank of New Zealand, but there was no committal, I understand, as to loan-moneys—how they were to be deposited; and I think the House ought to safeguard the Bank of New Zealand over such deposits. We are now especially interested in the Bank of New Zealand, and I trust there will be found sufficient members of this House to agree to the clause introduced by the honourable member for Patea, to the effect that no moneys shall now be placed in any bank not already guaranteed by the colony. I heartily agree with that amendment, and for these various reasons have no hesitation in voting against the second reading, and I trust that honourable members who believe in the views I have expressed will not hesitate to throw the Bill out.

Mr. Duthie

Mr. HOGG.—Sir, we have had this Bill reviewed to-night at the hands of the honourable members for Wellington City (Messrs. Bell and Duthie), the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, the honourable member for Wairarapa, and the honourable member for Patea; and I observe that the criticism has all been of the same quality—it has been adverse. The honourable gentleman who spoke last appeared to be satisfied that no banking institution could possibly stand the manner in which the position of the Bank of New Zealand is continually being brought before this House. I would ask honourable members to consider for a moment what party in this House is responsible for bringing the affairs of this particular bank up on every occasion. Have we not noticed day after day, in regard to questions affecting this bank, that those questions have emanated from the honourable members who are now criticizing this Bill so very adversely? What has the honourable member who spoke last been doing with regard to this particular question? Has he not been attacking the Assets Company? Has he not been deorcing, scarifying, virtually scalping this bank, and in every possible way turning it inside out? He has been exhibiting the balance-sheets of the bank before the public of the country in the most damaging form; and I should like to know what company, solvent or insolvent, could possibly stand for any time criticisms of this character. I say that, no matter whether the State is under any obligation to this bank or not, there are not a few in this colony who are indebted to this banking institution; and, in my opinion, it is neither more nor less than gross ingratitude for certain honourable members to be holding up to scorn a financial institution that has stood by New Zealand for many years past, and which has undoubtedly done good service to some of her oldest settlers. The question of the solvency of this particular bank has been raised, and its credit has been decried; it has been designated as a bank in serious difficulties, and its balance-sheet has been used to demonstrate that for years past it has been suffering enormous losses, which it could not possibly stand. This is the way in which an endeavour is made to injure the institution that we are endeavouring to raise by assisting it with the credit of the colony itself. I say this is no place for raising questions as to the solvency or insolvency of institutions which have such an important bearing upon the financial history of the country. It is perfectly true that the banks of Australia have passed through a very severe crisis, and the banks of New Zealand have possibly felt the effects of that crisis. It is also absolutely true that during the present session we have assisted our banking institutions in order that they might be able to meet the demands that might be made upon them. This is not the first time in the world's history that a similar crisis has been experienced by banks, not merely in the Australian Colonies and New Zealand, but in other parts of the world. What has been the history of banking in Great Britain and America? Have there been no crises there of a similar character to that which has affected the Australian Colonies? I say there is hardly a bank with a history, not even the Bank of England, which has not had at some period a similar experience to that of the banks in Australia. But what is the reason for the crisis that has occurred? Has it been because some of those banks are in a chronic state of insolvency? Can it be said that any of the banks of New Zealand are in that position at the present time, or that they are not able to pay if called upon—not able to meet every call made upon them? What are the facts? They are solvent, because their assets are in excess of their liabilities; and if only they could be assured of sufficient time to realise upon those assets, almost without exception, both in Australia and New Zealand, they would be able to meet their obligations. We know that the reason why the recent bank crisis occurred was, not so much owing to depreciation in values, but because in time of depression it is not possible for banks, any more than it is possible for public companies, to realise upon their assets. The honourable member for Wairarapa accused the Government of plunging into wild schemes of finance.

An Hon. MEMBER.—So they are.

Mr. HOGG.—The honourable gentleman denounced the Government as being extremely culpable because of the measures they have brought forward in order to strengthen financial institutions, and he accused them of using their position to make them as sound as possible. He also stated that it was an open secret that the Government of the colony encouraged the proposal of the bank to which I am referring to amalgamate with the Colonial Bank, and that it was the Government that withdrew at the last moment. Then, again, several honourable members, in dealing with this question, have opposed clause 2. What is the object of this clause? The sole object is to strengthen the whole of the banks in the colony—not merely the Bank of New Zealand—and to put them in a much better position than they now enjoy—to provide that if Parliament is not in session they may be prepared for any emergency. We know there is an old proverb that it is the unexpected that always happens; and I should like to know from the gentlemen who are adversely criticizing this Bill now before us, and who are attacking the Government for bringing forward a Bill to assist the banking institutions of New Zealand, are not they individually concerned in these banking institutions? The labour representatives in this House have not said one single word this evening against this measure; we have not heard a syllable from the lips of the men who are associated with labour; but all we have heard is from the representatives of capital, and it is from them that we have had the whole of this adverse criticism. I only wish that the effect of any disaster that might occur to these banks, if the legislation we are now endeavouring to pass is not passed into law, could be confined to the individuals who are denouncing this legislation to-night. I wish we could exempt people all over the colony from the effects of the non-passing of Bills of this character, because in that case I should be only too ready to take opposing members at their word, and walk into the same lobby with them and get rid of this clause. Honourable members who are supporting the Government in this House, and especially the representatives of labour, must notice that those who are now opposing the Government in trying to help the financial institutions are the representatives of capital. They have enjoyed monopolies in the past, the Bank of New Zealand has helped them to acquire estates and embark in commercial enterprises, and it is base ingratitude to turn round now and say that this institution is absolutely insolvent: yet that is the language that they use towards an institution that has been both a mother and a father to them. I believe in speaking plainly. It is base ingratitude on the part of certain members of this House who are representatives of wealth that they should refer to this institution in the way they are doing to-night. I say that if this Bill is intended for the benefit of any particular portion of the community it is that portion which those gentlemen are understood to represent in this House. I intend to support the Bill; but I say that if it were not for a regard for what might happen to people outside the walls of this building I should be only too glad to take the honourable gentlemen at their word in striking out clause 2 of the Bill. I should cheerfully follow them into the lobby, because I believe they would very quickly go down on their bended knees and ask that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of restoring the clause which at present they profess to be anxious to get rid of.

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, I agree with the last speaker that this is a very important Bill. I regret that there should have been need for another Bank Bill, as I understood that there were to be no more Bills on this subject brought before the House. In cases of this character we must accept really what the Government have to tell us, and if they say it is necessary for the finances of the colony that this Bill should be passed we ought to give their statement very careful consideration. I think we have overlooked the fact that before last election the Premier told the colony that he would allow no bank to fail. The colony therefore was warned of what it might have to do, and members who were returned pledged to support the Government must have taken that along with them as part of their responsibility. As to the Bill itself, there is no objection to the 3rd clause, and the whole of the objections raised to that section of the Bill may be narrowed to the question, Are the Government to insist upon being satisfied that the capital of the bank is intact, before they guarantee the note-issue? And, as our Act of last year provides that bank-notes are to be the first charge on the assets of banks in the colony, the reason does not seem to be so great.

12.0. I understand, however, two proposals have been made: one by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), in which he desires that this clause should be restricted to the Bank of New Zealand; and one by the honourable member for Selwyn, that it should not be restricted to the Bank of New Zealand—in fact, that it should not apply to the Bank of New Zealand, although it might apply to the other banks. That is, he proposes the converse—

Mr. SAUNDERS.—We both propose the same.

Sir R. STOUT.—I understood it was the other way. However, I would say that this is what we have to look to: We have, I apprehend, to look more after the Bank of New Zealand than any other bank. We have already given it a guarantee of £2,000,000, and we have to see that this sum shall not be lost to the colony. If we put this clause in the Bill we tend to weaken the institution that we are backing up; and what I think we should do instead of that is to allow the Colonial Treasurer, in the face of this House, to say that he will not guarantee any new bank unless he sees that it is more than ordinarily secure. I do not think that we should, as a colony, come to the aid of any more banks than we have done, and if I thought this 2nd clause of the Bill would cast an additional responsibility on the colony, even as regards the Bank of New Zealand, I would oppose it; but it seems to me, so far from that, the bullion, coin, and Government securities being against the note-issue with the clause in the Act of last year, that the bank-note issue is already a first charge, which takes priority over any other debts, which the two-million guarantee does not. I do not think there will be much risk. You cannot increase the bank-note issue. I do not care whether you guarantee your bank-note issue or not, you cannot get this colony to absorb more than a certain amount of paper money. That is not an opinion of my own. I take it from the effect of the guarantee given to the banks in Sydney. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government of New South Wales guaranteed the note-issue, the increase of paper money there was merely nominal: in fact, I do not think it was anything at all. That shows, Sir, that no colony can absorb more than a certain amount of paper money, and whatever may be the nature of your transactions the paper money will not increase. You will find that you cannot issue more notes than these banks issue now. The guarantee of our issue in New Zealand of all the banks combined will not vary much over a million, and you will not be increasing this note-issue. What will happen by your guarantee to the Bank of New Zealand? I suppose it will not exceed half a million, and that will be a first charge on the assets which the bank will have—against the Government securities, bullion, and coin. I do not think, therefore, the risk is much. If you were to put in the amendment of my colleague (Mr. Bell) that might be casting a slur on the bank and injuring its credit, and it would be far better to demand from the Treasurer, before we agree to this, that he will give the guarantee I have asked for. Let me say one word about the proposed amendment of the honourable member for Patea in reference to the Colonial Bank. I do not think that the Colonial Bank can be debarred of the business it gets from the Government now, but I think you ought to deal liberally with the Colonial Bank, for this reason: You have come to the aid of one bank that is in competition with other private banks. Well, that is giving it a very great handicap; and, if you treat the Colonial Bank or other banks harshly, as a result you may cause them to be put in a very peculiar position, though I do not think that there is any chance of their being injured. And, then, are you to be called on to give aid again? You cannot go and extend your liabilities in this way. I think that it would be advisable not to add that clause to the Bill, but I think we must leave it to the Government to say what should be done. I think the Government should support the institution they have guaranteed, while at the same time they ought not to deal harshly with other institutions; and if they are in the habit of allowing drafts to be passed through the Colonial Bank for transmission to London I do not think the Government should take from the bank its share of that business. I consider that we have not before us now—and we could not have before now—a question as to whether the colony should indorse the bank-notes of all banks; no bank has asked for that—neither the Bank of New Zealand nor any other bank—and consequently we are not in a position to say whether this indorsement should be given or not, and we must cast this responsibility on the Government, we cannot take the responsibility on the House; it is an administrative act: but I hope the Government will give the pledge I ask. If they do, I do not think it will be necessary to press the amendment proposed by my colleague (Mr. Bell). I do trust that the Government will give this pledge, and will undertake that we are not, either for the Bank of New Zealand or for any other bank, going to cast any additional responsibility upon the colony unless it be properly safeguarded by guarantees, and be made perfectly safe and without any risk whatever of loss. Unless that is done I do not think we ought to cast a greater responsibility on the colony than this £2,000,000 which I have already mentioned. We have gone far enough, and, if this private institution cannot carry on its business with the two-million guarantee that we have given, then it is far better that we should know the worst and see what we have to face at once, because I think it would be a great mistake for us to increase the liabilities of the colony. I do not think we are in the position to do that, and I will ask the Treasurer, before I vote for this clause, if he will give his undertaking that he will not cast any additional responsibility upon us, and that he is not going to take in any other bank unless he sees that its assets are more than sufficiently safeguarded. The Government has taken up this attitude, and I think we have a right to demand what I have asked, and I do not think that then the amendment proposed by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) should be pressed; and I again repeat that to single out one bank in the Bill would tend to weaken the credit of the institution, which we have to deal with, not in New Zealand alone, but also in London. I say again we cannot undertake the responsibility of determining this matter in the House, it is for the Government to bear that responsibility, and I do hope they will give the pledge I have mentioned, because if it is not so given I shall have to vote against the Bill.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. R. THOMPSON.—Sir, I am rather surprised at the speech of the honourable member who has just sat down. I fail to see why members of this House should try to divest themselves of their share of responsibility, and try to put it all on the Government. I hold that every member of this House must take his share of responsibility in connection with any loan that is proposed in the House. I am not going to take up the same position as the honourable member takes, but will take my share of responsibility, and not cast it all on the Government. I do not wish to say one word to embarrass the Government in any way. But I have to say, after thinking the matter over quietly and deliberately, that clause 2 of this Bill should not be allowed to pass. I am not going to mince matters in any way, and for my own part I will be no party to passing this Bill, and, at any rate, so far as my vote will go, clause 2 of the Bill will not pass. I should like to ask some of those honourable members who are asleep on the benches while a matter of such great importance to the interests of the colony is being discussed, whether they are prepared to allow the taxpayers of the colony to become responsible for the losses of any bank in the colony. We have already gone a great length in assisting the Bank of New Zealand. Probably we have gone so far that we shall have to continue that assistance still; but I say now that we should not attempt to go outside that institution and get ourselves mixed up in any way with any other bank in the colony. I say that if there is any other bank in the colony which is in such a position that they would have to apply to the Government for assistance, as proposed in clause 2 of this Bill, the sooner that bank winds up and liquidates the better. I for one in this House will protest, so far as I am able, against placing any further burdens on the taxpayers of the colony in connection with any banking institution in it. During this session, every time these banking Bills have been introduced, I have noticed that honourable members have appeared to be afraid to approach the subject by giving any expression of their opinions as to these institutions. I do not know why honourable members should hesitate to do so. For my own part, I shall do what I believe to be my duty, and shall certainly vote against clause 2 of this Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Will you vote for the second reading?

Mr. THOMPSON.—I do not know that I shall vote against the second reading, because I think clause 3 should be passed. The amendment proposed by the Colonial Treasurer does not meet the case in any way, although he now proposes to include paid-up capital and reserve funds. That means simply the assets of the bank, and we know very well what the assets in some of these institutions are. In some cases I do not believe 50 per cent. could be realised of the assets as they stand in the books of the banks. Every member in the House who has any knowledge of finance, or who has any sense of responsibility, should make it his duty to see that we do not place any further burdens on the taxpayers of the colony. I am afraid that we have gone rather too far already in this direction, but I say that we should go no further in making the taxpayers of the colony responsible for the least assistance to any of these institutions. I trust that when the Bill goes to Committee clause 2 will be eliminated altogether. Clause 3, I think, should be passed, and should put this bank in such a position that there will be no fear or dread arising among our constituents during the next nine months. I do not wish to cause any fear or alarm myself; still, I am afraid, unless we are very careful how we deal with these institutions, the colony will be let in for very serious consequences. Of course, in dealing with a question like this, there are very few of us who are in a position to pronounce absolutely upon all the proposals. We have not got the information; we have to depend almost entirely on what the Colonial Treasurer tells us; but we all know sufficient to know this: that if we incur liabilities, if we pass legislation which will make the taxpayers responsible for the losses of any of these institutions, we are not doing our duty to those who have sent us here. I trust that when the Bill is in Committee honourable members will insist upon eliminating clause 2 from the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON.—I had intended to leave all that was to be said further by the Government upon this question to my colleague the Colonial Treasurer, but I think I should be wanting in my duty to the House and to the colony did I allow the speeches which have been made upon this subject to go unchallenged. The present is a time when and this is a subject in connection with which, I think, all political feeling should be set aside, and we should deal with this question as statesmen, and as representatives of the people, and do that which we believe to be right in the interests of the colony. Some speeches that we have listened to, and more particularly the speech of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), were painful to hear. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) does not, as a rule, take a bright view of things, but his speech to-night was absolutely pessimistic. It was even worse than that: it was vindictive. I should have thought, had he come here with a desire to injure the Bank of New Zealand and the whole of our colonial banks, and to further the interests of foreign banks, he could not have done more than he has done. But I do not wish to misrepresent him. If I am mistaken in my interpretation of his remarks, well and good; but I do say that in making the remarks which he has made with reference to one banking institution in this colony—I allude to the Bank of New Zealand—in applying the terms which he did to that bank, if he wanted to bring about a serious trouble, if he wanted to bring about a financial crisis, he could not have used words which would have done more to bring that about than he has used. He has quoted in support of his statement some questions which were asked—and we are not sure as to whether the newspaper report is correct—of the chairman of the directors; and the honourable gentleman tells us that heavy losses have been made, and that there are accounts upon which no interest has been made. Why did he not tell us that upon the debentures of the Assets Company they have paid more than interest—5 per cent.? He ought to have told us that has taken place. If he had stated that on the balance there has been only a small interest made he would have told us the truth; and I put it to him, in the case of commercial men in this colony during the last two years, what have they made upon the whole of their capital? And is it to be said that, because during the time we have been labouring under severe difficulties they have not been able to make interest on the capital invested, they are not solvent? If we are to believe that argument in the case of this institution, it would apply to a very great number of the best firms in the colony. I should be very sorry to make such a statement, because it has been due to the influence of the bad harvests and low prices, and to circumstances which are beyond the control of any one in this country; and we are not in New Zealand responsible for the financial disasters which have occurred. Australia was not responsible for it solely. I say that it has been worldwide; and we ought to congratulate ourselves on the fact that, though our near neighbours have suffered, our country has remained, so far, absolutely unscathed. I say that for an honourable gentleman to take up the position which the honourable member opposite has done is not doing justice to the country, and is not fairly representing the intelligent people of Wellington; and I say the honourable gentleman ought to be the last to say such things as we have heard said by him in this debate. What did the honourable member tell us? He said that this is a scheme to entrap the colony. What a reflection to cast upon Ministers! What a reflection it is to say that all honourable members who support this measure are doing so for the purpose of entrapping the people of the colony—concocting a scheme with no other object in view than to entrap the colony into severe losses—to ask the colony to undertake liabilities which will be a burden upon the taxpayers! I say that the statement made by the honourable gentleman in this respect is absolutely and utterly without foundation. I say that the Ministry are not seeking to entrap the colony. They are not seeking to do any more than that which we believe, as prudent men, is absolutely necessary; and we are bound to do that which we asked Parliament to do when we passed the Bill of this session, and which we thought we had done when it was passed. But, after the measure was passed, when we came to see the legislation which had taken place in one of the other colonies, and after a careful reading, and with the fullest information in connection with the whole of our institutions, foreign and otherwise, we came to the conclusion that our legislation should be such that, if required, it could be acted upon without delay. As the law now stands, I say that could not be done. The question put is this: Shall we remain in a position with our hands tied behind our backs and unable to move should the necessity arise? Certainly not. Therefore we come to Parliament and say, "That is the law as it stands; this is the law as it should be," and we ask you to place us in a position which the Legislature intended. Did the Legislature intend, when it passed the Act of this session, that it should be inoperative—that it should be such a law that even in the case of an emergency arising it could not be used? Or was it intended that, if an emergency did arise, the Government should be able to take the necessary steps to give effect to the law? I say this was the intention; and, this being the intention, the Government were justified in bringing down this measure. Does the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) think for a moment that we would bring down this Bill unless we thought there was some necessity for it? We were told that if we proceeded with it there would be marked hostility to it, and that it would be better to withdraw it. The Government believe in a bold course being taken. We believe that if there is a difficulty we should face it and overcome it. We decided to state the position fairly to the House, and rely on a majority carrying the measure. It was for this reason that the Government, in spite of the threats made, decided to go on with the Bill. The honourable member said that our party was to be called upon, and that honourable members would support the measure from party motives, and would not act conscientiously; and he advised honourable members to act conscientiously. I hope the honourable member will apply his advice to himself. I also hope every honourable member will act conscientiously. I may tell the honourable member that this is not a party question at all. This is a matter of so much moment and of such importance that we say that members on both sides of the House should do what I believe, and what the Government believe, and what I think the great majority of the country believe to be the proper thing to do, and that is, to see that what has occurred in the other colonies shall not eventuate in New Zealand. If we had not done what Parliament has been asked to do this session, where should we be now? In reference to what we have done, I give credit to Parliament; the Government take no credit at all for it. We give the whole of the credit to the representatives of the people. What we have done has been prudent, and it has been beneficial; and we have not, as one honourable member said this evening, simply staved off the evil. We have absolutely averted anything occurring in New Zealand such as has occurred in Australia. My own opinion is that we have turned the corner. It only requires that we should complete the course which we have been going upon to make everything absolutely safe, and the measure now before us will do that. Let me tell the honourable member this: that in the Speech from the Throne we stated, as far as we could, that which was absolutely correct, and we made that statement from the only information which was then at the command of the Government.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. DUTHIE.—Oh!

Mr. SEDDON.—A statement which I made in a speech at Foxton was challenged at the time. I have been able since to prove that what I then stated was absolutely correct—that the colony was being drained of its capital, and that it was going elsewhere. My statement was denied then, and in most of the newspapers of the colony I was taken severely to task because I made the statement. On the only information obtainable I made that statement at the time, and so far as we were aware it was absolutely correct. Then the crisis came, and further information was placed before the Government. I hope never again during my lifetime to have to go through the same thing. But when we had this information before us we decided upon a course which I still say was the correct one, and which I think will ultimately prove to have been a prudent and safe one for the colony and all concerned. Now that we have had an opportunity of obtaining the fullest information, it gives me very great pleasure to tell the House and the colony that the Government would be prepared to take the same course and ask the House to support us in the guarantee.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The House would not do it again.

Mr. SEDDON.—My own opinion is that the House would; and the House in doing it would act wisely. Now, there is another phase of this question. We have been told by speakers to-night, and newspaper extracts have been quoted, and assertions made that the Government were the first to suggest or propose amalgamation. That has been stated time after time on the floor of the House, and I have seen it stated in the papers. Now, I simply wish to say this: that it was neither the Colonial Bank nor the Government that first proposed amalgamation. I have not stated that before, but, as it has often been challenged, I think, in justice to the Colonial Bank, that I should state the plain facts of the case. As regards the statements with reference to the Government on this point, honourable members are at liberty to say what they please; but, with regard to the Colonial Bank, it is only a fair thing to say that what has been stated in the Press and on the floor of this House is absolutely incorrect. Now we come to another phase of the question, and that is what was referred to by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). He said that there would be an enormous loss on the guarantee that we had given. Well, I would say this: that if there is a loss I should put it at the door of the honourable member and the other honourable gentlemen who, with him, in season and out of season, have been decrying what we have done, and who have been endeavouring, as far as it was in their power to do so, to injure the credit of our local institutions. I have been silent so far, but I now simply wish to state this: that if anything was to occur now I should lay it at the door of the honourable gentleman and of other gentlemen in the House who, in season and out of season, have done their best to cause a loss on the guarantee that we have given. I say that what was intended by the Legislature, and what was intended and what was wanted at the time, was something to give stability to the bank, and to prove to the creditors and the world that the colony had every confidence that all would in the end come right. The guarantee was given for that purpose, and before it was finally completed members were saying that we had no right to do it—that serious consequences would result, and that practically we were throwing away the money. I say that no commercial man would indorse another's bill and then go about and say, "Smith is clean gone; he will never be able to meet his liabilities; his business cannot succeed, and he is practically insolvent." I ask you, would that be friendly? would it be businesslike? I am not saying anything about friendship, but that is the position my honourable friend the member for Wellington City and those with him take upon this question. Why does he make these statements—these innuendoes? What could be gathered from his speech and the speech of the honourable member for Patea. It was this: that the colony in giving the guarantee would be a heavy loser; and that the institution we had secured was in a very unsound position. The honourable gentleman went so far as to say it was insolvent. The honourable member for Patea did not go quite so far, but I will take his words. He said this: "He would simply say that had the figures been known we should not have given the Guarantee Bill." It is only blinking at its matter to say otherwise. He might just as well have said this: "Had the true position of the Bank of New Zealand been known, we should never have given the guarantee." I say that by his innuendo he was conveying what the honourable member for Wellington City had said in another way. It is pleasing to me to know—notwithstanding the innuendoes of members on the floor of the House, notwithstanding that they dislike the Bank of New Zealand,—that its business is still flourishing, and that the people of the colony have the fullest confidence in it. It seems to me that it is a wonderful institution to be able to survive what it has survived in the colony; and it will survive, because it has the people and the representatives of the people behind it; and I again repeat that, with the fullest information before it, the Government would not alter the course adopted, and that we did the proper thing in giving the guarantee. What has happened here, on the floor of the House? I should like to say what has happened since we gave the guarantee. Not a single day has passed but we have had questions on the Order Paper containing some attack on the Bank of New Zealand or on the Colonial Bank. I ask again, is that a wise or a prudent course for the representatives of the people of the colony to take? What is the object that they have in view? Is it patriotism? Is it a desire to save the taxpayer? Is it for the purpose of eliciting information? It was done in the interest of foreign institutions which are no friends of our colony. I say, if they were friends of our colony, under these circumstances, and knowing, as they must know, what has occurred and what is occurring—I say that, instead of inciting and aiding and abetting those foreign banking institutions, which are and have been so antagonistic, they ought to have helped the Government, and united themselves to help the people and the colony out of the difficulties we were labouring under—difficulties which were not of our creating, for the money was taken away from the colony by at least one institution which we know of. And since we have had this legislation, and the crisis was averted, we have been told by members on the floor of this House that money is plentiful at a lower rate of interest, and that things are more cheerful, and that that condition of things is due to members of this House, who, like wise men, have helped us to overcome the difficulty; and for that we all are entitled to reward. I would earnestly urge upon honourable members not to make any more speeches such as we have just listened to—speeches which, when they appear in Hansard, will be regretted by those who have made them. We ought to be more cautious. What the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) said was the proper thing—“That, whatever we do, we should not forget our responsibility.” We are not doing anything more now than was done under the Bank-note Issue Act of 1893 and the Bank-note Issue Act of this session. What was in the Bill in a former part of the session was the question of responsibility in the declaration to be made, and the responsibility rests with the Government of the day, whoever they may be when the Proclamation is required in connection with the note-issue. What is intended to be given by Parliament is done. These are the reasons I have to give, briefly, to the House. In asking it to pass this legislation we are practically doing what was asked of us. Time after time we have been asked, “When are you going to bring the banking legislation forward?” What was thought by some honourable members was this: that we should bring forward legislation for a complete scheme of amalgamation, and that we should ask the House to consent to such amalgamation.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BELL.—The Colonial Treasurer told us so.

Mr. SEDDON.—The Colonial Treasurer did nothing of the kind.

Mr. BELL.—He said it would be a good thing.

Mr. SEDDON.—I remember what the Colonial Treasurer said. He does not carry his thoughts upon his sleeve, that he who runs may read them. I know what his answer was, and it was this answer which caused these frequent inquiries: “When are you going to bring down your banking legislation?” It came down, and those honourable gentlemen have been taken aback. They expected something to come down which they could criticize adversely, but, instead of that, it is a simple little Bill of two clauses, and one of the clauses I think nobody will vote against. I think that if they are a little disappointed their disappointment should not find vent in a desire to injure institutions which are deserving of, and are entitled to, our support, and I will ask honourable members to deal with the matter as business-men. I say that the law requires altering. We are asking the House to assist us in the alterations that are necessary to enable us to be prepared for any emergency. We felt, as the law stood, when the difficulties were pointed out to us, that if we did not take the House into our confidence, and tell it what was required, we might find ourselves in an emergency with our hands tied, and that we should be unable to do anything. Had we not done so we should be told hereafter that we ought to have taken the House into our confidence. The law as it is to be amended is to give relief should the necessity arise. By doing what we propose the position of every banking institution in the colony will be strengthened, and our proposals will act as a preventive. We are taking the bold course. We take the House and the country into our confidence. We see what it is necessary to pass, and if it is passed I say that we shall be proving ourselves to be prudent men by placing ourselves in a position to meet any emergency. The Colonial Treasurer and myself, however, do not think that there will be any emergency. In 1893 we were told that the banks were incurring enormous liability, and we were prepared to do something, but the banking institutions told us that they did not want any assistance. But I say it is not for those institutions to decide in a matter like this. There are times when some of these institutions make immense wealth when prices rise, but the responsibility is with us to ask Parliament to give us power should an emergency arise so that we may be prepared to meet it. The other colonies failed to make necessary provision, and owing to their timidity and want of foresight they will suffer for years to come. People who had been prudent and thrifty, and had made provision for their old age, have become absolutely penniless, and are leading a life which they little expected and little deserved. We do not want that state of things to happen in our country, and I do not think it will happen, and all you are asked in this Bill is that, in case the necessity should arise, you will place yourselves in a position to meet it. The Colonial Bank, the National Bank, and the Bank of New Zealand are New Zealand institutions, and I say the whole of these New Zealand institutions are deserving of our support. They have been worked prudently,—and that has been proved,—and we should, as the representatives of the people, be the very last to do anything that would injure them. I feel satisfied that the good sense of the House will pass the Bill by a large majority; but I should like to see the House unanimous. Let us get it into Committee, and, as prudent businesslike men, do our work properly.

Mr. DUTHIE.—The Premier was pleased to say that I was acting in the interests of a certain bank.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable gentleman is mistaken. I never said so, nor intended to imply it. If I had said so I should at once withdraw it unreservedly.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Sir, the Hon. the Premier has made a speech; and what does it amount to? He tells us we should deal with this matter as statesmen. I think it is our first duty to endeavour to know what we are about. The Colonial Treasurer talked for half an hour, and told us nothing. I was very much struck with a clause the Treasurer put in the Financial Statement about the guaranteed loan of £3,000,000, in which he said, "I take the opportunity of complimenting the House on the courage displayed by its members—a marked characteristic not altogether unexpected in dealing with a critical emergency." It was the courage of seventy rats caught in a barn, and not knowing where to turn for escape. The House was caught in a hole, and did not know where to turn, and members voted in the way they were obliged to vote; but, as to courage, they were driven into a corner and could scarcely help themselves. One of the great drawbacks in connection with our banking legislation has been that the Colonial Treasurer has given us no information. It has all been done by surprises. Not one of the Bills has been referred to the Public Accounts Committee, and no consideration has been given to the Bills by the House, and no knowledge afforded us. Last year this House in a single night—panic-stricken because a few men and women in Auckland got greatly excited and made a run on the savings bank in a moment of alarm, without adjourning, passed a Bank-note Issue Bill guaranteeing a million of bank-notes. After that was guaranteed the House had rest for a short time; and this year, at the beginning of the session, the House passed, in a single night, a guarantee of two millions—thus guaranteeing, in two nights, without consideration, no less a sum than three millions. Then, the honourable gentleman talks about statesmanship. What has been the position? We passed a bank-note issue guarantee Act last year—the honourable gentleman did not know how it would affect the banks—and this year he brought down a Bill altering and amending that Act; and again, just at the end of the session, he brings down a third Bill amending it. Where is the statesmanship, where is the wide knowledge, when the Government within fourteen months bring down three Bills amending one single Act? I want to draw the attention of the Colonial Treasurer to two or three things in connection with this guarantee. When we passed the Bank-note Issue Act of last year it was to remain in force for fourteen months. Well, I take it that Act ought at this time to have run out, and should not be renewed. We are here asked to renew it for another fourteen months. It would be much better if the honourable gentleman would accept an amendment that the Bill should run for two years and not be "renewed." Then the banks might have time to put their house in order, and the guarantee would not run on year after year. If it does, there will be no improvement, but we shall go from bad to worse. There ought to be a definite termination to these engagements. Then, I would draw attention to this: Under the Bank-note Issue Act of last year and this year, should any banks which had dealings in Australia choose, they could bring their notes over here, and could shovel a lot on to the Colonial Treasurer and make him exchange them for gold. Is not that the case?

Mr. WARD.—Certainly not.

Dr. NEWMAN.—They could do it to a very considerable extent. If they had not sufficient securities up to the full amount here they could recall them from Australia, float them with the honourable gentleman, and withdraw the securities—that is, having told the Treasurer they had so much security here to-day, ask him to guarantee their notes, and, having got that guarantee, turn round and ship away the lot. I will ask the Treasurer to say, in his reply, in what clause of the Bill this is prevented. Now a word or two about amalgamation. There is no question that this Bill has been put off from day to day because the Ministry have been wondering how much they could ask the House to swallow; and this little Bill—is this the result? I would ask the Treasurer why he brings down clause 8. He has power under the Bank Guarantee Bill we passed two or three months ago to veto any amalgamation. Then, if so, what is the need for a Bill like this? It seems to me his followers are not prepared to trust him to this extent, and therefore he is giving it to them in writing. That is what it amounts to. If the honourable gentleman had not been afraid of his followers not taking his word we need not have had this Bill. I do hope the House will strike out clause 2; and, as for clause 3, it does not matter whether it is there or not.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I agree with the Premier that this is a very important Bill, and I agree that it ought to be very carefully considered, and to be voted for on its merits and in what we consider the best interests of the country. So far as section 3 is concerned, I feel sure the House will be almost, if not entirely, unanimous in agreeing that it is a most important clause—one that has been looked for, and will be passed unanimously. But, when we come to clause 2, there is a considerable difference of opinion. I should like to make a few remarks with reference to the words the Treasurer proposes to add with regard to the security for bank-note issue. The words he proposes to add are to be added to section 3 of "The Bank-note Issue Act, 1893." At present the law is that the note-issue shall be the first charge on all the assets and property of the bank. He proposes to add certain words in reference to paid-up capital. I should like to point out that the Bank-note Issue Act of 1893 already covers the addition. The words "assets and property" cover everything he proposes to add. It is therefore a merely verbal alteration, which means nothing. The Act of 1893 gives power to the Governor in Council to declare notes legal tender, with the proviso that the assets shall exceed the liabilities by at least the sum of the paid-up capital and reserved profits. At the beginning of the session we passed an Act which omitted the words "reserved profits;" and it is now proposed to take out the paid-up capital, leaving only the assets as against the liabilities. I should like to ask the House to consider what this alteration actually means. As I understand it, it means that the assets are to be put against the liabilities; and the assets are to be calculated not on the real value, but on the value as disclosed in balance-sheets. The colony guarantees the note-issue, which is the first charge on the assets of the bank. I agree with the senior member for Wellington City that so far as the guarantee is concerned it may be quite right, and we shall make no loss; but I would ask, have the creditors of the bank no rights? Are we to protect ourselves and leave the creditors of the bank out in the cold? In my opinion we ought to leave the law as it stands at present, and we should be satisfied as between the bank and its creditors that its assets exceed its liabilities by at least 1.0. the sum of paid-up capital. I think, so far as that is concerned, we have gone quite far enough, and that, in the interests of the bank, in the interests of the colony, and in the interests of business generally, we ought to refuse to take these words out. Now, what is the object of the guarantee? The guarantee, I take it, would not be given to prop up a failing institution. The guarantee ought to be given where the bank itself is perfectly solvent, but where, owing to circumstances surrounding the business, it cannot meet its liabilities upon a sudden emergency. Then I conceive it would be within the duty and right of the colony to interfere, and to guarantee the note-issue. But I do strongly object to this colony entering into any further guarantee of notes on behalf of any banks. I think the colony has already incurred quite sufficient liability, and ought seriously to hesitate before going any further. I agree with the honourable member for Marden with reference to this section, and in Committee, if no one else proposes it, I shall move that the section be struck out. I consider the Bill if passed into law with the 1st and 3rd sections is admirable; but if the 2nd section is left in I consider it will spoil the Bill entirely, and therefore I shall move in Committee to strike it out. There has been a good deal said to-night about the banking legislation of the earlier part of the session. That banking legislation is past, and I think, so far as members of the House are concerned, it will be as well for us to say as little as possible about it for some time to come. At the time we agreed with the legislation; we recognised the emergency, and the necessity for meeting it; but, in view of what has taken place since, and of the information we have received, I think it is wise, before congratulating ourselves too much, to wait and see the result of the business we have done. Sir, I shall support the second reading, and reserve to myself the right to move in Committee to strike out the 2nd section.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, I should like to say a few words in reply. I am sorry the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs is not in his place. That honourable gentleman delivered a speech just now which clearly, to my mind, showed that he did not at all understand the position so far as the amendment of the note-issue in this Bill is concerned. The honourable member talked flippantly about the transfer of a million of securities, and he gave a hypothetical case, and when he gave it he gave himself away absolutely so far as understanding this matter is concerned. He said that if a million of securities were transferred the note-issue might be increased to that extent. The honourable gentleman must be entirely ignorant of the terms upon which all lending institutions can issue notes. In the first instance, there is no alteration of the law now proposed which gives any one banking institution the right to increase the note-issue by a single pound beyond the amount prescribed by the Act under which they were established in the colony. The honourable member talked as though by transferring securities to the colony they could have an increased note-issue, and then could transfer the securities out of the colony. To my mind, such a statement as that from an honourable member who occupies a responsible position in this House, and who wants his opinions on these questions to be taken seriously, shows the complete ignorance of the honourable gentleman in connection with this matter. Let me refer to the speeches made by the leader of the Opposition, the honourable member for Wairarapa, the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), and the honourable member for Patea. What has been the substance of all their speeches? It has been a condemnation of the Government—an attempt to find fault with the Government for what they have done in connection with the whole financial business. It is the easiest thing in the world for anybody to find fault. It is the easiest thing in the world for honourable members who have no responsibility, or very little responsibility, upon their shoulders to say, "I told you so. Wait till by-and-by: we will watch, and will judge by results," as the last speaker said. Now, I want to ask those honourable members if they have never read history in connection with financial crises. I want to ask those honourable members who are so very fond of telling us that we ought to accept the guidance of gentlemen who occupy in another part of the world the same side of politics as they do, have they ever compared their attitude, and the narrow view they have taken in connection with this matter, with the conduct of those gentlemen? I want to invite them to look back to what has taken place in connection with financial crises elsewhere. For instance, my honourable friend the member for Wellington Suburbs—who, I notice, has just come in—is always quoting from those gentlemen's speeches. He is always fond of quoting lords to us, and saying, "Look at the speech of Lord So-and-so in the House of Lords." These honourable members are always talking of those great authorities in order to show how wisely they act, and how desirable it would be that statesmen in this colony should follow them. Yet upon a financial matter of this kind, when those honourable gentlemen ought to be the followers of those they point out to us as examples, what do we find them doing? They find fault with a very light heart with the way the Government is dealing with these matters. But the honourable member has apparently quite forgotten some of the lessons of the history with which he is at times in the habit of favouring this House. Let me ask him to compare the attitude of himself and his friends on that side of the House with the attitude of the statesmen they refer to during the great financial crisis in England. What have they done? What was done in connection with the Bank of England? I should like to ask those honourable members who are always finding fault with the Government to look at what was done in 1825. In that year there was a great crisis in England, and those honourable members will find in Macleod's "Banking," Volume 2, what was done on that occasion. Probably, as the honourable gentleman does not like to take any authority in the colony for his guidance, he may be willing to take an authority I am going to quote as a guide for himself and his friends. Now, what happened?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—They then suspended the Bank Charter.

Mr. WARD.—I am glad to see the honourable member remembers that; but when he was criticizing the Government it was entirely forgotten by him. I do not think it is needful for him now to anticipate what I am going to read:—

"On Friday evening, the 16th, the Courier said, 'We are happy to think that the worst is over, though there are still great demands upon the Bank, particularly from the country.' The same paper, on the next day, the 17th, said, 'Although public confidence is on the return in the metropolis, and things are resuming their usual course, yet, as might be expected, this has not yet communicated itself to the country.' In fact, the London panic was completely allayed in this week by the profuse issue of bank-notes."

Very well. Now, I merely wish to point out to honourable members that from the 16th to the 17th—that is, in one day—the Bank of England had notes issued to the extent of £5,000,000. And then it goes on in this same work to indicate what was done in the country in the same way; but what I particularly want to come to—

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—No other bank issues notes but the Bank of England.

Mr. WARD.—Is it possible? I am glad to hear the honourable member say so, for that is exactly what I read out just now. Now, I want to read what occurred in 1866, and to refer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a gentleman whom the honourable gentleman quotes with apparent satisfaction, and claps himself on the breast when speaking of him to this House. I want to show what happened. It says,—

"The judgment in the case of the Mid-Wales Railway converted this into a complete ruin; and on the afternoon of Thursday, the 10th May, the terrible news spread through London that the great establishment of Overend, Gurney, and Co. had stopped payment, with liabilities exceeding £10,000,000—the most stupendous failure that ever took place in the city. This news only spread about after banking-hours, but every one could foresee what the effects would be the next morning. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said next evening in the House that the oldest inhabitants of the city declared that the excitement was without a parallel. Early in the evening he was questioned as to whether Government had authorised the Bank to issue notes in excess of the legal limit. The Chancellor replied that he had not yet done so, but that he had received a deputation from the private bankers, and was expecting one from the joint-stock banks, on the subject. Very soon afterwards this came; and the members of the Cabinet, having retired to a Committee-room, and consulted the Chancellor later in the evening, announced, amidst the loudest cheering from all parts of the House, that the Government, following the precedents of 1847 and 1857, had informed the Bank that, if they thought proper to make advances beyond the limit, the Government would bring in a Bill of indemnity. He also stated that the bank had advanced £4,000,000 that day.

"The announcement of the suspension of the Bank Charter Act produced the best effects next morning. The Bank raised its rate to 10 per cent., and everything was calmed down; and, though subsequently to this some other stoppages took place, yet the knowledge that the Bank had power to make advances on good securities abated the panic. On the 18th May the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the Bank had advanced £12,225,000 in five days. The sum that was paid away during the panic can probably never be known, but it was something perfectly fabulous. It has been said, though, of course, we know not on what authority, that one great bank alone paid away £2,000,000 in six hours."

Now, contrast this with the attitude of honourable members opposite. One evening the Chancellor of the Exchequer announces that in consequence of a run upon a private institution—an institution which had a capital of ten millions of money—after conferring with his colleagues, he comes down and asks authority—for what? Authority by which in one day four millions of money are issued, and within three days twelve and a half millions.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The Bank of England did not increase its note-issue on that occasion. Its ordinary issue was sufficient, with a high rate of interest.

Mr. WARD.—On the 18th of May the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Bank had advanced £12,225,000 in five days; and the honourable member knows perfectly well, I think—and he ought to know it if he does not—that such an issue has been authorised whenever a panic has taken place in London; and that the Bank of England was authorised to issue notes within a radius of forty miles.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I say on that occasion the Bank of England did not issue beyond its limit, although authorised to do so.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member is trying to draw a red-herring across the scent. What is the attitude of that honourable gentleman and of those who act with him in opposing the Government? Their attitude is this: that the Government of the colony, for the purpose of averting a crisis, should take no responsibility upon its shoulders.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—No, but should safeguard itself in a proper way.

Mr. WARD.—Only in such a way as the honourable member might suggest; and, because the honourable member is not here to safeguard the colony in the way he thinks best, every other attempt to safeguard it is wrong. That is the sum and substance of the honourable gentleman's argument. Now, what is the proposition in connection with this note issue? All we are asking the House to do is to enable an institution, should any emergency arise, and should it want to take advantage of the note-issue, to be in a position to show that its assets are in excess of its liabilities—that the amount of its capital is in excess of its liabilities only. It is the absence of this limitation that renders the present Bank-note issue Act in certain cases unworkable and useless, and that we are asking the House to remove. Then, honourable members talk, as the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs has done, about a million of securities being transferred. I am surprised at the honourable member. He is not looking at the position of the whole of these banks in connection with the note-issue. Every one of them is limited to the coin in reserve, the bullion, and the Government securities held—every one. But the honourable member talks about the possibility of a million of securities being transferred to the colony, and an issue to the extent of a million being obtained, and after that these securities are to go back to the Australian Colonies. That is how the honourable member talks; but I tell him that is impossible.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. WARD.—Is the coin reserve—the Government security—the million of securities transferred from the other side? The honourable member surely cannot have read the Act in connection with the bank-note issue business. If he reads it he will find it is a note-issue within the colony. How can the honourable gentleman say a bank is enabled to transfer securities from other colonies, and ask the House to believe his suggestion that a million of securities from other colonies could be transferred here and used in that way? He suggests that the main note-issue Act does not provide for an issue in this colony only. Now let me come to the question raised by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). He referred to what I admit at once to be the correct position—the impossibility of the colony being able to get security over assets beyond the colony. The honourable member for Patea referred to that as well. Everybody knows that, and nobody denies that for a moment. We do not propose—there is no such suggestion in the Bill as taking security over assets beyond the colony. But if honourable members will refer to the note-issue Act they will find that the terms of the law are that "the Governor in Council may," so that it is not mandatory at all. Supposing, for instance, an institution had the bulk of its assets outside the colony, and asked the colony to authorise the issue of notes in the way proposed, do honourable members think the Government would be foolish enough to do it? If they do they make a mistake.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The Act allows you.

Mr. WARD.—Does the honourable member suppose every one else is bereft of common-sense but himself, and that if the emergency arose—because the Act necessarily must give some latitude, and the Government thinks it is necessary in the interests of the colony—it must do so in all cases?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—You can take the right.

Mr. WARD.—Yes; we can take the right. We do not take the wrong, and there is no intention of doing it. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) must know that in the exercise of a heavy responsibility and a duty, such as this is, no Government would do anything but what it believed was in the interests of the colony. If the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) sat on these benches, I would trust him in a grave emergency absolutely to do what he thought was best in the interests of the colony. I would even trust the honourable member for Patea to do so, and that is saying a great deal more. They do not do us justice, and they imagine, if the emergency arose, that we would not do the best we could to conserve the interests of the colony. They ought to give us the same credit that we should be prepared to give them if they were upon these benches. Let me refer briefly to the speech of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie). I think it is a regrettable speech. It is a speech which the honourable member, when he calmly thinks over it, cannot congratulate himself upon having made. Let me recall to the House the points which the honourable member raised in discussing the report from which he read—I mean the report contained in the Scotsman. Let me point out one important fact. In the first instance, what did he indicate to the House? He indicated that, from the information contained in that report, certain losses were likely to be made in connection with this institution. Does the honourable member suppose there would ever be a necessity for the colony to come to the rescue of the institution if everything were going on well with it and it were making profits all over the world? Could anything be more ridiculous than to suggest, as the honourable member did, that if the institution never made losses it should be guaranteed? Why, Sir, it was the very fact of its having made losses that called for the special assistance which was afforded it by the colony; and the honourable member, in harping upon that, and making the damaging statements which he attempted to make against the bank, did a great injustice to the colony itself: not to the institution, because the honourable member must know, if he and his friends were successful in the strictures they have made from time to time upon the Bank of New Zealand,—if they compelled this institution to go into liquidation,—what the result would be. Do they suppose that some of the strongest institutions which do business in the colony, which are not owned in the colony, would not suffer also? If they suppose that, then all I can say is that they must lack all business acumen. The honourable gentleman's speech, if it meant anything at all, meant that he had well calculated what the effect would be. A speech of that sort delivered by an honourable gentleman occupying a high position in the commercial world, which he does, is calculated to do that which every one should try to prevent. What is the use, when honourable members know we have given the guarantee for ten years, and know what that guarantee was given for—what is the use, I ask, of saying and doing things which they know may deprive the colony of the opportunity of getting that guarantee right, and may deprecate the institution to which it has been granted? That is what the honourable gentleman has done.

Mr. Ward

Mr. DUTHIE.—So that members may not be led blindly into more things of the kind.

Mr. WARD.—I say the honourable member has taken the very course to bring about the thing which he should deprecate. He evidently does not wish the colony to enter blindly into more. Neither do I; but he makes a speech which, whether he intends it or not, he must in his calmer moments wish that he had not made.

Mr. DUTHIE.—All I said was deliberately said.

Mr. WARD.—Then, I can only regret that the honourable member makes deliberate statements of the kind, and apparently statements which he had thought out, and which he must realise are statements that are calculated to injure every man in the colony, if what he thinks should come about. The honourable member invites it, and assists to bring it about, and the effect of what he states will be to injure more than anything else the commercial men in the colony.

Mr. DUTHIE.—You are now mixing things up.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, if that is the honourable member's case, I should not like to be in his frame of mind. If he were here on these benches, and I were in opposition, in discussing whether it is a good thing or not, the fact that anything that was done was being done in the interests of the colony would make it my business—as it is the business of every man who wishes well to the colony—to do all I could to bring the guarantee out right. There is nothing to be gained by making speeches such as my honourable friend has made to-night, and which, as I say, are only calculated to do the very reverse of what we are all trying to do. Again, the honourable member asks why this legislation is brought down, and other honourable members ask the same question. He and other honourable members on the other side of the House, ever since the guarantee was given, have been continually firing questions of every sort about the institution across the floor of the House day after day and week after week. Honourable members on the other side of the House have been doing that sort of thing for political purposes.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Not at all.

Mr. WARD.—Well, Sir, a few of them have. Some honourable gentlemen, apparently for political purposes, have made up their minds to make capital out of the financial exigencies which unfortunately occurred and caused the colony to give the guarantee, and they seize every chance to attempt to embarrass the Government in connection with what has been done in the matter. That appears to be the sum and substance of the whole matter; otherwise I cannot understand sensible men, and men who should have the welfare of the colony at heart, making speeches which tend to injure every man, woman, and child in the country. I cannot for my life understand that; and I say it deliberately.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—May I be allowed to ask the honourable gentleman to tell us whether he will accept the amendment to confine the operations of clause 2 to the Bank of New Zealand only?—because our votes depend upon that a good deal.

Mr. WARD.—The amendment of the honourable member is the same suggestion that came from the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), to confine this note-issue entirely to the Bank of New Zealand. I say, if honourable members want to do the bank an injury, they should propose and support that. I say that will be the effect of the proposal if it is carried. In my opinion, if honourable members want to do a good turn to the institution to which I refer, they should not support that amendment.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—It would be an injury to the other banks.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member is quite welcome to his own opinion, but I think he should have sufficient idea of the way in which business is carried on in the world to know differently. Surely, if any particular institution is singled out in this manner, there can be only one opinion in the minds of people about it outside, and that is that something extraordinary had taken place in order to cause such a condition to be attached to one institution. Whether the honourable gentleman desires to do this I do not know. I am perfectly certain the honourable member for Selwyn is not actuated by a desire to do anything but what is right, and what is best for the country. I tell honourable members, with a sense of the responsibility that is on my shoulders, what the effect of that will be. It is not that this institution has specially asked for it. We say that it is desirable in the interests of the country. If an emergency arose in the country the Government, having the responsibility during the recess of conducting the affairs of the country, should, if necessary, exercise that responsibility.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Whether there was a margin or not?

Mr. WARD.—That is a different matter altogether. I am surprised at the honourable member suggesting it.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is why we are wanting to limit it.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable members who have been advised in connection with this matter have not had good advisers. If this country had been unfortunate enough to have had those honourable gentlemen in office, and if the expressions of opinion given utterance to since the Government has been called upon to face this matter were entertained and expressed when a crisis was pending in the colony, then it would be a very bad thing for New Zealand; because it is quite evident to me that such a Government would not have had the pluck to accept the full responsibility for whatever might happen. A grave emergency arose, and we believed it was our duty to do what we have done, and we did not shirk it. But if those honourable members had been upon these benches, judging from the half-hearted way they have acted and the want of courage they have displayed, what would have happened? Why, they would have woke up after the whole affair was over—would have let the crisis come on and have tried to stop it when too late; and they would have said—

Mr. BELL.—I never wavered in my support of the guarantee to the bank.

Mr. WARD.—I admit that the honourable member consistently supported the guarantee to the bank. But, Sir, he was an exception. We find that an honourable gentleman, a calculating man of business, who says he carefully weighs everything he does, and who should take care, as a merchant in this colony, not to say anything that would injure other business-men, got so carried away by excitement this evening that in this case he has not realised the fact that any injury which was done to this institution by his remarks and action might be severely felt by the whole commercial community. We can only account for it by supposing that probably his judgment was warped. If this Bill is not passed I tell the House that it will entail a great responsibility. That is undeniable, and I tell the wiseacres so. That the result, had we not acted promptly with our guarantee, would have been very serious to the whole of the colony is beyond question. No one can deny that; and in the event of this Bill not being passed a serious responsibility rests on the shoulders of honourable members. I do not believe in people who afterwards say, "I do not think it ought to have been done." I think very little of that sort of thing, and of those people who desire to shirk responsibility. The honourable member for Patea is now prepared to condemn what the Government have done.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I did not shirk the responsibility.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member virtually shirked the responsibility, as he wanted to refer the matter to the Public Accounts Committee. He wanted to shelter himself behind that Committee, knowing perfectly well that the Committee would come to the House, and that the House must take the responsibility. I want to say one word in reply to the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith). He asked if the creditors of this bank had been considered. Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that the State should not step in and take the first security? No; I say that, if the State should step in for the purpose of preserving the credit of our institutions—

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—The State has the first claim on the bank, and, if the honourable member will allow me, what I said was, if you take away the paid-up capital, the note-issue comes first, and possibly there may be nothing for the creditors at all.

Mr. WARD.—Then, I think it is quite right that, where the State steps in and takes the responsibility in order to preserve the credit of any institution, it should safeguard itself; and the creditors ought to be very glad that the country is prepared in an emergency to preserve them from trouble. I have only to say, in regard to the position of this matter, that I again repeat that there is no such thing as authorising an extra amount of note-issue by any institution in the colony. An alteration in the Bank-note Issue Act of 1893 is necessary, because if the emergency should arise it would be absolutely impossible in certain cases for the necessary declaration to be made to warrant the Governor in Council coming to the rescue if it should appear to be necessary. I have now only to move the second reading of the Bill.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be read a second time."

AYES, 49.

Bell	Hogg	Pere
Buddo	Houston	Pinkerton
Buick	Joyce	Pirani
Button	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Lang	Seddon
Carroll	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Collins	Mackintosh	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	Massey	Stevens
Duncan	McGowan	Steward
Flatman	McKenzie, J.	Stout
Fraser	McLachlan	Tanner
Graham	McNab	Ward
Green	Millar	Willis.
Guinness	Mills
Hall	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Morrison	Larnach
Harris	O'Regan	Maslin.

NOES, 16.

Allen	Mackenzie, T.	Thompson
Buchanan	McKenzie, R.	Wilson.
Earnshaw	Meredith
Heke	Newman	Tellers.
Hutchison, W.	Russell, W. R.	Duthie
Kelly, J. W.	Saunders	Hutchison, G.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Te Ao
Mitchelson.	McGuire.

Majority for, 33.

Bill read a second time.

The House went into Committee on the Bill.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

AYES, 15.

Bell	Hutchison, G.	Stout
Crowther	Lang	Thompson.
Earnshaw	Massey	Tellers.
Graham	Newman	Buchanan
Green	Russell, W. R.	Mackenzie, T.
Heke

NOES, 37.

Buddo	Hogg	Millar
Buick	Houston	Montgomery
Button	Hutchison, W.	Morrison
Carnell	Kelly, W.	O'Regan
Collins	Lawry	Parata
Flatman	Maslin	Pinkerton
Fraser	McGowan	Pirani
Hall	McLachlan	Russell, G. W.
Hall-Jones	McNab	Saunders
Harris	Meredith	Smith, E. M.

Smith, G. J.	Ward	Tellers.
Stevens	Willis.	Joyce
Steward		Mills.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Duthie	McKenzie, J.
Kelly, J. W.	Mackintosh
McGuire	Mitchelson
McKenzie, R.	Larnach
Mackenzie, T.	Green
Newman	Millar
Te Ao	Cadman
Wilson.	Duncan.

Majority against, 22.

Motion negatived.

Clause 2.—"The words 'by at least the sum of the paid-up capital,' in the first proviso to section five of 'The Bank-note Issue Act, 1893,' are hereby repealed."

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to insert at the beginning of the clause the words "The terms expressed in," and to strike out the words "are hereby repealed," with a view to insert, in lieu thereof, "shall not be made a condition precedent to the issue of the Proclamation mentioned in the said first proviso as far as the Bank of New Zealand is concerned."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words 'The terms expressed in' be inserted in the clause."

AYES, 14.

Bell	Hutchison, W.	Saunders
Buchanan	Lang	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	McNab	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Montgomery	Meredith
Heke	Russell, W. R.	Thompson.

NOES, 35.

Buddo	Hogg	Pere
Buick	Houston	Pinkerton
Button	Hutchison, G.	Pirani
Carnell	Kelly, W.	Russell, G. W.
Carroll	Lawry	Seddon
Collins	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Flatman	Massey	Stevens
Fraser	McGowan	Steward
Graham	McLachlan	Willis.
Hall	Morrison	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	O'Regan	Joyce
Harris	Parata	Mills.

Majority against, 21.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON moved to add the following words at the end of the clause: "The words 'in the colony' shall be read as inserted after the words 'assets' and 'liabilities' in the said proviso."

Amendment agreed to, and words added.

Mr. WARD moved to add the following words: "and section three of the same Act is hereby amended by inserting after the word 'property' the words 'including the paid-up capital, un-called capital, and reserve fund.'"

Amendment agreed to, and words added.

The Committee divided on the question, "That clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

AYES, 88.

Buddo	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Button	Lawry	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	Maslin	Seddon
Carroll	Massey	Smith, E. M.
Collins	McGowan	Stevens
Flatman	McLachlan	Steward
Fraser	Morrison	Ward
Graham	O'Hegan	Willie.
Hall	Parata	Tellers.
Harris	Pere	Joyce
Hogg	Pinkerton	Mills.
Houston

NOES, 15.

Bell	Hutchison, W.	Saunders
Buick	Lang	Thompson.
Crowther	McNab	Tellers.
Earnshaw	Meredith	Buchanan
Hall-Jones	Montgomery	Smith, G. J.
Hutchison, G.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Cadman	Te Ao
Carncross	Russell, W. R.
Duncan	Wilson
Green	Mackenzie, T.
Larnach	McKenzie, R.
Mackintosh	Kelly, J. W.
McKenzie, J.	Duthie
Millar	Newman
Mitchelson.	McGuire.

Majority for, 18.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said,—I desire to take this opportunity to protest against the manner in which the Bill has been forced through Committee, and is now being forced through the third reading. It is a Bill of the utmost importance, which may involve not less than the sum guaranteed to the Bank of New Zealand in the early part of the session. It is a Bill, so far as can be seen, likely to be pernicious as suggesting recourse to State aid by banks which can do very well without it. We have had no proof or evidence of any kind, other than the assertion of the Minister, that such assistance is required. For my part, I believe that no banking institution in the colony has asked for protection. I think we ought to hesitate before following Australian banking legislation, unless it is shown to be actually necessary. It has been claimed by the Government that they are strengthening the banking institutions by this Bill. I cannot believe it. So far as I know, the Bank of New Zealand requires no assistance of this kind. It has just raised two millions on the guarantee of the colony, £500,000 of which is understood to be intended as a gold reserve, and another million of it invested; thus making the bank apparently quite superior to any danger such as might be averted by making its note-issue legal tender. I desire to say that in Committee I proposed to move the following new clause: "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the Public Revenues Act, the Public Account of the colony is required to be kept in the Bank of New Zealand." The Premier, speaking, of course, for the Government, resented the proposal as a slur upon himself, quite ignoring the fact that it could not have been intended in that sense at all. We know from the public prints that an attempt has been made on the part of the Colonial Bank to secure one-third of the Public Account; and, in the circumstances, I think it was only proper to propose such an amendment as this, seeing that I had previously put a question on the Notice Paper which had been replied to evasively by the Colonial Treasurer. Of course, the Premier having referred to this as a matter which would be determined as upon a question of confidence or no confidence in the Government, it was useless for me to press the proposed clause. But I urged again and again in Committee that he should give an assurance that the bank account would not be disturbed. I am sorry to say that the Premier did not respond to that invitation, but appeared to me to steadily refrain from meeting it in a straightforward way. I trust, however, that the Government will not, during the recess, alter the Public Account from the Bank of New Zealand. We are more and more bound to that institution now in all legitimate matters affecting the public finances of the colony. But, if the Public Account is to be broken up, then there is no reason why, if the Colonial Bank is to receive a share, another New Zealand bank—the National Bank—should not also receive an equal share.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The present Government has already been the means of unloading some of the burdens of this bank on to the shoulders of the taxpayers of the colony, and I regard this Bill as going still further in that direction. I hope and trust that the taxpayers throughout the colony will mark, learn, and inwardly digest the conduct of the Government in this matter. I protest in the strongest possible manner against putting such provisions upon the statute-book as are contained in the 2nd clause of this Bill. I consider that they give a power to the present Government which should not be given to any Government—namely, that of guaranteeing bank-notes on altogether insufficient security. I also protest against the manner in which the Bill was passed. The hour at which we are now sitting here is anything but creditable to the 4.30. Parliament of New Zealand, and is another outrage by the present Government upon the liberties of the members of this House. They have a majority behind them which enables them to carry any legislation they desire, and to conduct the business of this House in any manner they choose. I deeply regret that that majority should allow themselves to support the Government in conduct of this character. I have, however, discharged my duty as a member of this House by protesting and voting against such legislation, and I can do no more. The responsibility must rest with the Government, but not the whole. A liberal share of responsibility must rest upon members who, entirely against their own convictions, are supporting the Government in their iniquitous course. I can do no more than record my protest against the passing of this Bill.

Mr. BELL.—I have only one sentence to speak, and that is to express my conviction that there is an engagement now under way between the Government and the Colonial Bank, and that as soon as possible they will enter into an engagement with the Colonial Bank by which part of the funds of the colony will be placed with that bank: and the sign and token of it is the action of the Colonial Treasurer upon the motion of the honourable member for Patea.

Mr. THOMPSON.—I merely wish to place on record that I decline to take any responsibility for the passing of this measure. I regret very much that there is any necessity for the passing of the measure. We are told there is a necessity, and that is all we know about it. It is a measure which I feel satisfied will be the means of involving the taxpayers of this colony in the liability for a very large amount of money. I am afraid, when I look back upon the divisions that have been taken to-night, that the interests of the banks are considered more by members of the House than the interests of the taxpayers of the colony. I am very sorry to have to make these remarks, but I know I am here as representing the people who sent me here, and I am bound to place my opinions on record. I fear the result of to-night's work will be very serious to the colony. I hope I may be mistaken, but that is my honest conviction. I am sorry it has been thought necessary to pass such a Bill. However, I must bow to the majority. I have no wish to cast any blame on the Government. The Government may have some reasons best known to themselves for forcing through the Bill; therefore I am not going to throw any blame upon them. At the same time I decline to take any responsibility in connection with the matter.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think that at this hour of the morning honourable members do not desire that any remarks which are made should be of a lengthy character. Members who have fought for the passing of this measure have voted from conviction, and believing they were voting for that which will be in the interests of the country. I say there has been no forcing of the measure through at all. Is it to be thought that half a dozen members, who hold views different from those held by some forty or fifty other members, should be allowed to prevail because they refuse to permit progress to be made—such refusals as we have had here from time to time to-night? The question arises, Should forty or fifty members be sent home in deference to the opposition of half a dozen—in fact, less than that, because they were not, I believe, more than three or four—or is the business of the country to progress notwithstanding this opposition? That is really the position; and

I would myself say to the honourable member for Patea and the honourable member for Wairarapa, who stated that this measure has been forced through, that it has not been forced through at all. What the majority had to insist upon was that a mere handful of members should not block the business of the country. That is what the Government had to do, and that is not forcing business through. It is simply insisting that progress shall be made irrespective of such opposition. It is well known that those who are a majority in favour of the Bill are not responsible for being here at this hour of the morning, and I say that under ordinary circumstances the members who have caused this waste of time ought to tender an apology to those members who have been kept here to do the business of the country. I tell the honourable member for Wairarapa and the honourable member for Patea that they have no right to say that the business has been forced through: there has not been anything of the kind. Then, the member for Wairarapa says—and he is perfectly right—that it is very strange that none of the institutions in the colony want this legislation—that none of them had asked for it.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Neither have they.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable gentleman is absolutely correct in both statements—that none of the institutions have asked for it and none at present want it; but when the Government found that there was a defect in the law, and found that the other colonies had made an alteration in the law to meet any emergency that might arise, we considered it our duty, after carefully considering the matter, to put our legislation in such a state that if an emergency did arise it could be met. These, Sir, are the circumstances that led the Government to take this step, and we knew that in proposing it there would be opposition to any banking legislation proposed here on the floor of this House; on such a very large question there are members holding diverse views. Consequently I fully contemplated that this would take place; and I say that, with the exception of one or two speeches made on the second reading, the Government have nothing to complain of. There were some speeches that I think the honourable members who made them will regret having made, and I hope they will withdraw them, because remarks were made which may prove prejudicial to the best interests of the colony, and, although our institutions have not gone through a crisis to be compared with that which has happened in the other colonies, yet, in regard to the question of their stability and their management by those intrusted with their control, we should be very loth to say on the floor of this House anything that would prejudicially affect them. We have been told by several members that in doing what we have done we are increasing the burdens of the taxpayers of the colony; and when we passed the Act of 1893 exactly the same remarks were made. It was said that we were increasing the liabilities and burdens; but, since the Act was passed, has the colony been called upon to pay one farthing? Not at all. We are passing this legislation as a preventive—as a precautionary measure—and if there is prudent management of the whole of our institutions there will be no risk at all, and therefore, I say, we are not increasing the burdens of the taxpayers, or placing any further liability upon them. Well, I desire to say this: that I was rather pained to hear the remarks made by the honourable member for Marsden. He certainly transgressed a little. I certainly think that he had no right to cast reflections upon honourable members here by saying that he considered that they thought more of the interests of the banks than of the interests of the taxpayers. I say that that is a reflection which I cannot allow to go unchallenged. They have been considering the interests of the colony generally, and the well-being of the people: that is what they have been doing in considering this Bill. There will be no increased liability placed on the taxpayers by this Bill, and there will be no special advantage conferred on the banking institutions. Some honourable members would be very much pained here if I stated that they had been considering the interests of foreign institutions, and that for that reason they had been refusing to allow this legislation to pass. It would be a very painful thing to any honourable member if I said that of him, but it would be just as true as to say that the majority here to-night have been considering the banking institutions and not the interests of the colony.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Would it be true?

Mr. SEDDON.—It would be absolutely incorrect in both cases, but I simply say that such a charge has no right to be made in either case.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I did not make such a charge.

Mr. SEDDON.—I was alluding to the honourable member for Marsden, when he said that the members of the House were studying the banking interests rather than the interests of the colony. At all events, this appears in our public prints, and my opinion is this: that in coming to the conclusion we have come to, what we have been doing to-night is the proper thing to have done, and that the result will be beneficial, and that we shall have nothing to regret from our action. Those honourable gentlemen who have supported this Bill will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have done their duty, and those who have opposed it will find hereafter that their fears were unfounded, and that they have been conscientious to no end. As far as the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) is concerned, he has put a wrong construction upon my refusal to give any reply to the question of the honourable member for Patea. I took up what I believed to be a dignified and proper position. I believe the amendment was moved for the purpose of forcing the hand of the Government. The Colonial Treasurer gave a reply in the House, which the honourable member for Patea was dissatisfied with. To force the position, that honourable member gave notice of an amendment to the Bill, and then he said that he would not go to a division upon it, as a majority of the House were against him. I say that the law gives the power to the Government of the day; there has been no abuse of the law by the present Government. There was no abuse by the present Government under our late respected Premier. Why, then, should we have any amendment in the law, when there is no reason for it? When I was in opposition I used to fear a good many things. I used, when in opposition, to come to conclusions sometimes right and sometimes wrong. When Sir Harry Atkinson was here, if such an amendment had been moved by me as has been moved by my honourable friend, I undertake to say that I should have got a severe castigation. I should not have been treated in so mild a way as I have treated the honourable member for Patea. In conclusion, I think we have done well in passing this Bill.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Very unsatisfactory.

Mr. SEDDON.—It may be to the honourable gentleman, but it is very satisfactory to me. I do not think any of us have any reason to complain. I am firmly of the opinion that the House is acting wisely and prudently in passing this Bill.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE.—I wish to enter a protest against the third reading of this Bill. There is no doubt the Bill is more far-reaching in its effects than most honourable members have any idea of. I am perfectly satisfied of that.

Mr. HEKE.—I wish to say this: that we have had in this House a precedent laid down by the Premier that when any important Bill is brought before this House for consideration, especially at this late stage of the session, it is our duty to report progress. We have been discussing this Bill with a very thin House. I supported the Premier in a motion to report progress on a similar occasion, as I thought it was reasonable. I say this Bill is one of the most important Bills that have been brought down in this House; and, so far as the action of the Premier and the Colonial Treasurer is concerned in reference to questions that have been asked them with regard to the Bill, they have given no answers at all, and I think it is only fair that the representatives of the people should have an understanding on the matter. We have had a statement from the Premier that this House should accept the assurance of the Government. Now, I wish to say these few words in conclusion: that, as far as I know from the little experience I have had in this House, the assurances that have been given by the Premier and his colleagues have not been kept at all, and, in the face of that, I am not inclined to believe any assurance that may be given by the Premier and some of his colleagues.

Mr. WARD.—I will not occupy the time of the House very long. I should just like to say to the honourable member who has last spoken

—he will excuse me for saying it, but he is a young member, and I have watched him very carefully—that he has been responsible for a delay of five or six hours in the business of the House to-day. I wish to say to the honourable member—and I hope he will take it in good part—that if there can be anything which is calculated in future to lead to abolition of the special representation of the Natives in this House it is the way in which that honourable member continually gets up on every conceivable matter before the House, and, whether he understands it or not, proceeds to lecture honourable members. I say that to the honourable member because I was once a young member myself; but I am bound to say I never before saw a young member take up so much time, and with such an assumption of experience, as the honourable member has done since he has been in this House. I have no motive in saying this except to give the honourable member a little bit of friendly advice, and I trust he will profit by it. I think it is valuable advice, and I hope he will consider it, and profit by it next session. If he does not want to injure the race he represents, and which I hope will continue to be represented in this House, he ought to show more judgment and more consideration for other members of the House, since every member of the House has displayed a very large amount of consideration for him; but the honourable member gets up on nearly every question, and, with a self-satisfied smile upon his face, talks in a way that is calculated to annoy members of the House. He ought to be more careful for his own reputation and for those he represents. Now I wish to say a word or two for the honourable member for Patea. That honourable member made a statement about this measure on the third reading of the Bill. I was a little surprised to hear the honourable gentleman say what he did say, though he is in the habit of making statements to suit his purpose in this House, whether they are in accordance with fact or not. What was it he said? He said we had forced through a measure this evening which involved a sum of not less than the guarantee given to the Bank of New Zealand.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Which might involve.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman said it would involve.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—No.

Mr. WARD.—I made a note of the remark at the time. The actual words used were these, if he wants the actual words: He said, "involving not less than the guarantee which was given to the Bank of New Zealand." Now, the interpretation is that it would involve it, and it requires a member of the legal profession to draw this fine distinction, and to say it does not mean it. There is the fact. And I repeat that in the legislation we are passing to-night we are not adding to the responsibility of the colony by way of guarantee, as the honourable gentleman suggested we were; no one knows better than the honourable member for Patea and the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) that we have not added one pound to the guarantee given in the Act of 1893.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—You have.

Mr. BELL.—You are increasing the risk.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member shifts his ground. He says now we are increasing the risk.

Mr. BELL.—I have never shifted my ground.

Mr. WARD.—I was not commenting on the remarks of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), but on those of the honourable member for Patea. When I am dealing with this honourable gentleman he shifts his ground when he finds it convenient to do so.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—By reducing the security you increase the risk.

Mr. WARD.—I say the honourable gentleman is shifting his ground. He said that the legislation we passed would involve no less than the guarantee given to the Bank of New Zealand. Now, when he is bowled out, and he has to admit it, and it is confirmed by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), he shifts his ground and says we are increasing the risk. That is what the honourable gentleman said: and what I wish—

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—It is not what I said. I challenge the honourable member's statement.

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—Unless the Hon. the Colonial Treasurer gives way the honourable member for Patea cannot be permitted to interrupt him.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—He will not give way.

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—Then, I must ask the honourable member not to interrupt; he will have an opportunity of explaining later on.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Very well.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman said the legislation which had been forced through was legislation which would involve not less than the guarantee given to the Bank of New Zealand. Those were the words he used. But he has now shifted his ground by saying that we have increased the risk. We have not altered our legislation, so far as the guarantee is concerned, to the extent of one pound. This legislation has not altered to the extent of one pound that guarantee, and, what is more, we can point to the experience of the last recess, and say that, although it was a critical time in banking matters, there was not a single application made to us from any institution of the colony signifying its wish to have such an Act; and in this coming recess, if some institution or institutions should apply to the Government and are able to show that their position is such as to warrant this provision of the law being put into operation, then honourable members will know that not two-pence of risk will be put upon the colony.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I deny that.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman's denials are worth nothing.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I deny that also.

Mr. SEDDON.—I appeal to the Acting-Speaker to say whether he is going to allow these continual interruptions.

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—The honourable member must allow the honourable gentleman to proceed.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member should extend the same courtesy to me that I did to him. I made the statement that unless application is made during the recess that this law be brought into operation, and unless the institution making such application is able to show that its position is such that the Governor in Council would be justified in allowing the provisions of the Act to come into force, not one shilling in the way of guarantee or risk will be incurred by the colony.

5.0. That is a fact, and the honourable gentleman denies it. If he denies a statement of fact, such as that, all I can say is that the honourable member is in the habit of denying facts; and, if he persists in denying such a statement, I am perfectly justified in saying that I decline to accept his denial, or that assurance I should like to accept from the honourable member on a point of the sort. The honourable member also referred to the fact that our banking institutions had not applied for this Bill, and he was perfectly correct; the Premier also said that was the case: but the Government felt the responsibility that would be upon them during the recess if we found that the existing legislation would be useless, and those honourable members opposite would be the first to accuse the Government of not taking the trouble to acquaint themselves with what was going to take place. The Government have taken the responsibility; and I reiterate that those who would have been the first to accuse the Government if anything had happened would have been the honourable members opposite. And when we find honourable members charging us with temerity for doing what we have done, and what, if they had been in our position, they would have done also, I think it is only right I should say this. The honourable member for Wairarapa has disappeared, and I am very sorry that he has. He complained of the delays that had taken place in connection with this legislation, and he also complained that it was being forced through. I complained in Committee and charged honourable members with having delayed this measure, and the honourable member was one of them. I called attention to the fact that we passed the second reading of this Bill at half-past one, and yet it was actually three o'clock before we commenced to get on with the work, and that the honourable member and one or two others had delayed the business in Committee. Then, the honourable gentleman told the House that members were voting against their conviction; but I say it is not right to make this accusation, because members of this House are just as well able to exercise their convictions as the honourable member for Wairarapa is. I also resent the remarks made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), and I think that on reflection he will quite agree that they ought not to have been made. I say the remarks he made were absolutely and totally incorrect; he has no authority to make such a statement, and, unless he has some authority for making it, I say the honourable member should be more careful of his facts, and that he was not justified in making it. I could make a statement in the same way if I desired to do so, but I have refrained from making any statement of the kind. I merely wish to say, in conclusion, that I thank the supporters of the Government who have made up their minds to stand by the Government, and also some of those honourable gentlemen opposite, who have greatly assisted the Government to-night. I have to thank them for the way in which they have stood by the Government. It is right for reasonable protest to be made and for a Bill to be fairly and reasonably debated on the second reading, but a legitimate criticism has not taken place in Committee, and I think it is regrettable that a large number of the members should have been detained in this House by a few members, and that a minority should attempt to override a majority. Why, in one of the divisions there were forty-nine to sixteen, and the lowest division was thirty-three to fifteen; and yet the honourable member complains. I say that comments such as these are frivolous, and that they are doing no good, and are not placing on record what is correct in connection with this matter. I have only again to say, in answer to the question of the honourable member for Patea as to the necessity for this, that he has been urging the Government, along with other honourable members opposite, all the session to bring down legislation: and when they get the legislation, because it does not give them the opportunity they wanted, they find fault with the Government. I say that the legislation which has been introduced has been introduced in the general interests of the country.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The Colonial Treasurer, as usual, has misrepresented what I said. I desire an opportunity of pointing out that by withdrawing from the security for the guarantee, as this Bill does, the paid-up capital—

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—The honourable gentleman must not discuss the operations of the Bill.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I desire to explain. He indicated that I had shifted my ground in respect of the amount involved under the Bill which we are passing. I beg to point out that, by the Bill we are now passing, the whole of the paid-up capital—

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—I think your remarks are going beyond what you have a right to say after a reply.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Of course, if you say so I shall submit, but I would ask that you hear the rest of the sentence. I did not state what the Treasurer represented that I stated, and it is for the correction of that misrepresentation I rise. Am I to be allowed to say what I stated, or not? I said that by the operation of this legislation, in withdrawing the whole paid-up capital of the various banks from the condition of guarantee—

The ACTING-SPEAKER.—I think the honourable gentleman is going beyond his right.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—This is how we are allowed to facilitate business!

Mr. WARD.—I merely wish to say—and honourable members are not going to put me down—that the honourable member was not referring to the remarks which I made at all, and I am right in saying that I made no such reference as he has assumed. I referred to the remark he made in saying that the Bill involved an amount equal to the guarantee of two millions. In his point of explanation he is not saying what I referred to.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I desire to have an equal opportunity of explaining the position. If I had been allowed to finish my short sentence I should have come to the point the honourable gentleman has just referred to—namely, the two millions. My point was this: By the legislation we are now passing we are withdrawing from our guarantee, in the event of the note-issue being made legal tender, the whole of the paid-up capital of the various banks, which amounts to more than two millions.

Mr. WARD.—I wish to say again the honourable gentleman made no such statement when he was speaking, and he is only replying to a statement I made, and I protest against this, because I have no right of reply.

Bill read a third time.

The House adjourned at ten minutes past five o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Saturday, 20th October, 1894.

First Reading—Third Readings—Native Land Court Bill—Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill—Horo-whenua Post-office—Public Trust Office Consolidation Bill—Wilson Land Bill—Land and Income Assessment Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Banking Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Sea-fisheries Bill, Post and Telegraph Department Bill.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS brought up the following report of the Conference on this Bill, and moved, That it be agreed to :—

“The Conference have the honour to report that they have agreed as follows :—

“1. That the amendment made in section 2, page 4, in line 2, be restored.

“2. That the proviso to section 14, page 8, be struck out, and the following words added after ‘respectively,’ in line 3 on page 8: ‘nor to confiscated lands which have been granted or agreed to be granted by the Crown under any special statutory provision, nor to lands where any share or interest in such lands has heretofore been lawfully sold, conveyed, or transferred.’

“3. That clauses 31 and 33 be restored, and that the amendments made by the Council be waived.

“4. That the words ‘within three months,’ in line 14 of clause 39, be struck out.

“5. That the amendments to clauses 46, 52, and 53 be agreed to.

“6. That the new clause 56A stand.

“7. That the new clause 56B be struck out.

“8. That the amendment in clause 92 be struck out, and a new clause, 91A, be inserted, namely: ‘91A. The Appellate Court may state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court on any point of law that may arise, and the decision of the Supreme Court on such point of law shall be binding on the Appellate Court.’

“9. That the amendment in lines 21, 22, and 23, clause 115, be struck out.

“10. That the first new proviso to clause 116 be struck out, and the following substituted, namely: ‘Provided that in the case of any block in respect to which it has been certified to, as in this section is provided, that one-half of the shares have been purchased or leased, the purchaser or lessee may agree with the remaining owners of shares to lease any of their shares or interests for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, though negotiations for the lease of the said shares or interests had not been commenced until after the passing of this Act.’ That the second new proviso be agreed to.

“11. That the first amendment in clause 118 be struck out, and the amendment at the end of the clause be retained.

“12. That new clause 118B be struck out.

“13. That the other amendments be agreed to.”

Motion agreed to.

LITTLE BARRIER ISLAND PURCHASE BILL.

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS brought up the report of the Native Affairs Committee on this Bill. The Committee recommended that the Bill be allowed to proceed. He moved, That the report do lie on the table.

Motion agreed to.

On the question, That the committal of the Bill be made an order of the day for Monday.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said he would like to have the ruling of the Hon. the Speaker as to whether this was a private Bill or not. It appeared to him that there were a number of recitals in the preamble as to the correctness or otherwise of which the members of the Council knew nothing whatever. As a matter of fact, he happened to know that several of these recitals were, if not inaccurate, at any rate not full recitals of all the facts. He also desired to call attention to Standing Order No. 350, which provided, "Private Bills shall be understood to be Bills which are promoted for the private interest of individuals or companies, or which, by their provisions, directly interfere with the private property of individuals." This Bill did evidently interfere with the private property of these Natives. It was true they were Native lands, but it would be remembered that under "The Native Rights Act, 1865," it was provided that there should be absolutely no distinction as to the rights of Europeans and Natives. In these circumstances, he thought the Natives should be treated as Europeans would be whose private interests in land had been interfered with. He contended, therefore, that the Bill was a private Bill.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said the question really was, whether this land was the private property of individuals or not. He could not see how Native land which had not been individualised, and had not been vested in the Natives by Crown grant, could be the private property of individuals.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said he had looked into this Bill, as far as the time at his disposal admitted. The Native Affairs Committee had reported that they had taken evidence in regard to the Bill, and they recommended that the Bill be allowed to proceed without amendment. He was, therefore, bound to assume that the statement in the preamble was quite correct, and that it was a Bill to carry out the agreements entered into by certain individuals with Her Majesty. The island was required for public purposes, as a reserve for birds in time of peace, and for defence purposes in time of fighting. It was not to be disposed of by sale or otherwise for settlement purposes. Under these circumstances, he could not rule that this was a private Bill.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said, under these circumstances, he would take whatever action might be required on the next sitting-day, when he would be prepared to move that the Bill be committed that day six months. He gave that notice in order that the honourable gentleman might have an opportunity, if possible, of affording further information to the Council in regard to the Bill.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART understood that this was a Bill to compel certain Natives to sell land which they did not wish to sell. Certain Natives had entered into an agreement for a conditional sale, and others who were interested in the land never had consented to the sale, and the Government were taking the land in spite of the protests of those Natives who did not wish to sell. He could not help thinking that this was directly contrary to all principles of legislation, and was also contrary to the spirit of the Treaty of Waitangi, which conferred on the Natives the exclusive right to their property, leaving to the Government simply the right of pre-emption. That, of course, meant that the Natives could not be forced to sell. He believed this matter was very closely contested in another branch of the Legislature. He also knew that a professional man in Wellington was anxious to be heard in support of the rights of the Natives who had not consented to the sale. He thought the facts of the case should be stated fully by the Chairman of the Committee, or by some other member who was acquainted with them.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—We have all the facts here.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said they had the facts from the departmental point of view, it was true, but it was possible the Natives might wish to be heard at the bar of the Council. This was a very important question indeed. In fact, this was an attempt to confiscate private property at a price which the Government thought should be paid, quite irrespective of what the Natives thought—he meant those Natives who had not agreed to the sale. This might be a very desirable purchase;—he was not prepared to express an opinion on that point; but it seemed to him an extraordinary thing that the Natives should be compelled to give up their land at a compensation to be fixed not by any outside tribunal, but by some Government official or person acting in the interests of the colony. When the Bill came up on Monday he would probably make some further reference to it.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said this Bill only carried a little further a principle to which the Council had made itself a party—namely, the compulsory taking of land—and this Bill only extended that principle to Natives.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said in this instance the Natives were only being treated in the same way as Europeans in their land being taken for public purposes. He could not help thinking, moreover, that behind these Native matters there were always some Europeans trying to work a point, and therefore he asked honourable gentlemen not to be carried away by any ex parte statements.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN hoped the members of the Council would not think the same as the Hon. Mr. Stewart—namely, that the colony should not take this land the same as they would take land from Europeans. If his honourable friend would get a little experience of these Native-land-buying transactions he would agree that the Government should exercise its power to buy it, being for public purposes. He should like all Native land to be sold through the Land Boards, the same as other land was sold. His opinion was, in reference to Native-land buying, that, no matter how clean the hands of any Government might be, if it entered into this business it would defile itself. It did not matter how pure the Government might be, there was always trouble in connection with Native-land buying. He had never ceased to rail at these Native-land transactions. There were always a large number of Europeans behind the Natives, desiring to work points, and the Natives had very often hardly anything to say in the business, the Europeans pocketing the money.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said the honourable gentleman spoke as if this were Native land which had not passed through the Native

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

Land Court. It had been passed through the Native Land Court, and was now held under the Land Transfer Act. It was, therefore, quite as much private land as any other private land.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE said there was plenty of land which was held under the Land Transfer Act. The Treaty of Waitangi was altogether out of the question. That being so, he thought the issues were very simple and narrow. He held entirely that, if the Natives did not receive a sufficient price, means should be taken whereby they should receive a fair price.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY hoped to be able to remove all the difficulties which had been introduced into the question by somebody who might have an interest in the matter.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—I heard the discussion in the House.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said, at any rate he hoped by Monday to satisfy the honourable member that the whole of his contentions were without foundation. Also, with regard to the statements of his honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn, he would reserve to himself the right to reply to those statements on Monday.

Bill read the second time.

HOROWHENUA POST-OFFICE.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG asked the Colonial Secretary, Will the Government make arrangements for receiving and delivering letters addressed at and to Horowhenua pending the inquiries to be made during the recess into the circumstances connected with the closing of that post-office?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had received information on the matter, in the shape of a letter from the Under-Secretary of the department to the Postmaster-General, to the effect that it was not thought necessary to make special arrangements. The question of opening the post-office would receive attention when Parliament prorogued.

PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed, The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said this Bill bore evidence on the face of it that a great deal of pains had been taken in drafting it. It was a consolidation Bill, and appeared to provide for nearly all the circumstances likely to arise. There were, however, one or two clauses to which he wished to draw the attention of the Council. He referred particularly to clauses 19 and 52. There had been a great deal said about providing cheap money for the people, and the colony was going to lend money at 5 per cent. This clause—19—proposed to validate acts done by the Public Trustees acting under probate or administration granted in error. There would be danger of confusion unless the clause were amended. Then, with regard to clause 52, which made it obligatory to give notice to the Public Trustee when a person died in a public institution, in many cases this would be found to be impossible. This would have to be struck out.

Bill considered in Committee.

Bill reported, with amendments, and read the third time.

WILSON LAND BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed,

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART thought this was a Bill which it was necessary the Council should have some particulars about. This Mr. Wilson lost his parents in 1869, at the time of the Poverty Bay massacre. The Government granted him an annuity of £50 a year until he came of age. They also granted him one hundred acres of land, of which he was to have the use during his lifetime, and he had power to dispose of the land by will on his death. He now wished to have the land vested in him, and if that were done it meant that he could dispose of the land to-morrow, and thus deprive himself and his children of the benefit intended for them by the Legislature in 1869. Mr. Wilson had granted a mortgage to the Union Bank of Australia over his interest in the land, and if this Bill were passed it would make that mortgage good, and the Union Bank might realise on their mortgage, and thus deprive Mr. Wilson and his children of the land. The object of the Bill seemed to him to be directly in conflict with the intention of the Legislature in making the grant in 1869. He did not think the Bill should be proceeded with any further, and would therefore move, That the Bill be committed that day three months.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN hoped that the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Stewart would be carried. This Bill had been before the Waste Lands Committee, and was carefully looked into. He considered it was a Bill that should not be passed by any Legislature. The colony had given this boy a pension, and it was the duty of the Legislature to protect him from himself. He hoped the amendment would be carried by the Council.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS wanted to know what the position of Wilson would be if the Bill passed.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON said the position was very easy to describe. Wilson would be simply out of house and home. He would like to draw attention to the proviso, which said, "And whereas the said James George Wilson, being at the time in ignorance of the restriction imposed by the said Act, executed to the Union Bank of Australia," and so on. It seemed to him a very curious thing that in executing the mortgage the lawyer for the Union Bank should not have examined the title, and it was more startling still that the Registrar should not have done so. The circumstances were that at the time of the Poverty Bay massacre the whole of the family of this boy were murdered, and the boy at the time went to the settlement and gave the alarm to the people. The women were thus enabled to take their children away on their backs, and the men were able to provide themselves with arms and to make provision for their safety. This little lad was the means of saving the lives of he did not know how many people.

The Provincial Government of Auckland had given him a grant of money, and the General Government gave him £50 a year till he was twenty-one years of age, and this land, with no power of sale, on account of his plucky conduct; and that object would be defeated if the Legislature passed this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. KERR said it seemed to him that this must have been a most extraordinary young boy, and when he grew up he seemed to be more extraordinary still, from the fact that he was able to get money on land to which he could give no title. He (Mr. Kerr) should certainly be inclined to keep him on this land until such time as he was able to bequeath it to the Union Bank or to his children.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it was quite clear that the Union Bank was interested in this matter. A good many other people who had blundered in connection with it were also interested in it. It was also clear that this Mr. Wilson would be very much injured if they passed the Bill. Therefore he supported the amendment.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said his honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn invariably showed some suspicion that there was something wrong, especially in anything the Government had to do with. Probably he would be pleased to know that this was not a Government measure at all. The representation made to the Government was that this man was anxious to get upon the land for the purpose of making a home for himself. As to the amount that was due to the Union Bank, the fact of his living upon the land would enable him to pay off that mortgage. He was liable under the mortgage, and he would be placed later on at a disadvantage if this Bill were not passed.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said he could easily go through the Court and clear himself in that way.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said if that was so he had not a word to say.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be committed that day three months.

LAND AND INCOME ASSESSMENT BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said there were a number of alterations in it of considerable importance. He would refer to some of them; otherwise there might be another objection that he only read the side-notes. One important matter was that instead of the assessment being made triennially it was to be made biennially, if the department should consider it necessary to do so. Clause 7 provided that the existing assessment should continue until the new assessment were made. A person might make an objection to his assessment, and the Commissioner might refuse to agree to the objection, but if that were granted the result of that would be a new assessment. There was another matter, and that was with regard to the Board of Review of Assessments.

Hon. Mr. Swanson

That was abolished, and the Stipendiary Magistrate was empowered to review assessments. Then, the 18th clause provided,—

“If any person makes default in furnishing any return of income, or if the Commissioner is not satisfied with the return of income made by any person, he may make an assessment of the amount on which, in his judgment, tax ought to be charged, and the tax shall be payable accordingly.”

That was the same as the English Act. He mentioned that because some honourable members thought it was rather inquisitorial. Then, in section 15 there was an alteration. As the law stood they could call upon a banking company to register; and there was another clause inserted, under which every banking company was to be assessed for income-tax each year. The provision was this:—

“Every banking company shall be assessed for income-tax each year upon a sum representing seven shillings and sixpence in every one hundred pounds of the average of its total assets and liabilities for the four quarters of the preceding year ending the thirty-first day of March.”

There was great difficulty in ascertaining what would be the income of some of the banks, and this was a method of arriving at what they should pay if they conducted their business prudently and wisely. It was something in the nature of a property-tax, as they would have to pay on their property. He had gone through this with great care in order to ascertain why the amount should be 7s. 6d., and why it should be assessed in that way instead of on the actual income; and that was the explanation he had had from the head of the department, and it was the only explanation that could be given. In the case of machinery there was a good deal of depreciation. Some machinery became obsolete, and no allowance had been made for that, or for repairs or depreciation, but under a clause in the Bill that would be allowed. In Committee he would be glad to give any further information which might be required by the Committee.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said this was a very important Bill, and he would therefore ask the honourable gentleman to postpone the committal till Monday, so that honourable members might have time to look into the different sections and see what alterations in the law were proposed. There were certainly some amendments which were necessary. Hitherto local ventures had been taxed very severely, while foreign companies had been allowed to go scot-free. He did not see anything in the Bill which provided for the taxing of outside shipping companies trading in the colony. All the local shipping was taxed, but outside shipping might come here and trade and not be taxed at all. He certainly thought something should be inserted in the Bill to reach them. Probably that might be held to come under the provision as to regulations. He was glad to see that at last some justice was going to be done in the matter of taxing banking people. It had been a scandal during the last three or four years that this question had not been dealt with. Local institutions were taxed up to the hilt, while we allowed some of the foreign companies to go scot-free. He was glad to see the present provision introduced, thus making all banks pay for the protection which they got from the colony.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN thought there must be either a mistake or a misprint in section 18, relating to banks. That clause provided that—

“Every banking company shall be assessed for income-tax each year upon a sum representing seven shillings and sixpence in every one hundred pounds of the average of its total assets and liabilities for the four quarters of the preceding year ending the thirty-first day of March, according to the sworn statements published in the Gazette.”

That was a most extraordinary thing—to tax an institution on its liabilities. It might, however, be a technical expression which laymen did not understand.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—It is very fair.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN would like to know how you could tax a bank on its liabilities as well as its assets. The liabilities might be something enormous. It seemed to him an extraordinary use of language. He could understand taxing a man or bank on their profits. Then, as to making returns every two years instead of every three years, it was one of the annoyances of the present system—the complicated returns which had to be made up and furnished to the department. Many persons regarded it as almost worse to make up the returns than to pay the tax—the whole thing was so complicated. Curiously enough, a return was made in this Bill to the principle of the property-tax, although that principle was looked upon as so utterly abominable. For his own part, he thought it was a much better principle than the present system. It was only in the working of it that it failed; it was foolishly administered, and the assessments were not made as they ought to have been. As to the graduated tax, that was simply a form of confiscation, and any one who studied the matter would see that. In his opinion, the whole system was wrong from beginning to end.

Bill read the second time.

The Council adjourned at four minutes to one o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, 20th October, 1894.

Second Readings—Third Readings—Native Land Court Bill—Criminal Code Bill—Native Land Court Bill—Shipping and Seamen's Bill—Death of the Hon. Mr. Dignan.—Pomahaka Purchase.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READINGS.

James Mitchell Trust Bill, Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill, Westland County Council Enabling Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

James Mitchell Trust Bill, Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill, Westland County Council Enabling Bill.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

The report of the Conference on this Bill was brought up. [See proceedings of Legislative Council, p. 973.]

On the question, That this report be agreed to,

Mr. HEKE moved, That this House does not agree to the recommendation of the Conference as regards clause 115, in so far as such arrangement strikes out the dealing with lands held by Natives in severalty. He contended that the Natives, where they had their title established to them in severalty, ought to be allowed to deal in the same way as Europeans. They were liable to suffer in many respects under Acts passed by the House—such as the Rating Act and other Acts which imposed taxation on them—and he thought it was only fair that Natives holding their title in severalty should have an opportunity of dealing with them in the way Europeans were allowed to deal. They had a provision in the Bill that any Native could apply to the Land Board; but he contended that it cost too much for any individual to apply to the Board to have his land disposed of, and the only way in which any individual would be able to dispose of this burden placed upon his property under the Acts he had mentioned was to allow them to deal with their lands as Europeans.

Captain RUSSELL seconded the amendment, on the principle that, so long as it was provided under statute that no Native should be allowed to alienate his land to such an extent as to render himself liable to become a burden on the State, it was not the duty of Parliament to interfere with the alienation by the Natives of such land as they held in severalty. Under the provision alluded to—in clause 115—no Native had power to alienate his land unless he could prove that he would have sufficient land left to support himself; and under those circumstances it was their duty to assimilate the position of the Natives to that of the Europeans as far as possible, so long as they did not thereby make the Natives a charge on the State.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON took leave to say that he hardly believed the House realised what it was doing in connection with Native lands. Since the Bill had come to the House from the Native Affairs Committee he did not know that half a dozen members had been able to follow the intricacies of the changes that had been made. In short, the provisions of Division II. of the measure as now presented for acceptance were nothing short of confiscation of Native property, tempered by compensation, not under such safeguards as were afforded by Arbitration Courts in the taking of land for settlement or for public works, but at the caprice of the Minister of the day. It might be very desirable to restore the pre-emptive right over large blocks of land, particularly where the titles were not ascertained; but there were, to his knowledge, holdings of small extent which the Native owners could not utilise themselves—holdings of bush or swamp land—which, under the provisions of this Bill, the Natives would be debarred from dealing with except to the Crown. The Natives were to be treated not only as imbeciles but as outlaws. He had no hope, of course, that his proposal would be carried, but he took the opportunity of saying those few words, for the day would come when this rash and inconsiderate legislation would have to be undone.

Mr. SEDDON was somewhat surprised, after the House had expressed itself on the question, that the matter should now at this late stage of the session be questioned. The honourable member for Mareden had tested the feeling of the House by moving an amendment in Committee.

Mr. R. THOMPSON.—Members did not understand what they were voting on.

Mr. SEDDON said it was well understood, and, at any rate, the amendment was not carried. Then, the Legislative Council placed the same thing in the Bill. It came to the House; the House disagreed with the amendment and instructed their Managers to disagree; so that, now the House had had its own way, an amendment was moved providing that it should stultify itself by agreeing to what it had refused on two occasions. It was placing the Managers for the House in a false position. It meant practically free-trade in Native land, and that was not considered by the House to be desirable. The Natives were not treated unjustly, but in a way that would be for the benefit of the race, and were protected as against what had been happening time after time, and what had proved injurious to the colony in stopping settlement, and what had led to litigation as between the Natives and the Europeans which had caused serious trouble to Parliament. The House had repeatedly to be passing validation Bills, and the only way to stop this was to agree to the Bill as amended. The feeling of the House was so well ascertained on this point that, whatever might occur in the future, the Bill should be passed at once.

Mr. THOMPSON knew it was useless to say anything in reference to the Bill; but the Premier had scarcely put the case fairly before the House, and that accounted for the way in which a great many honourable members voted on the question. The honourable gentleman represented that this meant free-trade in Native land. It meant nothing of the kind, and if honourable members would look at clause 28 of the Bill they would see it was not free-trade. No Native could divest himself of land without going before the Trust Commissioner and satisfying him that he had sufficient land left to live upon. There could be no stronger indication of the injustice of the Bill than the fact that the Native members in the House were opposed to it. They must surely know their own business, and be able to look after their own affairs. He told honourable members if the Bill passed it would lock up the North Island and stop settlement. If that was what honourable members desired they were going to attain their object. He knew it was useless to say anything in the matter, but if they came back next session they would find that the matter would be reopened, and the measure would have to be repealed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, representing as he had done for many years a considerable number of Natives, he must, in justice to them, support the amendment. His opinion was that the Natives in all the settled districts who had titles in severalty to their land would be very much injured by the Bill. They had lived in contact with Europeans for many years, and were perfectly well able to deal with their own property—just as well able as many Europeans. They were always making professions of placing the Natives on the same footing as Europeans, and now they proposed to pass this Bill and commit a rank injustice upon such Natives as he had described. Then, again, the passing of the Bill would mean the confiscation of considerable sums of money, spent by Europeans in assisting Natives to get titles to their land. Under the provisions of clause 115, those who had so advanced to Natives, and had done so in a bonâ fide way, would have their advances confiscated, because there was no protection for them under the Bill. If it were provided that the Government should recoup them on the sale of the land, justice might possibly be secured; but as it now stood there would be a great amount of injustice perpetrated, both on the Natives, who had in his experience been always willing and anxious to deal fairly and justly with the Europeans, and also on the Europeans themselves who had advanced money in a bonâ fide way.

Mr. McGUIRE would support the amendment, because the Native Minister was acting in a very arbitrary manner. It was a very unjust thing, and would inflict great hardship upon the Natives, who were subject to pay rates and taxes, and whose land would be locked up at the sweet will of the Government. It was also very unjust to the North Island, and would be the means of retarding settlement. This was one of the ways in which the present Government meant to bar the progress of the North. They were working in the interests of the South, as could be seen by the Land for Settlements Bill. He hoped the amendment would be accepted, as it was on lines of justice. The Premier knew nothing whatever of Native matters, or he would know that it was the wish of thousands of Natives that they should have the right of dealing with their own lands.

Mr. WILSON said they might just as well stop the Europeans on the west coast of the North Island from dealing with their lands as the Natives on the Coast. They had just as much knowledge of the value of land, and had as much opportunity of getting good value for it, as Europeans. In their interests he would be doing right in supporting the amendment.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. CARROLL was inclined to agree that the time was inopportune to resist the amendments made by the House and sanctioned by the other Chamber. He was inclined to think that at the present stage the question had better be left over, believing as he did that the matter would have to be faced and dealt with before long. If the question were left over, it would allow his colleague during the recess to look at every phase of the question, in the interests of all concerned. He might state that he was quite in sympathy with the desire for individual freedom as advanced by the previous speakers.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said a correspondent had written to him stating that he had already purchased a large portion of land from Natives whose title had been individualised, and that he contemplated purchasing the balance.

Mr. SEDDON said that was provided for.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Have they a right of sale?

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes.

Mr. LANG rose to support the amendment of the honourable member for the Northern Maori District. He looked upon it that the Natives were quite able to look after their own interests, and that to make provisions such as those proposed was only to retard settlement. It was also most unjust to the Natives. How would Europeans like to be placed in the same position as the Natives, in not being able to deal with their own property? So much had been said on this question that he did not wish to delay the House. He simply wished to add his protest against the action of the Government in this matter.

The House divided on the question, "That the report of the Conference with regard to section 115 be agreed to."

AYES, 39.

Buddo	Joyce	Pinkerton
Buick	Larnach	Pirani
Cadman	Lawry	Reeves
Carncross	Mackintosh	Russell, G. W.
Carnell	McGowan	Saunders
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Seddon
Collins	McKenzie, R.	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McLachlan	Stout
Earnshaw	McNab	Tanner
Graham	Meredith	Willis.
Guinness	Millar	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Montgomery
Harris	O'Regan	Morrison.
Hogg

NOES, 25.

Allen	Green	Massey
Bell	Houston	McGuire
Buchanan	Hutchison, G.	Mitchelson
Crowther	Kelly, J. W.	Parata
Duthie	Kelly, W.	Pere
Fraser	Mackenzie, T.	Russell, W. R.

Smith, E. M.	Thompson	Tellers.
Stevens	Wilson.	Heke
Te Ao		Lang.

Majority for, 14.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON desired to move an amendment with regard to clause 116. This clause was intended to allow an opportunity to those who had been in bonâ fide negotiation for interests in land to complete their transactions—in legal phrase, to allow them a locus penitentiae—but he doubted if the clause, as it now appeared, would have the effect that had been promised. The understanding was that a clause such as that in "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," would be inserted in this Bill. But this clause did not preserve rights to the same extent; it would apply only to enable pending transactions to be completed where some interests in the same block had been already acquired according to law. That was to say, unless a person had perfected the purchase or lease of some interests in a block, he could not go on to complete interests which he might have been in treaty for, although the completion of these outstanding interests was subject in the first instance to his obtaining a certificate after due inquiry as to the bona fides of the transaction, which on completion would be again subject to various safeguards against fraud. His amendment was as follows: "This House accepts the amendments made in the proviso, if the wording of the main clause be amended to allow (subject to the safeguards as to certificates of bona fides) the acquisition of shares or interests which at the passing of the Bill were under treaty, although the person so treating had not purchased or leased other shares in the same block." Although it might be futile—in fact, desperate—to attempt a division on this question, he would probably call for one, for the purpose of putting upon record this protest against such "hugger-mugger" legislation as they were passing—legislation which would almost certainly have to be amended or repealed in some succeeding session.

Mr. BELL said he was quite aware, with his honourable friend who had moved in this matter, of the futility of endeavouring to obtain an amendment. It was not a question of argument, but a matter of fairness between the Premier and himself. There was no dispute as to the facts at all. During the debate on the second reading, at a time when there was some obstruction to the Bill, he had said that if the Hon. the Premier would accept the clause contained in Mr. Ballance's Administration Act he would agree to support the Bill. Thereupon the Premier said he would do so, and suggested that he (Mr. Bell) should stay and give him the benefit of his assistance on the other clauses of the Bill. He was, however, pretty tired, and went to bed, and the whole result followed from that. It was for the House to say whether the country was to be punished because he happened to go to bed. Then, this happened: His honourable friend the member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), acting under some misapprehension, told the Premier that a clause which was in manuscript, and which he (Mr. Bell) had never seen and had nothing to do with, was his clause, and the Premier inserted it. So far the Premier had done all that could be expected. The Premier had put in the clause which he had been told was his (Mr. Bell's) clause; but he had said that he would put in the clause of his late chief, Mr. Ballance. In that way the Premier was led into this error; and he (Mr. Bell) was under the impression that the clause from the Administration Act had been put in. When appealed to subsequently the Premier said that this was a better clause than the clause in the Administration Act, and that he would stick to it. The Premier had power to do that; and he wished to put on record that up to the time of the Premier ascertaining his mistake, and refusing to remedy it, there could be no possible ground of complaint against him. Since the Premier had discovered his mistake he thought he had not treated him fairly, and that he had not treated the House fairly. He submitted that the amendment of the honourable member for Patea ought to be accepted. There had been a statement made by the Premier on the floor of the House that a certain provision would be inserted, which, by a mistake for which the Premier was not answerable, had not been inserted. That was the case, but, the mistake having occurred, the Premier refused to rectify it.

Mr. SEDDON said the history of this clause was almost as unique as that of clause 21, the famous clause in the Licensing Act. Just for the moment he could not tell who was the preparer of this particular clause. The honourable member must admit that he had put the question to him, if he (Mr. Seddon) had any objection to put in clauses 24 and 25 of the Administration Act of 1886—which he said were put in by Mr. Ballance. He (Mr. Seddon) had said, "Well, if my late chief approved of them they must be all right, certainly." Then, what happened was this: Later on, when they were getting the Bill through the House, Mr. Button came to him and said, "Here is a new clause"—asking at the same time, "What about the amendment you promised Mr. Bell?" He replied, "Very well," and accepted the new clause, at the time believing it to have been drafted by Mr. Bell. This had happened in consequence of Mr. Bell going away. Knowing that he desired the amendment, he had asked Mr. Bell to remain to attend to it and finish the Bill, but he had replied that he felt rather tired and would leave. He left, the clause was given to him by Mr. Button as Mr. Bell's clause, the House accepted it, it was put in the Bill, it went to the Legislative Council, the Legislative Council accepted it with some additional proviso, and the Conference agreed to it. Then he had met Mr. Bell in the lobby, and Mr. Bell had said it was not his clause; he replied that Mr. Button had given it to him as Mr. Bell's clause; and Mr. Button, when asked who had given it to him, said he did not know, but he thought it was Mr. Mitchelson.

Mr. Bell

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was not he.

Mr. SEDDON said, Well, when he received this clause, he read it carefully, and he saw it was not objectionable—that it went in the right direction, and quite as far as he intended it to go. He had not read clauses 24 and 25 of "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," at that time, but when he did read them he thought that they would have given far too much latitude. He had simply to say that to have put them in when he was asked to do so afterwards would have been to have made a complete farce of the whole thing, and he refused to be a party to anything of that kind. If they were going to pass legislation, let it be defined; and he would say that, whoever had drafted the amendment, it was well drafted. He felt sure that it had been done by some member of the legal profession. There were three or four little words in the clause which he liked very much; they were "in accordance with the law." These words pleased him, and he said, Well, as long as these negotiations have been in accordance with the law, let the party who is purchasing a block or leasing it continue the negotiations. Now, these words were not in sections 24 and 25 of the Administration Act, and, under the circumstances, if he put in the Bill an amendment which was not an improvement on the Administration Act, and his honourable friend complained, then he should blame himself; but, as the amendment was an improvement, and their experience had led them to know it was an improvement, then he thought no one had a right to complain. The only one who was to blame in the matter was the honourable member for Wellington City, who had asked to have the amendment, for, if he took sufficient interest in the matter, he ought to have remained at his place and have seen that it was attended to. The honourable member did not do that, but went home; and now they were asked to undo all that had been done, though the Bill had passed the Council and the Conference. He did not think the House was called upon to accept the amendment, and he could not accept it, for it would go very much further than the original. When the Bill was introduced representations were made that very many persons who had been legally negotiating would be injured if they were suddenly stopped short in their negotiations, and, under these circumstances, he agreed to give the concession, and he felt satisfied the House would do well to allow the Bill to remain as it was, and the country would be satisfied.

Mr. BELL wished to explain that he had not at all attempted to discuss whether the clause that was now in the Bill was or was not better than that in the Act of 1886. All he had intended to do, and had done, was to say that a clause in the Act of 1886 was the one which the Premier had agreed to put in this Bill. He was glad to find there was no difference of opinion as to the facts.

Mr. SEDDON thought he was entitled to the benefit of the doubt. He had not endeavoured to misrepresent the matter, and might say that the clauses in the Administration Act would not work in with this at all. They would require the aid of the legal profession to put them into shape, and he thought some one had taken the trouble to do that. In the honourable member's absence he had acted in perfectly good faith.

Mr. BELL said he had not accused the honourable gentleman of doing otherwise.

Captain RUSSELL thought there could be no doubt that here both honourable gentlemen were guilty under extenuating circumstances, and that the case was one in which there ought to be a fresh trial.

Mr. SEDDON said he was quite satisfied with the result.

Captain RUSSELL said the hardship to a person who, under the existing law, had entered into negotiations, if those negotiations were cut short by the Bill would be very great indeed; and in all probability the passage of such a clause as has been inserted would intensify the distress. It would be a very good thing now, when there was an endeavour to obtain a final settlement of the Native question, to allow the most liberal interpretation to be put upon transactions which had been bona fide entered into between the parties.

Mr. HEKE said he sympathized very much with all those Europeans who had made arrangements with Natives in reference to the leasing or sale of their lands. It had been the practice, especially with the older Natives, to make promises to Europeans to lease or sell, and a great many such engagements were made in good faith by both parties. Although agreeing with the clause, he would say that a great many arrangements had been entered into between Europeans and the Natives which had not been made in a very pleasing manner. There were also many that had been made in good faith on both sides. He wished to say that in many of these cases there were Europeans who had entered into negotiations with the Natives, and they should have an opportunity of completing the negotiations they might have entered into. Now, there was a great deal of difference between treating privately and publicly with the Natives. He would tell the House again that in future dealings with the Natives public dealings were the best, and the sooner public dealings with them, either by the Crown or by private individuals, were adopted in cases of either sale or lease of Native lands the better it would be for the Natives and for the Europeans, and also for Parliament. Much of the trouble and litigation that had arisen in connection with these matters had sprung from the secret negotiations not only on the part of the Crown, but also on the part of the agents appointed by private individuals. He would not say that it was private individuals alone who entered into these secret negotiations. The Crown also was entitled to blame the same as private individuals; and as soon as the House saw its way clear, that for the future negotiations with the Natives in reference to the sale or lease of their lands and everything of that nature should be made in public among the Natives the better it would be for all concerned.

The House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 37.

Buddo	Lawry	Reeves
Buick	Mackintosh	Russell, G. W.
Cadman	McKenzie, J.	Saunders
Carnell	McKenzie, R.	Seddon
Collins	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McNab	Stout
Earnshaw	Meredith	Tanner
Graham	Mills	Ward
Guinness	Montgomery	Willis.
Hall	Morrison
Hogg	O'Regan	Tellers.
Joyce	Pinkerton	Harris
Larnach	Pirani	McGowan.

NOES, 27.

Bell	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	Kelly, W.	Smith, E. M.
Button	Lang	Stevens
Carnarross	Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao
Crowther	Massey	Thompson
Duthie	McGuire	Wilson.
Fraser	Newman	Tellers.
Green	Parata	Hutchison, G.
Heke	Pere	Mitchelson.
Houston

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Carroll	Allen
Flatman.	Hall-Jones.

Majority for, 10.

Amendment negatived.

Report agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

Mr. SEDDON brought up a report from the second Conference on this Bill, stating that the Council insisted on its amendments, and recommending that the House should waive its objections to them. In moving, That the report be agreed to, he said that the point really at issue was as to the clause dealing with the age of consent. On the occasion of the first Conference the Managers on behalf of the Council refused point-blank to agree to raise the age of consent to sixteen, which was the amendment made by the House. A second Conference was then asked by the House; and the same Managers, with an additional member from the Council, attended, and the Managers for the Council still insisted on the Bill as it left the Council, in which the age of consent was only raised from fourteen to fifteen years. It therefore became a matter for consideration with the Managers on behalf of the House as to whether they should accept the increase of one year, represented by the raising of the age of consent from fourteen years to fifteen years, fourteen years being the age according to law at the present time, or whether they should refuse altogether to accept the Council's amendment, and wait for a year, and then bring in a Bill next session. After thinking the matter over in the interests of the young females of the country, they came to the conclusion that it would be better to take the increase of a year offered by the Council, seeing that they would have another opportunity next year of sending a Bill up to the Council providing that the age should be raised to sixteen. He hoped that the conclusion arrived at in this matter would meet with the approval of the House. He had felt very anxious in connection with the matter. He thought fifteen years was not high enough. Judging by the expressions of opinion they had had from all parts of the colony from those who took a deep interest in the matter, he thought the Council had done wrong in insisting upon their amendment. However, the House could do no better than accept what it had gained, and in that spirit he hoped the House would accede to his motion.

Mr. MILLS said that before the report was agreed to he desired to make a few remarks. He understood the Legislative Council had excised that part of the Bill providing for a new trial for the man Chemis, and he wished to say that it was a marvel to him that in these days a Legislative Council attached more importance to anything in the shape of retrospective legislation than to the liberty of the subject in this colony. He contended the House had passed retrospective legislation over and over again, and only as recently as the day before they had done so in regard to the Little Barrier Island. He was not going to elaborate on the matter, or to go into the new evidence which came out before the Committee of which he was Chairman; and, though the member for Clutha might interrupt him and laugh, as a father of a family he would ask the honourable gentleman if he could not show some slight feeling of sympathy, if not of justice, as that was practically what was asked for in this case. He did not ask for the discharge of the man, but simply that legislation be passed putting him in the same position as any member of that House or of the Upper Chamber stood in to-day. That right had been denied to Chemis; and he hoped that those members who laughed and jeered at this matter, trying to turn it into ridicule, would yet regret exceedingly what they were doing. He only asked what was right and fair and just, and there was no unfairness about that. When he found honourable members treating such a matter with levity, he simply wished to say that he was not afraid to speak, and that he should always give expression to his own opinions, even though he might be wrong. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) was a man who considered he could do no wrong, for, like Caesar's wife, he was above suspicion, and he could not make a mistake. And yet he had heard the honourable gentleman in that House say things one day and the next day he reversed the whole statement. His legal knowledge enabled him to express whatever views he liked, and to twist them as he wished. He invited the attention of honourable members to this fact: that the logical conclusion in this matter was that either the man Chemis was a murderer or he was not; and if the Crown could prove that he was a murderer he ought to have been hung. Failing that, the man should receive the benefit of the doubt. He might also remind honourable members that there had been many cases recorded, as the House knew well, where prisoners had been convicted and hanged, and afterwards it was proved they were innocent. They knew perfectly well that the session before last a man shot two men on the wharf in Wellington, and the result was that he was only sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Last year a young man shot his own father in the City of Wellington; and on looking at the details in the newspapers he found that he had been allowed to receive visits from his friends, read the papers, and smoke, until the trial, and then at the trial the verdict was "Justifiable homicide." But in the case of this unfortunate man Chemis how very different the treatment! and it could not be shown conclusively that he was guilty of the gross crime attributed to him. The evidence before the Committee proved to them that he was not guilty, and, in his opinion, that Committee were at any rate quite as well qualified to express an opinion as any common jury. He had no hesitation in saying that a great miscarriage of justice had taken place: of that there was no doubt in his mind; and he was only asking what was right and just—that this poor man should receive the benefit contemplated when the provision referred to, providing a Court of Appeal, was inserted in the Criminal Code Act. He asked honourable members to assist him in the matter, because the position was unfortunate and they were blocked. The House had passed a clause in the Bill to meet this case, and the Upper Chamber refused to accept it. He had done his best to get a separate measure passed, and had at the commencement of the session brought in a Bill to deal with the matter, but it was swept away by the debate on the Financial Statement. Then, week after week went by; and what was the result? Just as the honourable member for the Eastern Maori District had said, these shadowy Bills that were introduced into the House had taken up so much time that this question, which was one of such grave importance, had been allowed to pass, and would, if he and several others had not taken it up, have been allowed to sink into obscurity. Once more he asked not for sympathy, but for justice. They knew perfectly well that many cases had occurred, both in the Old Country and in other countries, where a man or woman had been imprisoned for long years while innocent of the crime he or she was accused of; and in this case there was not one member of that House who could say positively that he was certain Chemis was guilty. He had been convicted purely on circumstantial evidence; and he (Mr. Mills) regretted exceedingly to hear the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), with his legal training and knowledge, stand up and state that the man was a criminal—in fact, pronounce a second judgment on this unfortunate man, and thus constitute himself a Court of Criminal Appeal. He asked that something should be done to meet the case, and he hoped every member who had any feeling of true sympathy with the unfortunate would help him.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. GUINNESS would like to see honourable members practising what they preached. He regretted very much that the Legislative Council had seen fit to disagree with the clause in the Criminal Code Bill which virtually meant retrospective legislation in regard to the convict Chemis, but he thought the honourable gentleman would remember that at a meeting of the Goldfields Committee he (Mr. Guinness) had proposed that a measure of justice should be done in the shape of a slight modicum of retrospective legislation, but the honourable member had opposed it.

Mr. MILLS.—No.

Mr. GUINNESS said the honourable gentleman's vote threw the proposal out; and he would leave him to think over it.

Mr. HOGG wished to say a few words, in addition to those uttered by the honourable member for the Grey and the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds. He believed that Chemis was innocent of the crime of which he had been convicted; and they were not now asking that his sentence of imprisonment should be in any way interfered with, but that further inquiry should be made into the case. What had been stated by the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds was perfectly true, that Chemis had been convicted on purely circumstantial evidence of an exceedingly shadowy character. The circumstances of the trial were of such a peculiar nature that they were warranted in demanding that the opportunity should be afforded him which the amendment in the criminal law now provided, with a view to enabling him to apply for a rehearing. In reference to this particular case, they must consider the interests of others—of the unfortunate man's wife and family. This family had been damaged in reputation, bereaved, and deprived of their bread-winner; the father had been convicted of murder; and for the sake of those depending upon him, if there was a doubt of his guilt, something ought to be done. There was also to be considered the serious responsibility that rested on the Crown Prosecutor, the public officers, and the witnesses for the prosecution if through their efforts an innocent man was lingering in prison. The jury at the trial had had placed before them a one-sided statement, and not one solitary witness had been called for the defence of this man. His counsel was dying at the time from typhoid fever, and died a few hours after the conviction took place. Before his death he was sure of his unfortunate client's case—that no jury could possibly convict. No evidence was called for the defence; and if all the circumstances were taken into consideration, in justice to this unfortunate man, he should have a further opportunity of having his case reviewed. He held peculiar views with regard to the whole system of criminal trial. In his opinion the system was one that ought to be reformed. It had been handed down from "the dark ages," and was a most unfortunate state of affairs. They found that, while a matter of a few shillings had to be tried before a trained tribunal, issues relating to the life of a subject were tried before an uneducated common jury. Where men with no judicial training, and no special education, were brought together for the first time in a case of this kind the evidence had often little to do with the verdict—it depended almost entirely on the relative abilities of the counsel for the prosecution and the counsel for the defence whether the accused was convicted or discharged. Under such circumstances, if ever there was a case which demanded a rehearing, in which the action of a tribunal ought to be reviewed, it was the case of the man Chemis. He noticed that the representatives of the legal profession in that and the other Chamber were mostly opposed to a rehearing of this case. The family of Chemis were not asking for any consideration; they were only crying out for justice. He believed that, no matter what steps might be taken by either House, the public mind in connection with this case would not be satisfied until justice was done to this man.

Mr. BELL would like to say a word or two with regard to what had been stated by the honourable member for Masterton, who had attacked those who had conducted the prosecution of this man. Of all persons whom he (Mr. Bell) had ever met, the honourable member for Masterton was the most incompetent to form an opinion on the question whether the prosecution or defence was properly or improperly conducted. For that reason he (Mr. Bell) refused to enter into discussion with the honourable gentleman on this subject.

Mr. O'REGAN said that, even if he differed from his honourable friend the member for Waimea-Sounds on this question, at the same time he could not but admire the interest that gentleman had shown in connection with it, and he took that opportunity of saying that he felt exactly as the honourable member did in regard to this case. If there had been no doubt whatever about the guilt of the prisoner, he wanted to know why the death-sentence had been commuted, and why this case had been given as a reason for setting up a Court of Criminal Appeal. He (Mr. O'Regan) did not wish to express any opinion as to the manner in which the trial had been conducted, or as to whether Chemis was innocent or guilty. But one fact which was indisputable was that there was a doubt about his guilt. It was quite possible that this man who had been convicted upon a charge of murder was suffering innocently.

Mr. REEVES.—No.

Mr. O'REGAN.—The Hon. the Minister of Education said "No." That honourable gentleman was entitled to his opinion, just as any one else was; but beyond that he (Mr. O'Regan) would not go. It was quite possible the Hon. the Minister of Education might be wrong, and he must refuse to believe that the honourable gentleman had any special qualification to judge of this matter. If the prisoner was really innocent he had the consolation of conscious innocence, and the House was unable to deprive him of that consolation. He (Mr. O'Regan) asked honourable members to consider that this man's wife and children were labouring under the stigma, the terrible stigma, that Chemis had committed murder—a stigma that would rest upon his family when he was gone. He (Mr. O'Regan) had read of instances where men had been convicted of murder upon evidence somewhat similar to that adduced at Chemis's trial, and in these cases the innocence of the accused persons had been established after long years had passed. He remembered the case of a man who had been convicted of murder at Birmingham and was transported to Australia, and forty-four years afterwards the innocence of that man was established. The Victorian Government gave him £1,000 compensation, and a free pardon as well. The relatives of Chemis were not asking for mercy. What they asked for was simple justice. His (Mr. O'Regan's) opinion was—and he said so with all due deference to the honourable members who differed from him—that there was strong evidence to be had of the man's innocence, and therefore his case should be reviewed.

Sir R. STOUT.—It has been twice reviewed.

Mr. O'REGAN.—The honourable member for Wellington City said the case had been twice reviewed: then, it should be reviewed a third time if necessary. The honourable member for Wellington City was bound by cast-iron precedents of law, but there were times when law did not have the sanction of morality; there were laws for which he (Mr. O'Regan) had no respect, and which he for one would not hesitate to break if it were necessary to do so. He failed to see why he should be bound down by mouldy precedents. The case should be tried on its merits; while a doubt remained they should not rest until that doubt was removed. This man might be guilty or he might be innocent. If innocent, there was not only an undeserved stain resting upon him, but upon all who belonged to him, and it was their bounden duty as legislators to see that a stain did not rest upon him or them undeservedly.

Mr. MILLS rose to explain, in reference to what the honourable member for the Grey had stated, that that gentleman had made a proposition to the Goldfields Committee to extend the time to twelve months during which people could put in claims for damage done to their land from tailings put into water-races; but he also wanted to make the law retrospective, and would not tell the Committee for what purpose. That was why he (Mr. Mills) voted against the motion, but finally he proposed an amendment which made it ninety days instead of fifty, as it stood, and that, he believed, was carried.

Mr. O'Regan

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said no information had been given to the House in the speeches which honourable members had heard which would lead him to suppose that if a further trial were granted those honourable members would be satisfied. The honourable member for Inangahua had stated that if evidence had been twice reviewed it ought again to be reviewed by a Court of law. The case had been tried by a Court of law, and had been investigated by a Committee of members of that House; and yet, years after the occurrence had taken place, these honourable gentlemen stood up on the floor of that House and claimed that all that had been previously done should be reviewed, as if this man had been treated unjustly. Why, if the matter had not been of so serious a character, the whole thing would be amusing. Whether this man was guilty or not, he had been tried by a Court of justice, and it was only fair to assume that he had had a fair trial. All honour was due to the honourable member for Waimea for the action he had taken in this matter if he thought this man was innocent. But he ought not, in taking up the case, to have made reflections upon the law-courts. And then the honourable gentleman referred to the "poor ignorant jurymen" in this case. Why, the honourable member had gone more on his knees before the electors from whom, as a class, these jurymen were drawn than any other member in that House. Why, two-thirds of the members of that Parliament were not qualified to occupy a higher position than that of a common jurymen. They were as able to come to as sound a conclusion upon a question of this sort as those who made reflections upon them. He (Mr. Mackenzie) did not intend to say anything further than this; It seemed peculiar that so much cry had been made over the wife and children of Chemis, but not a single word had been said about the unfortunate widow of the murdered man.

An Hon. MEMBER.—We are not dealing with that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—But it had a great deal to do with the matter. He did not know that that House was the proper place to bring up such a case as that, and he would not have spoken on the occasion had it not been for the manner in which the case had been dealt with by those who assumed, whether rightly or wrongly, that Chemis was innocent.

Sir R. STOUT was glad to see that the honourable member for Masterton had at last come to think that ignorance was a thing to be reprobated, because he had imagined from the speeches which the honourable gentleman had made before that he had a contempt for higher education and matters of that sort. What were the facts about this case? The honourable member for Masterton assumed, and the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds assumed, that this case had not been investigated. There was no criminal case in this country which had been more closely investigated, not only before a Judge and jury, but when the verdict was given a charge of perjury was laid against the witnesses, which had been most carefully sifted by the Magistrate, who declined to commit them for trial. A Grand Jury investigated the charge, and they declined to send the persons accused of perjury for trial, so that there were two hearings beyond the first investigation which resulted in the man being condemned to death.

Mr. MILLS.—The second investigation was nothing.

Sir R. STOUT.—It was something. It was conducted before a special jury of educated men, and they did not think there was a prima facie case to send for trial. The honourable gentleman was so biased that he did not understand what was a fair hearing. There was a third investigation by the Governor and the Executive, and they did not think the man was innocent. The honourable gentleman had complained that this Executive Council inquiry was not equal to a Court of Appeal. He (Sir R. Stout) did not think it was. But it should not be forgotten that in South Australia the Governor and Executive Council were the Appeal Court even for civil cases. Honourable members who had taken up this matter had decided that this much-talked-about man Chemis had not had a fair trial; but their opinion was simply without foundation.

Mr. E. M. SMITH said he had a few words to say. What had brought him to his feet was what the honourable member for Clutha had said. He (Mr. Smith) was quite certain of this: that the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds, in rising that afternoon to protest against the action of those in another place, was within his rights and privileges. What were the facts? The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), whenever this case had cropped up, either that afternoon or any other afternoon, had shown that what he accused the member for Waimea-Sounds of he was guilty of himself. He had placed himself in the same position, for he had pronounced on this case whenever an attempt was made to get Chemis a rehearing. This was a special case. He was not in Wellington at the time, nor did he have an opportunity of considering the way in which the prosecution was conducted when the matter was on trial, but when he came to consider this case before the Committee which investigated it, what was the result? The Committee had all the evidence in connection with the case, and amongst other evidence they had the evidence of an ex-Minister—Mr. G. F. Richardson—who was the first member of the Ministry to point out the doubts as to this man's guilt, and he believed, of all men in New Zealand, if Mr. Richardson was in that House that afternoon he would say that he was firmly confident that this man was innocent. It was well known that Chemis's wife was barred from giving evidence before the Court, when she was capable of showing where Chemis was between certain hours; and that would have weighed with the jury, provided they had examined her on oath. He considered the law was defective on that point. He would state that if any impartial tribunal went through that evidence they would say that the police had neglected their duty. They appeared to set their eyes entirely on this one man, and they took no trouble to look after other people whose movements had been very mysterious in connection with this man Hawkings. They never attempted to investigate the actions of those people, and if they had he believed there would have been a good deal of light thrown on the case. He said that in a democratic country like this, where they had amended the law, and where they believed this case had never been fairly sheeted home to the accused man, the matter should not be allowed to rest in its present position. What did they do during the session in opening this case? It was to be with the sanction of the Supreme Court, and no outsider could come in and demand that the case should be opened. What harm was there in that? They had seen how the matter was dealt with in another place; but he felt convinced that there were certain honourable gentlemen in that House who, if they could not carry their way, immediately began to lobby, and when they looked at the amendments made in another place they could easily trace where the action had been. He asked the residents of Wellington and the people of New Zealand to get a copy of the petition, and see the way in which it was worded by the deputation that waited on the Governor—the deputation of the prisoner's fellow-countrymen. Let the people read that petition word for word to see how well they had put the case; and, if they did so, they could only come to the same conclusion that he had come to—namely, that it would be only honest and fair to give this man an opportunity by reopening his case in the Court. They could lose nothing by it, but would have everything to gain, and it would be said rightly that they, as representatives of the people, were endeavouring to do justice—not that they were trying to override the ruling of the Supreme Court, because they were not trying to do anything that would tend to throw contempt on our system of trial by jury. As for members like the honourable member for Clutha, who got up in his place whenever there was a case of murder, or opening it up again, and turned it into ridicule, he felt sorry that he was not privileged by the rules of the House to use the words he would like to use in connection with that honourable gentleman's action. That honourable gentleman attempted to throw ridicule on the representatives of the people, and he talked about people that were not able to address a public meeting before they came to the House. He would ask the honourable gentleman to search the records of Taranaki, and he would see that he (Mr. E. M. Smith) had been before the public for the last forty-three years. He had been talking about theology and botany and all those kinds of things; and if he could take the honourable gentleman home with him to the Old Country he would go with him and deliver an address at the Science College at Birmingham. He would speak there of New Zealand, and give them information about this democratic country. He would not, however, forget to give a page to the honourable gentleman. With regard to this case, he did not say that this man was guilty or innocent, but he firmly and conscientiously believed that the evidence put before that Committee, which was now obtainable by the Court if the case were reopened, would be such that they would lose nothing by bringing it forward, and if they would gain nothing, at any rate they would let the world know that they disagreed with the amendment made in another place.

Mr. ALLEN understood the matter under discussion was the Chemis case, but the question of the honourable gentleman's going home to England had been brought up. Well, they all wanted to go home, and if they discussed useful legislation instead of useless legislation they would get home all the quicker. He had no doubt if the honourable gentleman went Home the country would very much benefit by it, especially if he made the wild statements at Home that he made in the House.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked if the honourable gentleman was speaking to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member for Bruce seemed to be referring to some remarks made by the honourable gentleman himself during the present debate.

Mr. ALLEN was only astonished that the honourable gentleman had been permitted to make the remarks he had made. The honourable member for Clutha did not wish to prevent him from going Home: in fact, he thought the House would be very glad if he did go. Of course they should be sorry to miss him, because he was amusing to the House, especially when he made the amusing statements he had made that afternoon, and on other occasions, and which he had committed to Hansard. If the honourable gentleman wished to go Home and float a company to open up the vast areas of coal in the Mokau district, areas including something like 474,000,000 tons of coal, he thought the honourable gentleman should be permitted to go. In fact, he (Mr. Allen) would be almost inclined to vote for a sum to be placed on the estimates to send the honourable gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER considered the honourable gentleman was dwelling too long on that particular subject. It would be well now to return to the real subject of the debate.

Mr. ALLEN only regretted that the honourable gentleman had introduced the subject. Otherwise he would not have spoken upon it himself.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

Mr. SEDDON desired to make an explanation, in justice to the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), the honourable member for Eden, the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), and himself.

Mr. E. M. Smith

When the report of the Conference on the Native Land Court Bill was before the House he stated to the House what occurred, and the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) gave what had occurred in reference to clause 116. Since the matter had been looked into he found that the clause which had been given by the honourable member for Eden to the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), and which was given by Mr. Button to him, and which was now included in the Bill, was the clause he took to be the one to which Mr. Bell had referred. What occurred with regard to Mr. Bell's clause was this: Mr. Button asked him, "What about Mr. Bell's clause?" and then gave him this clause. He then went to the Law Officers and asked them to draft clauses in accordance with clauses 44 and 45 of the Administration Act of 1886, and they gave him a draft of the clause, which was the one in the Bill. The complication had arisen owing to the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) reminding him of the promise he had made to the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). He thought what he had stated would effectually remove what was in doubt, to the satisfaction of all concerned.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

Mr. REEVES moved, That the amendments made in sections 5, 6, 8, 9, 16, 19, 25, and 35, and the First Schedule of this Bill be agreed to, and that the other amendments be disagreed with, and that Captain Russell, Mr. Millar, and the mover be appointed a Committee to draw up reasons. There was a new schedule, with regard to reducing the number of firemen, and relieving steamers under 50 tons from the necessity of carrying certificated firemen, and providing in the case of larger steamers for the number of what were called "greasers," who were assistants to the engineers. Then, instead of a trimmer having to serve six months before he could be rated as a fireman, under the amendment he need only serve three months. Then, with regard to apprentices, in cases where a master was unable to go on teaching an apprentice seamanship, instead of having all his money returned, the apprentice was only to receive a proportionate amount. Then, there was an amendment under which masters of coastal vessels could engage seamen on board, instead of having to engage them on shore. There was also an amendment which allowed seamen to get certificates, not necessarily that they had served so many years, but to show that they had passed an examination. These, with some verbal amendments, were the amendments to which it was proposed to agree. The following were those with which he proposed to disagree: The Council had, in his opinion, altogether spoiled the provision relating to the overcrowding of passengers. It was proposed that it should not be allowable to overcrowd any class, but the Council proposed to allow overcrowding in one class, provided the total number did not exceed the total number allowed to be carried in all the classes. The Council also proposed to exempt steamers plying within extended river-limits pretty well from the whole operation of the Bill: they were to be exempted from all provisions with regard to deck-loading, from all provisions relating to carrying skilled persons, and from all provisions relating to accommodation. The last suggestion was particularly objectionable, inasmuch as there was a law at present regulating those steamers, and the Council proposed to exempt them from all laws, and to make the law far worse than it was now. Then, as regarded punishments for desertion, insubordination, and so forth, the Council proposed to make them more severe in some cases. They had struck out entirely the proviso relating to the payment of wages; and they had amended the law relating to deck-loading, and had reduced the penalty on a master for overloading so as to submerge the Plimsoll mark from £500 to £100. That was almost the worst amendment they had made. These were pretty well all the amendments he proposed to disagree with, and he moved accordingly.

Mr. THOMPSON moved, That the amendment made by the Legislative Council in clause 7 be agreed to. This was the amendment on which the House divided when the Bill was in Committee, and which was rejected on the casting-vote of its Chairman. When the Bill went to another place the Labour Bills Committee inserted an amendment, and when it came before the Council there were only five members of the Council who voted against the amendment, which was carried by a large majority.

Mr. REEVES said the requirements of the schedule had been reduced four or five times, and they had been materially reduced again since the Bill was in the House so as to prevent it from inflicting any hardship upon the Auckland coastal marine. He thought the vessels referred to should be required to carry some skilled people on board, although he would be prepared to reduce the number to the lowest possible limit. He would remind honourable members that the extended harbour-limits at Auckland comprised a considerable area of the open ocean. He would be quite prepared to reconsider the matter at the Conference, and see whether further concessions with regard to these steamers could not be given.

Mr. CADMAN said, as this matter was of considerable importance to the Auckland district, where there was a large "mosquito fleet" of steamers, he was glad to hear his colleague state that he was prepared to get the Conference to reconsider the matter, with a view to meeting their requirements. Many of the steamers at Auckland ran short trips of from four to seven hours, and under this Bill it depended on the horse-power of the boats what number of firemen they should carry. Take a boat like the "Rose Casey," whose indicated horse-power was 150, and her nominal power only 80: under this Bill she would have to carry two firemen. It was ridiculous to provide that in making these short trips of from three to seven hours she must carry two firemen. In his opinion the Bill should be altered so that the number of firemen would be more in accordance with the number of hours the men were required to work, rather than, as at present, with the horse-power of the engines.

Mr. MILLAR said the only parts of the colony where these extended river-limits applied were at Auckland and the Bluff. In the case of the Bluff he believed Stewart Island had been included within the extended river-limits. If they allowed the extended river-limits to be put in here, it meant that, so far as the travelling public of Auckland were concerned, there was no guarantee that one single competent man would be on board one of these steamers. Was it not as likely that a passenger might fall overboard in Hauraki Gulf as in Cook Strait? Was it not as necessary to have a competent man on board to take charge of a boat, in case of accident, in Hauraki Gulf as in Cook Strait? Then, since 1853, the Shipping Act had laid down that 72 cubic feet of space should be provided for each seaman; but, under the proposed amendments, that provision was not to apply to the extended river-limit. Therefore a man might own a vessel of a thousand tons, and yet crowd the men into 10 cubic feet of space each, like sardines packed in a box. He could do anything with them.

5.0. That was one amendment made, and in the interests of the public he thought there ought to be some limit, so that those boats should come under the law the same as other vessels. There was a mosquito fleet in Wellington—vessels that ran six- or seven-hour trips, and there was no objection raised to their coming under the law. Surely on a vessel of 30 tons register there should be at least one able seaman. Would any one say that they should go with less? There was no vessel trading in the Hauraki Gulf, he would undertake to say, with less than the number of hands laid down in the schedule. What they had endeavoured to do in the schedule was to provide for a number of hands that would make the ship safe; and were the Auckland shipowners to allow their vessels to go to sea as they thought best, without having any one on board, perhaps, who had ever been to sea before? Were the whole of the travelling population of Auckland to be at the mercy of a dozen shipowners, and were they to be the only shipowners in the colony who would not be required to comply with the Act? He did not think that would be fair, and so he should oppose the amendment of the honourable member for Marsden. The point, he thought, was a fair one to have discussed between the two Houses. Some honourable members who last time voted against this provision had since informed him that they did not support it because it meant closing the North of Auckland, so that the people would not be able to get their produce down, and therefore they had voted for the extended river-limits. But that was not the case at all. This did not mean closing the North of Auckland; it was simply a question of whether a vessel, when she went to sea beyond certain limits, should not be required to carry a certain number of qualified men. The Auckland shipowners wished to run exactly as they liked, with as few men as they liked, or with incompetent men. They wanted absolute freedom. He wished to know if the House was going to grant that concession to them, while compelling the whole of the other shipowners to comply with the Act.

Mr. MCGOWAN thought the honourable gentleman who had just sat down had hardly put the case fairly. He would like to remind the honourable gentleman and the House that the men who were employed in these boats, though they might not possess A.B. certificates, were well able to do the work. There was not one of them but was well qualified to manage a boat at sea.

Mr. REEVES said they had met all that.

Mr. MCGOWAN thought that at the Conference these facts should be considered. Before the steamers were employed a great portion of the trade along the coast was carried on by Natives in their canoes. The Natives had no certificates, but they carried on the trade safely: a large grain trade was carried on in that way. If this coastal service were interfered with it would cause great hardship. These small steamers having a certain number of men were only two or three hours at sea; but the honourable gentlemen seemed to think that, because a steamer was of a certain horsepower, it should have a certain number of able seamen. But the fact was that these men employed on the steamers had been engaged all their lives at the same kind of work.

Sir R. STOUT would suggest that a compromise should be arrived at by the honourable member for Marsden withdrawing his amendment and being added as one of the Managers at the Conference. If that were done, he thought some agreement might be come to. He might say that where he was born they got on very well without any examination or control by the State of the men who were engaged in this class of work, and he did not think there were many accidents. The men were trained to the sea from their early youth.

Mr. REEVES did not wish it to be thought that he was reflecting on the honourable member for Marsden, but would say that he would have no objection if that honourable gentleman would agree to accept the appointment of the honourable member for the Thames on the Conference, as the honourable member himself objected to a very great deal that there was in the Bill. He was prepared at the Conference to meet any reasonable objections respecting the clause.

Mr. CROWTHER wished to know if the Minister of Labour objected to the honourable member for Marsden being on the Conference.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was necessary that the Managers for the House should be a united body in their opinions on matters of dispute between the House and the Legislative Council when they met in Conference.

Mr. REEVES said he proposed to add Mr. McGowan to the Managers.

Mr. Millar

Mr. CROWTHER thought, so far as the inquiry had gone, there could be no objection to adding the honourable member for Marsden, who was thoroughly posted up in this business, and who he was sure had spent more time in connection with the Bill than the honourable member for the Thames, and consequently ought to be more fitted to deal with it.

Mr. REEVES.—Yes; but the Managers must pull together.

Mr. CROWTHER said, from the knowledge he had acquired, there were very few men who could pull together with the Minister of Labour on these questions.

Mr. REEVES.—That is very rude.

Mr. CROWTHER said he had got to be rude frequently, in order to be just. There were men in the locality referred to who had been engaged in these occupations since 1870. They had their own scows, and they went where steamers could not go, and at certain seasons carried fruit, vegetables, and produce. Had this Bill passed as it left the House not one of these would have been allowed in the Auckland Harbour. Thousands of people would have been thrown out of employment, all this plant would have been left on the owners' hands, and the settlers would have been unable to get their produce to market except by paying exorbitant freights to the steamers, and the steamers would not have been able to visit all the localities, because they could not get up the rivers where this trade must be done. He thought that, at this period of the session, the Minister of Labour would have shown very good taste in accepting the amendment as it had come down from the Upper House. The honourable gentleman knew better than any of them the strict examination and searching inquiry that the measure had been subjected to. They had had witnesses from Auckland, and the Minister of Labour had been represented, and fairly represented, on that investigation. He was sorry the Minister of Labour could not see his way to adopt the suggestion of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), for to decline to do so was to say that the honourable member for Marsden was not fit to be intrusted with matters of this sort, and, if that was so, he was extremely sorry for the ratepayers who had sent that honourable gentleman there.

The House divided on the question, "That the amendments of the Council in section 7 be disagreed with."

Ayes, 31.

Buddo	Kelly, J. W.	Russell, W. B.
Cadman	Mackintosh	Saunders
Carnell	McKenzie, R.	Seddon
Earnshaw	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.
Flatman	Mills	Stevens
Graham	Montgomery	Tanner
Guinness	Morrison	Ward.
Hall	Pinkerton
Harris	Pirani	Tellers.
Hogg	Reeves	Collins
Joyce	Russell, G. W.	Millar.

NOES, 31.

Allen	Kelly, W.	Mitchelson
Bell	Lang	O'Regan
Buick	Lawry	Parata
Button	Mackenzie, T.	Smith, E. M.
Carnoross	Maslin	Steward
Carroll	Massey	Willis
Duncan	McGowan	Wilson.
Green	McGuire
Heke	McKenzie, J.	Tellers.
Houston	McNab	Crowther
Hutcheon, G.	Meredith	Thompson.

Mr. SPEAKER said he would give the casting-vote for allowing the matter to be further considered by Managers of the two Houses at a Conference. He consequently gave his vote with the "Ayes," in favour of disagreeing with the Legislative Council's amendment, and with the view of having the difficulty arranged at a Conference.

Motion agreed to, and other amendments disagreed with.

On the motion of Mr. REEVES, Captain Russell, Mr. Millar, and Mr. McGowan were appointed a Committee to draw up reasons.

DEATH OF THE HON. MR. DIGNAN.

Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, sad tidings have reached us. The Hon. Mr. Dignan, on his way home from his parliamentary duties, died this morning at New Plymouth. I shall therefore, in respect to the deceased legislator, conclude by moving the adjournment of the House. I would say that he was well and favourably known as an old colonist. He has done faithful service. In the district he has represented for many years in the Legislative Council, and where he has lived for very many years, there is no one who does not speak well of him, and who will not pay due tribute to his memory. All those who have known him as I have known him for very many years as a member of the Legislative Council, and as a member of the House, must have known him to have been in all his actions fearless, honest, and upright. Whatever action he has taken has always been from purely conscientious motives, and from conviction. There is no one, I say, but will admit that throughout the time he has been amongst us there were very few who were so well respected and revered as he who has passed away. It will be to those who are near and dear to him some slight degree of comfort in their sad bereavement to know that every one in this Parliament assembled sympathizes deeply with them. He has passed away at a ripe old age, revered and respected, and leaves behind him an honoured and unsullied name. He has done his duty to the country fearlessly and faithfully; and in respect to his memory I move, That this House do adjourn until eight o'clock this evening.

Captain RUSSELL.—I venture to ask the privilege of being allowed to second the motion of the Premier that this House should adjourn until eight o'clock this evening out of respect to the memory of the Hon. Mr. Dignan, lately a member of the Legislative Council. Sir, there is little that I can add to the remarks that were made by the Premier. Very many years ago, when I first came to this country as a young soldier, and lived in Auckland, I remember the Hon. Mr. Dignan as a respected fellow-citizen with me in that town. He was a member in the early days of the Provincial Council of Auckland, taking an active part in the government of his province. When I first came to the House of Representatives, in the year 1875, I found Mr. Dignan a respected member of this House; and then, in the course of years, he was translated from this House to a position in the Legislative Council. And all honourable members who, like myself, remember him for nearly a quarter of a century will join with me in expressing the high opinion we ever had of him, for his unvarying kindness and courtesy of manner, and for that generous sympathy and warm-hearted feeling which distinguishes pre-eminently the country from which he came. It is useless to endeavour by expressions of regret at the death of a man whom we all respected to assuage the grief of his relatives, but, at any rate, it is a satisfaction to know that he leaves behind children to bear in New Zealand the honoured name that he has borne for so many years past.

Sir R. STOUT.—Having been for four years in this House closely associated with the Hon. Mr. Dignan, belonging to the same party, and being also, I think, the only one in the House now who was in the Ministry that recommended him to the Governor for appointment to the Council, I may be pardoned for saying a few words. I knew him from the year 1875, in which I first entered the House, and up to the time practically just before he left this city for home I was on terms of unbroken friendship with him. We all knew his leading characteristic, which I may term modesty. He was one who never pushed himself forward in any way. Another characteristic may be mentioned, and that was his extreme fairness and extreme goodness. He was a man upon whose word you could always place the most implicit reliance. I join with the honourable gentlemen who have spoken in paying this tribute to his memory, and, as stated by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, I hope his children will nobly bear his name and keep his memory in remembrance. The mere fact of the House showing sympathy with them will be, at any rate, a slight solace to them in their great trouble.

Mr. LAWRY.—I was very much pleased to hear the observations which have been made by the Premier, the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, and the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). Perhaps, with the exception of yourself, Sir, and the honourable member for Eden, I had the pleasure—I may say the honour—of knowing the late Mr. Dignan longer than any other member of this House, and every word that has been expressed relative to his character can be borne out by the actual facts. He has lived a most exemplary life, and when the news of his death was received here to-day there was not a single member of either branch of the Legislature, no matter what his politics may be, who did not express profound regret. The honourable gentleman who has just passed away has been associated with my family for nearly fifty years. I regret exceedingly, Sir, that you are not upon the floor of the House to pay that tribute to his memory which, from your experience and your friendship with the deceased statesman, you are so well qualified to pay. I will conclude by merely observing that the life of the late Mr. Dignan has borne out in its truest sense the expression of Pope, "An honest man 's the noblest work of God."

POMAHAKA PURCHASE.

80. Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Sir, in rising to move the motion standing in my name, I may say that my motto is the motto of my country and clan—"Nemo me impune lacessit"—"No one attacks me with impunity." That is my motto, and I am sure the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) will be glad to find that I am keeping up my classics. As far as I am personally concerned, I do not think it would be necessary for me to-night to move this motion, or to quote anything in connection with it. I understand the Committee is unanimous in acquitting me of all blame or corruption. But the honour of my department has been assailed, and the honour of my department is, I consider, my honour. It is my duty to defend my department on the floor of this House when I find that undeserved odium is sought to be cast upon it, particularly when that odium is cast in the attempt to strike at me. The history of this matter is well known to honourable members. At the last election my opponent at the Waihemo electorate brought this charge of corruption against myself by way of insinuation and innuendo. He may have said it then in heat, but he repeated it afterwards in cold blood in the Otago Daily Times—always, however, by way of insinuation, never by way of open and manly charge. My enemies took it up and echoed it, and my department and I were hinted at as having conspired together to perpetrate a fraud on the taxpayers of the colony. Both he and the editor of that paper clamoured for an inquiry. An inquiry into what, if not into corruption on my part and my department's? Well, the inquiry is held. They are asked to attend and bring their witnesses at the public expense. And what do they do? The people who were so ready to insinuate these charges now declare that they never made them. They say this when challenged to the proof. But it is for this House and the public of New Zealand, when they read the evidence taken before the Waste Lands Committee, to say for themselves whether these charges were made or not. And I venture to say that any one who will read the evidence taken before the Waste Lands Committee, and note the method of cross-examination adopted by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, can come to no other conclusion than that he was making desperate efforts to unearth something to give colour to those charges. During the whole of this inquiry this gentleman was endeavouring to find some peg on which to hang a charge of corruption. During the last election at Waihemo this charge was levelled at myself for the purpose of trying to make the people in the electorate believe that I was unworthy of their confidence at the election. My opponent's friends and political supporters at the election endeavoured by all the means in their power, fair or unfair, to get the electors to believe them; but they failed after all, and the result was that I was returned to this House with the very substantial majority of 325. So far as I am personally concerned, I might have allowed the matter to rest there, as the large majority of the people amongst whom I lived during the greater part of my lifetime did not believe the aspersions on my integrity. If they had done so they would not have sent me here. But, Sir, as a Minister of the Crown, I am responsible to a certain extent to the people of New Zealand, as well as to the constituents of the District of Waihemo, and I felt it my duty, both to my department and to my own position as a Minister, to give our opponents every opportunity if they wished to prove anything against us, and with that view I moved that this matter be referred to the Waste Lands Committee for the purpose of inquiry. The result is now before the House in the report before us, and also in the evidence attached to the report. The result of the inquiry will show, if honourable members will look at the report for themselves, and the evidence in connection with it, that the Committee has come to the conclusion that, so far as I myself am personally concerned, I am blameless in this matter, and so likewise is my department. I believe the whole of the Committee was unanimous on these two points. There was a slight difference of opinion amongst the members of the Committee so far as the price paid for the land was concerned. There was also a decided difference about Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. His friends on the Committee—and he had friends there—wanted to shield him from censure; the other members thought he ought to be censured, and I understand that it was on this point only that unanimity was impossible. But I repeat that, so far as myself and my department are concerned, the Committee was absolutely unanimous; and yet Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, the Otago Daily Times, and my other opponents insinuate that my department and I escape by the brute force of a party majority! Time will not permit me to go into the evidence or to refer to it at any length, as the half-hour in which I have got to move the motion is so short. I must leave it to the members of the House and the people of the colony, into whose hands this report will go, to judge whether the opinion which is passed upon it is correct. I hope the House will pardon me if I digress here from the inquiry proper in order to show the House the reason why this charge was made against me, and by whom it was made. It has fallen to my lot as a public man in this colony to expose some of those in high places, and it has fallen to my lot to expose some of the financial rings in this colony, and their managers and agents, during my political career, and in doing that I have gained their never-dying enmity. Consequently no opportunity has ever been lost on the part of those people to do me an injury. During the last election nothing would have pleased them better than to have seen the Minister of Lands defeated for the Waihemo seat. By fair means or foul he was to be defeated at any cost, and they put forth every effort with that object. It fell to my lot several years ago to move, in this House, that inquiries into certain cases of dummyism should be made, and I moved for a Select Committee for that purpose. Through the evidence of that Committee, the Otago Waste Lands Board was called upon to hold inquiry into certain dummyism cases; and what was the result? That a certain individual there, James Smith, of Gellebrand and Smith, had to disgorge several thousands of acres which he had secured by dummies, and to also lose the very large sums that he paid for this land. He had also to pay the costs of the inquiry. That was all brought about by my action in this House as a public man; and from that moment I gained the enmity of this James Smith, a director of and one of the largest shareholders in the Otago Daily Times. That will show honourable members the reason for the animosity which that newspaper has always borne to myself. Not only has that paper persistently assailed me in my public capacity, but it has also dragged in my private affairs and my family with the view of doing me all the harm it can. Then, there is another gentleman in Dunedin, a Mr. John McFarlane Ritchie, the manager of the National Mortgage Company, who hates me because in the performance of my public duty I made him disgorge in connection with the Benohau Run. He also would have given a good deal to see me defeated at the last Waihemo election. But I venture to say that if that gentleman had received his due he would have been serving a long sentence in Her Majesty's Gaol at the time of the last Waihemo election. Now, Sir, this John McFarlane Ritchie is, as I have said, manager of the National Mortgage Company at Dunedin; and honourable members may ask themselves this question: How is it possible that any respectable company would employ such a man to manage their business? But let us look back at history. Let us look at the directors of the City of Glasgow Bank, and the directors of the Overend Company, of which we heard something last night. I have no doubt that Mr. Ritchie is employed because he is a man who would do for his company exactly what it wishes him to do, without any scruples as to what is honest. We know that the directors of the City of Glasgow Bank were all pious men; they went to church on Sunday, and robbed the public through the rest of the week. So with Mr. Ritchie. He is a very pious individual.

Mr. Lawry

He goes to church on Sunday, and devotes himself to dummyming runs on Monday. Now, I have reason to believe that this man Ritchie conceived the Pomahaka conspiracy; for conspiracy it was—a conspiracy to damn me and defame my department. He was the gentleman who conceived it, the Otago Daily Times helped at the hatching, and in my opponent they found a weak and willing tool. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was marvellously well informed in respect to the leases held by the New Zealand and Australian Land Company over the Pomahaka Estate. How was he able to put questions on the minutest points to Mr. Douglas, and to know every detail about these leases? It was because he got the information from Mr. McFarlane Ritchie, whose company was the agent of the Australian Land Company in Dunedin. The whole plot was conceived in Dunedin between him and the editor of the Otago Daily Times, and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie lent himself to become their tool. But they failed. And what then did they do? Failing to defeat me at Waihemo, they sought revenge in the columns of that paper by repeating and fomenting their slanders long after the election was over. Then, we have the inspector of the Union Bank in Wellington coming before the Committee here, going the length—for he did not scruple for one moment—of disclosing the private affairs of one of the bank's clients in order to assail the Minister of Lands and his department. Such conduct on the part of a respectable bank is almost inconceivable; but it was done, Sir—why I cannot tell; but perhaps the honourable member for Wellington City, Mr. Bell, the solicitor for the bank and the brother-in-law of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, could explain it, if he cared to do so. Anyhow, it was done, Sir. All the papers relating to Mr. Douglas's private affairs with the bank were placed at Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's disposal, to enable him to injure me. And not only so, but this inspector tried hard to make it appear that the Pomahaka Estate was not worth £8,000, which the bank had advanced against it. He was afraid to openly swear that the land was not worth the money, but, though all the banks were at that time calling up advances, he tried to make it appear that this particular advance was called up not as part of a general policy, but because the land was not worth the money. And that was the construction put on it by their own friends and the Tory Press. But, if that construction were correct, I say that the Union Bank must be in a very bad state indeed, because I have personal knowledge of many properties not nearly so good as Pomahaka, upon which that bank has lent far more than it lent on that estate; so that if that was bad security for the Union Bank the bank must be in a bad state indeed, and the sooner the shareholders look after it the better it will be for themselves. Now, this is the class of people who come up and do everything they possibly can to injure the Government of this colony, because getting at the Minister of Lands is getting at the Government. I venture to say that if the inspector of the Union Bank paid more attention to his legitimate business it would be better for the bank and for its shareholders. I have complained very bitterly of the terms which have been applied to me by the Tory Press of this colony, especially by the Otago Daily Times. The editor of the Times behaved in this matter in a shameful manner—a manner in which no honourable, upright man would have behaved. He demanded an inquiry in this matter, and when the inquiry was called he was asked to come here. But did he come? No, Sir: he telegraphed that he had never made any charges against the Minister of Lands, and had no evidence to give. The gentlemen he named, who, he said, could tell the true story, were all summoned here, and not one of them had a word to say in his favour, or in favour of the contention he took up in the matter. But, though my good friend the editor did not come, he was not idle. Information was sent him from time to time of what went on in Committee—information that could only have reached him from somebody who was present; and this information he shamefully distorted and then published in order to poison the public mind in Otago. The Committee was packed; the Chairman was my bosom friend, Mr. Thomas Duncan—honourable members know that to be false, as Mr. Thompson was Chairman; Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was extorting the most damning disclosures; important papers had been fraudulently removed from the file—this referred to one telegram that had never been filed, and had nothing to do with the purchase; Sir Robert Stout's report—the report prepared and produced by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's friends on the Committee—was the report of my bosom friend the Chairman; and so on all through the piece. This shows how continuous was the falsification of the facts in this paper in its endeavour to do injury to myself personally. Sir, I do not complain of fair, honest criticism on any occasion—no one can accuse me of that; but I say I have reason to complain when false statements are continually made by any paper, and no paper of any respectability would descend to such despicable tactics. I have a great deal to say in this matter, but I must curtail. Let us come to the facts in this inquiry. What has been found? It has been unanimously found that the statements were not proved—statements that were made by insinuations and innuendoes; and before the members of this House can believe that there was one iota of truth in them they must first believe that Mr. Percy Smith, the Surveyor-General; Mr. Barron, the head of the Survey Department; Mr. Ritchie, the Secretary of the Stock Department; Mr. Maitland, Commissioner of Crown Lands of Otago; Mr. Adams, the Chief Surveyor, of Dunedin; and Mr. Turton—that all those gentlemen have perjured themselves. You must believe this before you can believe there was one iota of truth in the statements which were endeavoured to be proved. I venture to say that every member of this House who knows these gentlemen knows perfectly well that they could not be guilty of anything of the kind. Before you could hold them proved, you would have to show that all these gentlemen conspired with the Minister of Lands to do a corrupt thing; and I venture to say that not one iota of evidence came before the Committee to show that there was anything wrong in this matter. The only evidence that can at all be favourable to the other side was in connection with the value of the property. That evidence was given by two individuals, including the inspector of the bank referred to. The first day before the Committee that gentleman swore to a falsehood, and had to come back the next day and apologize. Evidence was given by Mr. Stevenson that the land was everything that was bad—not worth more than £1 or, at most, £1 10s. an acre. But he himself voluntarily signed the petition praying the Government to buy it; and, before attaching much weight to his evidence, most sensible people will want him to explain the reason of the somersault he took. The fact is, he has been a station-manager all his life, and his squatting friends probably remonstrated with him for doing anything to promote close settlement. Hence his sudden right-about-face. I have little doubt that he came up as a tool of the squatters in that part of the country. I am told that this man is “off his chump” on the Pomahaka question. This much, at all events, is undeniable: He is the only man Mr. Scobie Mackenzie brought to speak to the value of the property from personal inspection; and, as the Committee had offered to pay the expenses of all the witnesses he liked to name, the fair inference is that Mr. Stevenson is the only man he could get. And that in itself speaks volumes. With regard to the value of this property, you must believe that the twenty-one settlers who took up sections were all fools, if you believe the evidence of Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie—that all the settlers were fools for giving the prices they did to the Government. Now, for some of these sections there was a considerable amount of competition—over a dozen applications in some cases; and those who were unsuccessful must also have been fools not to know the value of the land. The position is that 5,230 acres of the Pomahaka Estate have been taken up, and the Colony of New Zealand at the present time is getting 4 per cent. interest on the total capital cost after surveying and roading. Does that show that we paid too much for the land? And about 2,000 acres are still lying, which can easily be disposed of now that by an amendment of the law they can be sold in larger blocks. The only reason the Pomahaka did not go off altogether was that the acreage was too small in some cases for the country. When I say twenty-one settlers are at the present time paying rent which yields an interest to the colony of over 4 per cent. on the whole cost of the estate, I think it proves beyond doubt that the price we paid was not too high. I know that at present a number of people are trying to make out that they gave too much for the land, and nothing would please them better than if some of the settlers would decline to pay their rents—nothing would please them better.

Mr. J. McKenzie

8.80. Now, I am going down after the session to see the settlers, and to see for myself what they are doing, and I will then tell them not to be led away by my opponents—men who would not allow them to get one acre of land if they could help it. I have only five minutes more in which to speak, and I have a good deal more to say. The evidence which came before the Committee shows that, so far as the department over which I preside is concerned, everything has been done in accordance with the law, and that the action I took in the matter was such as I was bound to take as Minister of Lands. Then, as I have already shown, the whole of the evidence, except that of the two witnesses I have named, proves that fair value only was given for the land, notwithstanding all that may be said to the contrary. The evidence and the report also show that my opponent had no grounds for making his charges, and he should either have made them openly, so as to allow me to defend myself elsewhere, or he should have withdrawn them when he found they were baseless. I believe at this moment that my opponent in his heart does not believe and never did believe that I was guilty of any wrong, but I believe that in a weak moment he allowed himself to be persuaded to make use of these charges at the instance of those financial people who hate me like poison, and who would give anything to see me out of this House and out of all political power. I believe, further, that, having once made them, he lacked the moral courage to withdraw them and confess himself in the wrong. He is given to the use of reckless assertions, and if the Committee's censure teaches him to be more heedful in future it will serve a useful purpose. I venture to say that the gentleman who has slandered me has slandered almost every Minister that has occupied these benches. He has got names for them all. He slandered the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) on one occasion, when speaking at Naseby, and called him "a sponger on the Colony of New Zealand." He has slandered the late Mr. Ballance; he has also slandered Sir Harry Atkinson and the Hon. Mr. Rolleston; and he slanders every man who comes into prominence in this House. I trust the lessons he has got at the Waihemo and Tsupaka elections, and at the hands of a Committee of this House, will not be lost on him. Now, Sir, my time is up and I must stop. I have made one classical quotation, and I am going to make another to wind up with—Honi so'i qui mal y pense, which means, Evil be to him who thinks evil.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the report of the Pomahaka Purchase Committee be adopted, and entered on the Journals of the House."—(Mr. J. McKenzie.)

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, I exceedingly regret that the time-limit has prevented the honourable gentleman who moved this motion from getting sufficient time to deal with the subject he intended to deal with to-night—namely, the defence of his department. I do not intend to deal with this Pomahaka business, for the opinion I hold about it appears in the draft report I brought up before the Committee. And so far as I am concerned, I believed what I stated in that report,—namely, that no charge of corruption can be made against the Minister of Lands, and that in my opinion neither Mr. Ritchie nor Mr. Barron, the two officers implicated, can be blamed for the action they took. As I have said, I still hold that opinion. What I do regret is that there should have been any inquiry at all about Pomahaka. I do not think it is a wise precedent that the babblement of an election contest should be made the subject of a Committee of inquiry of this House. That, I think, is exceedingly unwise. There have been charges more serious and pronounced made in this House, and yet we have been unable to get any Committee of inquiry. For instance, take the case of the 21st clause of the Alcoholic Liquor Bill. We have been unable to get any Committee of inquiry in reference to that. Then, we had charges made in reference to railway management under the present Commissioners. We have been unable to get any inquiry into that. Now, if that be so, I should like to know why it is that in the case of an election contest, when people are heated and make heated speeches, these speeches should form the subject of an inquiry at the expense to the colony of many hundreds of pounds. That is entirely unwise; and I know there are some members of the Committee, strong friends of the Minister of Lands, who agree with me in thinking that it was unwise that this inquiry should have been held. The next thing I regret is this: that the report as brought up should not have been amended so that it could have been adopted unanimously. It should have been discussed and amended, as there were many details in it. I think it is a great pity the Committee should not have accepted this view of it. I was exceedingly anxious, for the sake of the Minister and his department, that the report should, if possible, be unanimous. It is always a mistake in these Committees when the report is not unanimous, so that, whatever charge has been made, or whatever may have taken place, it could be said there was nothing that looked even like bias in its finding. I consider that the report should, if possible, be unanimous; and I believe that, if my rough draft of a report had been adopted on that basis, we might have come to a unanimous finding on the subject. However, that was not done. What happened was this: I brought a report before the Committee, who ordered that it should be printed. The print was sent round to the members of the Committee, and I think the members got it between five and six o'clock in the evening. The next morning, however, I was surprised to see that my honourable friend the member for Waima-Sounds brought up a printed report, supposed to have been drawn up by himself, dealing with the matter. I asked the Chairman why it had been printed, and he said he did not know—that he had no knowledge of it, and that he did not authorise it to be printed. I assume, therefore, that either the honourable member has the right to ask the Printing Office to print anything he likes, or else he had had the Ministerial sanction for printing this present report. Now, so far as this report is concerned, I do not think it is judicial in tone, and therefore it must lack weight through the form and language in which it is couched. What I complain of is this: that if it has been drawn up by the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds he must have been so impressed by the speech of the counsel on behalf of the Minister as to have copied his language. There are passages in the report identical in phraseology. Now, as the Minister of Lands has quoted Latin, allow me to give him a Latin maxim. It is this: Sua cuique quum sit animi cogitatio, colorque pulchrius; which means that each man has his own fancy and colour, which he gives to his productions. If any one looks at the report, and at the speech of Dr. Fitchett, he will find that there is paragraph after paragraph identical in language. Now, I do not say that Dr. Fitchett drew up the report. I do not know who drew it up. If I am to judge by handwriting, I can only judge handwriting by its appearance and by its similarity to other handwriting that I know. I do not say that the report is drawn up by the person who made the speech. But what I say distinctly is that my honourable friend the member for Waimea-Picton, if he drew it up, has used the same language as Dr. Fitchett. I do not say that that is wrong. The honourable member may have thought it expressed the thing fairly. There is, however, a style about the speech and a style about the report that are identical. It is written in a literary style, and with considerable literary finish, which is generally absent from the honourable member's productions. Let me just read one or two extracts, to show what I mean. If honourable members will turn to the report, on page 2, paragraph 5, they will see this passage:—

"In 1889, 1,140 acres of the same estate, and not the best part of it, were sold at £3 12s. 6d., and for several areas £3 was offered."

Now, if honourable members will look at the speech they will see a paragraph there, on page 108, which reads as follows:—

"Eleven hundred acres were sold in 1889 at £3 12s. 6d. per acre, and not the best of the estate. Some sections were bought in for £3. . . . He refused £3 for large blocks."

Then, let me take another passage of the report:—

"The owner (Mr. J. Logan) had recently died, and his executors put all his property in the district—30,000 acres in all—into the market, thereby outrunning the demand for land and lowering the price."

In the speech we find,—

"The owner was dead, and the trustees were winding up the estate, so they put all in the market—30,000 acres—to bring what it could."

Sir R. Stout

I might, Sir, give paragraph after paragraph, but I will only take one or two others. There is another passage in the report:—

"Lastly, there is the practical test of values afforded by the rents paid by settlers who have taken up sections since the property was thrown open by the Government. Up to the 26th July, 1894, 5,230 acres have been disposed of, at an average rental of 8s. 4d., or a capital value of £3 6s. 6d. per acre, leaving about 1,800 acres still to be let. And it must be borne in mind that these rents were given in spite of much depreciation of the property in the Otago papers, and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's public statements that the soil was cold and ungenerous, and that the rental for years had been 6d., representing a capital value of 10s. per acre."

And in the speech,—

"Last, but not least, we have the fact that, in spite of the abuse showered on the land by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and his friends—cold and ungenerous soil, worth no more than a capital sum of 10s. per acre, and so forth—people come forward and voluntarily take up 5,230 acres at an average rental of 8s. 4d."

There are two more extracts which I may give. The report says,—

"As to the suggestion that Mr. Ritchie improperly induced Mr. Barron, the Under-Secretary for Lands, to instruct the preliminary inspection without the knowledge or authority of his superior officer, the evidence was contradicted that Mr. Barron was not exceeding his authority."

And in the speech there is this passage:—

"Mr. Barron was acting within his authority in instructing the preliminary inspection."

Then, again, there is another one referring to Conical Hills:—

"With respect to Conical Hills, the evidence clearly shows that the purchase was impracticable at the time, and could not have been effected without beginning the whole negotiation de novo. The offer was to exchange, and there was no statutory power to exchange."

In the speech it is as follows:—

"An offer had been made to exchange, and there was no power to exchange."

Then, I might point out that the framework of the speech and the report are identical. The endings are similar. So I might go on. The language is identical. The literary style is peculiar. There is no difference between the speech and the report. They are the written and spoken utterances apparently of one man. Now, I do not say that Mr. Mills, who brought up the report, did not write the report, but what I do say is that, if he did, his mind is of that plastic cast that would be moulded by the last utterance he heard, and have it reproduced, just the same as phonographs and other instruments do. He has simply repeated what he heard last before the Committee. Now, of course, the Minister of Lands is not to blame. I am not making charges against him; he had nothing to do with it, nor had the Lands Department; but I only point out this, and I hope it may be—I do it in this spirit—a lesson to other Committees to think, when they meet to deal with a report such as this, that they should be judicial in tone, and not adopt the language or literary style of the counsel of either side who may appear before them. I do not know that I have anything more to say. I am glad I can say freely that I do not think the Minister of Lands had any right to have charges made against him; and I say the same thing of Mr. Barron. However, I disagree with the Committee in several of its findings. I disagree with the language of the report; I disagree as to the value of the land. I do not say but what the Minister thought he was getting a good bargain; and I think the Committee should have left it in the way I proposed. There were only two witnesses, of those examined, who were not connected in some way with the purchase—Mr. Cameron, from Waitahuna, and Mr. Stevenson, from the neighbouring station. As far as Mr. Cameron was concerned, he had ridden from home to Pomahaka, thirty miles, on Sunday, and returned to his home the same night, and that was all his knowledge, and his opinion apparently was that the land was what was called “sappy.” The other witness was Mr. Stevenson, and I exceedingly regret that the Minister of Lands should have assumed that he gave evidence that was biased. I was present when he was examined, and, so far as I can see, he may have had predilections—every person has—but he meant to say what was fair. I think it right that I should explain here why it was that I was opposed to the finding of the Committee. I think the language was not judicial, and some of the statements are not borne out by the evidence, and, further, I consider it was not their province to enter into the political duel between the Minister and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. Their duty was to follow the order of reference, and simply find the facts, and not to deal with suggestions either to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie or to the Minister of Lands as to how they should in future conduct political contests.

Mr. MILLS.—I may tell the House that when I came here to attend this session I had never heard or read one word in reference to the Pomahaka purchase. Therefore I think the House will acquit me of any prejudice in the matter. I was appointed as a member of the Waste Lands Committee, and, in the ordinary course of our work, an order of reference was sent to us which I will read to the House. But before coming to that I may follow up the first link. On the 10th July the Minister of Lands referred to the matter, and stated that he would call for an inquiry. The senior member for Wellington City at that time complimented him for asking for the inquiry.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. MILLS.—The honourable gentleman did compliment him for asking for an inquiry, and, if I were permitted, I could refer him to the page in Hansard. The order of reference sent in to the Committee was as follows:—

“Ordered, That the whole transactions in connection with the purchase of the Pomahaka Block, under ‘The Land for Settlements Act, 1892,’ be referred to the Waste Lands Committee for investigation, with power to take evidence on oath, and call for persons and papers, and to report to the House.—(Hon. J. MCKENZIE).”

In connection with this, the Chairman took the necessary proceedings. He telegraphed at once to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, to the editor of the Otago Daily Times, and to others he thought necessary to get evidence from. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie replied to say that he would attend, and the editor of the Times refused. But very soon afterwards the latter gentleman published a subleader, in which he said the Committee were afraid to call those who could tell the real story. He was telegraphed to immediately again by the Committee, and his own words were quoted; and immediately afterwards he replied practically stultifying himself, and stating in so many words that he imputed no motives to any one, but naming certain witnesses who could give effective evidence. Evidence was taken, and witnesses were brought up from Otago and gave evidence before the Committee, who made a most exhaustive inquiry, and, I say, absolutely without any prejudice as far as I am concerned, and I believe I can say the same of the other members; and after the inquiry both Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and Dr. Fitchett, who was acting for the department, addressed the Committee, and both of their speeches were in print before the report was prepared. Probably that was where I acquired some of the language the honourable gentleman takes offence at because he finds it superior to his own. We also had a printed report from the senior member for Wellington City, which is now before me, and savours very much of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I should say that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie had a good hand in its production, and no doubt some members of the Committee had read it. So that the honourable gentleman should have very little fault to find with any one else. If honourable gentlemen look at the substance of Sir Robert's report, it is “wishy-washy,” as evidently attempting to please both sides, and gives no result of the inquiry—no practical decision on the merits of the case submitted to the Committee. There are some of the points of the evidence so striking and so contradictory that I intend to place them before the House. I shall not refer to the charge made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. Honourable members can see that for themselves at any time by reading the evidence.

Mr. ALLEN.—What was the charge?

Mr. MILLS.—The charges were made by implication and innuendo on the platform when Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was speaking at Wai-hemo, I believe. This is what he says to the Committee: “I maintain that all the statements made by me in that speech, though I am not answerable to the Committee for them, have been proved to be true throughout this inquiry.” Well! I will now refer to one or two replies that he made when he was under cross-examination by the Committee, and then honourable members will be able to form an opinion as to whether his first statement or his last was the correct one. He was asked by Mr. Duncan,—

"49. Was it not in your mind that it would impress the public with the notion of corruption as against the Minister?—I was addressing those who were prepared to give me their support at the election. There were present persons who were prepared to support the Minister. I had a perfect right to make any statement of fact that might affect the minds of either. If you want to know whether I wanted to generally damage my opponent's cause and help my own, I will not deny it."

I think that is a very conclusive reply. Then I asked him,—

"50. When you made that speech, were you not aware that all these purchases would have to be made according to the statute?—They should have been, but they were not."

Is that not a charge of corruption? I ask any one with common-sense, could he for one moment say there is no charge of corruption even at that late hour? Then I asked again,—

"51. Are you aware that they had to be?—I am aware that they should have been made according to the statute, but I am not aware that they were."

"52. Were you unaware that the statute confined the Commissioners to certain things? When you made the statement, were you aware that any purchase would have to be made through the Board?—Yes, I was aware that the Land for Settlements Act of 1892 constituted a Board to make purchases of land, but that by that Act the Minister was above the Board. The Board might recommend a price, but the Minister may, as 'Governor in Council,' not accept the decision of the Board. The Minister is in reality the Board, under the Act of 1892."

"53. Did you know that the Commissioners had fixed the price?—Certainly not. I do not know it now."

Now, look at this: After a man has gone through this inquiry, accused the Commissioner of giving too high a price, and accused the Minister and the department of corruption and all that, yet he has the audacity to stand in front of the Committee and not only commit himself to this statement, but, after revision, let it come out in print. Then he was asked,—

"54. Then, how was it that you complained of corruption; or how could you infer corruption in saying that too much money was paid for the land, or the estate, rather?—Too much money had been paid for the estate. I knew that £2 10s. had been paid for it."

That is another direct contradiction.

"55. Then, why not impute the blame to the Land Purchase Board?—I throw the blame on nobody; I do not throw the blame on any particular person. I said that a very bad purchase had been made."

Honourable members will see it is one tissue of contradictions. Then Mr. Mackintosh asked a question:—

"64. Then, who do you think is to blame, if they are not to blame?—Primarily the Minister in charge of the department, and probably the Commissioners at the same time. I think the Minister is to blame."

Mr. Mills

Is not that another direct contradiction? Surely honourable members will see what credence can be given to the statement of a witness who contradicts himself so constantly. Then Mr. Mackintosh asks,—

"65. After all the evidence that has been taken, do you think it was the Commissioners?—I think the whole system of land-purchase under the Act of 1892 is absolutely rotten, and that, in this matter, all connected with it are to blame, including the Minister; all alike have been fooled by Mr. Douglas."

There is the statement clear enough. Then later on I asked the question,—

"69. In what way do you consider the Minister was to blame?—In allowing a man to impose an encumbered and unsaleable estate on the public at an improper price. Somebody must have been to blame, and, if the Minister is not, who is?"

"70. Do you not blame the Land Purchase Board?—They may have their share of it."

He was asked if he had seen the land, and he replied, "No, I never went on it." Here is evidence straightforward: he had never seen the land; he was speaking from hearsay. Later on, as appears on the same page—95

9.0. —Mr. Mackintosh asked,—

"You say that the whole system is rotten, and you blamed everybody concerned?—For that particular purchase."

"92. Minister and all?—Yes."

"93. In what way do you blame the Minister?—I have already said that under the Act of 1892 the Minister was the Board. The Minister is, of course, in any case responsible for any transaction that takes place in his department. In this case he was practically the Board."

This is not true, for, as honourable members know perfectly well, the Act constitutes a Board which is independent of the Minister. The Board makes inquiry, takes evidence from valuers, fixes the price, and then makes a recommendation to the Minister. Then he is asked again by Mr. Duncan, on the next page, 96, question 100,—

"You stated that the Minister could object to the price, or he could accept the price, or that he could raise the price?—He could do anything he liked."

"101. Now, will you tell me under what clause he could raise the price?—If you read the Act you will find that what I say is correct. The Act, moreover, says that the thing should be initiated by the Purchase Board; but in this case it was not so."

Now, the only point which he could raise before the Committee was this: that Mr. Barron had sent from the head department a telegram requesting the surveyor who was going down to another part of the Otago District to visit the estate also. He was asked finally,—

"105. Do I understand you to say that it was in the power of the Minister to raise the price of land without the consent of the Board?—Whatever price the Minister wished to give he might have carried it. The Minister was the Board. He had the power, and if he chose to exercise it the Board would have to agree to it.

"106. Are you aware that in clause 4 of the Land for Settlements Act these words occur: 'The Governor may purchase at any price which may be agreed on between the Governor and such owners, on the recommendation of the Board'?—Yes, he may, and he may not.

"107. Do you consider it was in the power of the Minister to buy that land without any recommendation from the Board?—I should like to see the Act first; I am not prepared to say he could. He may do it on the recommendation of the Board, there is no question about that. The Minister, certainly, is supposed to get the recommendation of the Board before he does so. I think the law requires the Board's recommendation, but does not require any special price to be fixed.

"108. Could the Minister fix the price without consent of the Board, or above their own recommendation?—I think, from the evidence that has come before us, the Board would be guided largely by the Minister, if not entirely.

"109. That is not a fair reply: give me a definite answer?—I have given a definite answer to that question.

"110. Do you say that the Minister can alter the price fixed by the Board in any way?—I do not think he could alter the price fixed by the Board; but I think he is the Board, all the same."

Now, I ask honourable members to think for a moment what kind of evidence this would be considered when given by a gentleman who had made such grave charges and innuendoes by implication against the Minister of Lands. In the face of this the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) expected this Committee to bring down a kind of wishy-washy report, containing neither censure nor praise, but leaving everything in statu quo. The department was not to be censured, and it was not to be cleared of the charges which were made; the Minister was not to be cleared of the charge, nor anything else done. That, at any rate, did not suit the views of the majority of the Committee, who, after going into the matter very carefully, and watching it all through, and taking notes of the evidence, came to the conclusion which they did. The only man who stated to the Committee that he thought the purchase was too dear was Mr. Stevenson, but when he was cross-examined he floundered as much as Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, because in making a statement he said first the land was only worth £1 10s., then he came down to £1, and subsequently he admitted that the sale of a large estate of 30,000 acres in the neighbourhood would affect the price of this land. He was then asked, "Mr. Stevenson, have you ever done any valuation on properties?—I have valued for Mr. Crawford at Timaru." How on earth that could affect the value of land at Pomahaka, hundreds of miles away, I cannot understand. So far as Mr. Stevenson was concerned, he absolutely knew nothing whatever about the case, and his evidence was clear and convincing to us on that point. It was simply a position of this kind: "Save me from my friends"; for practically every word he uttered was giving Mr. Scobie Mackenzie away as far as the valuation was concerned. Therefore, while the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) has endeavoured to twit me with this report, I may tell him that it satisfied the majority of the Committee, who, as the honourable member has already said, were unanimous on two points—namely, that there was no reflection on the Minister, and there was no reflection on the department. But we did think, after sitting the whole of that time, it would not have been right to pass the matter over without stating what we considered about the action of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I shall not read the report at length, but just quote this part:—

"Finally, and as the result of as exhaustive an inquiry as they could make, the Committee find that there was no ground for the grave charges made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, and that neither the Minister nor any member of the Lands and Survey Department, or of the Board of Land Purchase Commissioners, is in any way affected either as to integrity or capacity."

We also say,—

"The Committee feel it their duty to refer to one other point:—

"In the course of his evidence, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie said that neither in his speech (quoted above) nor at any other time did he impute corruption to the Minister, and that so far as he knew no inference of corruption was ever drawn from his speech or his subsequent correspondence in the Otago Daily Times: further, that he was not responsible for the inquiry, and was merely there because the Committee had invited him."

That, of course, was an absurd position for him to take up, because when he came before the Committee the Chairman immediately asked him if he would like to be represented by counsel, because the department was represented, but he declined, and he was present all the time. He cross-examined every witness, and he had a latitude allowed to him unequalled as far as my experience of Parliamentary Committees goes. Therefore the Committee say,—

"The Committee regret that they cannot agree with him. In their opinion, no reasonable man can read the speech without drawing the inference that the speaker is intending a charge of corruption. The effect of the preliminary disclaimer is merely to put the charges in the form of innuendo instead of direct statement, and to serve as a loophole to escape the responsibility of having to prove them. There was ample evidence before the Committee that, as a matter of fact, the inference was drawn, and that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie knew it and countenanced it.

"They are further of opinion that charges of corruption, if made at all, should be made plainly and specifically instead of by innuendo and suggestion, and that the person who makes them should when challenged either prove them or withdraw them. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie has done neither."

I think that is a fair reply to the statement which has been made with reference to this matter by the honourable member for Wellington City, who has endeavoured to cast a reflection on the Committee not only for drawing up this report, but also for the way in which it has been drawn up. The honourable gentleman has a very strong individuality, and he tries to exercise it on everybody who comes near him, and unless they accept his dictum as right he thinks they must be wrong.

Mr. McGOWAN.—I have no great desire to add to the history of this celebrated purchase, but I should like honourable members to carry in their minds the statement of the honourable member for Wellington City. The honourable gentleman says he entirely exonerates the Minister and his department from any improper action, and immediately after he says he is sorry that such an inquiry should have been held.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. McGOWAN.—The honourable gentleman also said the report is not judicial in its tone.

Sir R. STOUT.—I say so still.

Mr. McGOWAN.—The honourable gentleman also gave us a classical quotation, which he rendered in English as follows: "Each man has his own fancy and colour, which he gives to his productions." Let the House bear in mind what the honourable gentleman says—that he entirely exonerates the Minister and his department; and let the House bear in mind that he says, "Each man has his own fancy and colour which he gives to his productions." Let honourable members remember the first statement, and think of the honourable gentleman's speech upon the question, and then they will be able to know what weight to place on the honourable gentleman's speech.

Mr. MEREDITH.—I have to compliment the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) on the very fair speech he delivered this evening on this question. If the case were a good one there is no honourable member more capable of presenting the case in the best possible light than that honourable member. I am a member of the Waste Lands Committee, and attended most of the sittings during this inquiry, which extended from the 4th September to the 12th October. The sittings which I did not attend were those conducted on the same mornings on which I had to act as Chairman of the Public Petitions M to Z Committee. I have, however, carefully perused the evidence given on the days when I was not present, so that I think I have a fair grasp of the case. At the first meeting of the Committee the Minister of Lands stated very briefly the nature of the accusations made against him by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and the editor of the Otago Daily Times. The speeches of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie during the election contest contained the following expressions in reference to the purchase of the Pomahaka Estate: "a downright bad purchase," "an unearthed job," "a deplorable spectacle," "a highly-improper purchase," "a fraud." These statements contained in them allegations of a grave nature, preferring charges of political corruption and jobbery against the Minister of Lands, against the officers of the Lands Department, and against the Land Purchase Board under the Land for Settlements Act. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie also accused the department of indecent haste in the purchase of the Pomahaka Estate. Now, the accusations I have just referred to were made by means of insinuation and innuendo. They were not straightforward. If they had been made in a direct manner I should have thought more of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie; and I think members of the Committee who sat and heard the evidence given, and the country generally which read the evidence, would have thought more of him if he had made the charges in a straightforward manner; and I regret that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie lacked that moral courage which should have characterized him, and which I think we should have expected from a gentleman who sat during the last Parliament as a member of this House. I might be permitted to say that I regret exceedingly that this case should have been brought before the House. I regret the circumstances in connection with it. In the heat of party warfare gentlemen are apt to make statements which in their calmer moments they regret, and I have no doubt that when Mr. Scobie Mackenzie made use of the statements I have referred to he thought that there was some provocation from the other side. But I am of opinion, in common with the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), that there was no foundation whatever for the charges of political corruption, jobbery, and indecent haste made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie against the Minister of Lands, the Lands Department, and the Land Purchase Board. To be brief, I will epitomize the evidence. I will not make any direct quotations from it, but I have made a few extracts which I will submit for the consideration of honourable members. Under the head of "indecent haste," I may say I do not think there was any indecent haste whatever in connection with the purchase of the Pomahaka Estate. A letter was written on the 17th August, 1893, by Mr. Douglas, the owner of this estate, to Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, member for Clutha, informing him that a petition was being signed, asking the Government to purchase the Pomahaka Estate. Mr. Mackenzie received that letter, as he admitted in his evidence, and showed it to Mr. Ritchie, the head of the Agricultural Department, on the 21st August. Mr. Ritchie mentioned the circumstance to Mr. Barron that the Pomahaka Estate was offered for sale; and Mr. Barron communicated on the same day, the 21st August, with Mr. Adams, Chief Surveyor to the Otago Land Board, and asked him, as he was on his way to value the Conical Hills Estate, to go on and examine and report upon the Pomahaka Estate. On the 27th August Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, the honourable member for Clutha, received a petition, signed by over three hundred persons, asking that this land should be acquired under the Land for Settlements Act. On the 30th of the same month Mr. Mackenzie presented the said petition to the Minister of Lands. The Minister of Lands referred Mr. Douglas to the Land Purchase Board in Otago. Mr. Douglas communicated with the Board; and on the 4th of September a recommendation was forwarded from Wellington to Mr. Maitland, the Chief Commissioner on the Otago Land Board, recommending him to appoint Mr. Dallas to value the Pomahaka Estate. Mr. Dallas had been employed in valuing land in connection with the Property-tax and Insurance Departments, and as a public valuer generally. Mr. Dallas admitted that he was in the habit of valuing estates for money-lenders in the City of Dunedin, so that Mr. Dallas was a public valuer.

Mr. Mills

Mr. ALLEN.—That is not so. Where is that in the evidence?

Mr. MEREDITH.—If the honourable gentleman who states that is not correct examines the printed evidence he will find that it is so. On the 12th of September Mr. Dallas sent in his report to Mr. Maitland. The Land Purchase Board sat on the 11th, 12th, and 13th. On the 13th September they agreed as to the valuation, and the desirability of acquiring the estate. On the 25th of September Mr. Percy Smith, the Chief Surveyor, received a report from the Land Purchase Board, and, after submitting the report to the Minister of Lands, he telegraphed to Mr. Douglas and offered him the sum of £2 10s. per acre for the Pomahaka Estate. Mr. Douglas wanted £3 10s. Telegrams passed between Mr. Douglas and the Lands Department in Wellington extending over eight days, showing that there was no particular hurry connected with it. On the 3rd of October Mr. Douglas accepted £2 10s. per acre, and on the 28th of October a cheque was forwarded to Mr. Douglas; so that from the time Mr. Douglas wrote to Mr. Thomas Mackenzie till the cheque was forwarded to him there elapsed a period of seventy-two days—namely, from the 17th of August to the 28th of October; so that the allegation that there was indecent haste by the Minister, by the Lands Department, or by the Land Purchase Board does not accord with the facts brought before the Waste Lands Committee during the inquiry. Now as to the valuation. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie stated in his evidence that the land was only worth 10s. per acre—that was, based upon the rental.

Mr. ALLEN.—That is not so. Where is that evidence?

Mr. MEREDITH.—That was based upon the rental that Mr. Douglas was receiving at the time—that is, 6d. per acre; 6d. an acre was paid upon a tenancy at will, Mr. Douglas having power to resume possession of the land at any moment; and on the 6d. an acre, at the rate of 5 per cent. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie placed the capital value of the land at 10s. per acre.

Mr. ALLEN.—Where is that in the evidence?

Mr. MEREDITH.—If the honourable gentleman will read the evidence—

Mr. ALLEN.—I have read the evidence, and I say you cannot prove that by the evidence.

Mr. MEREDITH.—Mr. Thomas Mackenzie stated in his evidence that, in his opinion, the land was worth £2 an acre, or it even might be worth £2 10s. The Pomahaka Estate is in the Clutha Electorate, and therefore I place considerable weight upon the statement by the honourable member for Clutha. The Union Bank advanced a sum of £9,000 upon the collateral security of the Pomahaka Estate to Mr. Douglas. That amounted to the sum of £1 4s. per acre. I wish these statements to be placed against the statement made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie as to the capital value of the land. Then, a Mr. Johnson gave evidence before the Committee. This gentleman belongs to the firm of Wright, Stevenson, and Co., auctioneers and land-salesmen, in Dunedin. He stated in his evidence that £2 10s. per acre was a fair price for the land. Mr. Dallas, a farmer, and property-tax, insurance, and general valuator, a member of the Otago Land Board, valued the Pomahaka Estate in 1891 at the sum of £2 2s. 6d. per acre for property-tax purposes. He valued the land subsequently for sale at £2 10s. per acre. I may point out that in his evidence before the Committee Mr. Dallas showed very clearly that another property which he valued in the immediate neighbourhood of Pomahaka at £3 per acre in 1891 was subsequently sold for the sum of £3 8s. 6d. per acre, or an advance of 8s. 6d. per acre upon the property-tax assessment valuation. Mr. Dallas also stated in his evidence on the quality of the land, or, rather, in the report he made to the Land Purchase Board, that it would grow from 45 to 60 bushels of oats to the acre. If land will grow from 45 to 60 bushels of oats to the acre in the part of the country I represent that land will be worth from £3 to £5 10s. per acre. Mr. Douglas's own valuation was £3 10s.; he accepted £2 10s. in consequence of being pressed by the Union Bank for an overdraft that had been advanced against this property. From 1871 to 1879 Mr. Douglas had been in receipt of 2s. an acre rent and local taxes. Subsequently he rented the land to the New Zealand Pastoral Land Company for 1s. 6d. an acre, and later still for 9d. an acre. In 1889, when the estate was only bringing in 6d. an acre, 1,140 acres of it were sold at £3 12s. 6d. per acre. I should like honourable members to place the realised value of £3 12s. 6d. per acre when Mr. Douglas was only receiving 6d. an acre against the capital value of 10s. per acre placed upon it by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. Mr. Begg, a gentleman of undoubted veracity and capability, the attorney for Mr. Douglas, stated that there was an offer to lease the land at 3s. per acre for a term of years, and an undertaking to break it up and lay it down in English grass. Mr. Hugh Cameron, on whose evidence I place great reliance, and who was mentioned by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout)—

9.30. Mr. ALLEN.—How long was he on the ground?

Mr. MEREDITH.—Mr. Hugh Cameron, who was president of the Farmers' Club at Waitahuna, spent eight hours on the land, after riding twenty-six miles to it. The honourable gentleman smiles at the evidence of Mr. Hugh Cameron. I may inform the House that the main portion of the farm which I am working is at a distance of twenty miles from my home—stead. I am frequently in the habit of leaving home at six o'clock in the morning, and either riding or driving to that portion of the farm, and, after spending eight hours on it, I am able to reach home again by nine or ten o'clock at night. So that it was quite possible for Mr. Hugh Cameron to reach Pomahaka in time to spend eight hours in the examination of it, and return the same day. He states this:—

"I am president of the Farmers' Club at Waitahuna. I have had a lifelong experience. I am a farmer. At the Waitahuna Farmers' Club I told them I was very much pleased with the appearance of the estate, and that I thought it suitable for agricultural purposes."

That is fully borne out by his evidence. He said the land consists of "open, flat spurs, and it appeared to me to have good soil upon it." He thought it was worth the £2 10s. an acre the Government paid for it. From the facts I have adduced it is plain there is not a vestige of proof in the evidence placed before the Committee to justify the allegations of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and the editor of the Otago Daily Times in charging the Minister of Lands with political corruption and jobbery. There is no evidence to impugn the integrity and veracity of the members of the Land Board, or of the members of the Land Purchase Board under the Land for Settlements Act. In fact, the whole of the proceedings connected with the acquisition of the Pomahaka Estate were conducted in such a manner as not to arouse the suspicion of any fair-minded man. The cost of the inquiry, I believe, has amounted to over £300, and the responsibility for the inquiry must rest with Mr. Scobie Mackenzie.

Mr. GREEN.—I was somewhat surprised at the manner in which the Minister of Lands dealt with this question. I do not think there was any necessity for all that heat which he displayed, especially when he commenced by telling us that he and his department had come out quite scathless. Like the honourable member for Wellington City, I do not think any one, from first to last, ever thought there was any corruption on the part of either the Minister or the officers of his department; but when he said that he took exception to the charges having been levelled, as he asserted, by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, he himself commenced to level charges at many persons, and against some who had nothing to do with this purchase, and I venture to assert that whoever heard him must consider that he made more serious charges against the gentlemen in connection with that inquiry and the circumstances of it than have ever been imputed to him or to any of the officers of his department. And he also said, Sir, that the reason for the opposition to himself as Minister of Lands was the action he had taken in this House in connection with the Cottesbrook runs and the Silver Peak runs. I think I may trust to memory, for since the delivery of his remarks I have not had time to look the matter up, but unless my memory is very much at fault it was the Otago Land Board that took into consideration the action of those who came down from Tasmania and wished to take up the runs in the Cottesbrook Estate, and it was the Board that refused to issue to them the leases they had bidden for at auction.

Mr. Meredith

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—After this House had first inquired into it.

Mr. GREEN.—Certainly not, Sir.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Certainly it did.

Mr. GREEN.—I feel sure I am right, but whether I am right or wrong, I have known the honourable gentleman sufficiently long to know that when he says I am wrong he will stick to that. But I was a member of the Otago Waste Lands Board at the time, and I say that the members of the Board were aware that certain people came by steamboat and landed in Dunedin, and, when the applications came before the Land Board, containing the names of some of the passengers by that steamboat, the Land Board refused to issue licenses to these people. Then the Board was threatened with legal proceedings, but it still refused to issue the licenses. The case was taken before the Supreme Court, and Mr. Justice Williams upheld the action of the Board in refusing to issue the licenses. It was then carried to the Appeal Court here, and the Appeal Court upheld the decision of Mr. Justice Williams. It is true that the honourable gentleman, as a member of the House, got a Committee set up; but that Committee, after taking evidence, would only say it was of opinion that a further inquiry should be instituted in connection with the Silver Peak runs.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I got the evidence for you.

Mr. GREEN.—You got the evidence? Well, the statement I have just made at any rate is the history of it. The honourable gentleman used to assert then in Otago, as he asserted in the House to-night, that he was determined to drive out all the dummies from the country, and he always made these bombastic assertions in connection with them; but, so far as the Cottesbrook runs are concerned, the Otago Land Board, of which Sir Robert Stout was a member, would not issue leases to those Tasmanians who were suspects; and so far as the Silver Peak runs are concerned, there were only two applicants who, so far as I am aware, the honourable gentleman himself ever asserted were dummies; and those gentlemen—Messrs. Borthwick and Hertslet—who gave evidence before the Waste Lands Board, and others who afterwards gave evidence before the Committee of this House, swore that they were not dummies, and the Land Board was of opinion that the evidence was not sufficiently strong to justify it in cancelling their leases. But the honourable gentleman for some years, I presume, was of opinion that the Board had not done its duty, and should have cancelled these leases; but, of course, I cannot expect him to admit he was in fault. At any rate, his action entirely reverses the opinion which he then expressed, not only on the floor of this House, but on the public platform on every other occasion, for since then he has appointed Mr. H. Hertalet, one of these same gentlemen, to his own department, and that ought to be conclusive evidence that he has changed his opinion with reference to the character of these gentlemen, because, if he denies this, then he must believe that this gentleman forswore himself; and I cannot imagine he would have appointed a gentleman to his department he thought had forsworn himself. However, he has not stopped short of an accusation against an officer of the Union Bank of having forsworn himself. He stated deliberately that this gentleman gave false testimony before the Committee—a statement I deplore he ever should have made. All through, Sir, the honourable gentleman here takes exception to statements made on the public platform during the heat of a contested election, but if he sincerely objected on any other than personal grounds he himself should have abstained from making more serious charges—in a place where the charges are privileged—against a gentleman who has no opportunity of defending himself and disproving the assertions of the honourable gentleman in the manner in which he has done to-night in connection with the Pomahaka inquiry.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Did not that officer go back the next day?

Mr. GREEN.—I am not here to prove whether that gentleman, in his evidence, was mistaken or not. I was a member of the Committee, and I positively assert that no witness gave his evidence more clearly or in a more satisfactory manner than did Mr. Brittan. I listened to the sworn testimony of the gentleman who gave that evidence, and I was led to form a very different opinion from that which some other members of the Committee formed in connection with the evidence submitted to us. But we were told there was no haste in the matter, and we were also told that everything done in connection with this matter was in the ordinary routine way, and quite in accordance with the ordinary manner of business. Then, I say the Minister of Lands, at any rate, has not, on the public platforms, made similar statements to this, but exactly the reverse, and therefore left a false impression on the minds of the electors of the colony as to how the Lands Department is administered under his Government. He has been in the habit of informing the electors in his own district,—and, I think I am correct in stating, the electors of other districts,—that one of the things which he takes credit for on behalf of the country is that the Government at the present time, and since they have been in office, have taken very good care to instruct their officers what they were to do, and that the officers in his own department have carried out his instructions. I say, if the evidence taken before this Committee has proved anything, it has entirely disproved these assertions, and it has proved—and he himself in evidence there has stated—that a great deal was done by the officers of his department without his knowledge, and for a very considerable length of time before he knew anything about it. The evidence goes to show that this petition was got up by Mr. Douglas himself; that it was rewritten by the agent of Mr. Douglas; that it was typewritten by a person in the agent's office; that the petition was sent to Mr. Turnbull at Clinton, and was then hawked round by Mr. Douglas's agent and another person in the employ of that agent; that Mr. Douglas paid £40 to the agent and £12 for the young fellow who took the petition round. I am not quite sure—it was disputed afterwards—whether the £12 was paid to the agent in addition to the £40—that is to say, whether the two sums of £12 were not really one £12. The evidence of Mr. Turnbull was that he himself received £12, that the youth whom he employed received £12, and that in addition to that he (Mr. Turnbull) received £40. I do not wish to exaggerate anything, but I am perfectly certain that Mr. Turnbull admitted he received £40 and £12, and paid £12 to the youth for riding round with the petition, which was got up by Mr. Douglas himself and hawked round the district for signatures at Mr. Douglas's instance and at Mr. Douglas's expense. Now, perhaps the members of this House who are not members of the Committee will be surprised to hear me say that, before that petition was presented,—before Mr. Douglas made his offer,—the officers of the department in Wellington here set the officers in Dunedin in motion, and that was some nine days before the petition was received by the Minister himself. Sir, the evidence is conclusive on this point: that is that Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Barron—two officers of the department—had a conversation on the 21st August; that Mr. Barron, without consulting the Minister of Lands, and without consulting the Surveyor-General, communicated with the Chief Commissioner of Lands in Otago, and directed him to instruct the Chief Surveyor to inspect and report on this land. Mr. Douglas's offer was dated on the same day, but it was not received by Mr. Maitland until the following day—namely, the 22nd August—so that, I ask, could you possibly get stronger evidence to refute the statements which we have been in the habit of hearing during the last three years—namely, that this Government had so completely changed the order of things—while the officers of the departments were doing things as they stated they were in the habit of doing before this Ministry entered into office, and which order of things had been completely reversed? They had taken very good care since they came into office to issue instructions in all cases and to see them carried out. I say that, so far as the inquiry goes, it entirely disproves these assertions. It shows also that the Chief Surveyor of Otago, who was on his way to inspect another estate, was instructed on the 21st August, 1893, in this matter by an officer of the department, and, on the oath of both himself and the Minister of Lands, without any knowledge of the Minister of Lands at all; and that the Chief Surveyor, on the 26th of the same month, inspected that land, and on the 29th he sent his report on to Wellington; and the petition asking the Government to acquire this land was dated on the 25th, and was not received by the Minister of Lands until the 30th. And the Minister of Lands in his evidence stated that he believed Mr. Barron, an officer in his department, was in his office at the time the honourable member for Clutha presented the petition, that he himself handed over the petition with directions to Mr. Barron to set this matter in motion, and that Mr. Barron did not tell him at that time what had been done. And not only had he instructed the Chief Surveyor of Otago to make an inspection and report, but the report was there. But did Mr. Barron inform the Minister of what he and other of the Lands and Survey officers had already done? No, he did not. He did not do anything of the kind. According to the evidence presented to this House the Minister of Lands remained totally ignorant of what was going on. But the Minister of Lands was not ignorant of the desire of Mr. Douglas to sell the estate. In his evidence he stated that Mr. Douglas told him he wished to sell it months before.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Nine or ten months.

Mr. GREEN.—I said months before; it matters very little whether it was nine or ten months. It was a very considerable length of time before that he intimated to the Minister of Lands that he wished to sell this estate, and the Minister of Lands in his evidence said that he never told Mr. Douglas that he would require time to enable him to consider the matter, but that he would require to submit an offer, which would have to be dealt with by the Land Purchase Board under the Act. That was months before the 21st August; and, although a deal of correspondence was carried on between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Ritchie, none of which could be produced because it was not official but private and has been destroyed, it does not appear that the Minister of Lands knew that Mr. Douglas had made the offer to sell, or that any action was being taken by his department for the purpose of acquiring this estate. He did not know anything about it till the report of the Board was submitted to him, and he forwarded this on to the Government. But, Sir, when we come to the point again in the matter we find that, to use a very common and perhaps vulgar expression, the cart again gets before the horse, and we find in the evidence that the Surveyor-General, who was Chairman of the Board, signed his instructions to the other members of the Board to hold their meeting prior to His Excellency the Governor signing the warrant authorising the Board to make the legal inquiry, so that when we arrive at this point we find just the opposite to what the Minister has expressed had taken place in this case, and that officers, instead of the Minister, were running the show, and things are reversed, they being ahead of the Minister and the Governor all along the line. We come now to the price of the land; and there is some conflict in connection with the value of the land, but it is slightly different from what the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds said in connection with this matter. He said that Mr. Stevenson had entirely contradicted himself in his evidence, because he first valued the land at £1 10s. and then at £1. There is nothing contradictory in the matter. Mr. Stevenson said that he would not value the land at more than £1 10s. for any purpose, and he himself would not buy it for £1. He considered that those who were occupying the land only valued it at £1, because the rental which they paid was only interest on £1 per acre. He said it would not be more; and that is how he came to refer to the land being worth only £1. He meant to and did value it at £1 10s. as being a fair price for it, and he, of all witnesses, said that he was thoroughly acquainted with the land, as he was the manager of an adjoining property and knew every acre of this Pomahaka land. He had been over it a great many times, and from his experience and knowledge he was able to give the strongest evidence as to the character of the land. He described the stock on it, and the condition in which the stock was at the time of the purchase and for some considerable length of time before. The other evidence in connection with the value of it of an independent character was that of Mr. Cameron, referred to by the member for Ashley. But the great difference between those two gentlemen, when we consider that they were experts, is that the one manages the adjoining estate, and knows this property intimately, and had been over it a good many times; whilst the other gentleman only saw it once, and that on a Sunday, for a very short time, he having ridden from Waitahuna, a distance of twenty-five miles, and after the inspection he rode back to Waitahuna the same day. Like the Chief Surveyor of Otago, he only saw the estate once, on the 26th October, when he met Mr. Douglas and Mr. Turnbull, who accompanied him during his inspection. You will therefore see, Sir, that while there is a great difference between the estimates of value given by these two independent expert witnesses,—practically the only two independent witnesses who were called to give expert evidence of the value of the land,—there was also a great difference between their opportunities of arriving at an estimate. One lived on and managed the estate adjoining, and the other lived twenty-five miles away, and was only on the land for an hour or two on one Sunday. The House can form its own conclusions as to which estimate is correct. I will not say which one is the more reliable, but leave the House to form its opinion thereon.

Mr. Green

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—What about the price given by the settlers?

Mr. GREEN.—It is too soon yet for any one to express an opinion upon that view of the case, but the honourable gentleman himself has already said in his speech to-night that there was no doubt his opponents would be very glad to induce these people to believe that the price they paid was too high. I do not think his opponents—I presume he means his political opponents—have any such desire as that. I, at any rate, have known some members of this House a good many years, both privately and in a political capacity, and I know, irrespective of what side they are on in politics, they are gentlemen who want to advance the true interests of the colony, and will not for political purposes do anything of the kind that the honourable member has intimated in his speech to-night. The members on this side of the House would be glad to do all in their power to make the settlers happy, contented, and prosperous, without any consideration that by doing so they might add to the popularity of the Hon. the Minister of Lands. “We should require to assume that such gentlemen as the Surveyor-General of the colony, the Chief Surveyor of Otago, and the Registrar of Deeds have entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of misleading and injuring this colony, or we must exonerate them from anything said against them,” said the Minister.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—That is what you are trying to do now.

Mr. GREEN.—No, Sir; neither I nor any politician need be blamed for saying the price is high, when such officers as Mr. J. P. Maitland and Mr. Marsh, in their official reports to the Surveyor-General, state that the settlers say the price is too high. I am not very much influenced by what the honourable member says or thinks. I have known him for many years, and I have heard him make statements in reference to matters not always in accordance with my view of the facts; but, Sir, we find that time is really the best witness in all these cases, and, at any rate, the honourable gentleman is not exactly correct in the opinions he forms or the statements he makes. I do not require to express an opinion about this particular statement of his. He himself asks this House not to assume for one moment that his judgment is not sound and his opinions good; but we have been told in the official report that the people consider they paid too high a price. He would not consider Mr. Stevenson's opinion of the value conclusive; but, knowing one of his own officers—a gentleman of whom, I am pleased to say, I have as high an opinion as the honourable gentleman has—has been informed before this inquiry was commenced before the Committee, and before this subject had been referred to in Parliament, that the people considered that they had paid—

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—He never saw the report.

Mr. GREEN.—He did.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Not the gentleman you refer to.

Mr. GREEN.—If he has never seen the report, and if the honourable gentleman admits he has never seen the report, of course I have a right to ask you to look at the Surveyor-General's report, and there you will find that the Chief Commissioner of Otago has reported to him, and you will also find amongst your papers that Mr. March has reported to the Surveyor-General that he is aware that the people in the district consider that they paid too high a price for this land. We cannot assume that these gentlemen are influenced by any political feeling, or, at any rate, that they have any political colouring in connection with this matter. So far as the question of price is concerned, I say we have the practical judgment of the manager of the adjoining estate, and his evidence; and we have also on record the opinions of two of the honourable gentleman's own officers in his own department, and that they are aware the people in that district are paying too high a price.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—They do not say anything of the sort.

Mr. GREEN.—It is a great pity that the honourable gentleman will say they do not say anything of the sort.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I challenge you to read the report now.

Mr. GREEN.—I say those gentlemen I have mentioned do say so, and any one who reads the evidence given at the inquiry will see it there; but, Sir, I am not in the habit of taking instructions from any man, and certainly will not obey any the Hon. the Minister of Lands may give.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—They do not read the report.

Mr. GREEN.—I am giving a reason, and I have read these reports and papers, and I will stake my reputation as a man, not as a politician, that the statement I make is correct: but any one who ventures to hold an opposite opinion to the honourable gentleman, and especially if he has the temerity to express it, whether orally or in writing, is a bitter opponent, and he is also an enemy to the true interests of the country. We often hear the honourable member speaking in this way in connection with financial institutions, companies, and banks, and the Tory Press, and we have got so accustomed now to hear the honourable member read about what the Tory Press says of him that if we did not know him, if we were not conversant with matters, these off-repeated assertions of his would make us think his statements were correct, and that these people had personal feelings against him, and wrote merely for the purpose of prejudicing and injuring him, instead of expressing their independent opinions in connection with the man they write about.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN.—The honourable gentleman says, “Hear, hear.” That may be his opinion, and he is as entitled to hold that opinion as he is to express it, but a person who makes a statement with regard to individuals should be prepared to prove what he asserts, but the honourable gentleman would find it anything but possible to prove half his accusations. Sir, there was a gentleman whose name he mentioned, and who we all know is connected with one of these companies. He made very serious charges against that gentleman, and asserted that he ought to be in gaol.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN.—He laid a charge against the manager of a financial company; and from the great power the Minister possesses I am of opinion that that gentleman who he said deserved to be in gaol would have been put in gaol had he deserved it, for I know the honourable gentleman sufficiently well to know that, with the power he can exercise against a political opponent, or any one who ventures to hold different opinions from the honourable gentleman's, and especially if he expresses them, he will punish such a person as severely as it is possible for him to do. And if he considered Mr. John McFarlane Ritchie should have been put in gaol for the part he played in the dummy case the Minister referred to, and as he has not been incarcerated, then, I say, that being the case, knowing the Minister as well as I do, and knowing also the power he possesses as a Minister of the Crown to do what he thinks right to punish an offender, I am driven to the conclusion that he does not think Mr. Ritchie should have been in gaol. At any rate, if he does and has taken no steps to mete out Mr. Ritchie's deserts, I charge the Minister with a great and grave dereliction of duty. Therefore, Sir, I take it only as a figure of speech; and the honourable gentleman, under the heat of debate, possibly expressed an opinion which he did not mean; and I am very much inclined to believe that in his serious moments, as Minister of Lands, he does not believe this gentleman ought to be in gaol, because I know, from the honourable gentleman's spirit of determination, that he would have exercised his power to put him there if he could. I do not want to refer to what he said with regard to the Press, beyond expressing an opinion that it is a pity the honourable gentleman should say on every possible occasion that he does not get justice, and that the Press treats him differently from any one else. I cannot believe that any portion of the Press of the colony is actuated with feelings which prompt it to write him down. I think it deals with him as it does with all other public men—that is, it gives them a castigation when it thinks they deserve it, and it praises them when it thinks they deserve praise. I have several notes yet, but I cannot refer to them, as I hear the bell. I may say that I for one do not think this inquiry is worth the money it has cost the country. The locality is known to a good many people, and I have no doubt that part of the colony has formed its opinion of this matter, and the evidence taken here will strengthen the opinion which has been expressed. I for one must express my regret that the inquiry was ever held, and the funds of the country expended so injudiciously. The £500 expended on this inquiry would, in my opinion, have been more judiciously expended in bridging a river or making a road to benefit the struggling settlers.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The honourable gentlemen who have already addressed the House on this subject are all, I believe, members of the Committee that investigated this matter, and they have all spoken from an intimate knowledge of the proceedings gained from day to day during the course of the inquiry. I and the majority of the members of the House, in common with almost every one outside the House, have not had that advantage; but I have endeavoured, since the report was brought down, to familiarise myself with the salient facts of the case, and I purpose referring to these facts, as they may be viewed by members of the House and the public outside. The inquiry, and the transaction the inquiry dealt with, seem to me to give an insight into the working of the Land for Settlements Act which will be very interesting to the people of the colony; and, while I am not going to deal out condemnation on one side or the other, but to endeavour to place the facts as they exist, I must at the same time say that the public may not, I think, be prepared for the amount of zeal exhibited by certain gentlemen in connection with the Lands Department. The public impression is that officials are slow to move. The public should make haste to alter that impression—under certain circumstances. This matter presents itself to my mind, after looking through the evidence, in three aspects. First of all we have the Minister so strictly impartial that he is absolutely ignorant of what is going on in his own department. Then we have the great landowner graciously permitting himself to assist in the work of land-settlement; and even, as he says, "giving away" his land. And we have a group of zealous and active officers taking upon themselves not only the initiation of administration but also taking the onus of what has occurred off the shoulders of the Minister who is supposed to be responsible. These are the three aspects; and they remind me of a form of picture not very common nowadays. As the Minister of Lands referred to the classics, I may be permitted to go back to mediæval times, and recall to the memory of honourable members a form of picture called a triptych—a picture of three panels, the centre one fixed to the wall, and the two others hinged to it so as to act as shutters, which, when closed, give no idea of the interior. So, taking the Crown Lands Report in connection with the Pomahaka purchase, you have, I may say, a triptych, with the shutters closed,—a very ordinary piece of official furniture; but when they are opened, as we may suppose them to be by this inquiry, you see the three pictures; the Minister in the centre, naturally occupying the chief place; on the left hand you have the great landowner, and on the other the group of officials. We might take them, I think, in that order. Here, then, is the Minister, who towards the end of last session—on the 30th of August—hears of the Pomahaka Estate, apparently for the first time in any official way, from a petition presented to him by the honourable member for Clutha. He makes inquiries, of course, and judge what his surprise must have been when he finds that the machinery of his department has already been in motion for a week or two, and that actually an inspection of the property has been made four days before! In the circumstances, this might be considered fortunate, for the subject was one relating to an estate in the part of the colony he represented. He must have felt relieved, by the action of his officials, from any possibility of connivance in a transaction that might have otherwise had a political complexion, for was not the owner of this estate an elector in the constituency that he was about to contest? How natural it was to have the whole affair introduced by a petition, and how fortunate to have the procedure for purchase actually commenced without his having had anything to do with it! As to the petition, it has a history which I will not anticipate at the present moment. I refer to the petition at this point merely to recall the fact to the recollection of my honourable friend the Minister of Lands, that when trouble afterwards arose he declared vehemently he would take his stand upon that petition. I wish he had better ground to stand on. It apparently was a genuine petition signed by 302 persons; but, then, petitions are often misleading. In this instance, however, the Minister had an assistant who knew all about it—Mr. John Douglas Ritchie, head of the Stock Department, the nephew of the man whose land these 302 petitioners prayed should be cut up. Mr. Ritchie was able to tell the Minister all about the land, and the desire of his uncle to promote settlement. Five days afterwards the Minister of Lands recommends the Governor to direct an inquiry to be made under the Land for Settlements Act. By the 24th of the month the report of the Land Purchase Board is submitted to him in Wellington. On the same day an offer is made by telegram to Mr. Douglas, and a few days after it is accepted. So we see that, within six weeks after the Minister has become aware of Pomahaka being available, another great estate in the colony is "busted." It is said that if that estate had not been "busted" its owner must have "busted." I gather from the evidence laid before the Committee that the income from the estate was £228 and the outgoings £675 a year; and, moreover, that the unfortunate owner was pressed hardly by some importunate creditors. But, even if that were so, what is this but a double advantage—the colony achieving the purchase of another big estate, and the landowner being relieved of large liabilities? That is the great central picture of the Minister. Now we will turn to that on the left hand—that of the great patriot—curiously enough, one of the very class the Minister of Lands was denouncing to-night, one of those large landowners of the colony, one of the "social pests," for he appears in the black list of 1891 as the owner of no less than 41,199 acres: that is, he is a man borne down by the hateful land-tax in its worst form because the Pomahaka Estate had been left unimproved. But, humanly speaking, I suppose he had the feelings of his kind, and might say, like another representative of an afflicted class, "Hath not a great landowner eyes? Hath not a great landowner hands? . . . If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?" If these were his thoughts, he must have dissembled. He would appear above revenge—as overflowing with charity and sacrifice for the public good. Only, a marked man like him—a great landowner and "social pest"—could not openly succeed in becoming a public benefactor. Fortunately there was a way. He had a nephew in the public service. We cannot too much congratulate ourselves upon the relationships which outsiders sometimes have with trusted men in the public service. Mr. Douglas has a nephew in the Lands Department—Mr. John Douglas Ritchie before mentioned—who knows all about the Pomahaka Estate being fit for close settlement, and not such as should be used only for sheep. What does Mr. Douglas do? It is not enough that he has this nephew who is in favour with a Liberal Minister: there must be some movement from without as well. He sets to work, apparently, to make public opinion. He sits down and draws up a petition. Now, I regret to say that Mr. Douglas for some time showed considerable hesitation in admitting that he was the author of that petition.

Mr. Green

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—He admitted it right off.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—For a long time he denied the merit.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I was not prepared to hear the Minister admit he knew so much of what was going on. I was certainly under the belief that Mr. Douglas would not in the first instance admit that he drew the petition up; and it would have been very peculiar if he had announced himself its author. It was not a petition from himself. Let us see what the petition says. It purports to emanate from "settlers and would-be settlers"; but, as the facts are now disclosed, there was no movement among "settlers" or "would-be settlers" at all. There was no committee, no band: only a solitary man, with the last peremptory demand from the bank calling up his overdraft before him, sitting down in his house at Mount Royal to manufacture public opinion. And this is how he does it:—

"Unto the Honourable the Minister of Lands."

Mark the title—"Unto the Honourable the Minister of Lands."

"The petition of the undersigned settlers and would-be settlers in Clutha County and neighbourhood, in the Provincial District of Otago, humbly sheweth."

We have to bear in mind that at this moment there was not a single "settler" or

"would-be settler" turning his attention to Pomahaka, and yet we proceed to find Mr. Douglas confidently anticipating an expression of opinion from the unknown as follows:—

"That your petitioners have watched with pleasurable satisfaction the facilities for settlement afforded by your Government in offering practical opportunity for so doing upon New Zealand lands."

Fancy the magnanimity of this "social pest" suggesting that the public express their "pleasurable satisfaction" with the administration of the Minister of Lands! But no, it is not he; the expression is to be that of petitioners, whose opinions are being moulded for them, even at the sacrifice by Mr. Douglas of all he holds dear. So he goes on and describes the sort of land which the Government should obtain for close settlement. Among other things the petition says,—

"That land to be thoroughly suited for close settlement should be really fitted for growing well both cereals, turnips, and English grass. But there is no open land of that quality in this quarter now in the hands of Government."

Without pause the petition goes on,—

"That were Government procuring land in this district by purchase for settlement purposes, possessing these qualities, this would then place it within reach of settlers to take advantage of any favourable opportunity for either cropping, or rearing or fattening stock, as from time to time may practically be found most profitable."

Again it enlarges,—

"That land thus capable of cultivation affords, over and above the advantages of ordinary grazing, facilities for artificially feeding, rearing, and growing fat lambs for export, as well as for fattening off at an early age the class of long-wool sheep for freezing, now most fashionable as well as profitable."

That was the sort of land, apparently, that it was desirable to have, and that the signatories sought to obtain, for the purposes of close settlement. And now the petition approaches the point:—

"That a property possessing the above qualities, and of maiden soil, is located almost in our midst, and could, we believe, be secured by your Government on reasonable terms—namely, the Pomahaka Downs, the property of Mr. John Douglas, Mount Royal, Palmerston South, and containing about 7,500 acres."

But drafting a petition is not the only thing Mr. Douglas seems to have done in the way of educating public opinion. He seems to have also tuned that mighty organ the Press with its diaphanous stops, although it is a matter for regret that some doubt has been suggested as to the authorship of a certain leading article in the local newspaper. If the Bill of my honourable friend the Minister of Lands—his Libel Bill—had been in force the article must have been signed, and then we should have heard nothing as to the disputed authorship. Now, Mr. Douglas insists that he was the writer of that leader; but the editor of the newspaper denies the claim. He says that all he got from

Mr. Douglas was a few "aspects" of the land as seen through a good glass of whiskey, and that the only article Mr. Douglas gave him was a cigar. Well, whoever he is entitled to the credit of this leader I must leave in doubt, although I must say that not only in the leading article but in the petition there is a flavour of whiskey.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Is that part of the evidence?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Yes, it is part of the evidence that Mr. Douglas claimed the authorship of the leading article, and that the editor would not admit any contribution beyond a cigar and some "aspects" of the land as seen through a good glass of whiskey. Well, this petition, backed by the thunders of the Press, was signed by 302 "settlers and would-be settlers,"—none of whom, however, took up any land on the block when they afterwards had the opportunity,—and was followed up by a formal offer of the land at £3 10s. an acre on the 21st August to the Commissioner of Crown Lands in Dunedin, who on the next day acknowledged receipt. So you see there was no time lost. The petition was meanwhile soon on its way to Wellington, where it was presented on the 30th August. But a week before, through the agency of Mr. John Douglas Ritchie, the departmental machinery had been set in motion; and on the very date of Mr. John Douglas's application, and before it reached its destination, he met the Chief Surveyor, Mr. Adams, on the ground. All this was, if not a coincidence, one of those happy conjunctions that redeem our public affairs from the charge of being too slowly or too elaborately conducted. Mr. Adams went to Pomahaka, and there met Mr. Douglas. Mr. Adams afterwards sent in a report, other movements followed,—to be referred to later on,—and, eventually, in less than a month Mr. Douglas got an offer from Wellington of £2 10s. an acre; and then Mr. Douglas telegraphs to the Surveyor-General to try to get the Minister to "split the difference," and make the price £3 an acre. This telegram must be admitted as somewhat unfortunate. The very idea of a Minister in the discharge of his public duty "splitting the difference" is too much to suppose. The Surveyor-General, however, told the Minister that he did not think the Act contemplated the Minister offering a higher price than the Board recommended. Consequently he replied, No, there was to be no "splitting of the difference," and Mr. Douglas then reluctantly accepted, and, as he says, virtually gave away the land! But he is not in the least hurt about it, or, at any rate, he does not show any annoyance. A week after getting the money—£18,656—from the Treasury he addressed a letter to the Minister of Lands, wherein he called the Minister "Dear McKenzie." And—following out what occurred very soon after—Mr. Douglas, although suffering from indigestion, or influenza, or some other complaint, actually travels six miles to the poll and records his vote—for whom, of course, we do not know. Thus we have the great central figure, and thus we have the first leaf in this triple picture. Now we turn to the second leaf, which discloses the official group. I may here remind you of a curious thing that sometimes happens when viewing those old pictures. The artist by a stroke of genius sometimes succeeds in making the central figure appear differently in association with one or other of the sides. In association with the one side, for instance, the central figure may appear severe, even forbidding; while, in association with the other side, you will be caught thinking that there is a smile gathering on the countenance, a twinkling of the eye;—you might almost believe the eye is winking! Of course, that is an optical illusion. However that may be, we naturally associate the great central figure of the Minister with his subordinates. And with them we have now to do. We do not know exactly when the official communications began;—that with which the appendix of documents accompanying the report opens is a telegram dated the 21st of August from Mr. Barron, the Under-Secretary for Crown Lands in Wellington, informing Mr. Maitland, Commissioner of Crown Lands in Dunedin, that Mr. Adams, the Chief Surveyor, has been instructed to inspect the Pomahaka Downs property. We do not get the communication to Mr. Adams authorising him to do this. That must have come from the Surveyor-General.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Sir R. STOUT.—No; it went direct from Mr. Barron.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Well, that is not set out in the evidence or in the appendix of documents, but I accept the correction of the honourable gentleman, who was on the Committee and no doubt followed the evidence as it was taken. Well, this telegram states two things; it states that Mr. Adams has been instructed, and it refers to "Begg's office for boundaries." So that the department in Wellington was familiar with all the bearings of the subject—no doubt by information from Uncle John to Nephew John in Wellington. Well, in connection with this matter, it has been explained that this telegram was sent to Mr. Adams so as to save time and expense, because he was in the same part of the district, inspecting another property called "the Comical Hills." But, as it turns out, this property was not properly the subject of any inquiry under the Land for Settlements Act, because the proprietor only desired to exchange it for other Crown lands—a proceeding which was not authorised at the time and has not been since by any legislation—so that it may be said Mr. Adams was inspecting a property that could not be acquired, but which was fortunately near to Pomahaka which could be acquired and was apparently intended to be acquired. We find, then, that Mr. Adams, accompanied by the Land Ranger, inspected this property; but they were so pressed for time that they were only two hours on it. Pomahaka is a large property—over seven thousand acres in extent—and upon it the scenery is very varied, if one can judge from the fact that, besides possessing all the charms so glowingly touched on in the petition, it has also a coal-mine which has been burning for the last thirty years. A two hours' inspection consequently could only give an approximate estimate. Mr. Adams, referring to the inspection by the Ranger and himself, says, "I do not suppose that the land will be bought on our valuation, as I see that clause 3 of the Act provides for a Land Purchase Board." So it is quite clear that so far there was no real valuation of the property at all. The 30th September was a busy day in connection with this matter. First of all Mr. Barron wires "urgent" to Mr. Maitland in Dunedin for the valuation by Mr. Adams. Mr. Maitland replies from Dunedin, giving the approximate valuation. Mr. Smith, the Surveyor-General, in Wellington, minutes that if the report be favourable the matter is to proceed. Then we come to the 4th October. That is an exciting day. The Minister advises the issue of a warrant under the Act. The Commissioner of Taxes, Mr. Crombie,—in reply no doubt to an inquiry by Mr. Smith, who was on that date at the Cheviot,—recommends Mr. Dallas as the valuer. On the same day Mr. Smith wires to Mr. Maitland in Dunedin to employ Mr. Dallas, and on the same day Mr. Maitland directs Mr. Dallas, at Balclutha, to proceed. "Who is this Mr. Dallas?" may be naturally asked at this stage. Well, Mr. Dallas is a gentleman who a year or two before had valued Pomahaka for land-tax purposes at £2 2s. 6d. an acre, and may be said to have known something about it. On the next day, the 5th September, Mr. Smith telegraphs to Mr. Barron asking whether the Pomahaka matter has been referred to the Board. It is observable that every precaution in the way of saving time was taken in advance. Mr. Smith had already left Wellington, and was hastening on from Cheviot or Christchurch, or wherever he was, to attend a meeting in Dunedin of the Board to decide on the purchase, or, rather, to recommend it. However, this is only another example of the zeal which actuated those officers hurrying hither and thither, and led them to anticipate the slower movements of the heavier bodies in Wellington, for we know now that it was not until two days after the meeting was arranged that the warrant for the Board to meet was issued. It was not until the 6th the Governor directs the Board to inquire. On the 7th Mr. Smith sends a wire to Mr. Maitland, asking if Dallas was instructed. Mr. Maitland replies that he has been, and also wires Mr. Dallas "Very urgent" to bring in the plan by a particular day, yet doubts if he will be ready in time. They little knew Dallas! He was the man for an emergency. Having passed Sunday on the Burning Plains, he was in Dunedin by Monday night, and on Tuesday morning was writing out his report in the Board-room, giving his valuation at £2 10s. an acre. On the same day the Board sat, and resolved next day to recommend the purchase at Mr. Dallas's valuation. Amid such haste it is not strange that one or two things were overlooked. First of all, the Act requires that the land shall be such as can be cut up in areas of 320 acres or less; but the reports—all of them—are otherwise. It also requires that there shall be a demand in the district for such land; but there is no evidence of that. The petition might have indicated it, but Mr. Smith says the Board knew nothing about the petition. Mr. Smith is back in Wellington by the 25th September, and lays the recommendation of the Board before the Minister, and the purchase is promptly concluded, as already indicated. Then the election takes place, after, of course, the money is paid. On the 20th of February, 1894, the land is thrown open for selection, but unfortunately, little more than half of it is taken up. Since then some more selections have been made—a couple of them by ladies who appear to be absentees. But the Minister is still hopeful that the land so bought will be all settled. Let us hope so, if only to crown the zeal of those who so fill the third picture with life and movement. Looking at the triptych in its completeness it is a matter of some little embarrassment which of those three pictures most to admire—the masterly inactivity of the Minister, the more than masterful activity of the officials, or the self-sacrifice of the patrician. There is the choice, which others shall determine. I am not going to say that the report of the Committee is either right or wrong, or who drew it up, though I must compliment the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds, if it were he, on his style and literary finish, which are so very like those of the learned gentleman who appeared as counsel for the Minister before the Committee. If the honourable member was the author of the report he submitted to the Committee and which they adopted, I can only congratulate him upon having so successfully imitated so excellent a model.

Mr. ALLEN.—Sir, I think it hardly fair that the Minister should be called on to reply immediately after the speech of the honourable member for Patea, because I feel quite sure that after that honourable gentleman's description of the middle picture the Minister would like to have time to collect his thoughts; and so I shall say a few words on this Pomahaka purchase. First of all I should like to refer to the inquiry itself, and the body before which the inquiry took place. We know now pretty well by experience what an inquiry before a Committee set up on party lines is. We have now had many years' experience of what Parliamentary Committee inquiries are, and this is only one of a very long series of inquiries which affect individuals where no justice is given whatever, and resolutions are come to by the Committee not in accordance with the evidence. I am very sorry that a Committee of the House was set up to inquire into this matter. In speaking of the Committee itself, let me say that two of the speakers—one, at any rate—said the blame as regards its cost rests on Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. Now, there is no portion of the evidence which can for a moment show that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie desired the inquiry or asked for it. The Committee was set up by the Minister himself, and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was asked to attend it; and I should also like to point out that a most unusual course was adopted with regard to the Committee—that, instead of the Committee hearing the evidence and discussing it for themselves, and coming to a resolution from the evidence submitted, this unusual course was adopted: that the Minister, who was a member, absented himself from the Committee, and put in his place counsel to represent him.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—If he did not represent the Minister, whom did he represent?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The department.

Mr. ALLEN.—Oh, no; not the department. Counsel was there to represent the Minister. I happened to be present as a member of the House, and the Minister said he did not intend to remain there, but that Dr. Fitchett would remain to represent him.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman is making a statement that is not correct. I never made such a statement.

Mr. ALLEN.—Well, I will not press the point; it is immaterial whether counsel represented the Minister or the department. The Minister is head of the department, and therefore it may be presumed that, at any rate, he did represent the Minister as well as the other members of the department, and the Minister was the chief person represented. As has been pointed out by the senior member for Wellington City, and by the honourable member for Patea, the counsel practically drew up the report of the Committee. With regard to the question of these Committees of inquiry, there is one fact I wish to draw the attention of the House to, and that is this: that, although the Minister considers it fair to set up a Committee of this kind, ruled really by a majority of his own supporters,—although it is fair for him to set up a Committee to inquire into his own conduct,—on other occasions he does not think fit to set up a similar Committee. I refer particularly to a question which came up in the House some three or four years ago, in reference to an ex-member, Mr. G. F. Richardson. He was accused by the present Minister of Lands—perhaps I am wrong in saying he was accused, but this statement was made by the Minister in regard to certain runs in the South: that Mr. Campbell—who is now dead—set out on his way to Wellington, and on the steamer said that he had practically come up to influence the Minister with regard to setting aside certain runs for sale. Mr. Richardson, whose honour was impugned on that occasion, asked that a Committee of inquiry should be set up, and was willing that the Committee should consist of any members the Minister liked to propose. He apparently did not care whether or not the Committee appointed was all of Government supporters; but when he wanted a fair and proper inquiry it was not granted on that occasion. What I want to ask is, if it is right and fair to set up a Committee to inquire into this particular purchase of Pomahaka and all things connected with it, was it not equally fair to set up an inquiry on behalf of a member of the House who had been a Minister?

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The principal witness was dead.

Mr. ALLEN.—Is that all the honourable gentleman can say in excuse? Was there not sufficient evidence? Had he evidence in his own knowledge that was sufficient to give to a Committee to prove the allegation that he made, or not? If he had not, then I say he ought not to have made the accusation he did in the House. At any rate, nobody can deny that if it was fair in one case to set up a Committee it was still more fair and right that it should be set up in the other case, when the personal honour of an ex-member of the Ministry was concerned; and I cannot understand, except upon political grounds—and, unfortunately, political grounds influence us to a much larger extent than they ought to influence us—why the Committee on that occasion was refused. Refused it was; and I say it was eminently unfair to the Hon. Mr. Richardson that it was refused. Now, with regard to the question of this Committee, it has been blamed by more than one speaker to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie as regards its cost.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. ALLEN.—“Hear, hear,” says the honourable gentleman. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, as I said before, did not demand the Committee; he had nothing to do with it; he only came on its invitation. What he did offer was this: to meet the Minister of Lands upon the public platform on this question; and that offer was declined.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—He never did.

Mr. ALLEN.—Does the Minister say he never did?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No; he never did.

Mr. ALLEN.—You never declined?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I never declined, and he never did.

Mr. ALLEN.—I say that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie asked the Minister of Lands to meet him on the platform at Palmerston, and the Minister did not turn up.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman is making a statement that is not true.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman is saying what is not correct.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Did I rightly understand the honourable member to say that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie challenged the Minister, or that Mr. Richardson challenged him?

Mr. ALLEN.—I say that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie offered to meet the Minister on the platform at Palmerston, and I will accept no statement from the Minister that what I say is untrue. I say it is the absolute fact.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I should know the facts myself, seeing that I was the individual referred to. I did get a telegram from Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, not challenging me to meet him on the platform, but telling me that he intended to be in Palmerston that night, and that I could have the use of the hall if I chose to go there. He made no challenge.

Mr. TANNER.—What would that decide—substituting an excited public meeting for a judicial Committee?

Mr. ALLEN.—The honourable gentleman calls a Committee of the House with seven members of the Government against three or four of the opposite party “a judicial Committee.” Has the honourable gentleman no experience of Committees in this House? He has been here quite long enough, I am sure, to know that, if a Committee of the House with seven Government supporters on it and four Opposition members is set up to inquire into any matter dealing with a Minister, it is absolutely certain to make a particular report, and we know perfectly well, even beforehand, what that report will be. I say that no Committee of this House on a question of this kind is a judicial Committee in any respect whatever. Now with respect to this particular Committee. There are a good many facts in connection with it which, if honourable members read the evidence, would become patent to them. If they had risen to the speech of the honourable member for Patea, and taken in all the details, they would become conversant with this certain fact: that, as regards the administration of this Act dealing with the purchase of private lands, there is, at any rate, this amount of doubt: that any purchase that may be made of private property may be made through undue influence. I do not blame the Minister, I do not say he knows, but it is open to this interpretation that the purchase of private lands under this Act may be subject to undue influence. That it was so in this case I do not mean to state, but I say all the evidence goes to show that you can come to no other conclusion than that the individual who wished to sell the land was very anxious to get rid of it, that he had a mortgage and the money was called up by the mortgagee, and he had only a certain time to pay it in, and if not paid at a certain date the property would be sold up. Under this anxiety, having a friend here—I do not say the friend had any undue influence on the purchase, but certainly the friend had something to do with the negotiations and the starting of them—I say, putting all these facts together, we can come to no other conclusion but that there is an element of doubt as to the value of this particular property for settlement purposes at the price at which it was purchased. Will any honourable member deny that in other cases similar influences may not be brought to bear, and that the Minister, not being familiar with the property nor conversant with the facts, might come to a wrong conclusion? What has Mr. Scobie Mackenzie been accused of? He has been accused of pointing to the Minister as being improperly influenced, and doing a wrong thing with regard to this particular purchase. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie made no accusation, but only pointed out certain things which may happen with regard to the purchase of land; and that such events did take place is borne out by the evidence in this particular case; and, if these things happen in one case, I say they may happen in another. The landowner may take the same course as was taken in this case, in which the owner got up what I think may fairly be described as a bogus petition for the purpose of getting rid of land which he was particularly anxious to get rid of, and which, if he did not get rid of by a certain date, would have been sold by the bank. That points to this: that if that has been done in one case it may be done in a dozen others. Now with regard to this petition. I am not going to dwell upon the facts which have been brought out in the evidence, nor upon the facts which have been adduced by other honourable members in speaking on this question; but there are other facts which I do not think are recorded in the evidence, but of which I know myself personally. This petition was signed by 302 persons, all purporting to be settlers and farmers. What I know for a fact is this: that, although many of those people have signed as settlers, a good many of them cannot be described as settlers in any sense of the word. Honourable members know that paid canvassers were sent round to gather signatures to this petition. Honourable members perhaps do not know this, but I assure them it is a fact, within my own knowledge, that these paid canvassers went to individuals not residing at Pomahaka, but residing in the Township of Balclutha, and asked them to sign the petition. Those asked were indifferent, as many people are, about signing petitions, and they offered to sign it; and I know that in a particular instance they signed their names, and were proceeding to write out the occupation which they followed, when they were stopped by the paid canvassers, and the canvassers told them they must not sign in that way, but must sign themselves "settlers." If that has taken place in one case that I know of,—and this I assert as a fact within my own knowledge,—it may have happened in other cases. Couple that with all the evidence which has been brought forward with regard to the petition—that Mr. Douglas himself started the petition, and that he paid canvassers to get up the petition, that he himself wrote it, and that the canvassers were instructed to make every man sign himself "settler"—what value is there in the petition itself? I want to put one other fact with regard to the petition, and that is this: that, although 302 people signed the petition, and it was represented that they wanted to get upon this land, not one single person who signed the petition is now upon the land. Then, what is the value of the petition? Now let me come to this point: The Minister bases the justification of the purchase upon one thing, and one thing only, and that is the petition.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I did not say I based the whole purchase on the petition.

Mr. ALLEN.—Well, what does the Minister say himself? Perhaps I had better read what the Minister does say. Had Mr. John Ritchie nothing to do with it? That gives me a text for making a few more remarks. Had Mr. John Ritchie nothing to do with it? Does the Minister mean to say that now?

Mr. Allen

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Yes.

Mr. ALLEN.—Do honourable members know who started the whole of the proceedings? Mr. John Ritchie, by going to Mr. Barron and telling him that Mr. Douglas was willing to sell this land to the Government. If Mr. John Ritchie had nothing to do with it, why did he tell Mr. Barron that this land was under offer to the Government? I do not know what was the conversation with Mr. Barron, but I know that the result of the conversation was this: that a telegram was sent to Mr. Adams to visit Pomahaka. What conclusion can we draw from these facts? We are told that Mr. John Ritchie had nothing whatever to do with it. Do honourable members agree with that?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. ALLEN.—There is one honourable member who says, "Yes," and I am very sorry for him. Then he goes on to say, "The petition was signed by 302 settlers, who thought the land should be purchased. Was it his duty, under the circumstances, to tie a piece of red tape round the petition, put it in the pigeon-hole, and never look at it again?" He considered he had a duty to perform to the people, and that he ought not to treat the petitioners with derision, scorn, and contempt, but to see what could be done. But somewhere or other he says that he really based the purchase on this petition.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No. I said the first I knew of it was the petition.

Mr. ALLEN.—Well, I will take up that statement—that the first he knew of it was the petition. Will the honourable member hold by that statement?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Yes.

Mr. ALLEN.—The first he knew of it, according to his own evidence, was not then, but was some ten months before that time. I will quote from the evidence:—

"1. Dr. Fitchett.] Your name is John McKenzie, and you are Minister of Lands?—Yes.

"1A. I want you to tell the Committee briefly what you personally had to do with the Pomahaka purchase: when were you first spoken to about it?—As far as I can recollect the first time I was spoken to about it was about ten months before Mr. Douglas made his offer of the property to the Government."

He has made two statements to the House now. He said the first he knew of it was the petition. Now, when his evidence is brought before him, he admits that it was ten months before that time. What took place between the ten months and the time the petition was presented? That is a blank, so far as the evidence is concerned. Unfortunately it is a blank. The evidence has been destroyed. How is it that what took place between the ten months and the time the petition was presented—how is it that evidence was destroyed?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—There is no evidence.
Mr. ALLEN.—The evidence has been destroyed.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I say there is no such evidence. The honourable gentleman is misrepresenting me.

Mr. ALLEN.—I am not misrepresenting the honourable gentleman. Certain evidence might have disclosed what took place between the ten months when the honourable gentleman first heard about the Pomahaka purchase and the time when the petition came to him. Evidence which may have disclosed the facts with regard to that period has been destroyed.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—There is no evidence.

Mr. ALLEN.—Certain evidence has been destroyed, and very important evidence. Part of the correspondence between Mr. John Douglas and Mr. Ritchie has been destroyed; and what that might have disclosed is of importance in this case. However, I will leave that point now, and simply say it was destroyed. With regard to the value of this property, it was purchased at £2 10s. an acre. We have it in evidence that the settlers will have to pay £3 7s. 6d. The Wairuna Estate was sold in 1881 at £2 2s. per acre, and that was a fenced and improved property. We have it in evidence that values of land have fallen since 1881, and that the value of Pomahaka is only £1 10s. Evidence was given as to the sale of several other properties in the district, tending to show that too large a price was given for Pomahaka: as, for instance, Waipahi, an estate of 5,000 acres, sold at an average of £2 2s. an acre,—fenced, subdivided, cultivated, and near a railway-station. Also, Popotunoa sold at £3 8s. an acre—an estate that “runs right up immediately alongside Clinton, and then right down the railway-line towards the Waiwera Township,” part of which estate was sold as township sections, fenced, improved, roaded, and with a valuable homestead. Now one or two words with regard to the rents. My time is short. If honourable members will look at page 112 of the evidence they will find that Mr. Dallas, in his report about this property, says, “I think the land would be taken up if roads were made to it. The worst feature of this property is its long distance from railway communication.” Further on, he says, when asked the value to let, “2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. per acre, if roads were formed. Only perhaps three or four of the farms would require to be let at 2s. 6d. Average price all over, 3s.” I ask honourable members to note that statement, “if roads were formed.” Then, I ask the House to look at the table on page 117 of the evidence, which gives the rentals to be paid by those who have taken up this land.

11.30. The valuer of this property says were roads formed to it it would be worth from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. per acre, or an average value of 3s. per acre; but, Sir, if honourable members turn to the table on page 117 they will see the rates at which this land was let, and they will find that the lowest price at which any of the land has been let is 3s. per acre, and that it goes as high as 4s. 3d. Now,

I think, on the evidence of this particular valuator on whom the Government rely, this is a property only worth, on the average, 3s. an acre, but we have evidence also that the Government have let the property at not less in any case than 3s. an acre, up to as high as 4s. 3d. Now, I ask honourable members to determine this in their own minds, with the valuation of Mr. Dallas before them regarding the rental: Mr. Dallas valued the property for taxation purposes at £2 2s. 6d., and for settlement purposes at £2 10s., and he puts the rent-value at from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d., and we know now from actual facts that the Government have let the land at from 3s. to 4s. 3d. per acre. I ask, how are those who have taken up the land to possibly pay this rent? I say those who have taken up the land have been grossly deceived. They have agreed to give these prices very likely from want of knowledge, but I am certain the inquiry has disclosed this: that they will be quite unable to pay the rents charged; and the Government valuator has himself admitted that according to his own valuation the rentals these people are paying are excessive.

Mr. HOGG.—The honourable gentleman who has last spoken has adopted, I think, the legal maxim, “Bad case: abuse the other side.”

Mr. ALLEN.—I did not abuse anybody.

Mr. HOGG.—The honourable gentleman has been attributing motives pretty well all round; and, if he has not abused the Minister, he has questioned the action of the Minister and of the officers of his department, and in some of his remarks I think he cast a very severe reflection upon those who conducted this inquiry: I refer to the members of the Waste Lands Committee. Now, as a member of that Committee, I think I can speak on behalf of the other members, and say that they approached the inquiry with the determination to do justice as far as they possibly could to every one concerned. I am not aware that the slightest effort was made to prevent the fullest light being thrown on this transaction: indeed, the very fact that the inquiry cost so much money as it did is due to the circumstance that the members of that Committee made every effort to secure all the witnesses who were suggested as likely to throw the slightest light upon the transaction. They afforded every opportunity to those who made the charges to establish them, and there is no doubt about it charges were made. They may have taken the form of insinuations and innuendoes: they were practically charges. As a matter of fact, charges were levelled in that way both at the Minister and at the officers of his department, and the fullest facilities were offered to those who made these charges, through the Press and from the public platform, to show that they could be supported by evidence. Every witness they suggested was brought to the front. No expense whatever was spared. One after another, individuals who had very little evidence to give were brought up from Otago at their suggestion, simply to prevent their saying that a full and complete inquiry had not been held. It was insinuated before the inquiry took place, and was, I believe, insinuated by the gentleman who is charged in this report with having been the means of putting the country to all the expense that has been incurred—it was stated by him a little before the inquiry took place—that the inquiry would be a farce, that it was going to be held before a one-sided tribunal, and that an injustice would be done. Well, what is the result? We have before us the evidence, in a complete form, published, so that any one can read it: and any person who peruses the evidence will see that the members of the Committee, irrespective of their political opinions, exercised the fullest privilege of questioning, and that the report is based upon an exhaustive investigation. Of course, it is quite competent for honourable members to challenge that report, and it is quite competent for the public outside—for the community generally—to question that report; but I say that the strength of the report lies in the fact that it is, I believe, supported clause by clause by the evidence adduced in this inquiry. The honourable gentleman has referred to this bogus petition—that it was prepared by Mr. Douglas; and he has questioned the way in which the petition was canvassed. I do not for a moment dispute these facts; but how many petitions are got up in almost precisely the same manner! Petitions are often prepared by parties who are more or less interested, and I do not know that Mr. Douglas should be so severely condemned because, in order to dispose of the land, no doubt to the best advantage, as every man would desire to do under the circumstances, he promoted that petition. He does not deny for one moment that he did so. On the contrary, he related fairly the whole story of the process by which it was got up, and admitted that he had employed paid canvassers. All this was admitted in a most frank manner, and I do not see that he can be held up to blame and reprobation. Now, the last speaker also hurled his insinuations against Mr. Ritchie. He wished to know what right Mr. Ritchie had to recommend Mr. Barron to make inquiries regarding this property. Well, I say that, if Mr. Ritchie thought the property could be utilised in the manner proposed under the Land for Settlements Act, it did not matter whether the property belonged to a relative or had previously been under his own management; I say he did perfectly right in speaking to Mr. Barron on the subject. He did not deny it for a moment, and Mr. Barron did not conceal the fact. They were perfectly free and frank, and explained everything that occurred in the way of conversations. Then the honourable gentleman alluded to certain evidence as to correspondence that passed between the Minister of Lands and Mr. Douglas having been destroyed. Now, so far as the Committee were concerned, no such evidence was ever suggested, and where the honourable gentleman gets the information from that there was such evidence I am at a loss to understand. Then, he alluded to the value of the land, and suggested that, because certain well-improved properties have, since that land was purchased, been sold at a low price, comparatively speaking, the purchase made by the Government must be an exceedingly disadvantageous one. But he does not take this into consideration: that it is well known that land in that neighbourhood has been falling in value, nor does he take into consideration the very important fact that, subsequently to the sale of the Pomahaka Estate, so much land in the neighbourhood of that estate was put into the market that the market was simply glutted. That, I believe, accounts for the low price that some of the land has been sold for. I will now turn particularly to the remarks made by the honourable member for Patea, and I will compliment that gentleman on having delivered a speech which, emanating from himself, was of a somewhat unusual character. It was full of humour, and of veiled sarcasm. It was calculated to create a vast amount of merriment. There is not the slightest doubt about it that it was funny throughout. Well, as I listened to this speech I was attracted by one of the illustrations he drew when he mentioned something that belonged to mediæval times. He spoke of a triptych. What kind of an article that is I do not pretend to understand. I suppose from his description it is a picture with three panels, but I must say that his speech, if it did not resemble a triptych, resembles something more ingenious. A triptych is described as something mediæval, but his speech resembles something entirely modern—a trance lecture. I thought in listening to the speech that, though we had the voice of the honourable member for Patea, we had the ideas, the sarcasm, and the rich vein of humour which used to emanate from the gentleman for whom he evidently was holding a brief at the time; and I have not the slightest doubt as to who was the author of that speech. From beginning to end he carefully followed his notes, and I do not think he can conscientiously say I am doing him an injustice when I say that the conclusion is irresistible that he was simply in the position of one of those marionettes that you see manipulated on the knee of a ventriloquist, who makes its head move, its mouth open and shut, while the brain and the words belong to the operator. The honourable member for Patea delivered that speech, but I have the impression that we had the late honourable member for Mount Ida once more amongst us, and that we were listening to his eloquence and to his humour. And, after all, what did the speech amount to? It was, no doubt, a very clever speech; it would have made a very good speech for a "corner man." The honourable gentleman did not for a moment confine himself to the evidence, but travelled a long way behind it. Referring to the presentation of this petition, he said that when the petition was presented to the Hon. the Minister of Lands his consternation was very great to find that the matter of this purchase had been initiated several days before. As a matter of fact, there was no such thing as consternation : on the contrary, when the Minister of Lands received the petition he expressed no surprise at all ; he was not even made aware of the fact, as the evidence shows, that any preliminary inquiry had been made at all ; and, indeed, that is one of the charges which Mr. Scobie Mackenzie makes against the department—that, although Mr. Barron was present when this petition was presented, not the slightest reference was made to any preliminary inquiry having been instituted. Then, Sir, what has the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) to say on this subject ? In the first place, he says that there should have been no inquiry—that it is very unwise that the country should have been put to the expense of this inquiry. No doubt the cost has been heavy. Some £340 has been expended. But, Sir, he surely did not mean that an inquiry of this character was uncalled-for. There were undoubtedly charges of corruption by innuendo and suggestion levelled against a Minister of the Crown. Then, for what purposes and at what time were these charges applied ? We are aware that the charges were made on the very eve of an election, and simply for electioneering purposes. The object was not so much to damage officers of the department as to damage the Minister of Lands amongst his constituents. That was the immediate purpose. That was the reason why this accusation was made. Well, let us see whether corruption was implied or not. With regard to the owner of the Pomahaka Estate, Mr. Douglas, it was asserted that he obtained the assistance of his nephew Mr. Ritchie, the assistance of the Under-Secretary for Lands, and the assistance of the Minister of Lands in disposing of his property on terms that were advantageous to himself, but exceedingly disadvantageous to the colony ; that he managed, through the agency of these individuals, to dispose of property that for many years had been a white elephant, and upon which he was losing money. The implied charge against the Minister of Lands was that he was assisted by certain officers in his department in what amounted to a conspiracy to defraud the colony ; that the conspiracy took place on the eve of the general election, and that the consideration was the political support the Minister was to receive from an influential property-owner and employer of labour. I would ask honourable members if a more serious charge could possibly be levelled against a Minister of the Crown, or against a member of an Assembly like this. It was not merely a charge of corruption against the Minister, but it was a charge of conspiracy against the Minister and the officers of his department. That was what was meant. It may have been direct or indirect ; it matters not whether it was conveyed by insinuations or innuendoes, the charge was one of corruption against a Minister of the Crown and the officers of his department. I say a charge of that kind is bound to be investigated, involving as it did the honour not merely of the Minister, but of the Cabinet. The inquiry, therefore, had to be held. That is my reply to the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). Then, Sir, he goes on to condemn the report. He says that the report is not judicial, and he insinuates that the report is the report of Dr. Fitchett, and not the report of the Committee. He compares the address that was delivered by Dr. Fitchett, and which was printed at the time the report was prepared—he compares certain sentences in that address with other sentences that appeared in that report, and he makes the insinuation that the report was an improper report, not a judicial report, and not a report which should have emanated from the Committee, because, if not prepared by Dr. Fitchett, it had undoubtedly been inspired by him.

Mr. Hogg

Mr. BELL.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HOGG.—But he does not say so. He adopts the tactics followed by the honourable gentleman who says, "Hear, hear," when he gets a witness into the box and proceeds to pillory him. He does not hesitate for a moment to pin him down in a way there is no escaping from. He says, "I am not saying that you were ever in gaol, but it is competent for you to say whether you were or not." Or, in the case of another witness, he says, "I once saw a man hanged whose features very much resembled yours, but I am not going to say he was your brother." That is the method pursued by certain gentlemen. They are trained in this method of hurling pitch right and left, and wherever that pitch is thrown it generally leaves a damaging mark behind it, and that is what the honourable gentleman is doing this evening—throwing pitch in all directions at the officers of the department and the Minister of Lands ; and those who have taken up the same side of the argument have been following his example. But I would remind the honourable gentleman that the pitch generally adheres most closely to the hand that throws it. I should like honourable members who have perused this report, or members who may peruse it, to consider, after reading the evidence, whether the insinuations that were bandied about during the last general election have been sustained. Let us see what the nature of these insinuations is. You will find at the commencement of the report an extract from the speech delivered by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie at Palmerston South, in which he couples with the name of the Hon. Mr. McKenzie the term "political spieler." Of course he says he does not include any Minister amongst the political spieler, just in the same way as some of the honourable gentlemen I have been referring to, when they have pilloried a witness in the box, say, "I do not assert that you have ever been in gaol, but it is competent for you to say whether it is so or not." Then, in another portion of the speech he says, "The owner of this estate is an influential man in this immediate neighbourhood, who employs a number of men, and who may influence a number of votes. His nephew is an officer at the head of one branch of the Minister's department." Now, what are these but insinuations of a serious character. Then he goes on to say, "But a Minister of the Crown may be influenced unconsciously by the pressure of his friends, by the fear of his enemies, by fifty circumstances which have no direct connection with corruption, but which lead in that direction." If that is not a direct charge of corruption I do not know what it is. It is a charge of corruption by innuendo and insinuation. Then, when we come to his address at the termination of the inquiry we find that, in referring to Mr. Ritchie, he says, "Mr. Ritchie was then, and is still, at the head of the Stock Department, appointed there by the Hon. Mr. McKenzie, and in an admirable position to act as medium between Mr. Douglas and the persons with whom he was negotiating."

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is now five minutes to the hour, and I shall leave the chair in three minutes.

Mr. HOGG.—I will draw my remarks now to a close. All I wish to say is this: that the report is based upon the evidence, and that it contains a complete refutation, in my opinion, of the charges levelled against the Minister and the officers of his department, and that the reason why this report is adopted in preference to the one which was cut and dried and submitted to the Committee by the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) was that, while the senior member for Wellington City rightly exonerated the Minister and certain officers of the department, we considered it was necessary to go a little further than that, and say whether we had a right to censure the accuser or not; and the report adopted certainly does censure the accuser.

Debate adjourned.

The House adjourned at four minutes to twelve o'clock p.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Monday, 22nd October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Third Readings
—Major C. Brown—Death of the Hon. Mr. Dignan —Railway Officers—Government Life Insurance Bill—Railways Authorisation Bill—Banking Bill—Railways Authorisation Bill—Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill—Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill—Counties Vehicle-licensing Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill, James Mitchell Trust Bill, Westland County Council Enabling Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Unclaimed Lands Bill, James Mitchell Trust Bill, Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill, Westland County Council Enabling Bill, Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill.

Mr. Hogg

THIRD READINGS.

Unclaimed Lands Bill, Government Life Insurance Bill, Land and Income Assessment Bill, Native Lands Claims and Boundaries Adjustment and Titles Empowering Bill, Native Land Court Certificate Confirmation Bill, Native Land (Validation of Titles) Bill, James Mitchell Trust Bill, Otago Harbour Board Further Empowering Bill, Westland County Council Enabling Bill, Westport-Ngakawau Railway Extension Bill.

MAJOR C. BROWN.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL asked the Attorney-General, On what date was District Judge Kettle's report on the case of Major Brown received by the Under-Secretary for Justice, and was a copy of that report forwarded to Major Brown?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said that on the 26th of December, 1893, and the 6th of January, 1894, Judge Kettle addressed memoranda on the case of Meringa v. Humphries to the Inspector of Police, New Plymouth, calling his attention to the conduct of Mr. Humphries and Major Brown. These memoranda reached the Department of Justice on the 19th of January, 1894. On the 28th of June, 1894, Judge Kettle handed to the Under-Secretary for Justice a memorandum setting forth the facts of the case. This was subsequent to the cancellation of Major Brown's appointments. Copies of these memoranda were not sent to Major Brown; but the Under-Secretary's letter, dated the 20th February, was as follows:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the attention of the Government has been called to the case of Meringa v. Humphries, heard in the District Court at New Plymouth on the 20th December last. It appears from the report of the case that a statutory declaration made by Meringa, and translated and explained to her by you, contained a statement that she had received a sum of £40 as the purchase-money of a certain piece of land, whereas it was well known to all concerned, including yourself, that as a matter of fact she had only received £20. The declaration was therefore false. The Government will be glad to receive any remarks or explanation which you may desire to offer in this matter."

DEATH OF THE HON. MR. DIGNAN.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor notifying a vacancy in the Council in consequence of the death of the Hon. Patrick Dignan.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, it is again my painful duty to have to announce to this Council the death of one of its members. The honourable gentleman who has gone was so well known to every one of us that I do not think I can say anything of him that is not known to every one in this Council. The Hon. Mr. Dignan was a kind friend. As a distinguished member of this House, he was honoured by all, and in every way he commanded the respect of everybody here. I knew him perhaps better than most people, because our friendship was of a very marked and strong character. At this late period of the session, while under ordinary circumstances I would ask the Council to adjourn till to-morrow, I think we shall be paying him every respect by the fact of adjourning. I therefore move, seeing the late period of the session, and the large amount of business that is likely to reach us within the next twenty-four hours, That the Council adjourn to half-past two o'clock p.m.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I rise to second the motion. I simply say that I sincerely regret it is found impossible, at this late period of the session, to pay a higher tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased colleague. I heartily support the motion to adjourn to half-past two. I wish also to say, as I was one of the Ministry who recommended the honourable gentleman to be a member of this Council, that I have taken particular pains to watch his career while amongst us. I can only say that he so conducted himself as to gain the respect of everybody acquainted with him. He has been most loyal in doing what he conceived to be right, perfectly regardless of the opinion of those who might be against him, and even of those persons who were supposed to be of the same opinion as himself. He was a gentleman who may be fairly said to have left not one enemy behind him. His career in the northern province was well known to everybody. My honourable friend alongside me (the Hon. Mr. Swanson) knows perfectly well how respected he was there. In the Provincial Council of that province, as well as in the House of Representatives of the colony, he was a man who might always be absolutely depended on to vote according to his conscience, without the smallest afterthought for himself, or for the differing opinions of those who were associated with him. I can only say that I have never been more sorry in the course of my whole life than I was when I heard of his sudden and unexpected demise. He was here in his place taking part in our discussions only the day before he left, and his terribly sudden death has shocked not only myself but many others; because we hoped that for years, although he was an old man, his life might be prolonged and spared to give us the benefit of his matured experience on many subjects; that he might continue to afford the Council the example, as he certainly did on all occasions, of being perfectly fearless in expressing his own opinions, and absolutely unmoved in anything which he considered to be right. I must say that I could have wished it had been earlier in the session, so that we could have paid full respect, as is our custom, to the memory of a departed colleague. Under present circumstances I am sorry, as it is the wish of the Council to pay what tribute we can to the worth of the deceased gentleman, that it is only possible to adjourn to half-past two o'clock. I therefore second the motion.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—I would merely state that I have had many opportunities of meeting the deceased gentleman, and I was greatly struck by the very faithful way in which he discharged even the smallest of the duties devolving upon him. I have had opportunities of seeing his work on the Public Petitions Committee and of knowing how careful he was in everything to see that justice was done. I may say that I formed a very high opinion of his independent character, impartiality, and conscientiousness.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—Having known my colleague in the province from which we both come, and having been a member with him of the Provincial Council, and also of the House of Representatives, and having had with him the honour of a seat in this Council, I cannot say anything further than what has already been said about him. At one time there were some remarks made in my presence, about him, as to his slow going; and Mr. James T. Boylan, a well-known Provincial Councillor and merchant in Auckland, asked the speaker, "If you were going to die, and had to provide for your widow and family, and consequently to put your property in trust for their benefit, do you know of anybody in the whole circle of your acquaintance on whom you could more perfectly rely to carry out your wishes?" when every one present admitted there was no man more entitled to such confidence and trust than Patrick Dignan.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—I should not like this occasion to pass without saying a word or two, as one having known the late Mr. Dignan from my earliest days, in the Province of Auckland, to bear testimony to his uprightness and gentlemanly conduct. He was one of the pioneers of the colony. He arrived in Auckland in 1840, and had to put up with all the hard work and trials and anxieties incident to settlement in a new country. He fought his way up most thoroughly, and by his independent self-reliance he attained to the highest position it was possible for a citizen to attain to. I knew him personally from my boyhood; and I knew many instances of his kindness and generosity. As most of us are aware, one thing underlying his generosity and kindness was the absence of ostentation. That was a very marked trait in his character. There is no industry in the Auckland Province that I know of in connection with which he has not shown himself an enterprising colonist—no industry with which he was not closely associated. All through, his career, both public and private, was one which those who would enter the political arena would do well to follow closely in his footsteps; and now that the end has come, it can be said, as has been said here to-day by those honourable gentlemen who have known the late Mr. Dignan so many years, that he died with the respect and goodwill of all who were acquainted with his independent character and upright conduct in all relations of life.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—As a member who has not been very long in this Council, I should like to say a few words, and indorse the statements that have been uttered in regard to the deceased gentleman. I was almost a stranger to him when I entered the Council, but I must confess there was nobody I ever met of whom I formed a more favourable impression than I formed of the kindness and conscientiousness of the deceased gentleman. He was a gentleman who was anxious to do what he could for the people. He was of a genuinely kind disposition, and his loss we must all regret. I therefore cordially indorse the sentiments expressed by honourable gentlemen regarding his character, and I express my deep sense of the loss the Council has sustained by his death.

The Council adjourned at twenty-two minutes past eleven o'clock a.m., and resumed at half-past two p.m.

RAILWAY OFFICERS.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had promised his honourable friend Mr. Bolt the other day to reply later on to his question in connection with the railway officers. He had received a memorandum from the Under-Secretary for Public Works, which he would read:—

"I am not aware of any grievances being imposed by clause 4, subsection (3), of the Government Railways Act. The whole of the railway officers are out of the Civil Service now: vide subsection (4) of section 62 of 'The Government Railways Act, 1887'; and section 3 of clause 4 of the Act of this session simply keeps them in the same position. Section 76 of the Act of 1887 preserves such rights as any officers of the Railway Department might have under the Civil Service Acts up to the date of their entering the service of the Commissioners, and subsection 3 of clause (4) of the Act of this session continues this provision in force."

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON said the memorandum did not provide for the point which had been raised in the Council. It seemed to him that the officers in the Railway Department would not get the same provision made to them which officers in the Civil Service would be entitled to.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT said he did not think it was necessary to waste the time of the Council at so late an hour of the session, but he would point out that what had been given to the Council was in direct conflict with what the Attorney-General had promised. It was generally agreed in the Council that there were grievances under which these officers suffered, and the Hon. the Attorney-General had given them to understand that he would see that such grievances should be remedied. He (Mr. Bolt) thought the Attorney-General should get power to give the redress sought, not perhaps this session, but as early as possible in the next.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he could only give the information which had been supplied to him.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON said the honourable gentleman was responsible for saying that he would do his utmost in the direction of getting an amendment made to effect the object sought.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he was not responsible for what was in the Bill; and after careful consideration he had got the information in writing that was asked for, so that there should be no mistake.

Hon. Mr. Bolt

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR was very much disappointed with the departmental reply. He thought the Council expected something more than a departmental reply, as it passed the clause in the Bill with a great deal of misgiving, as the honourable gentleman must be aware. He thought it was very much to be regretted that the Council could not get any information on the point as to whether there was any possibility of injustice being done under the clause that the Council had passed. He hoped the Council would have a guarantee that no injustice would be allowed.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had already stated that.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said the principle of it was to place the Government Insurance Department in such a position that it would not be at a special disadvantage. The power of getting cheap money had placed that institution in a peculiar position. Honourable members would recollect that, in the Insurance Act of 1886, by sections 10 and 11, the investments were somewhat confined to Government securities, and also in the advancement of money on freehold property to only half the value, and the amount to be advanced on any single property was limited to £5,000. Seeing that the legislation of this year might affect the Government Insurance Department, it had been considered desirable that it should not be placed in a worse position than that occupied by the Public Trust Office; and, seeing that the Board was the same as the Public Trust Board, he thought that some little alteration was necessary with a view of getting desirable securities which the Board might think proper. The office was obliged to let securities go where they amounted to over £5,000, and it was proposed to allow it to advance money up to not exceeding £10,000, and to allow three-fourths of the money standing to the credit of the Government Insurance Account to be invested as the Board might think fit on securities up to three-fifths of the value. They had found by experience that they had to reject securities of this kind which had been taken up freely by other institutions, and they thought that, in the interest of the shareholders, they might be able to compete with the other offices under these conditions, and be placed on a fair and reasonable footing with them. He remembered that in 1886, when the Government Life Insurance Act was before the Council, the amount was fixed by the Hon. Mr. McLean, who, seeing that the constitution of the Insurance Department had been altered, and that some mistakes had been made, moved that the amount should be reduced by one-half. He (Sir P. A. Buckley) rather agreed with him on that occasion, but now thought that, considering the alteration which had lately taken place, they might agree to what was proposed in this measure.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE said this was a most important measure in the interests of the Government Insurance Department, as honourable members would see that the department had taken up £1,084,000 of debentures, although the department only had on mortgage £490,000. The Government Insurance tables were calculated on the necessity of earning 4 per cent., and, if it did not get a greater opportunity of earning money on its receipts, he was afraid that, one way or another, they would be seriously injuring the institution they had themselves established. He was of opinion the Government would have done very wisely if they had borrowed a million sterling on the general credit, lifted these debentures which the Government Insurance held, and handed the million sterling to the Government Insurance Department, on condition that it lent the money to settlers on the tables which the Government had approved in the Government Advances to Settlers Act. In this way the Government could avail themselves of machinery already established, policyholders would be protected, and the Government Insurance Department would have good opportunity for the investment of the money. What he wished to draw particular attention to was the fact that in their financing they were in danger of injuring one institution by another. They must take care that one general, broad policy was underlying the operations of these departments, and take exceptional care to protect the interest of the Government Insurance Department, and that would be found to be the more necessary when the cost of taking the business of the Government Insurance Department was allowed for. He did not object to this measure, and thought, in the interests of the country, it should be passed. The three-fifths valuation was on a fair basis. He thought the department should not be hampered by being limited to the half value, and should be allowed to increase its advances.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN did not think it was advisable to take exception to the Bill, and was not going to object to the three-fifths value, as that had been established by the Advances to Settlers Bill, and the machinery established in this Bill would do for the other measure as well. He might say that the life insurance companies which obtained their money from Home and lent their money at half valuation were not competing with the Insurance Department here so far as the half-value was concerned; and he was equally sure that if they raised the amount they could lend in one sum to £10,000 it would be an advisable thing for the Insurance Department to do, in order to show a reasonable profit in the year's transactions. He took an active part in passing the last Bill, and might say he was quite ready to support this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR was much pleased to see this Bill introduced, and was particularly glad to see that the amount of Government securities was to be reduced from one-half to one-fourth. He thought that was only right, in the interests of the shareholders in the Government Life Insurance Department, because they had been getting less interest than they were entitled to. He thought, however, the power to lend might be extended now, and advances made up to £10,000. He thought it would be to the advantage of the department, and through the department to the advantage of the shareholders.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART thought that, seeing the position in which the Government stood in relation to the department, the Council should receive some information as to the advances.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the balance-sheet would be before the Council.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the balance-sheet did not show that. This matter was considered very carefully in 1886, and he thought the limit of one-half was too low. With regard to the increase to £10,000, he thought very great care would have to be exercised in lending out such large sums. He was rather inclined to stretch a point in order to get the Bill through, but the safety of the department lay very much with the valuations which were to be made.

Bill read the second time.

RAILWAYS AUTHORISATION BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said the Bill was necessary to allow the works referred to in the schedule to be carried out. It was necessary to pass a Bill of this character every session before public works could be constructed, and the object of the Bill was simply to enable that to be done.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said he would like to make a few remarks before the question was put to the Council. Some years ago a Select Committee of the Council went over the whole of the railways to be constructed; and there was a report in the Journals of the House showing what was authorised at that time, and what it would cost to complete them to the termini proposed. Since then several railways had been authorised, and these railways were still standing in abeyance. The money voted had not been spent upon them, but was paid for railways not then authorised. It was an injustice to other parts of the colony where railways were authorised that the money voted for them had not been spent upon them. He might quote the Otago Central, and the Catlin's River line. There were several others in the same condition. These moneys had not been spent upon these lines, and they were going on authorising other lines to be constructed. Why did not the Government finish these lines before going on with others?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—That would not be fair to other places.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS held it was not fair to keep railways standing ten years uncompleted, and to spend the funds voted between Wellington and Taranaki. That was the case, because the moneys voted for the railways he had mentioned had been expended between Wellington and Taranaki. With a view to test the question, he would move, That the Bill be read the second time that day three months.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the second time.

BANKING BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, in the earlier part of this session legislation was considered necessary for the purpose of guaranteeing one of our local banks, and we stood on that occasion face to face with a very grave crisis, and it was not without some hesitation and a good deal of anxiety that the Government recommended Parliament to pass legislation which, I am glad to say, the Council thought fit to pass, after very great, although perhaps hurried, deliberation; and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that if this same thing occurred again Parliament would again indorse the action that the Government took on that occasion.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—My honourable friend says "No"; but I think he is singular in that remark, because I am quite sure that if he were again in the responsible position in this House—a position he once held—of Minister of the Crown he would be one of the first to indorse the same view, and to carry out the action this Government have taken, in that fearless way which has always characterized him. I have had some passages with my honourable friend, but, knowing him as I do, I say nobody would have faced the matter more boldly than my honourable friend had he been in the position that the Government occupied, or in which they were placed on that occasion. If honourable members will look at the Bank-note Issue Act of 1893, section 5, they will find this provision:—

"Provided that no Proclamation shall be made unless the Governor in Council is satisfied that as between the bank and its creditors its assets exceed its liabilities by at least the sum of the paid-up capital and the reserved profits."

There would be a great difficulty, in case of a run on the bank, in making the declaration required in the 5th section of the Act, and it is proposed by this Bill to amend it so that the section will read to this effect:—

"Provided that no Proclamation shall be made unless the Governor in Council is satisfied that as between the bank and its creditors its assets exceed its liabilities in the colony and the reserved profits."

It is proposed by the Bill to also amend the 8rd section of the Act, which will read as follows:—

"After the passing of this Act all notes payable on demand, heretofore, or hereafter to be, issued, circulated, or reissued in the colony by any bank under authority of this or any other Act of this colony in that behalf, shall, to the amount of the issue authorised, be a first charge on all the assets and property, including the

Hon. Mr. Reynolds

paid-up capital, uncalled capital, and reserve fund," et cetera.

We have guaranteed one bank to the extent of two millions, and, lest by any accident or any unforeseen circumstances anything might take place which might cause a run on the bank, the Government, after very careful consideration and after a very anxious time, have considered it desirable to introduce this measure for the purpose of preventing any disaster that might possibly arise. I need hardly assure honourable members that this is a subject which has received very earnest attention on the part of the Government, and we have anxiously considered what was the best to be done in the interests of the colony for the purpose of protecting the colony's guarantee, and if this Bill is given effect to it will be a fair and reasonable way of meeting any difficulty which might, but which I hope will not, occur. When moving the second reading of the former Bill I mentioned that the Government would take the first possible opportunity of separating what was known as the Assets Company—the clog on the banking institution—from the bank; but, after considering the matter over and over again, we felt satisfied that we had no power to legislate to effect that separation, on account of the Assets Company being domiciled outside our jurisdiction; but we have obtained the assurance from the creditors of the company that within a very short period it will be placed under colonial control. With that assurance, I therefore ask the Council to read this Bill a second time. I should further refer to another clause in the Bill dealing with the question of amalgamation. My own opinion is that the least said about this so-called amalgamation the better it will be for the institutions concerned, as I am sure that what is said by "the man in the street" will not benefit those institutions, because it might look as if they were afraid of one another. It seems to me that frequent reference to them will be doing a great injury to an institution which is a thoroughly colonial one; and in moving in this matter the Government have no such desire and no wish to depreciate in the slightest degree any of the interests of that institution, which is, I believe, in a very sound condition, but we think it desirable that there should be no amalgamation without the fullest concurrence of Parliament. I have nothing further to say, except to move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I wish to draw the attention of this Council to what seems to me to be quite a new departure, and a departure for which there is no very great precedent. As I understand it, the colony has made a compact with the Bank of New Zealand, to which it has given its guarantee to the extent of two millions sterling, on condition that the colony should have the appointment of the President of the bank and the appointment of the Auditors. I hold that when that Bill was passed these conditions were accepted by the Bank of New Zealand, and that all right of the colony to interfere with the affairs of the Bank of New Zealand ended, and I hold that we have absolutely no right whatever, by legislative enactment, further to infringe upon the privileges of that corporation. But it is not only that. I hold that the introduction of a clause of this kind into a Bill is an admission pro tanto of want of confidence of the Government in its own official recently appointed—namely, the President. If this amalgamation was not desirable in the interests of the New Zealand Bank, the President had the power to veto it, and that was quite sufficient for the purpose of the Government. In regard to the amalgamation which has been so much discussed, I cannot for my life see in what way the Legislature has any right to busy itself about the consideration of that matter. The Bank of New Zealand is managed by very able, shrewd, clear-headed, independent directors, and, if this amalgamation would not prove to the interest of the bank, those directors would never assent to it. Any person who knows them will admit that. If, on the other hand, this amalgamation was likely to prove to the interests of the Bank of New Zealand, by what right is the Legislature to interfere to prevent it? I know of no claim by which this colony has any right to raise any such difficulty. Let us look at the equipoise that exists on the Bank Board. The President is simply the representative of the Government, and he cannot initiate any project on his own motion. The directors are competent to carry all the responsibility given to them by the shareholders. They are competent men, and are perfectly able to take care of the interests of the shareholders, and we should not in any way interfere by legislation. I look upon this Bill merely as the result of the harassing action of certain individuals who have been constantly putting questions on the Order Paper in another place, inquiring what has been done; and I question the good sense of those persons in interfering with the business of this corporation. I object on principle to this gradual encroachment on the rights of others. It is not for me to discuss the advisability of this amalgamation, but, since so much has been said, I am of opinion, as regards the Bank of New Zealand,—I am not its client,—considering its excellent business connection and its guarantee of two millions sterling securing its deposits, if the whole of its assets were swallowed up by its liabilities, that its position is perfectly secure, and that it is bound to earn good money.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—The clause referred to by the Hon. Dr. Grace, which is intended to prevent the Bank of New Zealand from amalgamating with any other bank, has been considered by him apparently as the most important clause in the Bill. For my part, I attach no importance whatever to that clause, and I do not think it is intended to have any importance. What the object may be in introducing it I do not know, but really the gist of this Bill, I am convinced, lies in the 2nd section. I think it would have been a pity if such a very important clause were allowed to pass without a word. The change which is proposed to be introduced by this clause is one of the very highest importance, and I think it is only fair justice to the other banking institutions of the colony that the provisions of this Bill should be declared to be, as the Attorney-General said, intended to apply only to the bank which the Government have guaranteed. As far as we are aware, there is not the slightest necessity for this clause with regard to any other banking institution, and everybody knows that there is no such danger of any harm to any other bank than the Bank of New Zealand, and in that case there may be a necessity for this clause; but it would be unjust to other banking institutions in the colony if this clause were not declared to be intended solely for that institution. The Attorney-General has given us the reason for the introduction of these two clauses—namely, that it would be competent in the case of any banking institution to call upon the Government to put into operation the Act of 1898 relating to the bank-note issue—and he stated it would be impossible, perhaps, for the Government to make the necessary inquiries to satisfy themselves as to the position of the bank being such as to justify the bringing into operation of the provisions of that Act. That is no reason at all, it seems to me; and it is a mere excuse, and can scarcely be dignified by calling it a reason. If this clause is intended merely for the sake of one particular bank, the Government are bound, standing in the position they do towards that bank now—so long as the guarantee of two millions is in force—to make themselves thoroughly informed from time to time as to the exact position of the Government bank. And the reason they are suggesting for the necessity of making a change in the law does not exist. While I think we should recognise that this clause is intended for one particular bank—and there is a necessity for it—on the other hand, when we know that the other banking institutions do not require it, it is unfair to those other banking institutions. Besides, it gives the Government a power which no Government should be intrusted with, as it gives them the power, by mere Order in Council, at any moment, to launch upon the colony a paper currency, the results of which it would be impossible to foresee. The power is one which I, for one, am not prepared to trust to any Government. I look upon section 2 as the very essence of this Bill, and I cannot give my consent to it, and I hope the Council will consider this question before it goes any further. If the Bill gets into Committee I propose to suggest an amendment restricting the operation of the Bill to the one particular bank—the Bank of New Zealand.

Bill read the second and the third time.

RAILWAYS AUTHORISATION BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said he desired to say a few words before the Bill was finally passed. With regard to the Bills on the Order Paper, the Council had not had an opportunity of reading them, and, in passing them without properly considering them, were acting against the interests of the colony. He could very well remember when a Railways Bill caused great interest in that Council, and was discussed from all sides upon its merits; but this Bill had not had any discussion; and it seemed to him, although honourable gentlemen wished to go home,—they had been there for four months, and no doubt desired to get away,—that that was no excuse for their setting aside all judgment and passing Bills without a single word, without a bit of consideration, and without even reading them, but leaving the colony to take the consequences. He confessed that the way the Banking Bill and other Bills had been passed that day was such that he really felt that this session was the worst session he had ever known in respect to the manner in which measures had been rushed through. A crush of work had been rushed upon the Council during the last few hours of the session, and it was absolutely impossible for that Chamber to exercise legitimate criticism in the legislation of the country. Although he would not oppose the Bill going through, he wished to see the Council a little more true to itself, and absolutely refuse to pass Bills at this late stage of the session. If not this session, at any rate, he hoped they would do so next, and refuse to do it, but adjourn and take time. Simply because the other Chamber chose to form itself into a debating society, that was no reason why Bills should be rushed through that Chamber without the least consideration. He thought that such action was not patriotic, and he was quite sure they would have to pay dearly in the future for the action they were taking now.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS quite agreed with the last speaker in the remarks he had made, and he thought the Council was not doing its duty in allowing Bills to pass without members having had sufficient time to enable them to judge of the merits of each measure. If the Council were to do its duty just now it would either decide to go on for a month to give full consideration to these Bills, or else it should throw the responsibility on the Government for not introducing them at an earlier stage, and absolutely refuse to pass them. He might say that, unless the Council exerted its prerogative and had full information on these measures before it, the best way would be to abolish it altogether. He certainly would vote for the abolition of the Council unless the Council performed its duty and considered Bills before they were allowed to pass. He guaranteed that very few honourable members knew anything about the Bills that were brought down that day; and there would be more Bills brought down, because he noticed that there was another Bill on the Order Paper to be introduced that day.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said that they had heard that old story very often. He had been watching events in another place,

Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore

and could tell the Council that it was quite impossible to get the measures more forward. The Council performed its work faithfully and honestly, and he was quite certain that, with the exception of his honourable friend, every member had made himself fully acquainted with the measure under discussion.

Bill read the third time.

LITTLE BARRIER ISLAND PURCHASE BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That the Council go into Committee on this Bill, said he would like to make an explanation in regard to it, because he had promised the Council that he would make inquiries concerning the Bill. He would place before the Council the facts which had come within his knowledge in relation to this matter, and what had transpired in connection with the department. He had a copy of the deed executed by all the alleged owners of this property with the exception of three Natives. One who signed the deed and who objected to receiving this money was the chief agitator in the matter, and was causing no little trouble in consequence of the action he had taken. He regretted to say that another agitator, who had negotiated the sale to the Government, was also an opponent of the measure. He would not refer to this person's name, because it was not desirable to do so. This Little Barrier Island was presumed to have been purchased with other lands about Auckland early in the forties by Mr. Commissioner Clarke, but by some accident or other the island was not proclaimed as a part of the general purchase. After a time the Natives set up a claim to the land, and it was the subject of investigation in the Native Land Court on five different occasions, each decision upsetting the previous one, so that there were five different decisions; and at last the matter reached its present position. This Native, Tenetahi, who was the principal opponent, although he had signed the deed, now objected to the purchase because the whole of the money was not paid to him in order that he might distribute it as he thought proper. He (Sir P. A. Buckley) had a letter which had been sent on behalf of the three principal Natives to Judge Fenton, who negotiated the matter on behalf of the Government in 1891, which was as follows:—

“Auckland, 1st July, 1891.

“To Mr. Fenton.

“FRIEND,—Your letter to me has arrived. You say Hauturu should be sold for £3,000. I have talked with Paratene. He has agreed to that payment; but let that money be given to the hands of Paratene, Rahui, and Tenetahi. It is for us to distribute the money to each man, that we may know that it goes to the great person and to the small person. We do not wish that a lawyer should distribute our money. Our money will be wanted for the lawyer. The reason of the delay about your letter was that I might see Paratene. Having seen him, I write you. Paratene is at Hauturu at present. When you get this letter, let the money (£3,000) be paid this month. This is all.

"By PARATENE.

"RAHUI.

"TENETAHI.

"When you see this letter, speedily write to me, lest Paratene should hasten to return."

Tenetahi, however, now objected to this on the sole ground of having incurred some expenses which might, perhaps, be charged against him out of his own proportion; but the Government had no intention of doing anything of the sort, and he would be paid the amount assessed as his interest. That was the only difficulty about the matter, and with that exception the whole of the Natives who owned this property were willing that it should be sold for defence purposes, for which it was required, and also for the preservation of birds. The Government were prepared to give Tenetahi what was fair, in accordance with the terms of the agreement on behalf of the others, and were faithfully carrying out the agreement. He (Sir P. A. Buckley) had a lot of papers and other documents in connection with the sale, which would show that it was a fair and square bargain.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said the honourable gentleman had given the Council what one might call the departmental report of the transaction, which, no doubt, he had taken in good faith. It was the usual practice for the department to do what they could to protect the revenue. There were a lot of papers in connection with this case, and it was impossible that the honourable gentleman should have mastered the details, and he was influenced by the officers of the department, who wished to protect the Government and save them any trouble. The honourable gentleman had, no doubt, followed the advice tendered by the head of the department, and had made his statements of the case from a departmental point of view, but he had omitted to tell the Council that this man Tenetahi was the chief of the hapu to whom this island was granted after a great amount of litigation. It appeared that this man had exerted himself and had spent a considerable amount of money in retaining the island for the benefit of his hapu and himself. He understood that he had a much larger claim to the island in question through his own interest and that of his wife; but, at any rate, he had expended a great deal of time and money in prosecuting his original claim, and he naturally objected to the whole of this purchase-money, £3,000, being distributed amongst the persons to whom the authorities had granted it, without his having an opportunity of obtaining a refund of what he had spent in litigation for the benefit of his hapu. That being the case, Tenetahi had protested very properly against the payment being made in a manner which he did not contemplate when he executed the conveyance of the property to the Government. He (Mr. Pharazyn) had a letter in his hands from Messrs. Russell and Campbell, solicitors, of Auckland, addressed to Mr. J. B. Campbell, solicitor, in Wellington, requesting that gentleman to act for this Tenetahi and the other Natives mentioned in the Bill, who had not received their money, and in this letter he stated the facts. He began by saying,—

"On Thursday last we wired you as follows: 'Tenetahi, Wi Taiawa, Rahui te Kiri, and Ngapeke wish to be heard by counsel at bar of House against Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill.' Endeavour to stop progress until opportunity given. Full particulars and instructions will reach Wellington Tuesday night. See May's 'Parliamentary Practice,' edition 1859, page 438."

The Bill having been brought down at this late period of the session, Tenetahi and his friends had been unable to obtain what they wished—that was, to be heard at the bar of the House—and therefore they looked to the Council, after a long discussion in another place, to protect their interests. The writer of this letter, the lawyer, said,—

"From the statement you will see that a conveyance was signed by Tenetahi under the circumstances therein mentioned. We understand that the signature by Tenetahi was for long in the Native Lands Office or in the Land Purchase Office considered worthless."

"The subdivision was made without Tenetahi or his family being represented, and he claims that his wife and himself were really entitled to the whole island, or at least the greater part of it. However that may be, it appears to be the fact that she, with Tenetahi and their family, are almost the only Natives who have lived on the island; here they have had their home for about forty years. They have a weatherboard house, and about two hundred acres sown with grass. He has sheep and cattle on the island, and he has made a good deal off it by sale of firewood. Tenetahi maintains that when he agreed to sell, and signed the conveyance, it was on the condition that the £3,000 was to be paid into his hands or, at least, in his presence. Swanson, interpreter, says that, unless all the owners signed within three months, Tenetahi's signature was to be void. Tenetahi says he has a memorandum in writing, which he has gone to the Barrier to get. Tole was acting for the Government in the matter."

"We do not know the date of his signing. It must have been long before the Native Land Court was held at which the interests were defined. The condition upon which Tenetahi signed the conveyance not having been accomplished, it is void."

"Although the interests of other grantees may apparently be the same as those of Tenetahi, and although £300 may be a very fair payment for a tenth to those Natives who never lived on the island, and had no interest in it but a paper one, it is a totally inadequate price for the interests of Tenetahi and his family."

"Neither Rahui te Kiri nor Ngapeke ever agreed to sell their interests; and to pass the proposed Bill would be a confiscation and an act of gross injustice to these persons, and also a breach of the Treaty of Waitangi."

"Insist strongly on this, and the condition made by Tenetahi; also the fact that the family lived there, and that Tenetahi has no other land.

"We intend to prepare a petition to Parliament, to be signed by the Natives aggrieved, but Tenetahi will not be back from the Barrier in time for this mail."

There was a copy of a document which he would refer to as showing the condition under which Tenetahi executed the conveyance, as follows:—

"It is hereby understood that in signing the deed transferring Hauturu to the Queen no money consideration is to be paid to any of the owners until all of them sign the said transfer; and that if all the other said owners consent to Tenetahi receiving the whole of the said sum, £3,000, the same shall be paid to him for distribution amongst all the owners, according to their respective shares.

"H. F. EDGER.

"TENETAHI.

"Auckland, 2nd October, 1891."

With that view of the case it seemed to him (Mr. Pharazyn) exceedingly unfair, seeing that the essential conditions of this conveyance of the island to the Government had not been fulfilled, and that this man and his immediate relations were being dispossessed of their rights by the force of law, for that was really the meaning of the Bill. The recitals in it were either inaccurate or inadequate. Nothing was said of the circumstances under which this conveyance was executed. It was stated in the preamble that this property belonged to certain Natives, and it went on to recite that these people agreed to dispose of the said island to Her Majesty for a sum of £3,000, and that all of them were satisfied with this arrangement except the persons named in the subsection at the bottom of the page. It also said, "And whereas the said Tenetahi, Kino Rewiti, and Wi Taiawa have not received their proportionate shares of such sum, amounting to three hundred pounds, one hundred and fifty pounds, and one hundred pounds respectively." Practically it declared that the sum of £3,000 was to be paid in accordance with the original proposal of the Court between the persons who still objected to convey the property, but the conditions under which the conveyance was executed were not referred to in any way in this Bill. The matter was treated as if there had been no condition at all. This man who originally executed the conveyance thought it ought to be given effect to even if certain Natives interested refused to be parties to it. It might be necessary in such cases, where a conveyance was given by Natives, and one or two of the Natives claiming stood out, to ignore their rights, and either to separate them or compel them to be parties to the transfer. But this was a special case, where Tenetahi had made the conveyance under special circumstances, and under conditions which had not been carried out. If this Act were passed he would be deprived of that right under which he acted when he executed the deed, and those who had benefited by the exertions of this man would be entitled to receive their proportions of the purchase-money, just as if he had had nothing to do with the matter. He (Mr. Pharazyn) thought it was an extremely unfair and unjust proceeding to say that public force should be used to compel a man to do what he did not intend originally to do—to entirely ignore the conditions of the agreement, and simply to treat him as if he made the conveyance without any conditions whatever, and was merely trying to get out of a bad bargain. That was not the case at all. It had been stated that, if his case were not dealt with fairly, Tenetahi would burn down the trees on the island, and render it unfit for what was required. This statement, he believed, was entirely false. He (Mr. Pharazyn) sympathized with the Government in the object they sought, and he thought there would be no difficulty if the Government were a little more liberal, and agreed to pay the Native what he had expended.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had received an assurance from the Minister that this would be done.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN thought it ought to be included in the Bill.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN confessed that he had not sufficient confidence that this would be done, and feared that, in passing this Bill, they were really doing an injustice. It was a Bill brought down within the last few days of the session, and they had not given the Natives an opportunity of being present. It was in the nature of a private Bill; but that had been ignored. They were asked to pass this Bill without any knowledge except that they were dealing with people who asserted that they were being treated unfairly. Even if the Bill were rejected, what harm could be done? Negotiations could be gone on with during the recess, and, if the proposal were made which had been stated by the Minister, the negotiations could be completed. If the Native refused to take what was offered no harm would result in rejecting the Bill, leaving it over until next session for the man to be heard; and then everything would be done that was proper under the circumstances. It would be unbecoming in the Council to assist any one in doing an act of injustice. He begged to move, That the Bill be committed that day three months.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE could not profess to know much about the Little Barrier Island, and still less could he say that he knew anything about the claims of Tenetahi. He noticed, however, that this man's claim amounted to no less than a third of the total sum. He knew enough of the way in which Native business of this kind was carried out, where, unfortunately the Government was concerned: it was not thought at all beneath the honourable position of gentlemen connected with the law to endeavour to extort sums of money from the Government. He knew of a surveyor who some time ago sent forward claims for a survey in a useless part of the country, and charged a sum that was enough to make one's hair stand on end. He did not think this was a claim by Tenetahi or any of the chiefs on the Barrier. It was nothing else than a claim brought forward by Europeans. He therefore thought it much safer to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and, if necessary, to put in a clause giving effect to what the Attorney-General intended to be done, if they could not trust the Government. He objected to passing an Act with unlimited application; because the colony would simply be giving a number of Natives over to the hands of Auckland lawyers, and affording the latter an opportunity of coercing the Government to give what was wanted by way of litigation. It appeared that Tenetahi and the other two Natives were to get a third of the whole amount, and they had agreed to allow these lawyers to keep a portion of the money—a practice with which they were all familiar. He (Sir G. S. Whitmore) was perfectly satisfied with the assurance that had been given that anything in the shape of legitimate litigation expenses would be paid by the Government. As regarded the trouble made over this Bill, and the attempt to set it aside, he might say that he had not been influenced by the document or the remarks of the honourable gentleman; but, knowing as he did how the Maoris were made perfect tools of in many instances for the purpose of getting money—and in this case he knew that they were being made tools of for the purpose of putting money in the way of the legal profession in Auckland—he would take no part in obstructing the Government, if the Government would agree to refund the legitimate expenses which had been incurred by the Native owners. He would therefore support the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS desired to say a few words on this question. The Hon. Mr. McLean, on the last sitting-day, thought that the Native Affairs Committee had not done their duty in regard to this Bill, but had considered it in a perfunctory way, and not given themselves time even to read it through. He begged to assure the honourable gentleman that he had read the Bill through carefully, and was thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances in connection with the Little Barrier, having heard the particulars of the case some eight years ago from Judge Williams, one of the Land Court Judges, who sat to hear the case with Chief Judge Macdonald, and who was exceedingly annoyed to find that their judgment was afterwards set aside by a younger man than himself—namely, Judge Puckey. But the case had been heard and reheard so often that it would be better to trace the history of it from the first. On the 16th July, 1880, Judge Rogan heard the case, and awarded the island to Paora Tuhaere and seventeen others of the Ngatiwhatua Tribe. They were the rightful owners of the island; and he (Mr. Williams) had no hesitation in saying that, as far as Tenetahi was concerned, the whole thing was a swindle from beginning to end. He was a half-caste,—his mother a Ngatiporou,—and he never had any claim. He had done the Ngatiwhatua out of their property, and he was now trying to blackmail the Government. It was in 1880 that Judge Rogan awarded the island to Paora Tuhaere and seventeen others of the Ngatiwhatua Tribe; and in 1881 Tenetahi came on to the scene, and retained Mr. Tole as counsel on his behalf. An order was obtained under "The Special Powers and Contracts Act, 1881," for a rehearing of the case, and Judge Munro was appointed to rehear the case. The judgment showed on the face of it that the case must have been heard in a very perfunctory manner, to say the least, as judgment was given in favour of Tenetahi, his wife and daughter, and two of the Ngatiwai, whereas it appeared at the last rehearing that there were fifteen of the Ngatiwai who should have been grantees. After this judgment was given Paora Tuhaere and others applied for a rehearing, and Chief Judge Macdonald and Judge Williams heard the case. With regard to Judge Williams, he might say that he came to the country in 1823, and was thoroughly up in all the manners and customs of the Maoris, and was a thorough master of the Native language, not only speaking it correctly, but with a refinement peculiar to only a few. He was one who might be said to dot his "i's" and cross his "t's" when he spoke the Native tongue. He was a man of a judicial mind, and he had taken great pains in all cases that he had sat upon, and in no other instance had his judgment been set aside. It was therefore particularly mortifying to him to find that his judgment had been upset on the rehearing of this particular case. It was the third hearing of the case, and he was determined that no stone should be left unturned in order to arrive at as correct a judgment as possible, and he gave his judgment that the island was the property of Te Kawerau and others of the Ngatiwhatua Tribe, including Rahui, daughter of Te Kiri and wife of Tenetahi. Tenetahi had no claim whatever: his father was a European, and his mother a Ngatioporou of the East Cape. That was in the year 1884; and in the year 1886 Tenetahi retained as counsel ex-Judge Fenton, and Judge Puckey was appointed to rehear the case. Now, he was sorry to say anything against Judge Puckey, because he knew him to be a good, amiable man, but he had not a judicial mind, and, as a Judge, often made mistakes. The Council had heard of him in connection with the Ngarara case. That case, older members of the Council would remember, had cost the country a Royal Commission, and the result of the Commission was a reversal of Judge Puckey's decision. This was the third time that he (Mr. Williams) had had to deal with a case in which Judge Puckey had given his decision. The second case was in the Bay of Islands two years ago. There was a half-caste of a certain tribe—and it was a singular thing that in all these cases of which Judge Puckey had made such a mess half-castes were concerned. In this case the half-caste in question put in a document purporting to be a transfer of property from Archdeacon Williams to the Maoris; but they had tampered with this document by altering one letter "i" into an "o," and the document read the reverse of what it was intended to be. This was pointed out to Judge Puckey, but he took no notice of it, and it did not alter his decision, which picked out the eyes of the block, and entirely destroyed the interests of the real owners. Had Mr. Hone Heke been there he would have called his attention to this case, because it was his tribe who had been done out of their interest by this half-caste. The Natives applied for a rehearing, and Chief Judge Smith went to inquire whether there were just grounds for a rehearing, and he expressed himself as satisfied that there were. Judges Barton and Von Stürmer heard the case and reversed the decision of Judge Puckey. And he had no doubt, if a Commission could be appointed to again rehear this case, the decision would be as Judge Williams and Chief Judge Macdonald had decided—namely, that the island was really the property of the Ngatiwhatua Tribe. As it was, he supposed no rehearing could be granted. Tenetahi had jumped the claim, and had got legal possession. His object now was to blackmail the Government. He wanted to raise money, and he had stated that he had expended the sum of £750 in obtaining his title. It would be interesting to know how that money was spent. It appeared that £180 was paid to Mr. Tole, and £100 to ex-Judge Fenton, but how the rest was spent was not stated. Failing to do his co-grantees out of their money, Tenetahi was now endeavouring to blackmail the Government, and he was told that for that purpose Tenetahi's wife and daughter had refrained from signing the deed. He had kept them back in order to corner the Government and to force its hand. He understood there were others behind, pulling the strings, and he gathered from a telegram from Mr. Hone Heke to Mr. Sheridan, before the former became a member of the House, that there were others behind. Mr. Hone Heke was employed by the department to try to negotiate with Tenetahi, and to obtain his signature; and he wired as follows: "Re Little Barrier Island. Many obstacles placed in the way by some clique." Who were the clique he referred to they were left to surmise, but evidently there was some one behind pulling the strings, for the telegram went on to state, "Tenetahi intends to apply survey. His interest out off. He asks £3,000 for his interest." This was after Tenetahi had agreed to sell the island for £3,000. He had signed the deed, and all the signatures had been obtained except Tenetahi's wife's and daughter's, whom he would not allow to sign, in order to corner the Government. He thought the Government were quite right in taking the steps they had done, and he hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN did not rise for the purpose of saying anything on the Bill, for he thought it was a very proper Bill, and after the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn had heard the explanation given he hoped he would see his way to withdraw his amendment and allow the Bill to proceed. He wished to say, with regard to what had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Williams, that he had no desire whatever to hurt the honourable gentleman's feelings in the remarks he had made, because he had not intended to say that the honourable gentleman had neglected to inquire into the Bills mentioned. He had simply referred to the fact that four or five Bills had been brought down, and had been referred to the Native Affairs Committee, which had reported on them in so short a time that it had rather staggered him. They referred to subjects which required careful looking into. He hoped there would be no more trouble about this particular Bill, but that it would be allowed to pass into law. He was perfectly sure the Government had no wish to do anything unjust to the Natives, and he was quite sure they would behave very fairly to those whose interests were concerned. At the same time, the Government should take care to see that it was not being taken advantage of by unscrupulous persons.

Hon. Mr. Williams

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said that, in taking possession of the island for the purposes which had been recommended, he held it was not only advisable but the duty of the Government to carry into effect the result of the many investigations that had taken place in connection with the claimancy since the award was first made to Tenetahi and others. The matter had been before the Native Land Court, and after so much litigation the Natives had no right to say that the sum to be secured to them by the Bill was not the proper amount to be paid to them. As to the amount Tenetahi had spent in previous transactions in connection with the island, it was quite right that amount should be refunded to him. He held in his hand an assurance from the Attorney-General that the amount would be paid. It was absolutely necessary the island should pass into the hands of the Government, but it was even more necessary that justice should be done in the case. The Government had assured the Council that all proper expenses incurred by Tenetahi would be paid to him, and he was quite sure the Government would do justice in the case. He would support the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY asked if, in the event of Tenetahi's costs being refunded by the Government, they could be taxed.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said Yes. He might inform the Council he had received a letter signed by the Minister of Lands, stating that the compromise arrived at in another place on the Little Barrier Island Purchase Bill was to the effect that the Government would appoint the Stipendiary Magistrate to ascertain what Tenetahi had paid in costs, and this amount would be refunded to him. He wished to record this letter amongst the other papers, so that there could be no question about the matter.

Amendment negatived.

Bill committed, reported, and read the third time.

OTAGO HARBOUR BOARD FURTHER EMPOWERING BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed, The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said that this Bill was apparently about to be sent through without attracting much observation. By means of it the harbour dues in Otago Harbour might be increased from a maximum of 8s. a ton to 5s. a ton. He believed that the adoption of a maximum of 5s. a ton would place the Otago Harbour in a very unenviable position as compared with the other harbours of the colony. It had been pointed out by the representatives of the Harbour Board that this increase was necessary to enable them to pay their way and to do their duty; but the way in which the charges of the Otago Harbour Board would compare with the charges made in other places would be as follows: Dunedin would charge 5s. a ton, against Auckland, 2s.; New Plymouth, 2s.; Wellington, 2s.; Lyttelton, 1s. 6d.; Bluff, 1s. 10d. It was manifest that the effect which would be produced by the adoption of the large charge of 5s. might be the very reverse of what was required—that was to say, that, instead of improving the revenue of the Harbour Board by the adoption of this excessive charge, the revenue might become less than it was now. He thought it was a downward step, and regretted it very much indeed, and he regarded it as a step towards the ruin of the harbour. He believed at this late period of the session it was of no use to move the rejection of this measure, but he had made these few remarks in order to enter his protest against the adoption of the rates proposed.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE asked if this was not a local Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said it had been reported from the Local Bills Committee that day as a local Bill.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN quite agreed with what had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Oliver to the effect that the adoption of this charge was very likely to produce exactly the contrary effect to what was hoped by its advocates for the Port of Dunedin. Of course the revenue might be raised by this means, but it was quite clear that the tendency would be to cause goods to be sent to other places, especially the Bluff, where the charge, so he understood, was lower than at Dunedin. It would, no doubt, increase the amount of goods delivered at the Bluff, and cause a very considerable increase in the trade of Invercargill: in fact, the trade that Dunedin lost would be gained by the latter place. Any locality, no doubt, had the right to decide on what was suitable to itself, but it did seem to him that the point he referred to had not been sufficiently considered, and it was, to say the least, unfortunate that this very considerable increase should be proposed.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said he would like to say one word before the question was put. It was necessary to explain that it was not proposed to increase the dues to the full amount allowed in the Bill. The object was to enable the Board to increase the dues, but it was with the object of classifying the goods and of levying classified rates. Under the proposed new classification some goods which were now charged the maximum it was proposed to charge at less rates, and there were only a few classes of goods which were to be rated at the maximum. The matter, he regretted, was serious enough, but it was not quite so serious as the Hon. Mr. Oliver thought.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said this Bill was a local Bill. It had been reported from the Local Bills Committee. When the Bill was first mentioned, it was stated in the House that the Dunedin people felt that it would injure their trade very much, and that they would rise against it and hold meetings, and send petitions to the House urging its rejection. However, there had been no meetings, and no petitions had been received; and, as regarded injuring the town, while the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn spoke of the Bluff, he forgot that in the case of goods landed at the Bluff there was a very heavy freight to pay by rail to Dunedin, which more than equalled the difference in the harbour charges between the two ports of Dunedin and the Bluff. The Hon. Mr. MacGregor had stated that it was not intended to charge the 5s. that was allowed under the Bill; but the people themselves were the best judges of how they should manage their own affairs, and they should be given the power to do so. They simply wished to obtain sufficient money to enable them to carry on the necessary work and business of the harbour. He asked that the Bill be read a second time.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS fully agreed with what had fallen from the Hon. Mr. Oliver. In his opinion this would mean the ruin of the port, because it would prevent traffic from going there, and the Harbour Board would consequently receive a lower revenue than it did at present. There was another thing he wished to mention. He had not much confidence in the management of the Otago Harbour Board, and as long as they had plenty of money at their command and means of raising money they would spend it. If the motion for the second reading went to a division he would certainly vote against the Bill altogether, as it was a great mistake to place such a large power in the hands of the Harbour Board as to allow them to charge 5s. a ton upon goods landed at the port.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said there could be no misconception regarding this Bill, as it had been before the Council from an early part of the session. There had been this peculiarity about the Bill: that it was a general Harbours Bill when introduced, and it contained one special clause which applied solely and entirely to the Otago Harbour Board. That clause had been struck out, to enable the local people to know what was going on. Previously they had asked the Government and that Council to put on a very much higher rate than was to be now imposed.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Unlimited.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said, Yes, it was unlimited, and was in the shape of ad valorem duty, which would have meant in some cases a charge of something like 1,600 per cent. more than the ordinary rate. In the case of drapery alone, it would have meant a charge of 350 per cent. more than the ordinary wharfage would have come to. The Council, however, had absolutely, and very properly, refused to do anything of the kind; but it had been shown, from repeated discussions that had taken place in connection with the Harbour Board—at the Chamber of Commerce and in the public papers—that the very lowest amount of money they could possibly do with would be such as would be raised by allowing the Harbour Board to impose a differential rate, ranging from 1s. to 5s. in the ton; and, very much against their inclination, the Harbours Committee had recommended that this 5s. a ton be allowed as the maximum rate. The Hon. Mr. Oliver had very properly pointed out that this would act most injuriously against the Port of Dunedin and Port Chalmers; but there was no alternative. It had been an important question whether the Council should not refuse altogether to give the Board assistance, and allow them to fall back upon their own resources in order to meet their own liabilities. However, they said No, but would allow the Board to go to the extent of a maximum of 5s., in the hope that they would be able to pull through. For his own part, he was not certain that they would pull through, because he agreed with the Hon. Mr. Oliver in saying that the higher they made their port-charges the less revenue in the end would they receive, as the trade would be diverted to other ports. As the matter affected only the Port of Dunedin, under the circumstances he thought it was only reasonable to allow them to have this concession, which was the very utmost that he felt disposed to grant.

Motion agreed to, and Bill committed, reported, and read the third time.

COUNTIES VEHICLE-LICENSING BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said this was a Bill to amend the Act of 1893 that referred to the licensing of vehicles. That Act extended very largely the powers of certain counties beyond the powers given by the Act of 1886, which authorised counties to license vehicles plying for hire, whether for passengers or goods. Under the Police Offences Act of 1890 it had been held by a Judge that every traction-engine must have two people to look after it, in addition to the regular staff; then it would have one man to look out ahead and one behind. Section 8 of the present Bill repealed that provision in "The Police Offences Act Amendment Act, 1890." He did not expect this Bill to go through without a slight amendment: for instance, he understood that honourable gentlemen would not agree to every spring-cart or buggy having to take out a license, and he fully expected that the Bill would be amended in that direction.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON said the honourable gentleman seemed to treat this

Hon. Mr. Bonar

Bill entirely as a joke, but he could assure him that in different parts of the colony they looked upon it in a different aspect. He had received telegrams from three different persons asking him to oppose the Bill, and certainly on seeing its provisions he could quite understand why they asked him to do so, and also why the Council should be asked not to pass it. The honourable gentleman said that section 8 seemed to have some little utility; but he (Mr. Richardson) could not see why the Council should pass it, because section 9 completely nullified the effect of section 8. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time that day three months.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, while agreeing to some extent with what the Hon. Mr. Richardson had said, wished to see the Bill go into Committee.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS seconded the amendment. He was in another place when the Bill was thrown out, and could not see why it should be introduced in the Council.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said it had come up in another place again by message.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON hoped the amendment would not be carried, and that they would go as far as section 8. Something should be done towards amending the Police Offences Act so far as traction-engines were concerned. The Act now said that traction-engines had to be accompanied by four men, instead of two as had been the custom. He was under the impression that this was what was understood when the Act was passed.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said it seemed to him a perfectly reasonable proposition. If the honourable gentleman looked at the interpretation clause he would see that it provided in subsection (1) that upon the application of any County Council the Governor might declare the Act to be in force in any county—not that governed by the particular County Council which applied for the enforcement of the Act, but any county whatever. It said,—

"The Governor in Council, on the application of the Council of any county, may from time to time declare that the provisions of section two of 'The Counties Vehicle-licensing Act, 1893,' may be exercised by the Council of any county in the colony."

He presumed that that should be the County Council which made the application.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said Yes, but they could alter the clause in Committee.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said then, under section 4, the Governor had to approve of the by-laws, but after he had signified approval of the by-laws there were sixty days given to ratepayers to apply in opposition to the by-laws. He thought that should precede, and not follow; and some slight amendment was required there. Then, in the Bill any vehicle was included, and a man who was the owner of a bicycle, or a buggy, or anything of that kind, would require to take out a license. The object, he presumed, was to prevent the roads from being cut up by heavy vehicles; but the honourable gentleman did not explain the objects of the Bill. Some limit should be fixed as to the class or weight of the vehicles. The honourable member was treating the Bill in rather a jocular way, but he hoped the Council would take it more seriously, and that it would, in spite of these jocularities, amend the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER thought the Bill had been badly conceived and badly drafted, and that the best thing the Council could do was to adopt the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Richardson. The merit of the Bill, if he understood the honourable gentleman in charge of it, seemed to be that there was a possibility of amending it. It was full of absurdities and contradictions, and, unless the Council could spend a day or two over it and have time in Committee to examine it thoroughly, it should not be passed.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY thought the object of the Bill was a very good one, and that it was simply extending the present law to counties not named in the Act of 1893. If honourable members would refer to the Act of 1893 they would see that it was for the purpose of enabling the Councils of the counties named in the Act to levy rates on vehicles to maintain their roads, and the amendment was to give them further revenue. The ordinary revenue from the rates on land was not sufficient to keep the roads in repair, and the object of this Bill was to enable the whole of the counties to get power to levy a tax on all vehicles—not only those of over half a ton, but all vehicles—to assist them to maintain the roads and bridges. There was some slight error in this Bill, because it proposed to extend the Act of 1893—by which the Governor in Council had power to give authority to County Councils to license vehicles—to the whole of the County Councils. That might or might not be good. But then, in the succeeding clause, it took away that power. It said in the first part of the Bill, "You shall have this power," and then, in the latter part of the Bill, "You shall not have the power unless your rateable value is below £2 an acre." In the next proviso it said, "You shall have the power if the rate-payers agree to it." The whole conception of the Bill was very bad. He supposed it was mainly owing to the amendments made in another place; but he thought, if the Bill was sent to a Committee, as the Hon. Mr. Oliver suggested, it would be a very wise procedure, as these defects could then be properly remedied. This legislation affected the whole of the counties, but the requirements of many were entirely different, and it seemed to him desirable that a provision should be made to exempt those that did not require this power.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR said the only redeeming feature of the Bill was the 8th clause, and that was so badly conceived that it could not be passed. The effect of section 8 would be to repeal the section of the Police Offences Act, and that would be very absurd. The rest of the Bill was not only bad in principle, but bad in execution, and the only possible way of dealing with the whole concern was to carry the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Richardson. The Bill was an object-lesson as showing the absurdities and incompleteness of the present system of local government. This was a matter it was impossible for the Legislature to deal with properly, and under any rational system of local government it would be left to the local bodies to deal with. The Bill would be a disgrace to the statute-book in its present shape.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN quite agreed with the honourable gentleman who had just sat down in his opinion regarding the system of local government, which certainly wanted amendment. This Bill was fought out in another place, where there was great excitement, and it was quite clear the country was not in favour of the Bill. Under the circumstances the Council should reject the Bill and accept the amendment proposed. The Bill was absurd in its views and unintelligible in its character; and no one would expect to find such a clause as clause 8 in this Bill, for it belonged to another Bill altogether.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY thought the most valuable clause in the Bill was clause 8. The Counties Act of 1886 gave power to County Councils to license all vehicles plying for hire—that was, for passengers and goods. This Bill was to give power to charge all vehicles whether they plied for hire or not. He admitted that in settled districts the people would object very strongly to every buggy and cart needing to be licensed. Clause 8 was very important. As the law stood at present, traction-engines could not be run, because it was too expensive to run them with four men. A Judge had decided that there should be two men, in addition to the regular staff of a traction-engine, to assist when necessary to allow horses and vehicles to pass. These traction-engines were very necessary, and it would never do to stop them; and he submitted the Council might amend the Bill in Committee even at this late hour. It was a pity the Bill had been brought in in such a shape, but they might give effect to that clause, and also keep in force the power given to the Councils by the Act of 1886. With a little ingenuity his friends might assist in passing a Bill with only a few clauses to meet the difficulty with regard to traction-engines. He admitted that the 9th clause made nonsense of the remainder of the Bill. But it had come up in that shape from the other House. He hoped the Council would allow the Bill to go into Committee, and not throw it out.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question."

AXES, 11.

Buckley	Kelly	Rigg
Feldwick	Kerr	Stewart
Jenkinson	Montgomery	Whyte.
Jennings	Peacock

NOSES, 17.

Acland	Barnicoat	Bonar
Baillie	Bolt	MacGregor

McLean	Reynolds	Walker, L.
Morris	Richardson	Whitmore
Oliver	Swanson	Williams.
Pharazyn	Taiaroa

Majority against, 6.

Word struck out.

Bill ordered to be read the second time that day three months.

The Council rose at a quarter past nine o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 22nd October, 1894.

First Reading—Third Readings—Pomahaka Purchase—Land Drainage Bill—Shipping and Seamen's Bill—Income-tax Bill—Moore, Hepburn, and Robinson—Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock a.m.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Local Bodies' Loans Conversion Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Mining Bill, Mining Districts Land Occupation Bill, Kirikiri Native School Site Bill, Indictable Offences Summary Jurisdiction Bill.

POMAHAKA PURCHASE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON.—Sir, I did not expect to have the opportunity at this late period of speaking on the motion now before the House, but as it has occurred I gladly avail myself of it to express in brief but strong terms my concurrence in the report of the Committee, although those who know the Minister of Lands needed no Committee and no inquiry to feel quite assured that he would come out of any such ordeal with his honour unstained. And he has done so. He, no doubt, makes mistakes and errors, like the rest of us, but the Hon. the Minister will never use his official position to do anything which could possibly reflect on his personal honesty or on the orderly administration of his department. The Minister of Lands began by quoting our Scottish motto, Nemo me impune lacessit; but as some of our friends probably do not quite understand the force of these words I will translate them into the good old Doric, which is, Wha daur meddle wi' me? and those who make a business of misrepresenting and maligning the Minister will find that, true to this motto, he and the friends who are prepared to stand by him can make it a tough job for them to tackle.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am very sorry indeed to stand in the way of the very natural desire of members to get through business; but there are other and greater considerations, too important to be overlooked. I promise, however, not to dwell at greater length on this important question than I can help. I need scarcely say the question of the Pomahaka purchase is one of very great importance, in view of the fact that in 1892 we put legislation on the statute-book giving the Government power to expend £50,000 a year in the purchase of lands for settlement, and that this session we have still further extended their powers in this direction by empowering them to expend within two years something like half a million of money. The two important questions which at once arise in connection with Pomahaka are the honesty and competency of the Minister, and of the officers of the Land Purchase Board. First, let me say that nothing appears in the evidence, as far as I have been able to examine it, which is inconsistent with perfect honesty on the part of the Minister of Lands and the whole of the officers of the department. It is only fair that I should express that opinion at the outset. But the Minister himself would be the first to acknowledge that there are many circumstances in connection with this purchase which would have aroused his own suspicion and keenest criticism if he had been on this side of the House. We have, to begin with, the relationship of Mr. Ritchie, one of the officers of the Minister's department, with Mr. John Douglas. We have also the fact that Mr. Barron, the Under-Secretary to the department, at the instance of Mr. Ritchie was the first to move in this business, while the Minister and the Chairman of the Land Purchase Board, who should both have been conversant with every step taken, really knew nothing whatever about the matter. The Minister himself must admit that it was a most extraordinary thing that the Chairman of the Land Purchase Board and the responsible Minister should have been ignorant of the first steps taken to acquire this estate. And a still more extraordinary thing comes out in the evidence—that even when the petition was presented Mr. Barron did not think it worth his while to inform the Minister of the steps that he had taken without any authority whatever. Then, we have the fraudulent petition which was drafted by Mr. Douglas and his paid agents, and circulated throughout the district surrounding Pomahaka. The public there or elsewhere knew nothing whatever about the trap that was so skillfully laid for them by Mr. Douglas; and can we therefore wonder that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, occupying the position which he once did here, and aspiring to again become a member of this House, felt it to be his duty to call attention to these suspicious circumstances? I feel therefore bound to say, looking at the matter now in the light of all the evidence which has been brought forward, that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie performed an important public service in calling public attention to this matter. He put it on record from the first that he did not attribute any corruption to the Minister of Lands, but that he felt himself bound to place broadly before the public what had come within his knowledge, so that all these suspicious circumstances should be thoroughly sifted. Then, we have the fact that the land was sold at £2 10s. an acre to the Government, although the land-tax value

tion had been fixed at only £2 2s. 6d. We have also the pregnant fact that, taking the average rental derived from the land for over twenty years, and reckoning interest at 5 per cent., we cannot reckon the capital value at more than 17s. 6d. an acre. Yet we have the Government buying this land at £2 10s. Can we, then, wonder at the great suspicion excited throughout the colony as well as in the part of the country more particularly interested—namely, the midland district of Otago? The Minister himself, as I have said, would have been the first to challenge all this had he been on the opposite side of the House, and would have been the first—and rightly so—to demand an investigation. I therefore repeat that this House and the country owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie for the action which he took. I have already said that, as far as I have been able to examine the evidence, I can see nothing in it to warrant me in saying for a moment that the Minister himself, or the officers of the department, have been guilty of any dishonesty; but I feel bound to express my regret that Mr. Ritchie did not at once see the extreme impropriety of touching a matter in which his relative was pecuniarily interested; nor can I also free the Under-Secretary, Mr. Barron, from blame. In the case of both these officers it should at once have occurred to them that all communications should have been made direct from Mr. Douglas to the Land Purchase Board, and then the whole business could have gone through its regular course. I do not wish to say for a moment that either Mr. Ritchie or Mr. Barron had any intention of dishonest action in the matter; but at the same time the course they took is much to be regretted. I now come to the second aspect of the question—namely, the business fitness displayed by the Minister and by the officers of the Land Purchase Board. I regret to say that I differ widely from the report of the Committee on this point. In the first place, it is utterly wrong that the Minister himself should have been in ignorance of the steps that had been taken to value the land until the petition came into his hands. The Lands Department should be conducted in a way which could not very well admit of this having taken place. It is not at all creditable to the business conduct of the department that the Minister should have been allowed to stand in complete ignorance of the negotiations that had been going on until the petition was actually presented to the Minister. The House and the country are entitled to expect substantial results from the special knowledge of the Minister of Lands on questions involving the value and occupation of land. In the case of the Pomahaka purchase, from first to last I have not been able to discover that he has endeavoured in any way to put his knowledge in this direction at the disposal of the colony. The colony has a right to say that he should have paid some personal attention to an important question with which he should have been much more competent to deal than any of the officers of his department. First in order is the officer of the Lands Department who went upon the land and reported upon its value. I refer to the Chief Surveyor of Otago, Mr. Adams; and while referring to him I might include Mr. Hughan, the Crown Lands Ranger. We find that Mr. Adams, accompanied by Mr. Hughan, left Clinton at nine o'clock in the morning, and, having visited the Pomahaka Estate, were back again to lunch at two o'clock. I quote from Mr. Adams's evidence:—

"16. You all went over the estate?—Yes.

"17. For what purpose? How did you proceed?—I may say that the estate is about nine miles long, and on an average about two miles wide. We did not ride much further than to the middle of the estate, and took a bird's-eye view of the north portion of it.

"18. How long were you on the estate?—We left Clinton a little after nine o'clock in the morning, and got back to lunch about two o'clock."

"35. I think you said you did not pretend to make anything in the nature of a valuation on this visit?—That is borne out in the report, if you will permit me to read a paragraph as follows: 'As Mr. Hughan and I had only one day in which to make a hurried inspection of the block, our estimate of its value must only be taken as approximate, and I do not suppose the land will be bought on our valuation, as I see that clause 3 of the Act provides for a Land Purchase Board.'"

"90. Do you consider that all the surveyors who were engaged in the work on the Pomahaka Estate were qualified to value?—Yes.

"91. Do you think that a surveyor just back from Australia was qualified to value New Zealand land?—Surveyors are well qualified to give relative values, but the general values were arrived at by myself with the help of the Crown Lands Commissioner and the opinions of the settlers round about the Pomahaka Estate."

Further on we have an answer by Mr. Douglas to Question 276 by the Committee:—

"276. Did Mr. Adams express any opinion as to value?—He said, 'I do not see why they sent me to value; I am not a judge of land. I am a surveyor, but I am not a valuer of land. I will take good care, however, that they will not be able to do with me as they did with the Cheviot valuers, for I will put it down at the very lowest valuation for rating.'"

Now, here we have Mr. Adams, the 12.0. Chief Surveyor of Otago, sent to value and report upon the land, and considerable stress laid upon that valuation by the Surveyor-General; yet we have Mr. Adams himself admitting, as I have just quoted, that he is not a valuer of land—that he did not suppose any weight was to be placed on his valuation of land—and at the same time claiming that an ordinary surveyor is a properly-qualified valuer. And this is the manner in which we have been expending £50,000 a year for the last two years, and in which we now propose to expend half a million of money within the next three years.

Mr. MILLS.—If he erred at all, he erred on the right side.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Then, I come to the evidence of Mr. Maitland, the Crown Lands Commissioner of Otago, and to his extraordinary ideas of how to value land. Questions 169, 170, and 171, put by Mr. Hogg to Mr. Maitland, are as follow:—

"169. Having had Mr. Adams's report before you that this land was in the occupation of the New Zealand and Australian Land Company, did you ascertain under what terms the company was occupying it?—No.

"170. Did you not consider it your duty to ascertain on what conditions it was leased to the company?—No.

"171. But did you not think it right to ascertain what rent the company paid for the land?—No."

Mr. Maitland, the Crown Lands Commissioner for Otago, occupied the most important position on the Land Purchase Board because of his local knowledge, and yet he did not think it necessary to put the questions above all others the most important—namely, as to the carrying capacity of the land and the previous rental paid for it. And this is the Land Purchase Board, whose competency to discharge the onerous duties thrown upon it by the colony is certified by the report of the Committee, which took all this voluminous evidence. Then, Sir, I come to the evidence of Mr. Smith, Surveyor-General. On page 6 occurs the following question:—

"28. Do you not think he should have a knowledge of it, seeing that you are to be guided by him in the purchase of this block? If that land had been let for a series of years at such a rental as would return 10s. to 15s. on the capital value, ought not that fact to have been submitted to you by the valuer? Was it not important in determining the value?—Well, I must go back to my former answer again—that it depends entirely on the circumstances of the lease.

"29. It is not my fault if you keep the Committee. I want a plain answer?—I trust I am giving one.

"30. You are evading the point. If this land was being let at 10s. to 15s. on the capital value for a series of years up to the date of the purchase, do you not think that that fact ought to have come within your knowledge before purchasing?—I will answer you directly. I think the Board should have had the necessary information if it could get it, and if it existed."

We have thus the specific testimony of the Crown Lands Commissioner and the Chairman of the Land Purchase Board that they did not think it worth while to inquire what stock the land carried, nor what rental had been paid for the Pomahaka Estate since it came into the possession of Mr. John Douglas over twenty years ago. Sir, no comment of mine is necessary upon such a lamentable state of affairs. How is it possible that any Land Purchase Board could come to any sound conclusion, conducting their business in such an extraordinary way as that? The only contention that can be set up for £2 10s. as a fair value is that Mr. Dallas, the valuer employed by the Land Purchase Board, was of that opinion. Now, would the Hon. the Minister of Lands invest his own money on such a slender foundation? I am sure he would do nothing of the sort. And yet in this valuation of Pomahaka the colony has had to rely upon the judgment of this one man, Mr. Dallas. And, if I had the necessary time, I could show by the evidence that Mr. Dallas's answers to the question as to whether or not he had ascertained the stock-carrying capacity of Pomahaka are just the same as those I have quoted from the evidence of the other witnesses. Can it therefore be wondered at that, in the opinion of the most competent and impartial men who know the land, the colony has overpaid by something like from 60 to 65 per cent. for it? Sir, having happened to be down in Otago in February last, I made it my duty to make the most careful inquiries as to the opinion of competent men in regard to this purchase, and in no case was I able to obtain a valuation of more than £1 10s. an acre. That is as nearly as may be the same valuation as was given by Mr. Stevenson, the late manager of an adjoining property; and it is most significant indeed that the Union Bank, which held a mortgage for £8,000 over the property, determined not to continue the advance, and that Mr. Douglas, despite the most strenuous efforts, was never able to get the advance replaced from any other source. Equally significant is it that he utterly failed to sell the property, and that, although an energetic improving man, he steadily declined to spend a shilling in improving it. I can only therefore indorse the opinion which has been already expressed in the House and outside it, that these unfortunate settlers, who are now condemned to pay a rental upon the capital value of £3 7s. 6d. an acre, will not be able to remain upon their holdings. The Minister of Lands and his department have been made the victims of a fraudulent petition—of fraudulent misrepresentations—and it is a monstrous thing that public money should thus be thrown away, to the enormous loss of the taxpayers of the colony. I feel sure, however, that the Minister of Lands has received a valuable lesson from what has happened, and that in the future he will take every precaution to prevent the recurrence of similar scandals.

Mr. MACKINTOSH.—It is not my intention to detain the House for many minutes, but I must say a few words after the last speaker, because he has not put the matter in a fair light. As a member of the Committee I had every opportunity of observing the manner in which the inquiry was conducted, and I must say that it was conducted impartially. Every opportunity was given to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie to cross-examine the witnesses. All the evidence was taken on oath, as usual, with the utmost care—in fact, sometimes one might have supposed that it was a matter of life and death, so scrupulously was every particle of evidence elicited—and the inquiry was unduly prolonged. Then, the Opposition, although not so fully represented on the Committee as the supporters of the Government, were represented in the exact proportion that they are to the supporters of the Government in this House, and, I am bound to say, as I believe the supporters of the Government are in the colony generally. Five to eleven, I think, is about the proportion of the Opposition members to the Government supporters in this House; and I do not think any one can show, therefore, because there was a majority of Government supporters on that Committee, that anything unfair was done. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was invited to give a list of the witnesses that he wished to be called, and their expenses were to be paid. Witnesses were got here who were supposed to be of immense importance, or, at least, it was suggested by the Otago Daily Times that they would be so. And when officers of the firm of Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co. were got here, at considerable expense and trouble, we found there was nothing startling to be revealed. They were capable business-men, and they gave their evidence in a straightforward manner, and we found it was a mare's nest. The fact is that, beyond the question of Mr. Douglas's conduct in the matter, there was nothing extraordinary at all. The officials gave their evidence before the Committee in a straightforward manner. Fault is found with Mr. Barron because he went out of his way and gave instructions to Mr. Adams, who was on his way to Conical Hills, to also call at Pomahaka, as he was in the immediate vicinity. It was thought that he should have consulted the Minister of Lands in an ordinary matter of that kind; but if he had neglected, when Mr. Douglas was desirous of selling his property, to give instructions to Mr. Adams he would not have been doing his duty. The matter of the value was gone into carefully, and an endeavour was made to show that, because Mr. Douglas had leased this land to the adjoining owners at a small rental, consequently the land was valueless; but we had evidence to show that Mr. Douglas held his land as a "spec." and that he was prepared at any time to sell it. Even if he had given a permanent lease of it it was shown by the evidence that it would fetch 8s. an acre.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. MACKINTOSH.—I say it was stated in the evidence distinctly.

Mr. ALLEN.—Can you point out in the evidence where that is stated?

Mr. MACKINTOSH.—I say it was stated in the evidence distinctly. The honourable gentleman can find it himself; and if it can be leased at 8s. an acre it stands to reason that it is not at all likely that the owner would have leased it at a small rental if it had not been held as a "spec." It was shown that the rental varied. Sometimes it was 1s. 6d. an acre, sometimes more, and sometimes less, and so on. And this is all because it was a short tenure. The weight of the evidence went clearly to show that the land was worth the money that was paid for it. Then, there is a valuer that has not been mentioned by previous speakers at all who valued this property, a gentleman of considerable experience and standing. He valued the land some years before for State purposes—for the property-tax valuation—at £2 2s. 6d. per acre. He valued it later at £2 10s. He is an experienced gentleman, and he accounted for this in a very natural way. It is supposed in giving a valuation for the property-tax or for land-tax that the value shall not be given up to the utmost limit. This gentleman went on to explain that the reason for this was that he did not want his valuation to be challenged, as it was troublesome and expensive to have matters brought before the Reviewers. As to any corruption in connection with the Minister or any officer connected with the department, I could not see it; yet I am sorry to say, after the whole matter had been carefully gone into, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie did not withdraw and say that he had made a mistake, and that there was no evidence to show the corruption he asserted. I never was in favour of this inquiry, Sir, because, no matter whether the inquiry is made or not, the Otago Daily Times, which is a bitter opponent of the honourable gentleman, will have the last word. The Minister of Lands was assailed by the Otago Daily Times, and by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and the party which he represents, in order to keep the Minister out of the House. A deliberate scheme was entered into under which Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was to stand for Waihemo to keep out the Minister of Lands, and I say that was an unwise proceeding both for himself and his party, and I also say that there was a feeling of indignation created throughout the country by the fact of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie standing against the Minister of Lands, who has conducted the Lands Department in a manner satisfactory to the colony and to the House. The simple shepherd from the hills enters this House and accepts a portfolio as Minister of Lands; and I ask, was there ever a Minister of Lands who has managed that department better? Inside this House he has the confidence of the House, and outside of it he has the confidence of the country, and charging him in Palmerston with corruption in connection with this Pomahaka purchase was simply a political move to keep him out of the House. Sir, the people of Waihemo and the people of the colony have vindicated the Minister of Lands, and therefore it was not necessary that a Committee should be appointed, although it was demanded by the Otago Daily Times and by the Minister's bitter enemies, who demanded a searching inquiry. Sir, that searching inquiry has been made, and nothing at all has been proved except the untruthfulness and the unscrupulousness of the attack made upon him. I have weighed the matter most carefully, and had anything been discovered I would not be one to overlook or palliate it in any way. But there was not. And now his enemies are not satisfied, but they make further charges against him, and, as far as they are concerned, they will never be satisfied. I regret that any inquiry has ever been held, because it was making too much of it. Nine-tenths of the people of the colony knew there was nothing in it, and nine-tenths of this House knew there was nothing in it, and after the most searching inquiry it has been proved that there was nothing in it.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, I think—after what we have just heard from the honourable member for Riverton—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Wallace.

Mr. BELL.—I made a mistake, Sir; I mean the honourable member for Wallace—the House will quite understand that there is a desire on the Government side to keep the debate going. I propose, therefore, to conclude my speech with an amendment, in order to give honourable members an opportunity of replying to my honourable friend. I have naturally something to say on the subject, and naturally the House does not want to hear it. Sir, the majority do not want to hear what there is to be said on this question because the majority have made up their minds to do an ungenerous thing, and they want to do it now and get it over. I, however, want to have my say, in order that it may appear that the majority is doing an ungenerous thing, and knows it is doing an ungenerous thing, and to give it time to understand it and to think of it, so that its subsequent regret may be the more poignant. The Minister of Lands has chosen himself to give to this inquiry the character of an investigation into his own conduct. He has endeavoured from the first to throw a cloud over the real facts, which he knew must be damaging, by suggesting that which Mr. Scobie Mackenzie denied—namely, that there was a charge of personal corruption against himself. No one could honestly have regarded the statement which Mr. Scobie Mackenzie made, and was bound to make as a public man, as a charge of corruption. When Mr. Scobie Mackenzie says, “I did not make a charge of corruption,” he means it, though some honourable gentlemen who do not know Mr. Scobie Mackenzie do not understand that when he speaks he speaks the truth; but there are some who cannot appreciate a declaration of that kind. Well, the Minister chooses, in order to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and to disguise the real facts of the matter, to treat it as a matter affecting himself personally, and, so treating it, he takes every precaution to insure a verdict in his favour. He does not appoint a special Committee, but he refers the matter to a Committee comprising six of his own most loyal supporters. I am not quite sure whether he himself is a member of that Committee, but I believe he is. If he is a member of that Committee, of course his influence will have been felt there. He also employs a Crown Law Officer, newly appointed by his own Government, to defend his character. He employs a Crown Law Officer, one of “the right colour,” and instructs that Crown Law Officer to assail his opponent. Now, Sir, that gentleman, Dr. Fitchett, is not now a member of this House, and consequently is not present, and I shall refrain from any attack upon him. But I say this, and I can say it without attacking him: that it must have been exceedingly distasteful to him, unless he has forgotten all the traditions of the profession to which he belongs, to use such language as he did in the concluding part of his address in reference to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I know something about this—what a counsel may do, and what he may not properly do, when holding the position that Dr. Fitchett holds. On that point I am at least as competent to speak as him-

Mr. Mackintosh

12.30. self. I know something of what the tradition of his profession requires, and I say the adjectives which he applied to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie would be objectionable were they not so grotesquely ludicrous. The Minister goes further. He employs his own advocate—the same Crown Law Officer—to draw up the report. I make that statement without any hesitation, partly for the reason suggested by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), that there is no mistaking the language. I know his literary style, and I can compare the report with his speech. I say without hesitation that I have no doubt the Minister employed the Law Officer—his paid officer—to draw up the report to vindicate his character. There has been further evidence of this adduced since the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) spoke. Firstly, Sir, the report presented for the consideration of the Committee was printed, and it could only be printed by order of the Government; and, secondly, the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds, who presented it, when challenged with that fact did not deny it, but suggested, as a convenient retort, that the speech of my honourable friend the member for Patea had been written for him by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie.

Mr. MILLS.—I made no such suggestion with reference to the honourable member for Patea.

Sir R. STOUT.—It was the honourable member for Masterton who suggested that.

Mr. BELL.—Yes; I beg pardon of my honourable friend the member for Waimea-Sounds. He would not go quite so far as the honourable member for Masterton went in that direction. It was very ungrateful of the honourable member for Masterton, after the delightful half-hour we spent in listening to the honourable member for Patea, and enjoying the perfect humour with which he pointed his unanswerable satire, to suggest that the speech was not genuine. However, the point to which I am addressing myself is the Minister's action in this matter. Sir, for the purpose of further proving the judicial character of this investigation, he himself moves in this House the adoption of the report, in order to secure for himself the right of reply. And then a strong effort is made by his supporters to choke the debate. On Saturday afternoon the Premier proposed that the local Bills should be taken, in order that the Minister might speak at half-past seven, and so that the debate on the report should not be taken in the afternoon; and now, to-day, a desperate effort is being made to choke the debate by the supporters of the honourable gentleman, so that

Mr. Scobie Mackenzie may not obtain a fair hearing. That is the effort of the Minister, backed up and nobly supported by a majority of the House. The Minister is to be tried by his own Committee. He has moved his own acquittal, and is himself to sum up, and he thinks by this method he can prevent the supporters of his opponent from having a fair chance of putting the contrary position. Well, this House will be able to tell the world how effectively a member of this Government can engineer a parliamentary investigation to its desired result. I congratulate the honourable gentleman upon the skill he has displayed. I was amused myself to hear the honourable member for Masterton on Saturday night, and the honourable member for Wallace to-day, protesting that this Committee was not biased and that its members were guided by the evidence. Why, Sir, the Committee divided on precise party lines. This House will itself divide on precise party lines: that in itself is a proof that neither the House nor the Committee is competent to come to a determination upon an inquiry of this kind. Not a single man on either side will be swayed by the merits of the case, so it is of no use protesting. I do not deny that if I were on the Committee, and if one of my own party were on trial, I should not be a competent judge. Party ties prevent us from being so; and the proof is in the divisions of the Committee and the division about to be taken here. What the honourable gentleman is now proposing is to record in the Journals of the House what is neither more nor less than a declaration that his Government have a majority in the House of something like twenty. That is all. The result of the inquiry means no more than the ascertainment of the actual Government majority, and is no more relevant to the facts of the inquiry or to the merits of the case than any other report which the Waste Lands Committee brings forward. The stuff in this report is going to be recorded in the Journals; and when another party comes into power it will be erased, and I will tell the House why. It will be erased because it is unjust to an absent man; it will be erased because Mr. Scobie Mackenzie is a gentleman who stands as high in the estimation of this country as any man who has served the colony in Parliament, because he has been an ornament to this House, and will again sit here; and, again, because, when the House does, as it is now about to do, an ungenerous thing, it is prone to regret and repentance. We have seen these censures upon the Journals of the House before, and we know that the Journals of the House are clear of them now. And finally, Sir, the record will be erased because Mr. Scobie Mackenzie has proved his case, and the people of the country will know it, and the House will ultimately say so; because, whatever may be the result of the party division to-day, that is a foregone conclusion. Sir, the facts are there—the facts that have been proved—the price and the value of the land are there, the circumstances are there, the action of the Minister and his satellites is there, and they cannot be effaced. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie has proved his case, and that is the final reason why the erasure of this record from the Journals of the House will be made. The circumstances of this transaction, pregnant as they were with suspicion when first mentioned, glossed over as they are in the report of this Committee, are patent to the colony and to the House. And, Sir, when truth prevails, as it must prevail in the end, unprejudiced minds—and the unprejudiced minds are, after all, decidedly in the majority—will give the only judgment that is possible in the case. And, Sir, with what well-chosen words did the Minister introduce his motion! How graceful were his gestures, how elegant his diction, how judicial his utterance! It was worthy of the honourable gentleman; it was worthy of the man who, in his own elegant and refined language, designated his opponent at the hustings as “the biggest liar in New Zealand”—a compliment indeed when there are so many eminent competitors for the position. And how courteously he referred to Mr. J. M. Ritchie as a man who should be undergoing imprisonment with hard labour!—quite forgetting that, if that were so, he himself has been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty in not prosecuting him. And if his words were true, then he should himself be indicted for compounding a felony. And then, Sir, how generous were his words with regard to Mr. James Smith, and how convincing to every man who had read the evidence his declaration that a witness before the Committee had been guilty of perjury! I am compelled to discount his statements and his charges with regard to Mr. Ritchie and Mr. James Smith, as to which I am ignorant, by what my common-sense informs me was the injustice of his charge against Mr. Brittan. It seems that that witness made a mistake about a date, and corrected it the next morning. I ask the other members of the Committee, do they support the Minister of Lands in that statement with regard to that witness? I appeal to them. How did they like to hear the upright and honourable gentleman who gave that evidence attacked in his absence in this manner by the Minister? I ask the honourable member for Marsden, as the spokesman of the Committee, does he believe that charge to be correct? It is a public scandal that a man occupying the position of the honourable gentleman should so speak with regard to a witness who appeared before the Committee. Sir, all three men were absent, and that, no doubt, was the reason why the Minister of Lands so controlled himself, and refrained from abusing his privilege and license as a member of the House by the use of words which might appear to be offensive to them. I congratulate him upon the choice expressions which he used. Passion might have made an ordinary man even rude; but the honourable gentleman is not an ordinary man, and I admit that he succeeded in delivering himself of some extraordinarily choice expressions. That is his method of defence. Not one word as to the merits, but a series of envenomed, malicious attacks, couched in language such as I will not venture to further describe, against absent persons. And this is the defence of the Government. Well, Sir, oddly enough, he seems to have missed the only point of importance—I will not say he avoided it, but he missed it—and the only point which is of interest to the colony, and which some day will be of interest to the House; and that point is that Mr. John Douglas sailed clean to windward of the honourable gentleman and his department, and foisted upon this colony at an outrageously high price a property which is, as compared with the price charged to the settlers, practically valueless; and, further, that the record of this voyage to windward, which would be of so much interest, the log which would have recorded so many interesting details, has been destroyed, and has therefore disappeared. These facts are of interest. That is the point which I should like the honourable gentleman to direct his attention to. Now, Sir, the value of this land was assessed for the purposes of the land-tax at £2 2s. 6d. an acre, and the Government paid £2 10s. an acre for it, or 7s. 6d. per acre more than its land-tax value, 18 per cent. more than its selling value. The land-tax valuer says that all land is valued for taxing purposes below its selling value. If this is a fact it is new to me. The honourable gentleman will remember that in the case of the Cheviot the land-tax value was £46,000 more than the selling value. Therefore the honourable gentleman should calculate his rental for the Cheviot on something like £350,000. The honourable gentleman cannot get over this fact: The land was valued for land-tax at £2 2s. 6d., and the Government paid £2 10s. Therefore either the Government paid too much, or this gentleman, who has been held up as such a model of integrity, was paying too little for land-tax. One thing or the other. Mr. Douglas, however, protests that he sacrificed his land at £2 10s. He protests that in the interest of the settlement of the country, and so forth, he sacrificed his land. Therefore the land, according to Mr. Douglas, was worth more than the £2 10s. paid—was worth more than £3. And, again, why was it valued for land-tax at £2 2s. 6d.? Mr. Douglas changed his colour, and at the election his new colour was reckoned to be right and warranted fast. This was his virtue; and all virtuous people of the kind in the colony are, according to the declaration of the Premier, and according to the instructions of my honourable friend the Minister of Lands, to have their deserts rewarded. I do not say that the question of Mr. Douglas's vote had anything to do with this matter. I know it had not. But I say that the honourable gentleman, because Mr. Douglas happened to be introduced to him by Mr. Ritchie, because his relations were of a friendly kind, because he thought these people were of "the right colour," abstained from an inquiry, which he would rightly have insisted upon in respect to other landowners. It will be so found in the future. It has been so found in the past. Will honourable gentlemen opposite kindly tell me this—

Mr. Bell

Mr. REEVES.—No.

Mr. BELL.—I was not addressing the honourable gentleman, because he never gives any information worth hearing, either from his seat in the House or outside; but I was asking honourable gentlemen opposite to tell me this: If a Conservative Minister of Lands had so dealt with a Conservative landowner, what would they have said, and in what language would the present Ministers have described the transaction and condemned the Minister? Let him remember what he said about my friend the Hon. Mr. Richardson, the late member for Mataura. Then, let him think what he would have said if Mr. Richardson had now been Minister of Lands, and had been an active participator in this transaction. The price charged to these settlers for the land is £3 7s. 6d. —for tussock lands—now that roads have been provided. I say that great injury is being done to these settlers, because the honourable gentleman thinks it necessary to lead his followers to indorse his ludicrous misstatement that this is a fair price that has been given for the land. The Minister insists that it should be declared not only that he has not been guilty of something which nobody charged him with, but that Mr. Douglas has not got to windward of him; and there is not a member of the Committee who does not know that Mr. Douglas did get to windward of him. The honourable members for Marsden and Masterton, who were on the Committee, who saw Mr. Douglas, and heard him give his evidence, know perfectly well, notwithstanding the report, that that gentleman was all the time well to windward of the Minister. Why was he to windward of the Minister? Because he had a friend at court. There is no disguising the matter. I am not apt to make accusations of a personal character, but it is proved that Mr. Ritchie, who was Mr. Douglas's nephew, first suggested this matter. He was behind every transaction carried on in the Lands Department in respect of this proceeding. He was the moving element in the whole affair, and I know that this was the reason why the matter was hurried on and the purchase completed. Does the honourable gentleman mean to tell us that it was not because Mr. Ritchie was Mr. Douglas's nephew that the matter was completed? Why, the correspondence—every scrap of paper that passed between Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Douglas—has been destroyed. Both men are men of business. But certain scraps have appeared, curiously enough, by reason of the publication by Mr. Douglas of a letter in the Otago Daily Times, and by reason of certain communications that appeared from Messrs. Wright and Stephenson. They show that Mr. Douglas wrote to Mr. Ritchie and asked him to get the Government "to bite"—a nice expression. Was not Mr. Ritchie Mr. Douglas's agent in Wellington? If not, why did Mr. Douglas write to Mr. Ritchie to get the Government "to bite"? He did so, and the letter only appeared by mere accident. But it is part and parcel of a most interesting correspondence. If his memory had been better, and if he had been able to tell the contents of the correspondence, we should have had something most amusing and most interesting. We find Mr. Ritchie telegraphing to Mr. Douglas on the 30th of August—the day when the petition was presented to the Minister—that the matter cannot be settled for a few days. The Minister tells us that the first he heard of this matter was on the 30th of August, when the petition was presented, and it was on the 30th of August that Mr. Ritchie sent this telegram. The two were engaged foisting this property on the colony, and have succeeded in doing so, and the Minister of Lands has to be complimented by the House on the sagacity of one of the officials of his department. My limit of half an hour is approaching, and I am afraid I have not time to touch on many matters which I had desired to enter upon. I propose to move, as an amendment, That all the words after "That" be omitted, and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof: "this House does not concur in the report of the Waste Lands Committee on the subject of the Pomahaka purchase." I say this in conclusion: Mr. Scobie Mackenzie never accused the Minister of corruption. If he had meant to do so, he would have said it straight out. To those who attribute to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie that he is afraid to use the language necessary to express his meaning, I say this: Those who know that gentleman are saying what they know to be untrue; and those who do not know him had better meet him and know him, and then they will join me in characterizing, in language which you, Sir, would prohibit here, the tactics of those who pretend to impugn his courage.

Captain RUSSELL.—I second the amendment. It is a great misfortune for the country and for Parliament that this question has been brought forward before the House in the way it has been. If there has been anything approaching a libellous accusation against the Minister of Lands made outside the House, he has had every opportunity of vindicating his character and confounding his adversary in the law-courts. But, in a House where the Minister has an overwhelming majority—I will say nothing of the composition of the Committee—in a House where he has an overwhelming majority, to bring such a case as this on for discussion, and to make such a speech in the dying hours of the session as he made the other night, replete with the most venomous attacks on gentlemen whose names are quite unconnected with the transaction, seems to me to be bringing the forms and proceedings of Parliament into a position which can only induce contempt in those who read the debate. In the speech of the Minister he did not attempt to justify the report of the Committee, or to explain various points which must strike the most casual observer in considering the question of the purchase. The long document laid before us, consisting of one hundred and twenty-three pages of printed matter, of course no honourable member except those on the Committee has been able to study in its entirety. But the impression conveyed to even the least observant must have been that there were various points alleged in the course of the inquiry which have not been properly dealt with in the report of the Committee, or by the Minister in speaking on the question, or by any honourable member who has addressed the House. Nobody has explained the patent fact that too much money was paid for the property. There has been a little vague declamation on the point, and it has been asserted that too much money was not paid, but there has been no attempt at logical argument put forward to meet the surrounding circumstances, or the statement that purchases, and of far better properties, have been made at infinitely lower prices than that paid by the Crown. Honourable members have endeavoured to approach the subject expressing the greatest interest in, and the greatest belief in, the honour of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I have endeavoured to look at the question from an impartial point of view, but I can arrive at no other conclusion than that the Crown has been induced to pay very considerably more for the property than it should have paid, and that the unfortunate people who took up the land have been induced to promise to pay much more than they will be able to pay when the day of reckoning comes and they have to make a living out

2.30. of the property. There are other points which have not been explained in this House. For instance, how is it that the nephew of the owner was the originator of the purchase? That is a point which has been steadily ignored. I make no imputation; I only ask for an explanation. How is it that a gentleman who is in the Stock Department, and who was in no way connected with the Lands Department, but is the nephew of the vendor, was the originator of the purchase? That is a matter which we have a right to have explained to us. It has not, however, been explained to us by the Minister or by anybody else what his connection with the case was. It would appear to one either that the Minister of Lands was a party to the whole transaction, which I understand was not the case, or, if he was not a party to the whole of the transaction, there can be no doubt about this: that he has been made use of by his department. Ministers are accustomed to boast in a rather inordinate manner that they have all their Under-secretaries and officials in complete submission to their wills. Well, in this case either the Minister did not know what was going on in his department,—which I believe to be the case,—or he himself was a consenting party to the transaction, about which, whatever we may think of its bona fides, we can have no doubt of its imprudence. It has not been explained to this House why documents which were material and of great importance in connection with the inquiry were put into the fire, and why no records of them were kept.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—There were no such documents.

Captain RUSSELL.—It is admitted that there were such documents, and some of them have gone off the departmental file, while other documents relative to the purchase have been deliberately destroyed. I do not venture to make any imputation, but I ask for an explanation of these circumstances—if they are capable of explanation. Let nobody think that by vilifying absent men he is controverting alleged facts. The alleged facts ought to be controverted, or else it must be supposed that they are incontrovertible. Nor have we had any explanation why the purchase by the Minister was synchronous with the pressure by the bank. Surely these are circumstances which in ordinary affairs of life would cause suspicion, and, instead of having unmitigated abuse heaped upon all and sundry who demand inquiry, surely it would be better to deal in a temperate manner with these facts. With the object of being brief, I will ask this question: Why have the report and evidence relative to the purchase of Pomahaka been brought before the House, and why did the Minister move that the report be entered in the Journals of the House? That was not necessary.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—You called for the discussion yourself.

Captain RUSSELL.—It is true I asked the Minister when he was going to bring on the discussion, but that was with a view of insuring the debate we knew the Minister insisted on before the end of the session, and not with the object of having the report of the Committee agreed to. The Minister must know that all these reports are entered in the Journals of the House, and therefore it was not necessary to make this motion unless it was to hang a bitter speech upon it. Until lately, I believe, the reports were entered in the Journals in extenso, but now they are referred to in this way: The name of the report is entered in the Journals, and then is added, "Vide so-and-so," giving reference to the number and page of the Appendix of the House; and so not only the report but the whole of the evidence taken before Select Committees is entered in full, and can be referred to by everybody. Therefore we may properly say that the report of the Committee would have been entered in the Journals without the motion of the Minister. It cannot have been with a desire to enter the report on the Journals that the motion has been made, but for some other reason. Before I go any further it would be as well to draw the attention of the House to what has not yet appeared in Hansard. I will just read to the House, so that it may appear in Hansard, what the actual charge was which was made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie; and members will be able to ask themselves why the Minister, at an expense of probably £300 or £400, caused a parliamentary inquiry to be made, and why he has brought on a debate which will cost the country nearly another £200—why, in all, an expenditure of £500 has been incurred. In reality the whole object has been to defame an absent parliamentary—I think I may call him—hero—a man of much distinction when in this House, and a man whom I am sure the great majority of us hope to see back amongst us. What is the whole charge about which so much has been made, and in regard to which 123 pages of evidence have been printed, and as to which an acrimonious debate has been raised which will be published in Hansard? The statement made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie was made outside this House, and was not a privileged statement. Therefore, if there was anything libellous, scurrilous, or improper in it, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie might have been called upon to prove his assertions in the law-courts of the country. If not, what necessity for the long inquiry? This is what Mr. Scobie Mackenzie said:—

"Let it be clearly understood, I am far from suggesting corruption in connection with my opponent in this contest. I say again that I don't even include him (Hon. Mr. McKenzie) among the political spiliers. I think his intentions are excellent, and that he is doing the best he can for all classes of settlers. But a man with unlimited power is apt to be acted upon unconsciously in all sorts of ways. Take this last Pomahaka purchase, for instance. I believe it to be a downright bad purchase, a much worse one than Cheviot. I only know the land by repute, but it is a cold ungenerous soil. It is purchased on the eve of a general election. The owner of it is an influential man in this immediate neighbourhood. He employs a number of men, and may influence a number of votes. His nephew is head of one branch of the Minister's department. The land has been for sale for many years. I heard it myself offered for sale at the same price, I think, ten years ago. It has been rented for a long time at 6d. per acre rent, which is 5 per cent. on a capital value of 10s. per acre. I believe even at that rent the land was about to be thrown up. Now, all these things may be mere isolated facts; there may be no connection between them at all. But a Minister's mind may be influenced unconsciously by the pressure of his friends, by the fear of his enemies, by fifty circumstances which have no direct connection with corruption, but which lead in that direction."

Surely this is fair comment upon a purchase which was exercising public opinion in the South. Surely it was proper for a candidate who did not believe in the system of uncontrolled purchase by the Crown to use such a purchase as this as an illustration of what he believed to be an injurious way of acquiring property. Is there anything in such a charge as I have read which need have induced the Minister to follow the course which he has taken? Was there anything there which any honourable member in making a hostile speech against an adversary in an election would feel derogated from his own character? The whole of the evidence produced before the Committee, so far as I have been able to read it, points plainly in the direction of proving every assertion made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie on the public platform. If we take the report and go through it we shall find this fact: that Mr. Ritchie,—head of the Stock Department, but unconnected with Lands,—who is the nephew of Mr. Douglas, was the person who first initiated the purchase. I do not say that it is unnatural that a nephew should take an interest in the affairs of his uncle. I believe most thoroughly that Mr. Ritchie was not in a position to compel any action on the part of the Lands Department. Mr. Ritchie was head of the Stock Department, but, so far as I know, had nothing to do with the Lands Department. He acted as an outsider interested in the vendor. As an official, I cannot see that he is very much to blame; but it would have been far better for himself if he had abstained altogether from taking any part in the negotiations; but it is not altogether unnatural that he should have expressed the opinion to his brother officials that it was a desirable thing that the negotiation should be entered into. But the blame in reality passes from his shoulders to those of his superior officer. Any blame that attaches to this affair must attach to the department and the Minister himself, unless the Minister tells us frankly that he knew nothing about the circumstances whatsoever, and holds himself irresponsible for it, which I trust he will not do, because a Minister, it seems to me, has a duty to his department, and, whatever he may say to them in private, it is his duty to uphold the department in public if it is possible. But there is no doubt about it, the question of the purchase was first raised by the nephew of the vendor, and then, as one goes through the report, one sees with what haste—I might say with what indecent haste—this purchase was pressed on; and I ask the House to arrive at this conclusion: that it was done under pressure. The actual dates with reference to it are: On the 17th August Mr. Douglas got notice that unless he paid up a certain sum of money—£8,000—to the Union Bank within fourteen days they would take further proceedings; and on the 21st—that is, four days afterwards; and I say it cannot be a coincidence, you must connect the two matters together—on the 21st, four days subsequently, we find the Lands Department in Wellington taking steps to purchase this land, before even Mr. Douglas had made a formal offer of it to Mr. Maitland, the Chief Commissioner, on the 22nd, five days after pressure by the bank. On the 26th, four days after the offer is made, Mr. Adams and Mr. Douglas and his agent go on the land for the purpose of inspection and valuation. I should like to know whether all purchases are hurried in this extraordinary way.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Some of them are.

Captain RUSSELL.—On the 30th, four days subsequently, Mr. Barron wires to Mr. Adams for the report as to the value of Pomahaka; and on the 30th, the same day, Mr. Adams replies, practically to an order of the department, and sends the report. On the 31st Mr. Maitland wires to Mr. Barron, "Pomahaka valued at £2 10s.," and so on. From the 14th of September, when the Land Board sat, till the 3rd of October the whole business was completed. Now, the Minister, so far as I understand, on the occasion when the petition for the purchase of Pomahaka was presented by the honourable member for Clutha (Mr. T. Mackenzie), was in his office, having the chief adviser of the Lands Department—Mr. Barron—in the office with him, and yet Mr. Barron never hinted to the Minister that he had taken steps, antecedently to the presentation of that petition, to get the land valued for sale, nor did the Minister tell the honourable member for Clutha that he knew anything about it. Then, what must we assume? Either that the Minister did not choose to tell the honourable member for Clutha that he knew about it—that the petition was a mere form, that the department was already prepared to purchase the estate—or, on the other hand, that the principal officer of the Lands Department had humbugged the Minister throughout, so that he knew nothing about the transaction. There is no escape from that dilemma; and it is a most unfortunate position for the country to find, having lately agreed that £250,000 should be expended for the purchase of land, that the department has carried on this business in what may be called "a hole-and-corner way," without the knowledge of the Minister, or else that the Minister now endowed with such large powers of purchase is careless of how the money is spent. Do not think it is merely a question of pounds shillings and pence. Men like myself, who believe that the Government cannot carry on as satisfactorily as individuals the purchase of land, especially compulsorily, have here reason to believe that more than double the value of the land was given by the Minister. We shall have that extravagance going on in the colony in every direction with the £250,000 which the House has unwisely set aside for land-purchase, and so possibly that amount will only buy a hundred thousand pounds' worth of land. We must be precious careful what is done in such matters. Now we come to the question of value; and who was the valuer? The principal valuer was, I understand, a Mr. Dallas, who, if report speaks truly, is a great supporter of the Government. I have not the honour of his acquaintance, but he is placed in official positions, I am assured, whenever the Government has any position to give him; chiefly in small ones, but still showing that he is on the most intimate terms with Ministers. He was the person appointed to value the land. Well, before we go into the valuation of this particular piece, let me tell the House about Mr. Dallas, and the valuations of Mr. Dallas. Some little while ago Mr. Dallas valued a property at £1,780; that very property was subsequently bought by him at a lower rate than the value he had placed upon it; and in due course, after he became the owner, and came to know its value, I am assured on good authority he expressed the opinion that he had given too much for the land, and that he would not have given so much money for it had he known what he was about. Therefore you have to start with the principal valuer—a gentleman who valued a piece of land at so high a rate for local bodies that he himself bought it at a lower rate, and subsequently to the purchase he has stated, though he himself presumably inspected it carefully before he purchased, that in reality he knew so little about it that when he came into occupation of it he found he had given more money for it than it was worth. So much for the capacity of the valuer that the Government placed so much reliance upon in purchasing the property. At any rate, £2 10s. an acre was given for this Pomahaka property, and we have the fact on record that the Union Bank, which had advanced £8,000 on the property, declined to continue the advance, and that the security was offered to the Dunedin Savings-bank, and that the Dunedin Savings-bank refused to take over the security. We have it here in evidence that the Union Bank was dissatisfied with the security, and put pressure on the gentleman to get rid of the estate, giving him only fourteen days to pay them off; and, combining these two facts, I think it is reasonable to suppose that the Dunedin Savings-bank and the Union Bank knew something more of the value of the property than the Minister and the department, which bought it for £18,656. And not only that, but there is the fact that this property was let at 6d. an acre. It is true it has been let at a higher rent at other times; but what does that prove? It only goes to prove that when persons gave 1s. 6d. an acre for it it was not worth 1s. 6d. an acre, or else they would not have given up their leases at that price. At any rate, we have evidence that it was let latterly at 6d. an acre; and that gives a capital value of 10s. an acre for the land. I will just ask members to pay attention once more, upon this question of value, to the fact that the property was purchased at £2 10s. an acre, whilst the Popotunoa and Waipahi Estates, which were adjacent, with a railway through them and roads to them, and, I am given to understand, with the land ploughed and laid down in grass and subdivided with fences, with good houses and buildings, were sold at an average of £2 15s. 3d. That includes the two properties of Popotunoa and Waipahi: £2 15s. 3d. an acre, as against £2 10s. for absolutely naked land in Pomahaka. I am told that this land is slightly better than the Pomahaka land; and yet the Government have valued the land while it is still naked, except for the roads upon it, at £3 7s. 6d. an acre. But mark my words, Sir, the £3 7s. 6d. does not cover by any means the price the settlers who will have to live upon it will pay. They have to fence it, to plough it, to erect houses, yards, and barns upon it, to stock it, and by the time the tenants are upon the estate they will have to expend at the very least £1 2s. 6d. in getting it into such a condition that it will be profitable to plough. That brings the price they will have to pay interest upon to £4 10s. per acre, as against £2 15s. 3d. for the Popotunoa and Waipahi which lie adjacent. If that is the case, there can be no question that it must be a most unfortunate position for the settlers to be in. We have had it in evidence that the adjacent property carried a sheep to the acre and a half, but Mr. Stevenson, I think it was, who rode over the property, reported to the person who employed him that the sheep were in such a poor and wretched condition that they could scarcely get out of his way. If that is the case, fancy the position of the tenant who will have to pay a rental of 5s. an acre for land that is so indifferent that it will only carry a sheep to the acre and a half: in fact, it will not do that, for the sheep were in so poor a condition that they were hardly able to get out of the way of the rider. The true value of the property may be ascertained pretty easily by computing the figures which I will just now mention, and they are these: Even assuming the value put upon the land for local taxation purposes by Mr. Dallas, £2 2s. 6d. an acre, to have been correct—the value put on three years ago—the fall in the value of grain and frozen mutton and wool, to say nothing of the conduct of the Government, has reduced the selling-value of all land by at least 33 per cent. during the last three years; and, if you deduct 33 per cent. from the value placed upon it when Mr. Dallas valued the land for the local bodies under no pressure whatsoever, you will find the value of the land will stand at £1 13s. per acre, or just about the price Mr. Stevenson valued it at—£1 10s. per acre, I think it was. Under the foregoing circumstances, no person can deny that the initiation of the purchase was extremely undesirable. There is no doubt about that. Either the Minister was a party to that initiation or he knew nothing about his department whatsoever. Then we come to the fact that the value placed upon the land was considerably higher than it ought to have been. Then, last of all, we have the fact that the documents which really were the key to the whole position—the correspondence which took place between Mr. Ritchie and his uncle, Mr. Douglas—have been destroyed, so that the country never can know what the facts in connection with the purchase really are. I have endeavoured to cut my remarks as short as I possibly can, but still there is a great deal I should have liked to say.

Captain Russell

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—So have I.

Captain RUSSELL.—I have no doubt the Minister will say a great deal; that is, he will say a great deal in abuse of persons who take a different view from his own. I am bound to believe he will not explain any one circumstance that I ask him to explain. I was invited last night to write my name in a birthday-book, and by chance I opened the book at the birthday of the Hon. John McKenzie, and may he live to have many happy returns of that day; but here I may mention the motto I found opposite his name. It is one of Carlyle's: "Our grand business undoubtedly is not to see what lies dimly at a distance, but to do what lies clearly at hand." What did lie clearly at hand? An election; very close at hand. He was very anxious to score a point in any possible way he could; and I believe, if the election had not been coming on, he would have had a full grasp of his department, and Pomahaka would still have been the property of the patrician, as my honourable friend the member for Patea said—and I should like to compliment him on the extremely splendid speech he made the other night: it would not have been the property of these unfortunate settlers, who cannot but go “bust” if they endeavour to pay their rent to this colony.

8.0. Mr. THOMPSON.—Sir, it was not my intention to say a word on this subject, and I should not have risen had it not been for the bitter and impassioned speech delivered a short time ago by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). Sir, seeing the relationship which exists between that honourable gentleman and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, I think it would have been much better had he remained silent. I am not going to enter into the dispute in this debate which has taken place between Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and the Minister of Lands, but I would just point out this to the House: The position is that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, at the late election contest, made charges against the Minister of Lands which were interpreted by the people of Otago, and by the Press of Otago, to mean corruption. There is no doubt whatever that the public and the Press of Otago interpreted his charges to mean that, and nothing else. Now, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, although this controversy was going on in Otago for some time after the election, never took the trouble to do what I think it was his duty to do, as an honourable man—to disabuse the public mind in the colony of the idea that he had charged the Minister with corruption. He allowed the Press and the people of the colony to remain under that idea until the matter was brought up before a Committee, which was asked for by the Minister in order that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie might be invited to appear and make his charges. His expenses were guaranteed, and he was invited to bring any number of witnesses that he chose to bring up to prove those charges, and their expenses were to be paid, so that every facility was given to have the case thoroughly investigated. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie came up here, and remained here six weeks, during the whole of the inquiry, and he only called two witnesses, though he had the right to call as many as he wished, and after the fullest investigation he failed to prove a single charge against the Minister. I ask, was any man ever given greater latitude on a Committee than was given to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie? It was the desire of the Committee from the commencement to give him every opportunity to prove his case, and yet, after the fullest investigation, he failed to prove a single charge. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) informed the House that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie had spoken the truth, and that he was a gentleman. Well, I am not going to contradict that.

Mr. BELL.—I did not use those words. I stated that he was a gentleman who stood high in the esteem of every one who knew him. I used the word “gentleman” merely as I would in speaking of any gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON.—Well, I have the greatest respect myself for Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, but I say that he failed in his duty to his opponent, the Minister of Lands, by not, immediately the election was over, contradicting the reports which appeared in the Press as to the charges of corruption. I am not going to say much more on that subject, for I do not feel myself called upon, as Chairman of the Committee, to get up and make a party speech. The object I had in view, and that the Committee had in view, was to have a perfectly impartial inquiry, and that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie should have the fullest opportunity of proving his case if he could. That, I maintain, he has failed to do. Neither am I going to express any opinion as to the action of the Land Purchase Board. Whether the Land Purchase Board did their duty is a matter of opinion. Whether they were justified in buying such an estate for small-settlement purposes is a question we may differ upon. Whether or not they paid too much for it is also a matter we may differ upon. But I wish to place on record this: that, so far as this Committee—which has been called a packed Committee—is concerned, the decision of that Committee was quite unanimous in acquitting the Minister of Lands of any blame whatever in this transaction. There was no difference of opinion on that one point, and that is all I wish to say on the matter. I do not wish to enter into this case further than that, and, so far as the Minister of Lands is concerned, he has no reason whatever to feel disappointed with the inquiry, as the Committee unanimously acquitted him of all blame. Beyond that I do not offer any opinion.

Mr. BELL.—I should like to point out that the Minister has charged Mr. Brittan with perjury. Would Mr. Thompson, as Chairman of the Committee, state what he thinks of that?

Mr. THOMPSON.—Well, I think that was a rather rash statement of the Minister's, and I think that in his cooler moments he would not have done so. Mr. Brittan gave evidence on a certain point before the Committee, and found afterwards that he was in error, and on the next day he came back to correct it. As Chairman of the Committee, I should not attribute anything like perjury to that gentleman, and I must say, in justice to him, that he gave his evidence in a perfectly straightforward way.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I think, Sir, I am entitled to a personal explanation, after the personal explanations of the two last speakers. My explanation is this: that this officer of the bank came before the Committee and swore that Mr. Douglas was in Wellington at a date which would imply that he had seen me during the time the land was being purchased. That statement was false, and he did not come back to correct it until after he was told by people outside the House that he had made a mistake.

He then came back and altered his evidence before the Committee.

Mr. COLLINS.—I venture to say that, while there have been many matters of greater importance brought before this House during the session which is now drawing to a close, this House has not been called upon to consider any matter of a more serious character than this, for this matter involves the honour of one of the leaders of this side of the House, and of one who occupies a position as Minister of the Crown. It appears to me to be the duty of every member on this side of the House, if he is competent to do so, to rise and express his deep sense of regret that a matter of this kind should have to be considered at all. Now, what has been stated? It is not for me to cover the charges and statements, which have not been substantiated, but which have been laid at the door of the Minister of Lands. Over and over again honourable members have asserted that no charges were made: and perhaps it is true to say so; perhaps it is quite true that no charges are made. I think it is quite true that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie did not make any charges against the Minister of Lands; but what Mr. Scobie Mackenzie did do was much worse than to make a direct charge. By insinuation, by innuendo, and by statements, or misstatements, he allowed it to go forth that the Minister of Lands had been guilty of corrupt action.

A lie that is all a lie may be met and fought with outright,
But a lie that is half a truth is a harder matter to fight.

Had Mr. Scobie Mackenzie made a downright charge, as other honourable gentlemen have stated, he might have been drawn into the Courts of justice, and the matter settled there instead of on the floor of this House. Then, Sir, we could have understood him. But to make charges, half covert charges, by insinuation and innuendo, leaves no other way open than for the matter to be dealt with by the members of this House. I regard this as a most regrettable matter. As one amongst the new members of this House, I can only say that if there be one Minister in the House who is regarded as the soul of honour and integrity, and up and down straightforwardness, that gentleman is the Minister of Lands. I am perfectly certain that that is the conclusion those honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House must have come to; but while they themselves aver that the honourable gentleman cannot be justly accused of doing anything improper, while every speech made from the Opposition benches has demurred from any direct charges, and from even the colour of supporting the charges which have been made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, has not every one of their speeches been so framed as actually to support the covert charges made? Undoubtedly every speech made by those honourable gentlemen has been framed for the express purpose of giving strong colour to those charges. If there be one member on the other side of the House whom members could regard with a certain amount of sincere respect it is the honourable member for Hawke's Bay; yet what was the concluding sentence of the honourable gentleman? It was that this purchase took place immediately preceding an election, and that, if there had not been an election impending at the time, the purchase would not have taken place. Sir, what does this mean? It means that the Minister of Lands, for party purposes, and as a political bribe, purchased an estate at a price which was not its value. As one who was not a member of the Committee, and who has not had the advantages that members of the Committee have had of going into the whole of the details of this case, I have paid some little attention to this matter, and I must confess, after reading the report, I have experienced very painful feelings at the speeches delivered by the other side of the House. On Saturday evening the House was regaled by an amusing and edifying speech delivered by the honourable member for Patea. But, Sir, I think a serious matter of this kind is scarcely a subject for a jocular speech or an evening's entertainment. It is suggested that the speech with which the honourable member entertained us that evening was made amusing by quotations from the writings of Charles Dickens; but I say, considering the seriousness of the charges that are laid before us, those amusing passages are hardly in keeping. I hold in my hand the printed report which was actually brought down to that Committee by Sir Robert Stout, in the hope that the Committee would adopt it. Now, what does that honourable gentleman say at the conclusion of his report?—

Mr. J. McKensie

"As for Mr. Ritchie's action, we think it our duty to say that, though an officer acting under the Minister of Lands, he had no duty or responsibility in connection with the purchase of estates, and all he did was simply what any outsider might have done.

"Your Committee are unanimously of opinion that no charge of corruption can be made against the Minister of Lands. Whether the system of land-purchase, as disclosed in the evidence, is sufficiently guarded is a wide subject, on which the Committee is not required by the order of reference to express an opinion."

That is the opinion of Sir Robert Stout, a member for Wellington City. But there are many members of this House who are not acquainted with the details of the report, or with the work of that Committee; and I think it is my duty to acquaint those honourable members with the details of the report presented to this House by the Committee. With your permission, Sir, I will read it. It runs as follows:—

"The Committee to whom was referred the inquiry into the whole transactions in connection with the purchase of the Pomahaka Block from Mr. John Douglas under 'The Land for Settlements Act, 1892,' beg to report as follows:—

"The inquiry commenced on the 4th September and closed on the 2nd October, 1894, and the evidence of thirteen witnesses was taken.

"It appears that, when addressing the Wai-hemo electors during the last election, Mr. M. J. Scobie Mackenzie spoke at Palmerston as follows:—

"Let it be clearly understood I am far from suggesting corruption in connection with my opponent in this contest. I say again that I don't even include him (Hon. J. McKenzie) among the political spiliers. I think his intentions are excellent, and that he is doing the best he can for all classes of settlers. But a man with unlimited power is apt to be acted upon unconsciously in all sorts of ways. Take this last Pomahaka purchase, for instance. I believe it to be a downright bad purchase, a much worse one than Cheviot. I only know the land by repute, but it is a cold ungenerous soil. It is purchased on the eve of a general election. The owner of it is an influential man in this immediate neighbourhood. He employs a number of men, and may influence a number of votes. His nephew is head of one branch of the Minister's department. The land has been for sale for many years. I heard it myself offered for sale at the same price, I think, ten years ago. It has been rented for a long time at 6d. per acre rent, which is 5 per cent. on a capital value of 10s. per acre. I believe even at that rent the land was about to be thrown up. Now, all these things may be mere isolated facts; there may be no connection between them at all. But a Minister's mind may be influenced unconsciously by the pressure of his friends, by the fear of his enemies, by fifty circumstances which have no direct connection with corruption, but which lead in that direction. I want you to remember this: It has never been the policy of the English law or custom to invest any individual with unchecked power over his neighbour."

"His opponent, the Hon. J. McKenzie, took these remarks to convey a charge of corruption against himself, and made a public reply at Palmerston. Considerable discussion followed in the Dunedin newspapers, and both Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and the editor of the Otago Daily Times demanded a searching inquiry, on the grounds that the purchase was an improper one and the price absurdly excessive.

"With a view of securing the fullest investigation, the Committee specially invited both these gentlemen to attend the proceedings, and also asked them to name what witnesses they thought should be called, the Committee offering to pay all expenses.

"The editor declined to attend, and said he had no witnesses to name. He had written merely as a public journalist.

"Subsequently, whilst the inquiry was in progress, this gentleman in his leading columns stated that the Committee was only taking such evidence as would suit the Minister and the department, but that the evidence of those who, 'if properly examined,' could tell 'the real story' was not being procured. Thereupon the Committee asked him to name the persons who, as he had said, could tell 'the real story.' In reply, he mentioned Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co., of Dunedin, and the paid agents of Mr. Douglas. The Committee then summoned a member of that firm, and also the paid agents of Mr. Douglas, as named by Mr. M. J. Scobie Mackenzie, and took their evidence.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie attended the proceedings, pursuant to the Committee's request. He was accorded the right of being represented by counsel, which he declined. The Committee also decided that he alone, of all the witnesses, should be constantly present, and that he should have the right to cross-examine. He exercised this right freely, and also called evidence himself and addressed the Committee.

"Dr. Fitchett attended the proceedings, examined witnesses, and addressed the Committee on behalf of the Department of Lands and Survey and the Board of Land Purchase Commissioners, who considered that their integrity was attacked.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, whilst stating that he had made no charges, urged that the evidence showed—

- "(1.) That the estate was purchased at a price far in excess of its value;
- "(2.) That one main factor in effecting the purchase was a petition falsely purporting to come from settlers, but in reality got up by Mr. John Douglas himself, urging the Minister to acquire the land for purposes of settlement;
- "(3.) That, in Mr. Douglas's interest, undue haste was displayed throughout the whole transaction; and
- "(4.) That, in the same interest, the purchase was effected in the face of a recommendation of the Board that preference should be given to another property—the Conical Hills Estate.

"With reference to the first point, Was the price a fair one? the evidence consisted of—(1) Previous sales and subsequent sales of property in the Pomahaka and neighbouring districts; (2) opinion of witnesses; and (3) prices actually paid by settlers for the Pomahaka Estate when thrown open by the Government.

"In 1889, 1,140 acres of the same estate, and not the best part of it, were sold at £3 12s. 6d., and for several hundred acres £3 was refused. Moreover, between 1889 and 1893 there were negotiations for sale and lease of parts of the property at £3 or thereabouts. This would seem to show that the estate was worth more than the Government paid for it.

"On the other hand, within less than a year afterwards the Popotunoa Estate, of 10,147 acres, adjoining Pomahaka, and undoubtedly a very fine, well-subdivided, and well-cultivated property, was sold for an average of £2 2s.

"It was, however, urged on the Committee that there were special reasons for these low prices—admittedly much lower than the owners' value. The owner (Mr. J. Logan) had recently died, and his executors put all his property in the district—30,000 acres in all—into the market, thereby outrunning the demand for land and lowering the price.

"The opinion expressed before the Committee by all the witnesses who spoke to the point, except two, was that £2 10s. was a fair price. On the other hand, of these two witnesses, one, the Inspector of the Union Bank, spoke of value for lending rather than purchasing purposes, and, while stating that the bank called up an advance of between £8,000 and £9,000 on the security of the property, gave as his chief reason that it was not a banking security. The other witness, Mr. Stevenson, said the land was worth between £1 and £1 10s. per acre.

"Lastly, there is the practical test of value afforded by the rents paid by settlers who have taken up sections since the property was thrown open by the Government. Up to 24th July, 1894, 5,230 acres have been disposed of at an average rental of 8s. 4d., or a capital value of £3 6s. 6d. per acre; leaving about 1,800 acres still to be let. And it must be borne in mind that these rents were given in spite of much depreciation of the property in the Otago papers, and Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's public statements that the soil was cold and ungenerous, and that the rental for years had been 6d., representing a capital value of 10s. per acre.

"After giving careful consideration to all the evidence on the point, the Committee are of opinion that the price paid by the Government was a fair and reasonable one.

"With respect to the petition, it was admitted that it was got up by Mr. Douglas, but it was signed by 301 settlers and others in and about the district; it was presented in the ordinary way by the member for the district, who knew many of the signatures, and had no reason to doubt its genuineness; and it could have had no possible effect on the price, inasmuch as its existence was not known to the Board at its meeting in Dunedin, when the price was fixed. For these reasons, the Committee fail to see how it affects the matter.

"As regards the suggestions of undue haste, the Committee are of opinion that no impropriety is disclosed. Mr. Barron was justified in hastening the preliminary inspection of the property, as an adjoining estate, the Conical Hills, was also under offer, and it was expedient that both should be before the Board together. The telegrams about the Board meeting are sufficiently explained by the fact that the Surveyor-General had left Wellington to attend meetings in Canterbury, Otago, and Invercargill, and, to save his time, it was of importance that the Board business should be ready for him on his arrival in Dunedin. As to the suggestion that Mr. Ritchie improperly induced Mr. Barron (the Under-Secretary of Lands) to instruct the preliminary inspection without the knowledge or authority of his superior officer, the evidence was uncontradicted that Mr. Barron was not exceeding his authority. Mr. Ritchie, too, though a nephew of Mr. Douglas, and a Government officer, did not, in the opinion of the Committee, interfere otherwise than an outsider might have done, and there is nothing to show that he promoted the purchase or influenced the price.

Mr. Collins

"As bearing on the question of undue haste, it appeared that the offer to sell was made on the 21st August, the offer to buy on the 25th September, Mr. Douglas accepted on the 3rd October, and the purchase-money was not paid until after the 20th.

"With respect to Conical Hills, the evidence clearly shows that the purchase was impracticable at the time, and could not have been effected without beginning the whole negotiations de novo. The offer was to exchange, and there was no statutory power to exchange. The Board's recommendation was to exchange the whole or purchase a portion, whereas there was no specific offer to sell the whole, and no offer whatever to sell less than the whole. Moreover, there were not funds sufficient to purchase the portion recommended, still less to purchase the whole.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie dwelt strongly on the fact that the correspondence between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Ritchie was not produced. The explanation offered was that it consisted of letters and telegrams between uncle and nephew, and was therefore not preserved. With respect to a telegram from Mr. Ritchie to Mr. Barron which was not on the file, the Committee accept Mr. Barron's explanation, that unimportant papers are not always filed; and in this instance, as the telegram was sent long after the purchase was concluded, it cannot have much bearing on the matter.

"Throughout the whole inquiry nothing has at any time been adduced to show that the Minister in any way departed from the strict line of his official duty; and, indeed, he appears to have had very little to do with the purchase except signing the ordinary official papers.

"Finally, and as the result of as exhaustive an inquiry as they could make, the Committee find that there was no ground for the grave charges made by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, and that neither the Minister nor any member of the Lands and Survey Department or of the Board of Land Purchase Commissioners is in any way affected either as to integrity or capacity.

"The Committee feel it their duty to refer to one other point:—

"In the course of his evidence, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie said that neither in his speech (quoted above) nor at any other time did he impute corruption to the Minister, and that, so far as he knew, no inference of corruption was ever drawn from his speech or his subsequent correspondence in the Otago Daily Times: further, that he was not responsible for the inquiry, and was merely there because the Committee had invited him.

"The Committee regret that they cannot agree with him. In their opinion, no reasonable man can read the speech without drawing the inference that the speaker is intending a charge of corruption. The effect of the preliminary disclaimer is merely to put the charges in the form of innuendo instead of direct statement, and to serve as a loophole to escape the responsibility of having to prove them. There was ample evidence before the Committee that, as a matter of fact, the inference was drawn, and that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie knew it and countenanced it.

"They are further of opinion that charges of corruption, if made at all, should be made plainly and specifically instead of by innuendo and suggestion, and that the person who makes them should, when challenged, either prove them or withdraw them. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie has done neither.

"R. THOMPSON, Chairman."

Sir, I think I am perfectly justified in placing that report in detail before this House. I would not have done this had it not been for the nature of the remarks made by a number of the speakers in endeavouring to screen Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. Why, what was the speech of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell)? When one listened to his judicial speech—a speech having the ring of the bar about it, and intoned just as one could imagine a speech to be intoned in the Supreme Court—one asks oneself, what was the nature of the honourable gentleman's mind for the time being, who, in endeavouring to screen a friend, could be so absolutely unjust, so unfair and I may say almost unscrupulous, towards an opponent? Why, Sir, what fault could he find with the Minister? Did he attempt to substantiate one of the charges, or to justify any of the statements made? Not for a moment; but in a most sarcastic manner he referred to the grace of the gestures of the Minister of Lands, the elegance of his diction, and the courteous nature of his references. Sir, a man speaking under the painful feelings which had their rise in the knowledge that unjust charges had been hurled against him may speak with warmth, may speak with little elegance of diction, his gestures may not be all that is graceful; but when a man can calmly and deliberately, with a speech judicially intoned, in which he avoids discussing the charge against the Minister who spoke warmly in defence of his character and position—defending the honour and integrity of a Minister of the Crown, and the honour of the House—when he gets up and simply, in sarcastic tones, refers to want of grace and inelegance of diction in the Minister's address, I think the honourable gentleman must be very hard up for matter for attack and very hard up for matter for defence. I think I have said enough to show that this report in every sense, in every detail—I will not say screens the honourable gentleman—I will not say vindicates him, for he requires neither screen nor vindication, but—places the true facts of the case before the country; and every honourable member ought to feel grateful to the Committee for having done its work in so adequate a manner as to enable the country to see that the Minister has not been guilty of that corruptness of conduct which some would persuade this House and the country to believe.

Mr. FRASER.—My reason for desiring to speak just now is that there may be no misapprehension of the reasons for the manner in which I shall exercise my vote. I intend to support the amendment. I am firmly convinced—and I am perfectly certain that any unprejudiced person who reads the evidence will also be convinced—that the report is not in accordance with the evidence. I have read both, and I think the honourable gentleman who has just sat down has grievously abused the privileges of the House in reading aloud the whole of the report solely for the purpose of hansardising it. Of this there can be little question. The very fact of his having taken this step induced me to rise, if for no other purpose than to enter my protest against it. I do not—I never did—suppose there was anything in what has been said about the Minister of Lands having been charged with corruption in regard to this matter. I take it that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie guarded himself from making such a charge, and I never considered such a charge had been made. I, with others, did not think that it was necessary for a Committee to be set up to exculpate the Minister. Speaking from my own knowledge of that gentleman, I would not believe him capable of doing anything wrong in the way alleged. I have a right to say that, as my knowledge of the honourable gentleman extends over many years. But it is quite a different matter with regard to the report of this Committee. It might have been written just as well before they took a single tittle of evidence. It has no connection with the evidence at all. It bears on the face of it the fact that it is intended not so much to exculpate the Minister from the charge alleged to have been made against him, as to place a stigma on his political opponent: that is the reason why I cannot vote for placing it in the Journals of the House. These are my reasons for voting for the amendment, and I desire to place them on record.

Mr. BUTTON.—Sir, I think it is most unfair that the report should be hansardised without the evidence, and I propose to begin to read some of the evidence that refers to it, unless a promise is given that the report shall not be hansardised without the evidence. If the House will consider my speech is made by reading the evidence I will sit down; otherwise I shall read it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Nothing can go into Hansard except what is uttered in the House by members in the course of their speeches.

Mr. BUTTON.—Well, Sir, I shall content myself with reading the speech of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I think it is exceedingly unfair that just a part of the thing should be put into Hansard without the whole, and I think this is necessary as a set-off against the other. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie said,—

"I propose, Mr. Chairman, to sum up the evidence which has been adduced in this inquiry. In doing so I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. I may say, at the outset, that this inquiry is in no sense due to any action of mine, and I cannot be held responsible for the expense of it in any way. The past three weeks have been occupied in taking evidence for the Crown, while two days have been devoted to taking such evidence as I had to give. The time was sufficient for my purpose, and I have no right to complain, since I have no status here, and it was by the Committee's invitation I took up the position I now occupy. Indeed, I may safely say that a large portion of the case on my own side could fairly rest on the evidence which has been extorted from the witnesses on the other side. Now, I hope to establish a complete—I might say a crushing—answer to the case set up for the Crown—a case showing that this Pomahaka purchase was, in the first place, a highly improper one, involving a great waste of public money in the purchase of land not at all of a desirable character for settlement; involving, also, payment by the settlers on it of crushing and unpayable rents; the sole effect of the purchase being to unduly fill the pocket of a private individual. In the second place, I shall show the Committee—to its satisfaction, I am sure—that the purchase by the Crown was itself founded on what, without any resort to language unusually strong, must be called a fraud. I do not think the Committee can possibly differ from me on this second head. I am here solely as an invited witness myself, in consequence, I understand, of certain criticisms of the purchase made by me as a public man. For these criticisms it is only right I should at once tell the Committee I am not responsible to any one; but I here affirm that all I said was true—every word of it—literally and absolutely. And the statements I made, so far as they were matters of opinion, were to the best of my belief thoroughly sound, and uttered in the true interests of the colony. Now, what were these statements—my criticisms? They form part of the evidence; but I will ask the Committee to allow me to read them again, for it must be remembered that, however familiar the Committee may be with them, a large portion of the public will read them for the first time. At the general election in November of last year I alluded to the Pomahaka purchase at Palmerston as follows:—

“Let it be clearly understood that I am far from suggesting corruption in connection with my opponent in this contest. I think his intentions are excellent, and that he is doing the best he can for all classes of settlers. But a man with unlimited power is apt to be acted upon unconsciously in all sorts of ways. Take this Pomahaka purchase, for instance. I believe it to be a downright bad purchase, a much worse one than Cheviot. I only know the land by repute, but it is a cold, ungenerous soil. It is purchased on the eve of a general election. The owner of it is an influential man in this immediate neighbourhood. He employs a number of men, and may influence a number of votes. His nephew (Mr. Ritchie) is head of one branch of the Minister's department. The land has been for sale for many years. I heard it myself offered for sale, for the same price, I think (£2 10s. per acre), ten years ago. It has been rented for a long time at 6d. per acre, which is 5 per cent. on a capital value of 10s. per acre. I believe, even at that rate, the land was about to be thrown up. Now, all these things may be mere isolated facts; there may be no connection between them at all. But a Minister's mind may be influenced, unconsciously, by the pressure of his friends, by the fear of his enemies, by fifty circumstances which have no connection with corruption, but which lead in that direction.’

Mr. Button

“I maintain that all the statements made by me in that speech, though I am not answerable to the Committee for them, have been proved to be true throughout this inquiry. As to the statement of opinion in the last sentence which I have just read—namely, that the mind of a Minister might be unconsciously influenced by the pressure of friends, or the fear of enemies, &c.—as far as that statement is concerned—I can safely appeal to any member of this Committee whether it does not embody sound opinions. I would remind the Committee that the House has, during this session, thought fit to disallow a proposal that the member for each district should be also a member of a Land Purchase Board for that district, largely on account of the influence that might be brought to bear on a member of the House by the pressure of friends or the fear of enemies. Surely, what has been thought likely to affect the mind of a private member may reasonably be held to affect the mind of a Minister in similar circumstances. It is here necessary that I should read to the Committee the public reply made to my speech by the Hon. J. McKenzie. On the 15th November he spoke at Palmerston as follows:—

“Mr. John Ritchie had nothing to do with it (the purchase). The history of the transaction he would give, and would lay every document in connection with it on the table, and he challenged Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's friends to examine them. If on inspection anything was found to be wrong he was willing to bear the odium; but if everything proved to be straightforward and honest, as he claimed would be the case, then Mr. Scobie Mackenzie should be called upon to apologize for having misled the electors. . . . The first he had heard of the matter was from Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, a political partisan and bosom friend of his opponent's, who presented a petition from 400 people in the Clutha County, asking that this tract of land should be purchased. . . . They must not suppose that he was misleading. That was not his method of dealing with politics. . . . The petition which was addressed to himself was as follows: (Here the petition was read by Mr. J. McKenzie, after which he continued).

“That petition was signed by 301 settlers, who knew the land situated there. What did his opponent know of it? In the opinion of the settlers of the district it was land that should be purchased. Was it his duty under the circumstances to tie a piece of red tape round the petition, put it in a pigeon-hole, and never look at it again? That, no doubt, was what his opponent would have done if in office. But he considered he had a duty to perform to the people; that he ought not to treat their petitions with derision, scorn, and contempt, but see what could be done.'

"That is the answer that was given to me—the ground of defence of the purchase. Now, I will ask the Committee whether, almost without exception, every sentence in that speech is not a scathing satire on the facts as we know them. Mr. Ritchie, who 'had nothing to do with the matter,' crops up at every turn in the transaction. Later on I will show the Committee where he does so. Then, it is said that 'if anything is found to be wrong' in the petition, &c., he will bear the odium. I ask the Committee, has not everything been found to be wrong? Again, if the petition is not proved to be 'straightforward and honest'! Was there ever a greater satire upon the facts as we now know them? I ask the Committee, was there anything straightforward or honest about the petition from first to last? Was it 'the opinion of the settlers of the district' that this land should be purchased, or was it only the opinion of Mr. Douglas, of Mr. Douglas's nephew, and Mr. Douglas's creditors? The Minister says that such a petition should not be treated with 'derision, scorn, and contempt,' but I say it was precisely the class of petition that ought to have been treated with scorn and contempt, for it proposed to saddle the colony, at a heavy price, with a piece of land that the owner had quite failed to sell to anybody else. Had the petition been signed only by Mr. Douglas and no one else, any Minister would have been on his guard, and would have inquired closely into the nature of the land offered for purchase, and would have taken care to ascertain the true value. He would also have inquired whether the people of the district really wanted the land for settlement. If the Minister in this case had done so he would have found that there was no desire whatever for this land. That is all I have to say on this point for the present.

"Let us now come to the history of this petition. It was hatched in the office of Wright, Stephenson, and Co., who were Mr. Douglas's general agents in other departments of his business. They held a second mortgage over the land as collateral security for advances they had themselves made on stock mortgages, with which we have no concern. This petition was written by Mr. Douglas, every word of it, at Mount Royal, his own home. The Committee knows that it was then sent by him to Wright, Stephenson, and Co., his agents, to be revised; then it was sent to Mr. Turnbull, his local agent at Clinton, to be further revised. By him the petition was sent back to Mount Royal, where a fair copy was written and transmitted to Wright, Stephenson, and Co., in order that they should have two copies type-written. This was done, and the copies forwarded on to the local agent, Mr. Turnbull, to get them signed. Mr. Douglas says he wrote the petition openly; that he made no secret of it in any way. In cross-examination, however, it appeared that what he called 'openly' was—within the knowledge of Wright, Stephenson, and Co., Mr. Turnbull, Mr. Begg, another agent, and, of course, the young man who wrote the fair copy. Well, we have got the petition to Clinton, in the neighbourhood of Pomahaka; it is in the hands of Mr. Turnbull, who employs a young man to go hawking it about the district to get it signed, a task which occupied three weeks. When he got the signatures he also got £12 from Mr. Douglas for his trouble. Mr. Turnbull also undertook to get signatures, and he also got £12 for his work.

"Dr. Fitchett: Pardon me, the one £12 covers the expense.

"Mr. Green: I certainly understood that there were two separate amounts of £12.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: Pardon me, they each got £12. I know it as a matter of fact, and it was clear in the evidence. I can say that I was aware each of them got £12 for hawking the petition through the district; the only difference is that 'the young man,' according to Mr. Douglas, took three weeks over it, whereas Mr. Turnbull said it took him over four or five weeks. Mr. Turnbull, later, got another £40 in consequence of the sale of this land to the Government. It is at the same time only fair to say—and I desire to be fair—that his own contention was that part of this money was payment for work he had done for Mr. Douglas over a series of years. At the same time he admitted that but for the purchase by the Government he would not have got the money. So that it may properly be said this petition cost Mr. Douglas altogether £64. Here let it be noticed that in no sense whatever can this petition be said to have originated in the district. The evidence is conclusive that such was not the case; there was no meeting of settlers at any time, or of any kind, to request that the land should be purchased for settlement. No such suggestion proceeded from the locality in any form that the purchase of this land was desired by the settlers. None of the residents of the district have been brought before us to say so; no movement of any sort was got up which would indicate that there was a desire to have the land for settlement. No communication was made to the member for the district on the subject. The Committee will allow that, as a general rule, when a petition of this kind is to be got up for the benefit of a district, and the settlers want help, the first person to whom they apply is the member for the district. In fact, it is his duty to assist them in every way he can. On this occasion the member for the district was not communicated with, although he was specially able to give assistance. Nobody seemed to know anything about the petition except that it was there. There was a local paper in the district, published at Clinton, but that paper never had a word about this land, or suggested that it should be purchased for settlement, or that it was required for settlement. On the 25th of August, however—that is, when the petition was signed—the local paper did publish an article puffing up the land and urging the Government to buy. Mr. Douglas wrote that article. He says the editor sought him out, and induced him to write the article.

I think, however, it will be admitted that the man who was prepared to take such trouble in getting up this petition, and to lay out so much money on it, would not be likely to stick at the trouble of seeing the editor himself and getting the article accepted by the editor. It is for the Committee to say which is the more likely story of the two. Then, we perceive that there is a good deal of indignation among the settlers who had signed the petition when they found how it was got up, from whom it originated, and all the facts connected with it. We have had the evidence on this head of Mr. Stevenson, the manager of the Wairuna Estate. He signed the petition under the general belief that it was the right thing to do. Mr. Turnbull showed him it was 'all right,' by first signing himself. He pointed out to Mr. Turnbull that there was no price mentioned. His evidence went to show that, in his belief, it would be a good thing to settle the land—that it would be better that industrious settlers should be upon it than that it should be in the hands of Mr. Douglas lying waste. He thought he was doing the right thing, or at least nothing wrong, in signing that petition. An attempt has been made to hold him—Mr. Stevenson—responsible for the contents of that petition, because he signed it, which is, of course, absurd; for it is well known that petitions are signed under the general belief that if there was anything wrong about them they would not be publicly offered for signature. When, however, Mr. Stevenson and others discovered the price given by the Government for the land—for the petition mentioned only a 'reasonable price'—they were indignant.

"Now, the question here arises: Did the Minister know the origin of this petition when he based his defence of the purchase on it? He has given it to us in his evidence that he did not. We are bound to accept his statement to that effect, and I accept it. But had that petition been read at an early stage of this inquiry by any member of this Committee I think they would not have finished their examination of it without the very strongest suspicion as to the quarter whence it came. I make bold to say there are very few people in Otago but who, when they first read the petition, knew its origin; and certainly every one who was at all acquainted with Mr. Douglas, or his language, knew perfectly well where it came from. All I can say on this point—and I have no desire to dwell upon it—is that it is greatly to be regretted that the interests of the colony should have been at this time in the hands of a man so unsuspicious and so credulous—one who could fall so very easy a prey to an astute landowner, who wanted to palm upon the Government land which he could not sell to any one else.

"Now, after hearing the public utterances of the Minister which I have read to you, I defy any one to come to any other conclusion than that this purchase by the Government was founded on that petition. The first the Minister heard of the matter, he says, was through Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, a member of the House, who, as member for the district, presented to him the petition. The Minister says that the reason he purchased the land was that he had received a petition signed by 301 persons, and he was not going to treat such a petition with scorn and contempt. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the purchase was founded on the petition; yet we have it in evidence that Mr. Barron, Under-Secretary for Lands, set the department in motion for the purchase by sending a telegram south directing Mr. Adams, Chief Surveyor for Otago, to inspect the land and report on it nine days before the petition came up. Mr. Barron, let it be noted, did this at the suggestion of Mr. Ritchie, a nephew of Mr. Douglas. Mr. Ritchie has been, as I shall show, clearly acting as the medium between Mr. Douglas and the Government, and was a former manager of Mr. Douglas's Mount Royal Estate. Mr. Ritchie was then and is still at the head of the Stock Department, appointed there by the Hon. Mr. McKenzie, and in an admirable position to act as medium between Mr. Douglas and the persons with whom he was negotiating. For all purposes of land-purchasing Mr. Ritchie was an outsider, but he was somehow in a position to start Mr. Barron at work and the department in motion nine days before the petition came up. He did so, we are asked to believe, on the ground of economy—from a desire to save expense to the Government by saving Mr. Adams a second journey south for the purpose of inspecting Pomahaka. Mr. Adams was on his way to inspect Conical Hills.

Mr. Button

"An Hon. Member: Mr. Adams travelled on a free pass by railway.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: Quite so; in order that he should not have two journeys to make on a free pass. Mr. Ritchie induced Mr. Barron to set the department in motion. Mr. Barron complied without consulting any one—without consulting Mr. Percy Smith, who is his superior officer, and not only his superior officer, but also a member of the Land Purchase Commission. He also did it, we are told, without consulting the Minister (Mr. McKenzie) himself. Now, there are only two hypotheses, under one of which we must account for Mr. Barron's action in this matter: first, that there is an extraordinary condition of laxity and demoralisation in the department that could permit such things to take place; or, secondly, that when Mr. Barron took that extraordinary action there must have been some one in authority behind him who, he felt, would support him in that action. It is for the Committee to say which of the two hypotheses is correct. If such laxity and demoralisation exist in the department it ought not to have been condoned as it has been condoned. If, on the other hand, there was any one behind Mr. Ritchie who made him feel that he was warranted in taking this extraordinary action, it is for the Committee to say who that person is. Here it is to be remarked—and it is very remarkable—that, when this petition was presented to the Minister by Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, Mr. Barron, who had been at work for nine days previously, was standing in the room at the same time, and yet did not then tell the Minister that for nine days the department was in motion on this very matter—that he had had the land inspected and reported on. He did not tell the Minister that various telegrams had been going backwards and forwards about this land between the date of initiation on the 21st August and the date—the 30th August—when Mr. Barron was standing in the Minister's room and Mr. Thomas Mackenzie presented the petition. Yet a good deal had been done in that interval; a large number of telegrams had passed between the parties concerned, and all with the object of hurrying on the work. The Minister was apparently left under the impression that on receiving the petition he was initiating the business for the first time; yet Mr. Barron does not say one solitary word about all that had taken place before.

"It may here be asked, What would be a rational explanation of the evident haste displayed for the inspection of the land? Instructions were sent to Mr. Adams to inspect on the 21st August, but we find that four days previously the Union Bank had given Mr. Douglas fourteen days' notice to pay up the mortgage-money. Four days after that notice had been given Mr. Douglas, Mr. Ritchie induces Mr. Barron to set the department in motion towards the purchase of this land. There was clearly no time to lose. Mr. Douglas had been for years trying to sell this land, and had failed. Wright, Stephenson, and Co. had a second mortgage over it by way of collateral security for other advances. It has been given in evidence that, notwithstanding their second mortgage, they were unwilling to take over the land with a mortgage of £8,000 upon it. It is also in evidence that they tried to induce the Dunedin Savings-bank to take up the Union Bank's mortgage, but the Savings-bank refused. Therefore it is clear Mr. Douglas had no time to lose in getting a purchaser. In fact, he was in desperate straits. Action was required to be taken at once; and four days after he received the notice from the bank to pay up the department was set in motion, and it lost no time in proceeding to a conclusion.

"Let me here give the Committee a few dates in regular order to show the despatch that was used in pushing on the purchase of this land. They are very significant. On the 17th August, 1893, Mr. Douglas gets the fourteen days' notice from the bank to pay up the amount of the mortgage. On the 21st Mr. Barron, at Mr. Ritchie's suggestion, wires to Mr. Maitland and Mr. Adams to get the land inspected. On the 22nd an offer of land is made by Mr. Douglas to Mr. Maitland, Chief Commissioner of Lands for Otago; so that action was actually taken by the department before Mr. Douglas had offered, also at Mr. Ritchie's suggestion, the land to the Dunedin Waste Lands Board. On the 26th, Mr. Adams, with Mr. Douglas and his local agent, go on the land for the purpose of inspection and valuation. On the 30th Mr. Barron wires to

Mr. Adams to know if the latter is ready with his report—sufficient evidence of hurry. On the 30th Mr. Adams sends in his report of both Conical Hills and Pomahaka. On the 31st Mr. Maitland wires to Mr. Barron that Pomahaka is valued at £2 10s., and Conical Hills at £3. All this was done before presentation of the petition to the Minister, for the Hon. Mr. McKenzie was, apparently, unaware of it all when the petition was presented to him by Mr. Thomas Mackenzie. Mr. Barron allowed him to remain in total ignorance of any action being taken. On the 4th September Mr. Percy Smith wires from Cheviot recommending Mr. Dallas, a local farmer, as valuer. On the 14th September the Land Purchase Board sits in Dunedin, and on the 3rd October the purchase is completed. There are other telegrams indicating the haste with which these transactions were pushed on; indeed, there is every sign of haste through the whole business from beginning to end. Can there be any reasonable doubt that the hidden cause of it all was the difficulty in which Mr. Douglas found himself with the Union Bank, which had sent him the fourteen days' notice to pay up?

"I must here allude to the Conical Hills Estate, which appears to have dropped out of the notice of the department. It is a first-rate estate, in the same district, fenced, subdivided, and largely cultivated, and could have been bought at £3 or £3 5s. an acre. That estate was offered to the Government before Pomahaka; the evidence is that it was offered in exchange for Crown land, but it was really offered for sale as well. It, however, almost drops out of notice while the Pomahaka negotiations are going on. The Land Purchase Board recommend, as their resolution shows, Conical Hills in preference to Pomahaka; but their report only recommends that Conical Hills be purchased. There is on this report an indorsement by some one saying, 'Wait and see if Shennan (the owner) will sell.' But no step is taken to see if Shennan would sell, although a single telegram might have done it in one day. No such telegram, however, was sent. Mr. Percy Smith thought, though he was not sure, that the reason Conical Hills (while still preferred to Pomahaka) was dropped was that there was not enough money in hand to complete the purchase. It required £41,000 to purchase that property, while all the money in the hands of the Minister was £31,000. It is a striking fact that, after he saw that he had not money enough to buy, Mr. Smith should still write to Mr. Shennan and go through the form of asking him if he would sell, as well as exchange, knowing all the time that there was not the money to buy. It never occurred to either the Minister or Mr. Smith to ask Mr. Shennan whether he would sell a portion of the estate; and the letter asking Mr. Shennan if he would sell is not written until within a few days of the Pomahaka purchase.

"Now we come to the price paid by the Government for the Pomahaka land. It was £2 10s. per acre for 7,462 acres—in all, £18,656. Mr. Dallas, the local farmer already mentioned, was really the sole valuator. Mr. Adams, it is true, after his inspection of the land (accompanied by Mr. Douglas, by the way, who carefully pointed out to him all the advantages and none of the disadvantages), mentions £2 10s. as the value. But, both in his report to the Government and in his evidence before the Committee, he said he made no pretence of being a valuator, knew nothing about it, and trusted to the Land Purchase Board (who have never seen the land to this day) to put a proper value on it. Mr. Dallas, therefore, is the sole valuator, and the curious fact comes to light that, while he valued it for selling to Mr. Douglas at £2 10s. per acre, he had previously valued it for taxing purposes at £2 2s. 6d. Here let it be noted that Mr. Douglas, in respect of both these valuations, was extremely fortunate. He gained by both. By the low taxation he gained a reduction of his county rates and general taxes; by the higher valuation he gained in purchase-money a sum of £2,798. He put that sum in his pocket. But the most unfortunate part of the business is the effect as regards the settlers now on the land under the Crown—namely, that this sum of £2,798 is being paid at this moment by them. Now, the explanation of Mr. Dallas is that the taxing-value is below the selling-value. But that contention has been refuted by the evidence taken before this Committee. It was actually refuted by Mr. Dallas in his evidence. It will be remembered that he said he had himself bought in the same district a parcel of land from Mr. James Allen, M.H.R., and paid for it £50 less than he himself had valued it for taxing purposes; at the same time declaring that he bought it at a fair value. This shows incontrovertibly that Mr. Dallas's taxing-valuations were occasionally higher than the selling-value. Then, we have the significant evidence of the bank inspector, who tells us that, as a general rule, the bank found the selling-value below the taxing-value. Mr. Percy Smith says that the taxing-value is from 10 to 25 per cent. too low. That was a very convenient statement to make in regard to this particular case. But it must be borne in mind that it only applies to those who keep their land for working purposes. That is a wholly different case from that of the man who keeps his land from year to year, only to sell when he can get an opportunity of doing so. It is to his interest to keep the land-value as high as possible, because the first question asked by the buyer is, What is the taxing-value of the land? That is invariably the very first question with the buyer. As a matter of fact, we have it in evidence that Mr. Douglas himself remonstrated with Mr. Begg, his attorney, because of his efforts to reduce the taxing-value. It must be, from that evidence, clear to the Committee that it was the aim and interest of Mr. Douglas to get the taxing-value as high as possible; and it was evidently high at £2 2s. 6d.

"Let us now consider what consequences flowed from the price—£2 10s.—paid by Mr. Douglas for the land. The first consequence is that the settlers are paying no less than £3 7s. 6d. an acre for uncultivated, inaccessible tussock-land: that is the price represented by their average rent of 3s. 4½d. per acre. This price being paid by the settlers is made up of two things—namely, the purchase-money for the land to Mr. Douglas, and the actual cost of the roads necessary to open it up. Mr. Adams, Chief Surveyor, says the roads have been made at the lowest possible cost. Mr. Percy Smith says the same thing. The Hon. Mr. McKenzie himself writes to the Otago Daily Times to prove that the loading was no more than was demanded by law, and the actual cost of the roads to give access to the property. If, therefore, it can be shown that the settlers are paying too much, it must be either from excessive loading for roads or an excess of purchase-money, or both. We have evidence that the loading is the lowest possible, so that the purchase-money must be far too high. This fact I will prove later on.

Mr. Button

"Meanwhile the immediate consequence of the high price was that when the land was opened for sale by the Crown it was an undoubted failure. Just half of the land went off in the first instance, the other half remaining untouched. In the Crown Lands Report of the 3rd June, presented to Parliament, we find Mr. Maitland, the Chief Commissioner of Lands for Otago, making the following remarks: 'The Pomahaka Block, of 7,462 acres 3 roods 1 perch, which was opened for selection on the 20th February last, was purchased in a district in which the Crown had no land available for settlement, on which account, and being surrounded by settlement, it was considered that it would be readily disposed of to residents in the immediate and adjoining districts desirous of acquiring land for themselves and families. From the number of those who signed the petition in favour of the acquisition of this land it was only natural to suppose that this would be the case. It has not, however, been taken up so speedily as was anticipated, and there is no doubt that one of the chief causes of this was that the people of the district were led to believe that a large estate in that and the adjacent district would be brought into the market, and this, considering that the land referred to is of more convenient access, militated, and still militates, against the taking-up of the Pomahaka sections. I have no doubt, however, that the remaining sections will be gradually disposed of. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the price at which the land was opened was considered somewhat high.'

"Here we have three remarkable statements. First, that the sale was a failure—a fact which astonished Mr. Maitland when he recalled 'the number of persons who had signed the petition.' Mr. Maitland, of course, did not know what the Committee now knows—namely, how this famous petition had been manufactured. Secondly, the statement is made that the settlers were hanging back in prospect of the sale of a neighbouring estate. That estate was the Popotunoa property. It really was sold shortly afterwards, and I shall have something to say about the sale presently. The third statement worthy of attention is that the settlers generally complained that the price put on the Pomahaka land by the Crown was too high. And here I will comment for a moment upon some curious evidence given by Mr. Percy Smith, Surveyor-General and head of the Lands Department. He declared in his evidence that he never heard of any complaint from the settlers that the land was too high in price. He admitted that he was the compiler of the Crown Lands Report, from which I have just quoted an extract, and he had to admit also that he overlooked the passage about the complaints of the high price. At a later date in this inquiry, after I had had an opportunity of looking over the file of papers connected with Pomahaka, he had to admit that he had also overlooked two other documents addressed to himself, both embodying the complaints of the settlers—that the price of the land was too high. One was from Mr. Maitland, Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the other from Mr. J. E. Marsh, Inspector of Settlements. I wish here to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the sale turned out an obvious failure, in spite of rather desperate efforts made to make the failure look as small as possible. We find, for instance, the Minister of Lands sending a confidential communication to Mr. Maitland, Chief Commissioner, to this effect: 'Try and induce the unsuccessful applicants to take up the remaining sections': in other words, a request is made to Mr. Maitland (and this was no part of his duty) to try and induce settlers to take up sections which they did not want. I do not suppose there can be any doubt in the minds of the members of this Committee that the object was to try and get rid of the appearances of failure which attached to this particular sale. And, although some of these sections have gone off since, there are still six or seven remaining, representing some 2,000 acres, which are still untouched.

"I have now a few words to say to the Committee as to the real value of this property. It was purchased in 1869 by Mr. Douglas at 10s. an acre, having previously failed to sell at 20s. It has remained unimproved ever since. Mr. Douglas is an enterprising man, and he has acquired two other properties since the Pomahaka purchase. Both of these he has improved to a very great extent, but never touched Pomahaka. One of these estates—namely, Mount Royal, which he purchased about the same time as Pomahaka—is made up, as he admitted, mostly of pastoral land; yet Mr. Douglas preferred to lay out his money on Mount Royal rather than touch Pomahaka.

"Then, the rents Mr. Douglas has been receiving for Pomahaka over a series of years are very significant as to the value of the land. From the 1st day of May, 1886, to the 16th of May, 1887, the rent was 6d. an acre, Mr. Douglas paying the property-tax. From that date to the 30th September, 1893, when he sold to the Government, the rent was 9d. per acre, he having to pay the land-tax and graduated tax out of that, leaving it really 6d. I would here ask the Committee whether it is not the fact that the earning-power of a piece of land is a very strong indication of its value. No practical man will deny that. The inspector of the Union Bank states that this was one reason for regarding Pomahaka as a bad security and calling up the mortgage-money. We have the evidence of Wright, Stephenson, and Co. that they fought shy of this property, though they made Mr. Douglas large advances on other securities. The Dunedin Savings-bank refused to touch it at £8,000. Not only was the property one that possessed no earning-power, but it was actually losing at the rate of between £400 and £500 a year. The interest payable by Mr. Douglas on his mortgage was £680. Add to this sum the amount of land- and graduated tax payable by Mr. Douglas at the rate of 1½d. on £15,680 (Mr. Dallas's taxing-value)—namely, £90, after deducting his mortgage exemption—and we have a total of £720. Deduct from that his rental at 9d. on 7,462 acres—namely, £279—and the net loss per year will be £436. Here let me state the argument. We have a piece of land which, according to the evidence, would not sell, would return no income, but would persistently yield a heavy loss; yet we are asked to believe that none of these facts are significant in estimating the value of that land. I do not believe there is a practical man in New Zealand who will indorse such a statement. Now let us come to the direct testimony we have as to the real value of the land. The Union Bank had, at the time of the sale to the Government, a mortgage over the land for £9,000. But they had at the same time one thousand pounds' worth of other securities in their hands belonging to Mr. Douglas, so that their mortgage over Pomahaka was really £8,000. Now, they peremptorily call this amount up at fourteen days' notice. It is contended by Dr. Fitchett that they (the bank) were realising their securities—sound ones—in order to send the money to Australia. There is something of a political catch-penny character about this explanation, which cannot for a moment be accepted. The Committee must take it for what it is worth. The only proof offered is that for some time the deposits in the bank have been largely in excess of the advances. If that proves anything at all, it is that the bank had more money than it could safely or profitably invest, in which case there was all the more need for retaining good securities. Securities, too, were just as difficult to get in Australia at the time; and, as a matter of fact, the dividends of the Union Bank have come down from 18 per cent. to 6 per cent. On the other hand, Mr. Brittan, the assistant-inspector of the bank, has given a flat denial to the statement that the bank was sending capital to Australia. His instructions at the time from the general manager in Australia—instructions which Dr. Fitchett objected to his producing—were to lay out as much money as possible in New Zealand, wherever they could get good securities. And we have it in evidence that the bank was prepared to advance Mr. Douglas £80,000 or £40,000 provided he could show good securities for the amount. The plain fact is that the Union Bank was trembling for the £8,000 secured on Pomahaka. I put the question to Mr. Brittan, and he admitted they were anxious about the money. The bank was afraid the land would be thrown on its hands. It knew the property would not sell in the market—that it was losing heavily every year. The Inspector told us plainly that the bank thought the time had arrived to shunt the mortgage on to Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co.; but Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co., though they transacted Mr. Douglas's other business, would not have it, and tried to shunt it on to the Dunedin Savings-bank, who also would not have it. The inspector further admitted that he would not have had the same anxiety about the £8,000 on Pomahaka had he known the Government was behind to give £18,655 for it. There was a curious kind of 'see-saw' about the evidence as to which institution should have a security of this kind. Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co. deposed that they were unwilling to take up the security because, properly, it was one for a bank, not for an agent. The bank deposed that they wanted to get rid of it as it was a security for an agent rather than a bank, because, if the special security failed, the agent could make good the deficiency out of some other branch of Mr. Douglas's business. What is the inevitable conclusion? Simply that it was a bad security to any one for £8,000, and no one would touch it—except the Government, of course, which with much promptitude gave £18,655 for the property. We are told, however, that Wright, Stephenson, and Co. showed their confidence in the property by giving their guarantee to the bank for the money. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the time when that firm gave this guarantee, for it is very significant. We find by the evidence of the bank that the guarantee was given on the 2nd of September—the last day of the fourteen days' notice. It was given after Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co. could not but be aware—in fact, they were made aware—that the Government was pretty certain to buy this land. The dates will make that clear. On the 30th of August, three days before the guarantee was given, Mr. T. Mackenzie wired to Mr. Turnbull to say that the Minister was favourable to the purchase. We must, of course, conclude that Mr. Ritchie had informed Mr. Douglas of that fact. We find, too, that Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co. sent a telegram, which we cannot but conclude was sent at this date to Mr. Ritchie, asking him, as he says, 'whether the matter was settled, or likely to be settled.' Mr. Ritchie said he replied to that telegram in one word, but he could not tell the Committee what that word was. There is little doubt the word was 'Yes'; and then Messrs. Wright, Stephenson, and Co., finding that the Government were prepared to buy the land at £18,655, naturally went to the bank and gave their guarantee for £8,000. The fact did not show any confidence in the land, but rather in what Mr. Ritchie could get the Minister to do. What Mr. Ritchie's methods were we cannot well know, owing to a curious phase in the business with which I must now deal—namely, the alleged destruction of the Douglas-Ritchie correspondence. Mr. Douglas comes before the Committee and says, 'I sent a number of communications to Mr. Ritchie, and I received a number from him. All that I received from him I destroyed, and I kept no copies of what I sent.' And Mr. Ritchie comes before this Committee and says, 'All the letters that I received from Mr. Douglas about this matter I destroyed, and I kept no copies of any that I sent.' Now, it is to be borne in mind that both of them are business-men. One is at the head of a large Government department, and the other was once the head of a large business firm in Dunedin. But it is to be noted that Mr. Douglas, who destroyed all the letters he received from Mr. Ritchie which deal with this purchase, nevertheless produces a variety of other letters which it suited him to produce—all docketed and kept in proper business fashion. Letters that are useful to him he is able to produce, but he has not kept those received from Mr. Ritchie, nor has Mr. Ritchie kept those received from Mr. Douglas. Now, I think that circumstance must be taken as extraordinarily suspicious, and that the only conclusion the Committee can come to is that these letters would have revealed something which the persons concerned did not wish to have revealed. And the Committee must come to the conclusion all the more readily from the fact that I have been able to give them a glimpse into at least one letter he wrote to Mr. Ritchie; for, writing to the Otago Daily Times on the 14th December, 1893, Mr. Douglas makes the following remarkable admission: 'In writing Mr. Ritchie, I mentioned that the petition had been sent to Mr. T. Mackenzie, and expressed a hope that legislators would be able to spare as much time from worrying each other as to consider the petition; that I was anxious to learn their decision respecting this, because I find I had plenty of buyers were I to sell in largish-sized blocks; that I believed I could make a better price in this way, and would try this mode if the Government did not "bite" at once; my object in desiring a speedy answer being that I might make financial arrangements for selling privately, and on terms sufficiently long to suit buyers.' Here, then, we have the fact revealed that in one at least of the destroyed letters Mr. Douglas employs Mr. Ritchie as the medium between himself and the Government—that is, of course, the Minister;—that Mr. Ritchie is to induce the Minister to 'bite'—that is, to buy—and, as a means of making him 'bite,' he was to use the argument that Mr. Douglas could get plenty of buyers at a higher price, to whom he would sell if the Government did not come up to the scratch. Here, also, it may be remarked that Mr. Douglas explained his acceptance of a 'merely nominal' rent for his land over a series of years by saying that he wanted to be ready to sell at any moment, though he could not. But when he wants the Government to 'bite' he has 'plenty of buyers' who would give a higher price than the Government. The main point, however, is to notice that one letter reveals the fact that Mr. Ritchie was Mr. Douglas's medium with the Minister. What might not the other letters reveal if we had them? And, while on the subject of the destruction of correspondence, I have also to allude to the curious fact that one document is missing from the departmental file of Pomahaka papers. That document was a telegram sent by Mr. Ritchie to 'the department'—that is, he explained, to Mr. Barron, urging him to get the purchase-money paid at once. Mr. Barron said it should be on the file; but when we got the whole file and examined it the telegram was missing, although every other document, even the most trifling, was there. Ultimately Mr. Barron wrote to the Committee that he was unable to find it. It is certainly odd the one document missing should be a communication from Mr. Ritchie. Another telegram of Mr. Ritchie's of a significant kind has been recovered in a curious way—namely, in a letter from Mr. Douglas to the bank. Writing to the bank on the 30th August, Mr. Douglas says, 'I have just received the following telegram from Wellington: "Matter cannot be settled for a few days. Have you arranged time bank?"—J. D. RITCHIE.' The matter to be 'settled' was admitted to be the purchase of Pomahaka; but Mr. Ritchie, curiously enough, could not tell us who told him it was to be settled in a few days. He thought it 'might be Percy Smith, Surveyor-General'; but, unfortunately for that view, Mr. Smith had previously said he had had no communication with Mr. Ritchie. Anyhow, on the very day the petition was presented—30th August—Mr. Ritchie was in a position to tell Mr. Douglas that the matter would be 'settled' in a few days. It is for the Committee to form their own opinion as to who told Mr. Ritchie it would be so settled. Now, as the Minister of Lands publicly declared in Palmerston that Mr. Ritchie 'had nothing to do with the purchase,' it may be well for me here to summarise the various occasions on which he, as it were, accidentally crops up. (1.) He initiates the whole business by getting Mr. Barron to set the department in motion nine days before the petition comes up. (2.) He is employed by Mr. Douglas to 'make the Minister "bite."' (3.) On the day the petition was presented he is able to wire Mr. Douglas the matter will be 'settled in a few days.' (4.) He wires a forgotten answer to Wright, Stephenson, and Co., who had asked whether the 'matter was settled, or likely to be settled.' (5.) He wires a message (which has disappeared from the file) urging the department to pay the purchase-money at once. In this Mr. Ritchie says Mr. Douglas relied upon his (Ritchie's) 'influence' after the purchase. Can it be doubted that if we had the destroyed letters they would reveal Mr. Ritchie's influence before the purchase? Here let me remind the Committee that before I began commenting upon all these suspicious circumstances I had begun to adduce the direct testimony we have had during this inquiry as to the real value of the Pomahaka land. The first item was the weighty testimony of the bank inspector, who was compelled to admit that the land (7,500 acres) was a bad and risky security for £8,000, and that no other institution asked would touch it at that. At that sum the bank was in great anxiety lest the land should fall into their hands. Let us now come to evidence of value of another but equally weighty sort—namely, the prices realised for the Popotunoa Estate, which adjoins Pomahaka, but lies between it and the railway. Mr. Maitland, in his report, which I have already quoted to the Committee, says that the settlers were hanging back for the Popotunoa property. He describes them as hanging back from the Pomahaka property in favour of Popotunoa, believing it would soon be in the market. In his evidence he also says that the settlers described Popotunoa as a 'grand property.' They were waiting for it. Well, evidence has been given here by a number of different witnesses on both sides that it was a choice property; that it was splendidly fenced and subdivided; that it was laid down in English grass where it was not otherwise cultivated; and that it was splendidly subdivided for small farms; that there was a magnificent homestead on it—of which the house alone cost £1,800—with gardens, plantations, and so forth; and that the main south railway-line and road ran past it, and that there were good roads on the rest; that the estate ran up as far as the Township of Clinton, and that a quantity of the land was sold even for suburban sections. Now, this is the estate that the settlers were hanging back for, and which has been sold since the Crown settled Pomahaka—a month or two afterwards. Well, the average price realised for this fine estate, sold with all improvements to small farmers, was £2 15s. 3d., as against £3 7s. 6d. which the unfortunate settlers at the back are paying for the wild, tussocky, and inaccessible land of Pomahaka. One set of settlers have a highly-cultivated and fenced property for £2 15s. 3d.; and another set—the Crown settlers—are paying £3 7s. 6d. for the naked land!

Mr. Button

"Dr. Fitchett: What is the price of the properties?"

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: £2 15s. 3d. There were your own witnesses on that point."

"Dr. Fitchett: You are adding on Waipahi property."

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: It is the same estate, owned and managed by the same person, but one-half of it happened to be in the Waipahi and the other in the Popotunoa Riding. Waipahi sold for £2 2s., and Popotunoa proper for £3 8s.: average, £2 15s. 3d. The Waipahi section was fenced, subdivided, in part cultivated, and within a mile of the railway-station. And, as Dr. Fitchett has reminded me of Waipahi, I may here allude to Mr. Stevenson's evidence as to the portion sold to a Mr. Taylor. It was a block of 3,100 acres, with a north aspect—for aspect has been much talked of in connection with Mr. Douglas's land—close to the railway. It was sold with 1,000 acres of growing turnips for £1 10s. per acre. Surely, that is a curious commentary upon what the Pomahaka settlers are paying! A rate of £1 10s. for fenced and partly-cultivated land close to the railway, and £3 7s. 6d. for the naked land away from it in the same district; or a rent of 1s. 6d. per acre as against 3s. 4½d.

“Well, now we come to some more direct evidence as to value—that of Mr. William Stevenson, who was manager of the Wairuna Estate at the time of the Government purchase of Pomahaka. Here I may remark that the Wairuna Estate, which adjoins Pomahaka, but was an earlier selection, and is closer to the railway, was bought by its present owners, Messrs. Brown and Rattray, in 1881 for £2 2s. It was then fenced and subdivided. Mr. Stevenson managed this property for three years. He was thoroughly acquainted with Pomahaka, and had been over every foot of it. He has described the land as poor, cold, and sour. The carrying-capacity was one acre and a half to the sheep, or 5,000 sheep for the block. The sheep were usually in very poor condition. Stevenson was in the habit of reporting to his employer, Mr. Brown, the condition of neighbouring stock as a basis of comparison with his own. He happened to be over the Pomahaka land in August, 1893, about the time the Government were buying, and he reported the sheep grazing on it to be wretchedly poor, a heavy loss among them, and many then scarcely able to get out of his way. A copy of that report was in his letter-book before the Committee, but it was objected to as evidence. Mr. Stevenson says Pomahaka might possibly be worth £1 10s. per acre, but he himself would not give that for it. He says it would take the land all it would do to return 5 per cent. on £1. That is the evidence of the only expert who has come before us. There was a farmer named Hugh Cameron on the other side, but he rode twenty-five miles, from Waitahuna, to see the land, and returned the same day, so that his evidence goes for nothing.

“Now, I want to draw the attention of the Committee to the remarkable concurrence of testimony as to the real value of the land from persons necessarily of the greatest weight. First, we have the Union Bank, who had a mortgage of £8,000 over 7,500 acres. They considered this amount too much to be safe on the property. That would be about £1 per acre. Secondly, we have the independent testimony of Mr. Stevenson that the land was worth about £1. Then we have the significant but unspoken testimony of the lessees, who for seven years had been giving 9d. per acre rent for the land. That rent, at 5 per cent., meant a capital value of 15s. per acre. Add to all this the fact that Mr. Douglas originally bought the land at 10s.; that he had never touched it since; that it had been for many years for sale; that cultivated land in the neighbourhood has since sold for much less than is being paid for Pomahaka: and we cannot fail to come to the conclusion that the latter is worth nothing like what was paid for it by the Government.

“Now, as against all this, what have we on the other side? We have only some cock-and-bull stories by Mr. Douglas as to offers he had made to him for the land a long time ago. One was alleged to come from Mr. A. Brown, of Wairuna—an offer of £4 10s. per acre, between 1870 and 1880. Now, even if any such offer had been made it would only have proved the poverty of the land, for at that time there was a land-boom on in Otago, when the poorest land was selling at high rates. I have known land that then sold to settlers at £15 per acre since reduced by official valuation to £1 10s. per acre. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Brown wires both to myself and to the Committee that he never made Douglas any such offer. Mr. Douglas had to admit he could show no direct offer from anybody at any time. Mr. Begg, his attorney, could only say he had heard Mr. Douglas say that he had had offers. The only evidence of value on which the other side seem to me to rely is the fact that in 1889 Mr. Douglas sold a few sections of this land for £3 12s. 6d. But it has been given in evidence, what is known to us all, that land has gone steadily down in value since 1889. In order to get over the difficulty of the Popotunoa sale, the witnesses on the other side have had to tell the Committee that land has fallen much since the Government bought Pomahaka, but not before—a rather odd circumstance. One witness on the other side, however, admitted that land had been falling in value for years, and Mr. Stevenson thinks it has fallen nearly 50 per cent. since 1889. Then, we have it in evidence that two good roads were then formed to the sections Mr. Douglas sold in 1889. So that, between the fall in value and the fact that the land was then accessible, the sale of 1889 goes for nothing at all. Mr. Douglas, at the very first inspection by Mr. Adams, appears to have carefully dwelt on this sale of 1889.

“I think I have now touched upon all the points of importance in this case. I think I can, with confidence, say that, from all the facts that have been laid before them, the Committee can come to no other conclusion than that the petition for the purchase of Pomahaka was conceived and carried out in something very much of the nature of fraud; that a gross injustice is now being done to the existing settlers in the price they have to pay for the land; and that the price they have to pay for the land is due to a gross overpayment made to Mr. Douglas. So far as concerns Mr. Douglas, the error cannot be rectified, for he has got the money, and it cannot be taken from him. But the settlers should not be called on to suffer for the blunders of the Government or the department, and I appeal to the Committee to at least report in such terms as will compel the reduction of the rents these men are paying to such a sum as represent the real value of this land. From 3s. 4½d. per acre, average, they should be reduced to 1s. 6d.

Mr. Burton

"I have only to thank the Committee for the patience with which they have listened to me. I dare say I have taxed their patience somewhat through this inquiry. It would be wrong of me to pretend that this Committee was a proper tribunal to inquire into a matter of this sort, for I do not think it is: not from the character of the men who compose it, but from its inherent character. But I hope some good may come from the inquiry. I may say that I made no charge of any sort against the Minister, and I have nothing to do with the inquiry. It was not of my seeking. The Committee first invited me as a witness, and afterwards invited me to ask questions, and I complied in both instances. That is all my connection with the matter."

Mr. HALL.—Sir, although I was a member of this Committee, it was not my intention to address the House in regard to the evidence which has been before the Committee, as I considered the printed evidence was quite sufficient for all honourable members to base a fair opinion on as to what were the circumstances which led to the purchase of this estate. I also consider that the Committee has taken a fair and reasonable course in bringing before the House the report which has been brought up. I will give briefly my reasons for what I am now stating. A report was presented to the Committee by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), without any suggestion whatever from the Committee that he should do so. Now, I moved that the honourable gentleman's report should form the basis of the report of the Committee which should be brought before the House. I had not a seconder to that resolution. It appeared to me that Sir Robert Stout was not prepared to consider any other report than the one which he had made, and wished to be presented to the House without any comment and without any amendment whatever. Consequently I consider the Committee was quite justified in bringing forward the report which was subsequently presented to this House, and which has been read by the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins). Now, I do not want to go into the pros and cons of this case. I consider, regarding the report read by the honourable member for Christchurch City, that it was only fair to the community that they should know the decision the Committee had arrived at: but the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) has read the address of the man who is admittedly prejudiced, who was working in the interests of one side, so that I consider it only fair that they should have also, through Hansard, the report of the other side of the case as presented by counsel—Dr. Fitchett. After this has been read I think it will be unnecessary for myself or any other member of the House to say anything further, and therefore I propose to read the speech of Dr. Fitchett. Dr. Fitchett says,—

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie tells us that this inquiry is in no sense desired by him. If it had not been for him, it is needless for me to say that no inquiry would have been held. He demanded it; so did the Otago Daily Times. The inquiry is due to his speech and the newspaper correspondence, in which he took the principal part. And let me say at the outset that the business of the Committee is to determine not whether the price paid for the land was a reasonable one, but whether the persons acting for the Government have been guilty of any moral wrong. Has there been corruption on the part of the Minister or on the part of the department? The price is only remotely relevant, as showing a motive for fraud if an excessive sum were paid. Sir, if a Parliamentary Committee is to be set up to ascertain, as to every Crown bargain, whether it is a good or a bad one, Parliamentary Committees would have their hands full. The question is, whether the persons who acted for the Government exercised their judgment honestly. I certainly fail to gather what Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's position really is. Does he make a charge or does he not? He says, on the one hand, 'I make no charge against any one.'

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: I made no charge.

"Dr. Fitchett: Do you make charges now?

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: No.

"Dr. Fitchett: He says 'No'; and yet the whole trend of his cross-examination and his speech has been directed to suggest fraud. As the Minister said in his evidence, he has not the moral courage to charge him openly, but he insinuates it. All Otago rang with these indefinite charges, and he still suggests them, though he does not formulate them: and herein lies the difficulty in meeting them. With specific charges the prosecutor would be called upon to prove them. But here the Minister and his department have to meet they do not know what. All they can do is to tell the Committee everything that occurred, whilst Mr. Scobie Mackenzie stands by to pick up anything he can give a colour to. Hence the length of the inquiry; and the responsibility rests with him and not with me. Now, he tells us that the statements contained in the speech are true—every word of them. Sir, he has confined himself almost wholly to half-truths. He first says, 'I make no charges.' That is the usual way when a man means to hint what he is afraid to speak out. He says, 'I make no charges; but, but, but'—and the charges lie in the 'buts.' Then, as to the half-truths. He says Douglas is a large landowner, but he omits to say, not in the electorate.

"A Member: It is in his constituency.

"Dr. Fitchett: My instructions are that Mount Royal is not in the Waihemo constituency. Then, he says the land was let at 6d. an acre; but he omits to add, on three months' tenancy. He says the rent represents a capital value of 10s.; as if a quarterly tenancy could have any reference to capital value. And so of the rest—half-truths, every one of them. The real facts are concealed, and false inferences suggested. And yet he tells us that he neither conveyed any insinuations of jobbery, nor could anybody draw that inference from his statements. He declared that.

he never heard that imputations on the Minister were drawn from his words, and yet I showed conclusively from the paper that when one correspondent stated specifically that he and others inferred that the Minister bought this land wickedly and corruptly, in order to buy Mr. Douglas's vote, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, so far from contradicting it, treated it as correct.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: You must give the man's name; it was an anonymous letter.

"Dr. Fitchett: He says it was an anonymous letter, but he replied to it. He wrote four letters to this anonymous writer's five, and he protested against his anonymity only when he found himself in a corner, and could not escape. The whole burden of that correspondence on the part of the writer, 'Watch,' was that the Minister was accused of corruption, and that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie had failed to prove the charge. He told us that he never mentioned the Minister's name in the correspondence. That is quite true. He had put Mr. Douglas and the Minister on the same footing as conspirators in the first instance. That done, he attacked Mr. Douglas by name, knowing that the public would construe every thrust at Mr. Douglas as a thrust at the Minister. Once establish the conspiracy, and evidence against one conspirator is evidence against the other.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: I invited them to meet me, and they would not.

"Dr. Fitchett: Well, I will leave this point now. The Minister, as a public man, is open to the keenest criticism; but his complaint, and mine, is that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie lacked the courage to attack him openly, and sought to injure him by insinuation. He now comes to the Committee and coolly says he never intended the Minister to be blamed at all. Why that long cross-examination of Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Barron, if not to suggest corruption? His position is to me inexplicable. If he had a charge to make, one could understand it; if he said he had not a charge, I could understand that; but, by innuendoes of all sorts, he repeats the charge whilst he disclaims it. He makes a great deal of capital out of this petition. He says it was hatched in Wright, Stephenson, and Company's, and drawn by Mr. Douglas, and for this reason is a swindle, and does not express the opinion of the settlers. You, gentlemen, are members of Parliament. Did you ever know a petition that got itself up spontaneously? Pomahaka had been lying idle for thirty years, and, in the nature of things, there was nothing to suddenly rouse the settlers until the owner stirred. Why should he not start the petition? How else was he to get their opinion? There was no concealment on his part. He sent the petition to Turnbull, his own well-known agent for years, who openly went around with it; and there is not the slightest suggestion that he made any misrepresentation: on the contrary, people refused to sign it until they knew that Douglas was getting it up. Then, Mr. Mackenzie says that the member for the district was not communicated with, and this is the stamp of fraud. He is wrong: the member was communicated with. Mr. Douglas himself wrote to him.

Mr. Hall

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: After it was got up.

"Dr. Fitchett: No; it was not sent till the 30th August, and Mr. Douglas wrote to him about it on the 17th August. Everybody knew that Mr. Douglas was the owner of the land. Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, the member, admits that he knew. What did Mr. Douglas do that he should not have done? Mr. Thomas Mackenzie says that the signatures are genuine; he knows many of them as constituents of his own. That petition, Sir, is as honest as a petition could be, and yet Mr. Scobie Mackenzie practically bases his charges upon the fact that it was started by Mr. Douglas. There is not a scrap of evidence to show that there is anything untrue in it. I omit Mr. Stevenson, who read it and signed it. There is abundant evidence that the statements are true. Where is the wrong, I say? The fact is, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie simply seeks to divert attention from the real issue. For, even if the petition were soaked in fraud, what on earth had that to do with the Minister? He did not get it up. Then, as to Mr. Ritchie. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie seeks to make capital out of the fact that, whilst the Minister said Mr. Ritchie had nothing to do with one matter, the evidence shows that Mr. Ritchie did have something to do with another. He saw Mr. Barron, did Mr. Ritchie, and sent several letters and telegrams to his uncle, Mr. Douglas. Here, again, we have the half-truth. The Minister, of course, spoke merely of what was in his own knowledge. So far as he was concerned, Mr. Ritchie had nothing to do with the matter; and that is abundantly proved. Moreover, in no sense and in no way had Mr. Ritchie anything to do with the purchase; and it was to the purchase that the Minister was referring. You are asked to infer a plot, because Mr. Ritchie communicated with Mr. Douglas, and is in the Public Buildings—uncle and nephew—and about a property that the nephew had managed. What more natural than that the one should consult the other—spite of the Public Buildings? With regard to the petition I will say no more.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: That is very convenient.

"Dr. Fitchett: Mr. Scobie Mackenzie cannot say anything bad enough about it. It is peculiar, however, that he steadily ignores the fact that it could have had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the purchase. It was not presented till the 30th; Mr. Percy Smith left for the South the next day without having seen or heard of it; and it was not before the Board in Dunedin when the recommendation was made on which the purchase was founded. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie has been barking up the wrong tree. I refer to the petition now to show how it corroborates the Minister's statement at Palmerston. He said then that the first he heard of the matter was when the petition was presented to him.

"Mr. Green: That is not his evidence.

"Dr. Fitchett: What the Minister said, both at Palmerston and before the Committee, was that the first he knew of the Pomahaka purchase was when Mr. Thomas Mackenzie presented the petition. And Mr. Thomas Mackenzie unconsciously supports him in this, for he wired to Mr. Turnbull that the Minister was favourably disposed, and would instruct that an inspection should be made; whereas, in point of fact, instruction had been given eight days before, plainly showing that the Minister up to then had no knowledge whatever about it. Then, as to Mr. Barron. Mr. Barron set the department in motion, says Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, at the instance of Mr. Ritchie, and he did so without the authority of his superior officer: whence fraud and corruption. Sir, the whole evidence shows that he had full authority to do what he did, and that it was the proper thing to do. It was done in the ordinary departmental way. Moreover, it was not the initiation of the purchase, as Mr. Scobie Mackenzie would have you believe. The initiation of the purchase is the warrant from the Governor to the Board to inspect and value. What Mr. Barron did was antecedent to that, and altogether apart from it. It is the practice of the department to have a preliminary report made, in order to see whether the land is worth the serious attention of the Board; and in very many cases this decides the whole matter—the offer is declined, and no valuation-fees are paid. The evidence is conclusive on the point. After inquiry has thus been made, if the report says that the land is not fit for settlement the Board proceeds no further. That is what Mr. Barron did, and he had full authority for it. The telegram, too, was amply justified. He knew the property was to be offered. Mr. Adams was just about to start to visit Conical Hills, and it would be a saving of time if he could visit the two places together. It is justified, too, on higher grounds than economy. It was a wise and prudent thing to arrange for both properties being before the Board together, so that they might be compared the one against the other. I say that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie is absolutely unwarranted in speaking as he does of Mr. Barron's action as an instance of the laxity of the department. On the contrary, it shows that the department discharges its duties vigorously and well.

Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: After Mr. Ritchie had looked after it.

Dr. Fitchett: And then the reckless insinuation that Mr. Barron did what he did because he knew that some one in high position or power was behind him, and would condone the breach of all the rules of his office.

Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: As an alternative.

Dr. Fitchett: Sir, it is scandalous to suggest such a thing with not a scrap of evidence to sustain it. Again, he hints that, as Mr. Barron was in the room with the Minister when the petition was presented, and knew that a preliminary examination had been made, and said nothing to the Minister about it, there must have been a motive. Here Mr. Barron is the plotter, and the Minister the victim. The evidence, of course, is that, if Mr. Barron were in the room (of which the Minister is not absolutely certain), he would not speak while any one else was present; and there is nothing to show that he heard what was said, or that he remained in the room after Mr. Thomas Mackenzie left; or, in fact, that he knew anything about it. Then, there is another unworthy and unwarranted insinuation about what he calls indecent haste on the part of Mr. Percy Smith, and the telegrams between him and Mr. Maitland as to the Board meeting. The Surveyor-General and the Commissioner of Crown Lands are now in the plot, and all because they telegraph to one another. What are the facts? Mr. Smith starts from Wellington on his journey, having Board business to do in Canterbury, Otago, and Invercargill, and naturally wished to have the different Board meetings arranged at the different towns so as to prevent delay. Hence the telegrams—which, by the way, refer to Conical Hills as well as Pomahaka. That there was no indecent haste in the purchase is abundantly clear. Mr. Douglas was furious at the delay—and well he might be. The offer was made on the 21st August, and was not accepted till the 3rd of October. The purchase-money was not paid until about the 20th of October. Is there any indecent haste there? Mr. Scobie Mackenzie also sees some element of iniquity in the fact that Conical Hills 'drops out of sight altogether.' What are the facts again? An offer had been made to exchange, and there was no power to exchange. Moreover, the recommendation of the Board was that part of Conical Hills should be bought, and not the whole; and there was no definite offer to sell the whole, and no offer at all to sell a part. Again, there was not enough money to buy either the whole or the part. Were these not sufficient reasons why Conical Hills should drop out of sight? Was the Government to hang up the Pomahaka offer until Mr. Shennan had been induced to make an offer to sell as much as the Government had money to buy? Correspondence, inspection, Board meeting, and what not would take months, and the Pomahaka was to be hung up all that time, with the risk of losing both it and Conical Hills.

Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: The settlers never asked for Pomahaka.

Dr. Fitchett: Nor for Conical Hills. As to the question of the value of the land, the Committee will go by the evidence before it. The evidence is incontrovertible that not more than a fair price was paid. We have Mr. Adams, who, though not a professional valuer, is the Chief Surveyor of land in Otago, and has of necessity a wide knowledge of values. We have the Commissioner of Crown Lands in Otago, a man with perhaps wider experience of land-values than any man in the district. We have Mr. Turton, who, as District Land Registrar, knows more of land-prices than anybody in Otago, for all dealings pass through his hands. We have Mr. Dallas, a professional valuer, who for many years has valued for the Government, the county, and for private persons. We have Mr. Hughan, the Ranger, a man whose business it is to inspect and value land. We have Mr. Percy Smith, the Surveyor-General. We have Mr. Cameron, of Waitahuna, who specially examined the property, and also Mr. C. Begg, whose word and judgment carry weight wherever he is known. Are all these gentlemen dishonest or incompetent?

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: Hughan said nothing of the kind.

"Dr. Fitchett: His evidence was taken by the Board, and he agreed with Mr. Adams and Mr. Dallas. Are all these gentlemen, I repeat, dishonest or incompetent? Last, but not least, we have the fact that, in spite of the abuse showered on the land by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and his friends—cold and ungenerous soil; worth no more than a capital sum of 10s. an acre, and so forth—people come forward and voluntarily take up 5,230 acres at an average rental of 3s. 4d. They have paid their rent punctually to date, and the yearly return represents over 4 per cent. on the whole capital sum—purchase—money, roads, &c.—whilst about 2,200 acres are still to be disposed of. What have you on the other side? With the offer of the Committee to pay the expenses of all the witnesses Mr. Scobie Mackenzie liked to name, he can only produce one, and that is Mr. Stevenson, who qualifies himself by blandly admitting that he read and signed the petition. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie talks of the taxation value as being lower than the purchase price; and so it should be. Valuers do not like objections and reviews. Mr. Percy Smith says his experience is that the land-tax value is 20 to 25 per cent. lower than the selling-value. That Mr. Dallas bought his land from Mr. Allen at the land-tax value shows simply that he made a very good bargain. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie says the offer was made by Mr. Dallas, and accepted by Mr. Allen. Precisely. If Mr. Allen had declined Mr. Dallas would have sprung. The evidence shows that the land-tax valuation of Pomahaka was uniform and fair. The price realised for Popotunoa at the sale bears the same proportion to its land-tax value as in the case of Pomahaka. This shows that the valuations were uniform. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie urges the evidence of the bank; but we all know the difference between a mortgage and a purchase. The manager of a bank wants all the security he can get, quite irrespective of his advance. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie tried hard to make the inspector say the property was not worth the advance, but he did not quite succeed, anxious though the witness was to help him. He could not get more from him than that it was not a banking security—nor was it. Banks, we know, have been taught bitter lessons of late as to the folly of lending on non-liquid securities, and the Union Bank has profited by the lessons. It is indisputable that at the time all the banks were calling in their moneys all round. It was suggested that this particular advance was called in for the purpose of sending money to Victoria. I cannot say as to that; but unquestionably the crisis in Australia had to do with it. Mr.

Mr. Hall

Scobie Mackenzie did not gain much from the bank's evidence; but it shows the influence he can exert, and has exerted, for the purposes of this inquiry, for the bank has given him access to everything relating to Mr. Douglas's affairs.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: I wish I could get any information.

"Dr. Fitchett: Otherwise the bank would never have placed in his possession the papers and figures of its customer.

"A Member: Has it been done?

"Dr. Fitchett: Yes, undoubtedly. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie gathered from the bank's letters and papers—

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: That is distinctly not true.

"Dr. Fitchett: I am not prepared to say that he actually saw the papers, but he assuredly got their contents more than a week before the bank gave evidence. He cross-questioned Mr. Johnstone and Mr. Ritchie about a telegram the existence of which he could only have learned from the bank, because it was mentioned only in the letter from the Union Bank at Dunedin to the Union Bank here. There is no possible question but that the information was placed at his disposal by the bank.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: It was not so.

"Dr. Fitchett: Where else could you have learned of it? Returning to the question of value, I submit that subsequent sales can have little bearing upon the matter. When valuing a property for a purchase to be made—and that is the point—what was a fair value at the time? One cannot avail oneself of what is going to happen some time in the future. Now, all previous prices show that Pomahaka was worth more than £2 10s. Eleven hundred acres were sold in 1889 at £3 12s. an acre—and not the best of the estate. Some sections were bought in for £3. The evidence shows that Mr. Douglas had been always asking £3 10s. per acre for the whole, and £4 for parts. He refused £3 for large blocks, because he did not want the eyes to be picked out of his property. He wanted to dispose of the whole or none. He refused offers to lease for a term at 3s. an acre. As to the Popotunoa properties, admitting as I do that their price was low, I submit that there is ample reason for it. The demand for land is limited, and if thirty thousand acres are thrown on the market at once you ruin the market price. Then, the sale of Popotunoa was, in effect, a forced sale; the owner was dead, and the trustees were winding up the estate, so they put it all in the market—thirty thousand acres, to bring what it could.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: There was a reserve.

"Dr. Fitchett: I understand there was not. The whole 80,000 acres were sold, and it is absurd to contend that the price realised is any indication of the value of Pomahaka twelve months before. Mr. Johnstone's evidence is that Mr. Logan would not look at anything like £3 5s. for the Waipahi portion (which sold for £2 2s.), whilst as for Popotunoa proper he never would entertain the idea of selling at all. Moreover, the homestead was 'a white elephant,' and the grass was worked out.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: That was Green Hills that had been run out.

"Dr. Fitchett: It was the same owner, and sold at the same time; all the properties were on the market at once. I submit that these are ample reasons for the low prices they realised, and they can have no bearing on the price paid for Pomahaka. Then, it is suggested that, when the bank wanted its money, Wright, Stephenson, and Co. and everybody else refused the security—a half-truth again. The evidence is that Wright, Stephenson, and Co. were not bankers, and Douglas did not want a fixed mortgage at all. What he wanted was a temporary advance from the savings-bank pending a sale, and the application was not entertained by the bank because it deals only in mortgages for a fixed term. At this particular crisis sound men might well find it hard to lay their hands on £9,000 on demand. It is notorious that the banks were calling up advances on all sides, and no person or firm, however wealthy, could conveniently find nine thousand sovereigns. That was why Wright, Stephenson, and Co. did not want to advance the amount, and that was why Mr. Douglas found himself in straits. It was not a question of security. No bank would look at a security, however gilt-edged. Can the Committee have any doubt that Mr. Douglas valued this land at more than £2 10s.? He refuses to accept 8s. an acre rent for it for a fixed term, and at one time he had refused £4 10s. for it. It is indisputable that Mr. Douglas firmly believed that he was not getting a full price from the Government at £2 10s., and, if so, that disposes of all questions of fraud on his part. If he knew he was foisting his property on the Government at a price above its value, would he not have promptly taken the offer when it was made? And yet what does he do? On the 25th September he gets the offer of £2 10s. Does he jump at it? On the 27th he wires asking to split the difference between £2 10s. and £3 10s. On the 2nd October he is told the Government cannot increase its offer. Does he snatch at it? No; he wires, 'Am writing you,' and writes on the 3rd reluctantly accepting. He allows eight days to elapse before he accepts the offer. Is that the conduct of a man who thinks he is getting an excessive price? He goes to Dunedin to consult Wright, Stephenson, and Co., and they tell you that they had great difficulty in inducing him to accept. I say that the evidence of his good faith is not to be got over in any way. All the evidence at your disposal goes to show the same thing—namely, that he was selling the land at what he firmly believed to be a great deal less than its value. Mr. Scobie Mackenzie asks you to believe that because the correspondence between Mr. Douglas and Mr. Ritchie is not produced it must have been desperately compromising. Now, I ask you to draw precisely the opposite conclusion. His theory is that Mr. Douglas and Mr. Ritchie are in a wicked plot, and burn the correspondence to conceal the plot. But if they were in a plot, if they were so dishonest as to conspire to defraud the Government, it is eminently unlikely that they would stick at such a trifle as the fabricating of letters to suit their purpose. What easier for unscrupulous conspirators such as he makes them out to be than to sit down and write a few harmless letters to one another, and then produce them? Self-serving evidence is always easy to get, and that is why the Courts exclude it. The fact, then, that they do not produce letters is evidence that there was nothing wrong in them. Depend upon it, if they had produced them, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie would have had nothing to say about them. As regards the letter to Mr. Ritchie, to which Mr. Douglas referred in the newspaper, it merely shows that Mr. Douglas did not know of anything to conceal. Otherwise he would never have disclosed it himself. As to the telegram from Mr. Ritchie to Mr. Barron, about which Mr. Scobie Mackenzie makes mountains of fraud because it was not on the file, the same considerations apply. How does the existence of that telegram become known to the Committee? Through Mr. Ritchie himself. He volunteered it.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: No. I found it out first, and drew it from him. It would never have been known at all if I had not had an inkling of it.

"Dr. Fitchett: That is not correct. He stated it quite voluntarily.

"Mr. Scobie Mackenzie: Yes; after I discovered it.

"Dr. Fitchett: There is nothing to show that you discovered it. Indeed, how could you? Mr. Barron had himself forgotten it, and it was not on the file. It is manifest that if there had been anything to conceal about it Mr. Ritchie need not have disclosed it. Why should not Mr. Douglas wire to his nephew asking him to try and hurry up the money? And why should not Mr. Ritchie send the message on to Mr. Barron? What more natural, and what more innocent? And that the telegram was merely that, and nothing more, is shown by the fact that Mr. Barron does wire to Mr. Douglas in reply. That reply is on the file. The fact is that whenever, in the course of this inquiry, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie discovers that a document does not exist, or is mislaid, it straightway becomes of gigantic importance to him—not that there would be anything in it if produced, but simply because he knows it cannot be produced. I will now summarise the position of the Minister and the department. The evidence shows that the Minister had singularly little to do with this transaction. He first comes into connection with it when the petition is presented, and he sends the petition to the department in the ordinary way. Next he sends the Governor's warrant to inspect. The next thing is when Mr. Percy Smith waits on him with the recommendation of the Board at Dunedin. The Minister sends this to Cabinet, and from Cabinet to the Governor.

Then comes the authority to make an offer to Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Douglas's reply asking that the difference be split. This request the Minister declines. Not much conspiracy about that, I suppose. That is absolutely all the Minister has had to do with this matter. As for the department, the evidence clearly shows that it has done nothing save what is usual and proper. Mr. Barron was acting within his authority in instructing the preliminary inspection, and, with the exception of the telegram to Mr. Douglas about the purchase-money, he did nothing else in the matter—absolutely nothing. I have no concern with Mr. Douglas, but it is equally clear that he did nothing save what he was justified in doing. He was anxious to sell—accepted a lower price by reason of the bank pressure than he otherwise would have done,—and worried about the delay in payment, as well he might; that is all. My purpose has been to lay before the Committee every fact and every paper connected with the matter. That I have done; and I submit that not a breath rests on the integrity of either the Minister or the department, and that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's hints and innuendoes have been proved absolutely reckless and baseless. One word more and I have done. It is to show his utter recklessness. He declared in Palmerston, and he repeated it here, that the Minister's power in the matter of these purchases is unlimited—he can override the Board and do anything. Sir, if he knows the Act, this is dishonest; if he does not, it is disgraceful. The Minister has less to do with a purchase than any single member of the Board. The Minister himself can do nothing. The Governor in Council—that is, the Cabinet—purchases 'on the recommendation of the Board.' That means that the Board determines both the land to be bought and the price to be paid, and the Cabinet cannot vary it. The most it can do is to decline to buy at all. As for the Minister, he is merely a member of the Cabinet, having an equal voice with every other member. In suggesting, therefore, to the people of Palmerston the facilities for corruption that existed by reason of the unlimited power of the Minister to buy what he liked and at what price he liked, Mr. Scobie Mackenzie either shamefully distorted the law or was shamefully ignorant of it."

4.30. Mr. CARNCROSS.—It is not my intention to keep the House more than a few minutes. I do not intend to make a speech; but it seems to me that so small a value is placed on time in this House that if I did occupy some considerable amount of time, judging from the action of honourable members to-day, there would be no objection to it. I only rise for the purpose of entering my emphatic protest against the exhibition, as I consider it, which we have had this afternoon. I think it has been a most pitiable spectacle, and utterly unworthy of men who are sent here to represent the constituencies, and to do what they can for the good of the country. Here we are in the dying hours of the session. We have two most important Bills yet to put through—

Mr. Hall

I refer to the two Mining Bills. On the passing of one of these Bills very large and important interests depend. I am not exaggerating when I state that at the present moment there are men, women, and children on our Otago goldfields who are actually living on the very verge of starvation pending the passing of this measure. We know that; and yet, instead of setting ourselves in real earnest to carry out the business of the session, we have had an exhibition of the description that we have had this afternoon—that is, of men taking up the time allotted to them in reading from printed reports, and "gabbling"—I can call it nothing else, because they were running against time, and trying how much they could possibly squeeze into Hansard. We saw this done; and when one man had finished another taking up time in doing the same thing. I say such conduct is quite unworthy of Parliament. I do not know when it will come to an end; but I hope it will be very shortly. As I have said, I only rose to enter as emphatic a protest as I possibly could, and to say that if the result of the waste of time which we have had right through this afternoon shall be that the Bill which I refer to cannot reach the statute-book this session it will be an everlasting disgrace to this Parliament. I hope I have not taken up too much time. I have simply contented myself with entering what I consider to be an emphatic protest against such waste of time.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Before you put the question, Sir, I wish to speak to a point of order. Will anything of this matter be printed in Hansard with the exception of what was read?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Only what was read by members in the House will appear in their speeches in Hansard.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Then, I merely say that I wish one-third of the stuff had not been read.

The House divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

AYES, 41.

Buddo	Joyce	Pere
Buick	Kelly, W.	Pinkerton
Cadman	Lawry	Reeves
Carncross	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carnell	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McLauchlan	Stevens
Flatman	McNab	Tanner
Guinness	Meredith	Thompson
Hall-Jones	Miller	Ward
Harris	Mills	Willis.
Hogg	Montgomery	Tellers.
Houston	Morrison	Collins
Hutchison, W.	Parata	Hall.

NOES, 15.

Buchanan	Mackenzie, T.	Te Ao
Button	Massey	Wilson.
Earnshaw	McGuire	Tellers.
Fraser	Mitchelson	Bell
Green	Newman	Russell, W. R.
Lang

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Carroll	Stout
Kelly, J. W.	Hutchison, G.
McKenzie, R.	Duthie
Steward.	Allen.

Majority for, 26.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, I would recall to the minds of honourable members, if it is necessary, the fact that it is desirable our business should be concluded, at all events, by to-morrow evening. Many honourable members have made arrangements for going to their homes. The subject-matter now under discussion must be submitted by every member of the House to be important, and more particularly in so far as the Minister of Lands and the officers of his department are concerned. It has always been held that where a Minister's honour has been impugned or his integrity impeached he was in duty bound to prove his innocence and protect himself against such attacks. I feel sure—in fact, what I have heard during the debate has led me to the conclusion—that there is scarcely a single member of this House but will entirely indorse the report of the Committee, upholding as it does the integrity and honour of my colleague the Minister of Lands and that of his officers. Then, I think it will also be admitted that when the honour of a department, or of any officers holding high positions, is concerned—where their honour is impugned—where it is the fact, as in this case, that the country has to some extent been led to believe that some of the officers—one in particular has allowed personal feeling to sway his judgment—in fact, that owing to the pressure of a relative he has not done his duty honestly to the country—I think it is clear that, when a stigma like this has been cast on an officer holding a high position, unless that stigma was removed there would be a feeling that the matter had not been cleared up. It was necessary, therefore, that this should be done, and in doing what my colleague has done, as he told the House, he did it more on behalf of his department than of himself, believing that after many years of honourable service no officer in the department would be a party to any transaction that would be dishonourable. I think, under these circumstances, the House will agree with me he was quite justified in having the matter referred to a Select Committee. At the time the debate commenced very few members, I think, thought that it would last during all Saturday's sitting, and also have taken the better part of to-day. I may say it has been said by one holding a very high position in this colony that it was absolutely necessary this should be done. I myself have refused, as honourable members know, during the session to permit matters where there had been indefinite charges made to go to a Select Committee, and if ever I had anything to prove to me that the course I was taking was a wise one it is what has happened here in relation to this matter. I shall probably recall, by-and-by, to honourable members who have been twitting my colleague with what has taken place in regard to referring this matter to a Committee, when they ask for Committees of investigation, what has taken place in relation to this Committee,—more particularly to the senior member for Wellington City, for there is no doubt that, on the Minister of Lands moving that the matter be referred to the Waste Lands Committee, he complimented my colleague on his so doing. He said it was necessary to do so, and that my honourable colleague took a proper course in doing it. I find now that honourable members say we are not to take notice of what a Committee says or what its report may be. I do not think that odium should be thrown on any Committee. This Committee seems to have performed its duties efficiently, and it is quite clear that the Committee has unanimously acquitted my colleague, and unanimously acquitted the department. The only question upon which some members of the Committee differed was as to the admission of evidence, which there is evidently some diversity of opinion about. This being the case, would it not be better for all concerned that we should bring the matter to a close? I may say the responsibility for the long debate that has taken place cannot be said to rest upon myself or upon the Government. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) appears to resent the finding of the Committee, and also what has been said. Well, I make every allowance for the honourable gentleman, and am bound to do so, because he is personally interested, and there is no member in the House, I suppose, would feel this matter so keenly as that honourable gentleman. That being so, I do not think it is necessary to say anything further. I think the proper course to adopt is to allow the Minister to reply. There are one or two Bills left that we can put through in half an hour. Then, let us get through the public works and supplementary estimates and go home with kindly feelings towards each other. We should never part bad friends, nor let animosities rankle in our breasts, because we never know what may happen. As an example of the uncertainty of life and of what may happen, our dear old friend, the late Hon. Mr. Dignan, who was on his way home from his parliamentary duties, has suddenly been called away. I say to all members of the House, whatever may happen during the session, when we come to its close let us part good friends. I should not consider it consistent with what is due to my colleague, whose public character has been impugned, did I permit Parliament to be prorogued without first having this matter dealt with. Therefore the course he has taken in this matter has my indorsement, and the Cabinet are unanimous in supporting him in the course he has taken. I do say this: When charges are made by public men against each other we may differ in opinion, but when it comes to the integrity and honesty of a member of the Government, and when charges such as were involved in this instance are made,—for though not made definitely and distinctly, still a serious reflection was cast,—it does not matter what may be the opinion of the person making the statement, but what the outside world may gather is what we are bound to consider, and we know that the outside world is only too keen to put an extreme interpretation on matters of this kind. That is the world. It has been so since the world commenced, and will be to the finish. I trust I have not said anything that will prolong this debate. I have explained the position of the Government, and I ask that the Minister shall be allowed to reply, and that we shall go on and complete the business of the session without acrimony or unpleasantness.

Mr. PIRANI.—Before the Minister replies I wish to spend five minutes over this debate. The Government themselves have wasted almost two days over it, and I do not think they ought to be the parties in the House to begrudge any member another five minutes. I merely rise for the purpose of adding my protest to that of the honourable member for the Taieri at the scandalous waste of time that has taken place in the House during two days over this debate, because nothing is proved by the debate except the fact that members can slang each other on both sides and end by adopting the report, because, no doubt, it was a foregone conclusion from the first that the report would be adopted. I think—and I believe the House thinks—the Minister ought to have been well satisfied with formally moving the adoption of the report, and saying a few words in defence of the Government, instead of the debate being prolonged and business of fifty times more importance to Ministers and to the country at large being shelved because Ministers themselves have personal grievances.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I do not think the House will accuse me of having wasted its time in this matter. Honourable members who were present here when the report was laid on the table will remember that two members on the Opposition side immediately got up and asked if an opportunity would be given to discuss the report—I allude to the leader of the Opposition and the honourable member for Patea; and my colleague the Premier said, "Yes; an opportunity will be given." If this promise had not been carried out, and a motion put on the Order Paper to discuss the matter, we should have been immediately told that we were afraid to have it discussed openly in view of the country and of the House. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing for the people of the country to judge of this subject when they read the evidence taken before the Committee. Some honourable members have made a great deal of it. Well, there it is for the country to see, and any impartial person can come to no other conclusion than that the Committee's report is correct and in accordance with the evidence. One or two words with reference to what has fallen from the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. He said there was no necessity for the inquiry because no charge was ever made. But the honourable gentleman lives in a part of the colony where they did not see or know the feeling that existed in the Waihemo district and in Otago on the subject. I venture to say that those who come from the South know that the charges were believed by a great number of people, notably in Dunedin and Waihemo. In that district during the election Mr. Scobie Mackenzie's political supporters paraded this matter up and down the country. They declared that it was a charge, and was meant as a charge. Nobody knew this better than Mr. Scobie Mackenzie himself, who allowed it to go abroad without taking the opportunity to contradict it either on the platform or in the public Press. On the contrary, he and his friends repeated it over and over again in the Press long after the election was over. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay tried to make out that the Government appointed Mr. Dallas valuer. That is not correct. The Government did not appoint Mr. Dallas; the Land Purchase Board appointed him. Mr. Crombie, of the Land-tax Department, who was a member of the Board, recommended him to be appointed, and selected him as an old land-tax valuer who had given great satisfaction. That was the reason he was appointed. It was only after Mr. Percy Smith came back that I knew Mr. Dallas was valuer for the Board; so that the Government had nothing to do with the appointment. Much has been said about the fact that Mr. Ritchie set the department in motion. He did nothing of the kind. Mr. Barron set the department in motion, and was quite right in doing so. Permit me to tell the House that during last year 177 offers were made to the Board to purchase land, and, out of those 177, there were 108 that were dropped, because the department made a preliminary inquiry and found that the land was not suitable. That was all that was done in connection with the Pomahaka. Mr. Barron sent a telegram to Mr. Adams, who was going to Conical Hills, to save time and expense by looking at Pomahaka to see if it was worth purchasing. It was simply a preliminary inquiry made in the same way as in the 108 other cases, and I venture to say if the Government had not made such preliminary inquiries the Minister would have been accused of wasting the public money in getting the Board to go to the expense of paid valuers, Board meetings, and so forth, for land not suitable for settlement. Now I will come to the undue haste in connection with the matter. The purchasing of the estate extended over a period of seven weeks. And what occurred lately in the other House? The Hon. Mr. Bowen charged the Government with delay in regard to another estate in Canterbury, when the owner got the answer within a month. The whole thing was done in a month in Canterbury, and then we were accused of delay. Seven weeks were spent in this matter of the Pomahaka Estate, and we are accused of undue haste. There was no undue haste.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. Douglas was anxious to sell his property—no doubt about that; and any man who wants to sell naturally does not want the thing to hang over indefinitely. He thought us too slow, and worried the department with telegrams. Now let me come to the honourable member for Wairarapa. He said I ought to have given my services to the country in giving my own knowledge of the land. Do honourable gentlemen expect me to go myself and inspect every estate in New Zealand that is offered to the Government? How could they expect it? It would be impossible for me to do so, and I must necessarily rely on the reports of the officers of the department and the Board. Why is a Board set up? For the purpose of making inquiry and reporting to the Minister; and it is the duty of the Minister to be guided by the Board, as I was in this matter; and everything done in this matter was done in the ordinary way by the Board. And honourable gentlemen who know the members of that Board know quite well that they are all honest, upright servants of the colony, and would not be swayed by the Minister or anybody else.

50. Now I come to one or two remarks made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). He no doubt was advocating the case of his brother-in-law and the Union Bank, for I understand he is solicitor for that bank in Wellington. When we have an honourable gentleman appearing in those capacities we have to take his statements with a considerable grain of salt. I have no objection to the honourable member taking the part of his relative, and I think he did perfectly right so far as that is concerned, but in doing that he should not have accused me of being unfair to people outside the House. If I spoke warmly—and I did, no doubt about it—I spoke because I felt warmly. The people of whom I spoke have never lost an opportunity of stabbing me behind my back. As for the inspector of the Union Bank, I say again that he came and gave evidence before the Committee which was not correct, and it was only when he was told that his statement would be disproved that he again came to the Committee and put his evidence straight. The insinuation which he made was that Mr. Douglas was in Wellington on the very day the purchase was put in motion. He came before the Committee and swore that Mr. Douglas was in his office in Wellington on that day; and it was only when Mr. Douglas offered to prove that he was not there, and had not been there for months before, that he came back and withdrew his statement. He withdrew it under compulsion. When I charge that gentleman with doing that, Mr. Bell accuses me of being unfair. What did the honourable gentleman do? He referred to the whole of my department, and to the Land Purchase Commissioners, and accused them of all the things he could lay his tongue upon.

Mr. BELL.—I said not one word about the officers of the department or about the Land Purchase Commissioners.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I will leave the public to judge of the honourable member's speech when it appears in Hansard. Did he not make a charge against Mr. Ritchie? Now, what is the position? Mr. Ritchie managed Mr. Douglas's property for a number of years before he became the head of the Stock Department. I am sure honourable members will admit that it would not be out of place for Mr. Douglas to consult his nephew, who managed his property for so many years, on a private matter connected with the property he had managed. That was all that was done in the matter, and the honourable gentleman knows it perfectly well. Then as to the report. He says it was drawn by my instructions. He is entirely incorrect again. I had nothing to do with it; and, indeed, throughout the whole inquiry I refrained from even attending the proceedings, or doing anything except give my own evidence. But I cannot waste further time over the honourable gentleman. I might say this with regard to the valuation, of which so much has been made in connection with this property: Honourable gentlemen opposite, in referring to the valuation, gave instances of the sale of properties miles away from Pomahaka. They never have referred to the fact that a large portion of Pomahaka was sold by Mr. Douglas at £3 12s. an acre. Farmers paid for that land, and are doing well on it; and not only that, but they have signed this petition in order to get more of the land. The evidence of Mr. Stevenson has been quoted, as the only unbiassed witness; but what about the evidence of Mr. Begg and Mr. Johnstone. Neither of these witnesses is of the same colour as the Government, and both said the land was good value for the money. Now I come to a few remarks made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) in connection with this report. As usual, he has found fault with the report. He says it has not been properly drafted, of course. He says it is not judicial, and so forth. Then, he found fault with the inquiry being held at all.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said that I found fault with the bringing-up of the battle of the election at the inquiry.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I understood the honourable gentleman to find fault with the inquiry being made at all. Let me quote the opinion of an honourable member of high legal authority on the subject. This is what he said:—

"He thought the Minister of Lands was to be commended for taking this course, and for sending this matter to a Committee. When a grave charge had been made against a Minister, he should have an opportunity of explaining the matter before an impartial tribunal. He presumed the honourable gentleman would send for the people who made the allegations, in order that they might be examined before the Committee and give evidence on oath. The House ought to agree to the motion."

Who made that statement? Why, the honourable gentleman himself.

Sir R. STOUT.—When?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—When the motion was before the House for appointing this Committee.

Sir R. STOUT.—The honourable gentleman has no right to refer to a past debate when I have no opportunity of explaining.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—What are the facts in connection with the report? The Committee were unanimous except on two points. One thing they differed upon was, whether there should be any censure put upon my opponent; the other thing was, that they had a doubt about the valuation. Those are the only two points of difference between the report that was adopted and the report that he himself prepared. I ask honourable members to consider this matter from a fair point of view—as to the value of this property. Is it likely that twenty-one settlers would take up this land at the price put upon it by the Government if they thought the price was too high? Everything bad about the land that could be said had been said over and over again by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie and his friends. And yet these twenty-one settlers persisted in trusting to their own judgment. They examined the land, and took up 5,230 acres, to the vast disgust, no doubt, of Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. And how have they done on the land? Instead of being ruined—as was predicted and hoped—they have paid their rent to date. The last return from Pomahaka shows that 1,250 acres have been broken up ready for cropping, and will be in crop this year. Houses and a school are being built, and settlement is going on there. The value of fences and buildings is £905, and the total value of all improvements is £1,517. Now, is it likely that these farmers would go on improving their properties if they did not see their way at all clear to pay their rent? With regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Bruce, the honourable gentleman was very unjust to myself. I am very sorry he was so, because I have known him ever since he was a boy, and I never thought he would stand up in this House and do the injustice to me which he did the other night. He insinuated that, because I stated before the Committee that Mr. Douglas some ten months before this purchase was entered into mentioned the matter to me during a conversation at Palmerston, correspondence had been going on between us during that time, and had been destroyed. I never spoke to Mr. Douglas on the subject, nor have I had any communication with him; yet the honourable member for Bruce insinuated that there was correspondence which had been destroyed.

Mr. GREEN.—Not with you.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—There was no correspondence in any shape or form. A portion of my evidence before the Committee was distorted in such a way by the honourable member for Bruce as to insinuate that correspondence had been carried on between myself and Mr. Douglas relating to this property. I again say that there never was any correspondence. Is it surprising that Mr. Douglas should speak to me about his property, seeing that I was advertising in the public Press inviting offers of lands for settlement? Mr. Douglas spoke to me in the street in Palmerston; he said he noticed I was advertising for properties, and he added that Pomahaka was for sale. I said, "If you have an application to make, make it to Mr. Maitland"; and that was the first and last heard of it by me till I saw the petition when it came to Wellington. With regard to Mr. Barron, he is an officer high in the service of the country, and he puts many things in motion of his own accord in the first place without the Minister knowing it. It is impossible for the Minister always to know the position of any matter unless there is some preliminary inquiry. Mr. Barron knows that before the Minister can decide on anything he will require to have some knowledge of the facts. Therefore Mr. Barron makes himself acquainted with the facts. That is exactly what he did in this case, in the same way as he has done in many other cases. Knowing that Mr. Adams was going to Conical Hills, he telegraphed to him to look at Pomahaka. In doing that in this and other cases, a large sum of money has been saved to the Government. A hundred and seventy-seven properties were offered to the Government last year, and if we had sent every one of these cases to the Board without any preliminary inquiry as to their suitability for settlement or otherwise it would mean great expense to the country. We knew we could only take up land of a certain class—we could not take up pastoral land. It is nothing new or extraordinary that these preliminary inquiries should be made, and evidence was given before the Committee to that effect. That point was magnified to an extraordinary degree by certain honourable gentlemen, because it suited them to do so; and the same with regard to the missing telegram. The contents of that telegram were made clear by the papers. It was a request by Mr. Douglas through Mr. Ritchie for the payment of the overdue purchase-money. That has also been magnified into an enormous thing. Now I come to the honourable member for Patea. He held a brief for Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. He told me so himself—that he intended to make a speech.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Not a brief.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I always look upon a lawyer who defends any one else as holding a brief for him. I venture to say he made an excellent speech—an amusing speech. I am quite prepared to give him a certificate to Mr. Scobie Mackenzie that he has earned his fee. But I say the honourable gentleman never touched the report at all. He never touched the evidence. He danced all round it, and made a beautiful dramatic effect, but I venture to say that when his speech is read in Hansard it will be found to contain a great deal of chaff and very few grains of wheat. Now I come to the honourable member for Waikouaiti. If any good thing has come out of this inquiry, it is that we have got a speech from the honourable member for Waikouaiti. During the whole session the honourable gentleman has been quite dumb. He has never been able to raise his voice in the interests of the constituency which he came here to represent. The honourable gentleman made a speech on this matter; but in respect to important policy measures he has been silent. The only occasion on which he could summon up courage to make a speech was when he wanted to support Mr. Scobie Mackenzie against myself. Of course the honourable gentleman knows a number of the people I referred to the other night, and I have no doubt he looks upon them as men of such high standing that no one should dare to refer to them in this House. He referred to my remarks in connection with the gentleman in Dunedin known as John McFarlane Ritchie, of Benohau fame. He said that the statements made would not be borne out; but I could prove a great deal more than I stated if I chose and had the time at my disposal. I could show what the Judge of the Supreme Court said in summing up that case of the Benohau runs in connection with Scott's imprisonment, and I think I could prove that the Judge of the Supreme Court was very much more severe upon Mr. John McFarlane Ritchie than I was. And what did the honourable gentleman ask the House to believe? That these were the only honest men in Otago—that the only honest men in the country were Mr. Scobie Mackenzie, John McFarlane Ritchie, and the editor of the Otago Daily Times—that they were to be taken in preference to everybody else in the colony, so far as honesty and straightforwardness were concerned. Now, respecting the Silverpeak-Cottesbrook dummy cases and the Waikouaiti dummy cases, the honourable gentleman said that I did not make correct statements; but when I brought the matter up in the House the other night I had not the documents before me; and he said it was the Otago Land Board that brought that matter to light. Well, I have since looked the matter up, and I have the facts here, and I must refresh the honourable gentleman's memory on the subject. I find that on the 28th of June, 1883, I moved a motion in this House, "That a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of making a complete inquiry into the alleged evasions of the provisions of the Waste Lands Act in the Provincial District of Otago: the Committee to consist of" so-and-so.

Mr. GREEN.—That is long after the Cottesbrook cases.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No, it was not. If honourable gentlemen will turn to Volume III. of the Appendices to the Journals of the House of Representatives, 1883, they will find the whole of the evidence given before the Committee of this House. That was the evidence that was laid before the Waste Lands Board of Otago, and that was what the Board acted upon.

Mr. GREEN.—No; it was evidence taken by the Board.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The Otago Land Board made an inquiry, but was unable to proceed or hold a proper inquiry until the Act was amended by myself and Mr. Rolleston: that amendment gave the opportunity for the inquiry. The honourable gentleman need not try to correct me.

Sir R. STOUT.—The only point on which the honourable member is incorrect is that the Waste Lands Committee got the evidence. They did not act on the evidence taken in the House; they took evidence.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—They did not act on the evidence taken in the House, but they called the same people, who gave the same evidence that had been dragged out of the witnesses by myself. Will the honourable gentleman deny that? And who searched out the evidence? It was done before a Committee of this House. Of course, you had the same witnesses before you in Dunedin, and got the same evidence, and came to a conclusion on it. I know the case too well. The honourable gentleman was very unfortunate in referring to it. He has a history in connection with that dummy case, and the honourable gentleman knows what was said about him at the time, both in the public Press and by the public. Did he not lose his seat in the House through his action on the Waste Lands Board at that time in connection with that inquiry? I think the honourable gentleman was very unfortunate in referring to that, because I have a very good memory, and I remember the unfortunate position he was in in Otago on the subject. Well, Sir, the honourable gentleman, the member for Waikouaiti, stated that he had known the Minister for a long time. I have known the honourable gentleman for a long time. We have both been in the Provincial Council of Otago, and I would bring to his remembrance a scene that took place there twenty years ago, when I did not act the part of Judas Iscariot to the Government of which he was a member. Does the honourable gentleman remember the scene that took place in the Provincial Council of Otago when he occupied a seat upon the Ministerial benches, when the Ministry was met with a vote of want of confidence, and when he was told to get up and defend the Government of which he was a member, and declined to do so, and then appeared next day upon the Government benches with the very men who had put him and his colleagues out of office on the previous night? Does he remember that? I venture to say that he does. And from that day to the present time he has had a certain amount of animosity against the present Minister of Lands. And why? Because John McKenzie on that occasion told him what he thought of him.

Mr. GREEN.—That is quite as correct as your other statements.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Does the honourable gentleman want to go back to history? I can give him any amount of it. The honourable gentleman and myself were elected about the same time to the Provincial Council, and for a number of years we pulled together. I voted for him on the night I have referred to, but to my astonishment next day I saw him on the same benches in the same position with the crowd that had turned him out. Can he refer to any page in my history of that nature? Can he get up in this House and say that the Minister of Lands has ever been guilty of deserting his colleagues or his political supporters in a case like that? I venture to say he cannot. Well, I am just about done now. I say the Committee that tried this case was a fair Committee. We are told that it was a packed Committee. It was not packed. It was set up for another purpose. It was set up as the Waste Lands Committee, and a large number of members on that Committee were not supporters of the present Ministry or the Minister of Lands. There was Sir Robert Stout. I do not put him down as a personal opponent, but I think it cannot be said that he has been very much in love with the Government this session. Then, there was Mr. Lang, who is not a supporter of the Government; Mr. Thomas Mackenzie, who is not a supporter of Government; and Mr. Green himself, and I am sure none will accuse him of being a Government supporter. All those gentlemen had an opportunity of putting questions to the witnesses who came before them, and Mr. Green, at any rate, exercised that right to the fullest extent. He was, all the time that he was on the Committee, on a fishing expedition, trying to see what he could discover against the Minister of Lands or the department. In that fishing excursion he had a full opportunity of bringing out anything he could, and I say that, upon the evidence that was elicited, I am quite willing that the settlers of New Zealand should judge of the whole matter in connection with the Pomahaka business. Now, let me say further that nothing has been brought out against the department or against myself that we need in any way be ashamed of. We did our duty—nothing more and nothing less—as the Committee unanimously found. In connection with the question of value, I ask honourable gentlemen to wait. I ask the honourable member for Wairarapa to wait till we see how the property will turn out. If these settlers remain on the land, if they pay their rents and settle the country, if they make good homes for themselves, and a good living, will it not be shown that the Government did not pay too much?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No. They have been made to pay a higher rental than they need have paid.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Sir, the honourable gentleman can be satisfied with nothing. The settlers would not have paid what they did if land in that part of the country had been obtainable at a lower price, or on better terms. Well, time will show; and I am willing to allow time to prove whether the Pomahaka has been purchased at too high a price or not. If the settlers do not grow discontented it will not be for want of the honourable gentleman's efforts to make them so. Now one word more. When it is said that that Board had nothing before them but the evidence of Mr. Dallas as to value, that is all moonshine. Mr. Maitland knew the property; Mr. Adams knew the property; Mr. Hughan knew the property, and no one will say he is not a good judge of land, and he reported on it. Then, there was Mr. Turton, the Registrar of the Lands Department, who went to the trouble to pick out the value of the properties alongside—the prices given for the lands, and the mortgages on the lands—and he took everything before the Board. Then, we had Mr. Crombie there, the Land-tax Commissioner, who had the values of all the properties alongside. That Board, after deliberately going into the whole of the evidence, and considering it carefully, came to the conclusion that the land was worth £2 10s. an acre. I offered the price the Board recommended, and if honourable members will look the matter up they will see that I had nothing more to do with it than to offer the price recommended by the Board. Every member of the Board swore before the Committee that I had never interfered in any shape or form in the matter. Mr. Turton I never saw. I should not know him if he came into this chamber. Mr. Crombie I never spoke to on the subject. Mr. Percy Smith I never saw respecting it till he came with the report that the Board had decided on the value of the land. Everything was done fairly and aboveboard. The only unfortunate thing was that Mr. Scobie Mackenzie at the time of the election was hard up for something to throw at the Minister of Lands, and he got Mr. John Macfarlane Ritchie, who, I believe, conceived the whole thing and gave it to him, and found, as I said before, in Mr. Scobie Mackenzie a willing tool. But I venture to say I had a duty to perform, not only to myself as a Minister of the Crown and a member of this House, but a duty to perform to my family, that it should not at any future date be cast up to any of them that their father had been charged with corruption when Minister of the Crown, and that he had taken no action to defend himself. Sir, I would not stand in that position. I took action to defend myself, and I am thankful to honourable members that they have given me the opportunity of doing that.

Mr. J. McKenzie

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, I wish to make a personal explanation. A remark was made by the honourable member for Waimea-Sounds—I believe it was made in joke, and it was so understood in the House, but it will appear in Haw-sard not as a joke but as a fact—that in the report I drew up I was assisted by some one. The suggestion was that it was by Mr. Scobie Mackenzie. I have to state that no one saw that report; that I wrote it myself without any assistance or suggestion from any one. The other point is with regard to what the Minister has stated with reference to the Waste Lands Board. If he will turn to the Appendix to the Journals, Volume III., 1893, he will see that before he moved in the House the Waste Lands Board of Otago had taken voluminous evidence, extending over several days, in regard to alleged dummyism.

Motion agreed to.

LAND DRAINAGE BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. MEREDITH moved the following new clause:—

"6A. Every Road Board and Town Board within any county wherein 'The Counties Act, 1886,' is suspended, and not within a drainage district constituted under 'The Land Drainage Act, 1893,' nor within a river district constituted under 'The River Boards Act, 1884,' shall have and may exercise the powers following in respect to watercourses and drains, that is to say:—

"Where there is any watercourse or drain within the road district or town district, or beyond the limits of such district, and its obstruction is likely to cause damage to any property in such district, the Road Board or Town Board respectively—

"(1.) May order the occupier, or, when there is no occupier, the owner, of any land on the banks of any watercourse, or through which any drain runs within the district of its jurisdiction, or

"(2.) May order the occupier, or, when there is no occupier, the owner, of any land on the banks of such watercourse or drain for the space of one mile beyond the up-stream boundary of such district—to remove from such watercourse or drain all weeds and other growth, or refuse and obstructions of any kind, calculated to impede the free flow of water in the said watercourse or drain; and, in case of the occupier or owner failing to comply with such order within fourteen days from the receipt thereof, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for every day during which such order is not obeyed, and a further sum equal to the cost incurred by the Board in removing any such obstruction; and the said cost shall be a charge on the land, and may be recovered as rates are recovered under any Act for the time being in force in the district.

"The Board, for the purpose of removing any obstruction from a watercourse or drain, either within or beyond the limits of the district of its jurisdiction, shall by its servants have the free right of ingress, egress, and regress on any land on the banks of any such watercourse, or through which runs any such drain."

Mr. McNAB moved to strike out all the words after "powers," with the view of inserting "exercised by Boards under the principal Act."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the first two lines proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 22.

Bell	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Crowther	McLachlan	Stout
Earnshaw	Millar	Tanner
Harris	Montgomery	Thompson.
Hake	Newman
Houston	Pirani	Tellers.
Kelly, J. W.	Saunders	Buddo
Mackintosh	Seddon	Meredith.

NOES, 37.

Allen	Hogg	Morrison
Buick	Hutchison, G.	O'Regan
Button	Hutchison, W.	Parata
Cadman	Joyce	Pinkerton
Carncross	Lang	Reeves
Collins	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Duncan	Mackenzie, T.	Ward
Duthie	Maslin	Willis
Flatman	Massey	Wilson.
Fraser	McGuire
Graham	McKenzie, J.	Tellers.
Hall	Mills	Buchanan
Hall-Jones	Mitchelson	McNab.

Majority against, 15.

Words struck out, and Mr. McNab's amendment inserted.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the remainder of the clause be retained."

AYES, 35.

Cadman	Larnach	Reeves
Collins	Lawry	Saunders
Crowther	Mackintosh	Seddon
Duncan	McGowan	Smith, E. M.
Earnshaw	McKenzie, J.	Smith, G. J.
Hall	McKenzie, R.	Stout
Harris	McLachlan	Tanner
Hogg	Meredith	Thompson
Houston	Millar	Wilson.
Hutchison, W.	Morrison	Tellers.
Joyce	O'Regan	Buddo
Kelly, W.	Parata	Montgomery.

NOES, 19.

Buick	Hall-Jones	Mitchelson
Button	Hutchison, G.	Newman
Carncross	Lang	Willis.
Duthie	Mackenzie, T.
Flatman	Massey	Tellers.
Fraser	McGuire	Allen
Graham	Mills	McNab.

Majority for, 16.

Words retained.

Mr. WILSON moved the addition of the following proviso:—

"Provided that any such occupier may appeal to a Stipendiary Magistrate against such order within ten days after the service thereof, and such Stipendiary Magistrate shall have jurisdiction to determine whether such order shall have effect, having regard to all the circumstances of the case; and pending the determination of such appeal the order shall be suspended."

Proviso added.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

10.30. Mr. REEVES moved, That the name of Mr. McNab be substituted for that of Mr. McGowan as a member of the Committee to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the Council's amendments in this Bill.

Sir R. STOUT asked, Why?

Mr. REEVES said that Mr. McGowan would not assent to the reasons agreed to by the other members of the Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER said that three of the Committee appointed to draw up the reasons for disagreeing had signed the document, and one dissented.

Mr. THOMPSON wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that the principle in dispute in each of these amendments referred to vessels engaged in the coastal trade of Auckland. The honourable member for the Thames was specially selected to represent that part of the colony. The Minister, however, ignored his existence as one of the Committee, and drew up the reasons without consulting the honourable member at all; and when his attention was called to this, and the reasons were then submitted to the honourable member for the Thames, he, naturally, would not agree to them. Now the Minister proposed to appoint another member from the other end of the colony, who could not possibly know anything about the district which was affected; and he thought the position taken up by the Minister was an unfair one. He did not know why the Minister should act as he did towards the City of Auckland, and try to injure the coastal trade of Auckland. He did not know what the people there had done that the honourable gentleman should try to injure them in this way; but, at any rate, he hoped the House would not permit this injustice to be done to the Auckland members. He moved, That the honourable member for the Bay of Islands (Mr. Houston) be appointed to take Mr. McGowan's place.

Mr. REEVES did not intend to reply to this characteristic tirade, beyond saying that it was eminently worthy of the honourable gentleman. The point was this: He had already apologized for forgetting to submit the reasons to the honourable member for the Thames before half-past five o'clock. He was added to the original three Managers, and asked to act on the Conference last week. He (Mr. Reeves) forgot that his name was added, and when reminded of the matter he postponed asking the assent of the House in order to enable the honourable gentleman to go into the reasons and assent to them. The honourable member could not assent, and he (Mr. Reeves) knew it was perfectly absurd to go on appointing member after member from the Auckland District when they were all against him on one point of the Bill. They must have Managers who supported the Bill. It was of no use having those who would not support the Bill; and therefore he asked that the honourable member for Maitland should be added in the place of the honourable member for the Thames. If the honourable member for the Bay of Islands (Mr. Houston), or any other Auckland member, were in favour of the Bill, and against the principle of the honourable member for Marsden's amendment, he (Mr. Reeves) would be delighted to see him on the Committee; but to appoint Managers who were against the Bill was simply to postpone the thing time after time and prevent any decision being come to in the other Chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was absolutely necessary that the Committee should consist of members holding the same views. It could not be composed of members holding different views. The members who drew up the reasons would in all probability become members to represent the views of the majority of this House at a Conference between the two Houses, and it would not do that those acting on behalf of this House should be a disunited body.

Mr. MCGOWAN was sorry the honourable member for Marsden had shown the heat he appeared to feel in the matter. He really thought there was no necessity for it. He sympathized with the position the Minister was placed in, and he at once accepted his explanation. At the same time he must say, seeing that the reasons were already written, and that he could not agree to them, he was only within his rights in refusing to sign them. If the Conference had been properly called together, and each man had been allowed to produce the reasons he could give, it was quite possible that in that case the Minister might have come to terms; but when reasons were drawn up and placed before a member, who was asked to sign reasons not agreeable to himself, and he had no means of altering them, there was nothing left but to refuse, as he had done.

Mr. CROWTHER quite agreed that it was necessary those representing the House should be agreed: at the same time, there was no use in suggesting a Conference if it was a foregone conclusion before it took place that every one on that Conference must approve of the Minister of Labour's Bill or that it must be thrown out. The Minister said, in effect, "You must take this Bill whether you approve of it or not." He understood the matter had been simplified to this extent: that there could be no difference. They wanted somebody on the Conference who had an opinion of his own, and some backbone. They were not all there to follow the dictates of the Minister of Labour, but to use their own judgment and experience, and to obtain those necessities and requirements that they could not do without. That was the position they were in, and they knew these requirements were absolutely necessary. The Minister of Labour did not know—he was not going to say the Minister of Labour did not care; but he would be much better satisfied if the Minister of Labour would consult their requirements a little more than he had done in matters of this sort.

Mr. BUTTON said that all the Auckland and northern members were unanimous on this point, and the reason they were unanimous was that they realised what an immense amount of mischief would ensue if these restrictions were put in by the Minister of Labour, or were to prevail in that district. They were constantly hearing about the unemployed, and that a large number of them were seeking employment in all parts of the colony. If these restrictions were to be put in, so that the men owning little boats and steamers could not pursue their vocations, they would have an immense number of unemployed. These restrictions were throwing men out of work. They were adding to the multitude of unemployed. At the same time they were always hearing about the unemployed, and what the Minister was going to do for them. There was a large number of small vessels trading out of Auckland, because the harbour was differently situated from those in other parts of New Zealand. There the Great Barrier Island and the Little Barrier Island afforded a large amount of protection to a considerable extent of coast, and boats could trade within these extended harbour limits with safety. If the owners of these vessels were not to be permitted to carry on their trade a great deal of mischief would be done, a large number of men would be thrown out of work, and a considerable number ruined. This was the reason that the honourable members for the northern districts felt so strongly on the matter. There would be a great deal of dissatisfaction created by these restrictions throughout the northern part of the colony.

Mr. REEVES said that already every care had been taken that there should be no restriction placed on the little boats trading in the Hauraki Gulf, and it was stated in the reasons that they were prepared for further concessions on that point. The only reason they wished to go to the Conference on this clause for was to see that in exempting these small mosquito boats they did not also exempt the large trading steamers on the ocean. The amendments made in the Council would, in his opinion, have that wide effect. He wished to narrow it so as to exempt only those boats which honourable gentlemen mentioned. He was quite willing that these boats should be exempted.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked, what about the small steamers coasting between Dunedin and Invercargill? They had a mosquito fleet there which was of very great importance to small settlers along the coast, at Port Molyneux, Owaka, and Walkawa; and they would soon be used at Tautuku. He thought the Minister should not legislate so as to render it impossible for these steamers to trade. He thought, with the honourable member for Auckland City, that the matter should receive more consideration.

The House divided on the question, "That Mr. McNab's name be substituted for that of Mr. McGowan."

AYES, 23.

Buddo	McKenzie, J.	Saunders
Buick	Meredith	Seddon
Carncross	Mills	Smith, G. J.
Carnell	Montgomery	Tanner
Earnshaw	O'Regan	Willis.
Flatman	Parata	Tellers.
Joyce	Pinkerton	Millar
Mackintosh	Pirani	Morrison.

NOES, 33.

Allen	Button	Duncan
Bell	Cadman	Duthie
Buchanan	Collins	Fraser

Graham	Mackenzie, T.	Newman
Hall	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Harris	Massey	Stout
Heke	McGowan	Te Ao
Hogg	McKenzie, R.	Wilson.
Hutchison, G.	McLachlan	Tellers.
Kelly, W.	McNab	Crowther
Lang	Mitchelson	Thompson.
Lawry

Majority against, 10.

Motion negatived, amendment agreed to, and Mr. Houston's name substituted.

INCOME-TAX BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

On the question, That the Bill be read a second time,

Mr. T. MACKENZIE wished to ask the Minister if he intended to collect this tax twelve months from the date of the last collection. He did not wish in any way to hinder the business, but he must really say, in all earnestness, that the Government should not collect this tax in the manner in which they collected the last land-tax. It was a very serious inconvenience and hardship to a number of people, who had made preparation in the ordinary way to meet the land-tax in twelve months from the last collection. In connection with the income-tax, he would like very much to have the assurance of the Minister that he intended to let the tax be collected once a year, and not within a shorter period than twelve months from the date of the last collection.

Mr. WARD might say that of course any Treasurer would be only too glad to do what the honourable gentleman suggested, but circumstances might arise from time to time in connection with the finance which might make a change desirable; but he could assure the honourable gentleman that if possible he would not collect the tax within twelve months. The income-tax was paid last February, and this income-tax would not be collected till next year. As far as the land-tax was concerned, it was possible that would not be collected for twelve months, but he would not make any definite promise now. If he made that promise now, and if he had to change the date, he would be charged with breaking his word. Therefore he did not think it was desirable to give such a promise.

Dr. NEWMAN said the last time the land- and income-tax was collected was a short time before Christmas. That had a very depressing effect upon business, and was a great inconvenience. He thought the tax should not be collected just before the holidays.

Mr. WARD said he would be very glad to try to meet the honourable gentleman's suggestion.

Bill read a second time.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 5.—Reference to "The Land and Income Assessment Act, 1891," to include amending Acts.

Mr. BELL moved to strike out the words "whether heretofore passed or hereafter to be passed."

The Committee divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

AYES, 48.

Budde	Kelly, W.	Pirani
Buick	Larnach	Reeves
Cadman	Lawry	Saunders
Carncross	Mackintosh	Seddon
Carnell	Maslin	Smith, E. M.
Crowther	McGowan	Smith, G. J.
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Steward
Earnshaw	McKenzie, R.	Tanner
Flatman	McLachlan	Thompson
Graham	Meredith	Ward
Hall	Millar	Willis.
Harris	Mills
Hogg	Morrison	Tellers.
Houston	Parata	Collins
Hutchison, W.	Pinkerton	Montgomery.

NOES, 15.

Allen	Massey	Stout
Buchanan	McGuire	Wilson.
Duthie	McNab	Tellers.
Fraser	Mitchelson	Bell
Heke	Newman	Button.
Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 28.

Words retained.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

MOORE, HEPBURN, AND ROBINSON.

On the question, That the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply,

Sir R. STOUT moved, That all the words after the word "That" be omitted, with a view to insert the following words: "in the opinion of this House it is desirable that due provision should be made for giving effect to the recommendations of the A to L and M to Z Public Petitions Committees respectively on the petitions of W. Hepburn, R. Robinson, and W. J. Moore." He was sorry he should have to take up the time of the House in speaking to this matter, but it was a very important matter to the three petitioners. He would explain, very shortly, the position. These three men had all been in the Defence Department. They had been in the Armed Constabulary, and were removed out of it to what was termed the Stores Department: that was, practically they were in the same branch of the service, but were called upon to do different work. Now, they were entitled to compensation if they remained in the Defence Department; and that was the view the A to L Committee had taken of the petition of William Hepburn, and they had recommended that he should be allowed £147 as the compensation due to him when he was removed from office. He found, however, that there was only a sum of £40 put down for him on the supplementary estimates, to meet this claim of £147. This simply meant that this poor man was practically defrauded of what he was entitled to as a right. It was not a question of a gratuity at all. There were gratuities spread all around these estimates, but this was a case where the man was actually entitled to the money. If, however, there was any doubt about that, if the Minister of Defence would allow the matter to be submitted to a Judge of the Supreme Court he ventured to say that the award would be that these men were entitled to this money. Then, in the next cases, of Moore and Robinson, what happened before the M to Z Committee was this: The M to Z Committee found that they were entitled to compensation for the time they belonged to the Armed Constabulary Force; but, as they were changed into the Stores Department, they should only be entitled to count the compensation money, for the time they were in the Stores Department, under the new regulations issued in 1886 by the late Mr. Ballance, who was then Defence Minister: and it was proved by the Under-Secretary for Defence that these regulations were read to the men, and consequently bound the men and the Government. Even if that regulation were given effect to, the amount put on the estimates for Robinson and Moore was not equivalent to what the Committee recommended. The result was that the men, so far as he could make out the figures, had been only allowed compensation from the time they were in the Armed Constabulary Force, and were not allowed any compensation for loss of office in the Stores Department. So far as the M to Z Committee was concerned, they construed it that the transference of these men from the Constabulary to the Stores Department meant that this was a new branch of the service they were entering, and that, consequently, the new rule applied to them and that they would be entitled to their compensation, and the result would be that they were entitled to claim at that rate all the time. He thought the M to Z Committee was wrong, and that the A to L Committee took the proper view of the matter. He was not asking that the M to Z Committee's report should be disagreed with; he was simply asking that the A to L Committee's report in Hepburn's case should be given effect to, and that the M to Z Committee's report on Moore and Robinson's cases should be given effect to. There was nothing more unfair than this treatment of the men. Those men were dismissed from the Government service. No charge was made against them; and they ought to have had their compensation at once, instead of being kept four or five months hanging about without getting compensation. One of them, they knew, was anxious to go on his bit of land and utilise it, but all the men had been kept waiting four or five months without being able to work while waiting for this to be given them. One man was to get, by the estimates, £40, another £50, and the other £100 odd for the whole of the compensation. The fact was that these men were entitled to about four times the compensation allowed them. Supposing a private employer had done what the Government had done they would have all sorts of statements about how the capitalist was doing this to his labouring-men, and injuring his labouring-men, and so on. Were not the Government, who were the employers in the first instance, doing an ungracious thing to their employes, and doing what was practically a dishonest thing?—because they were violating the contract that had been made with the employes, and there could be no contract more specific than was the contract under the new regulations that were issued, and which were read to the men. He was surprised at the Government not accepting the decision of the Committee. He could only say that both Committees seemed to have taken endless trouble in doing what was fair in the matter, and they came to their conclusion. He did not agree with it, but still the men were apparently willing to accept it. He might explain to the House that it ought not to take five months to simply pass this recommendation of the Petitions Committee. He could say no more at that late period of the session, but he exceedingly regretted he had to make the motion. He had been asking about it for many months, and now that day the Premier was courteous enough to inform him that he had not been able to put on the estimates anything but the sum which appeared there, upon which he (Sir R. Stout) stated he would take that opportunity of placing the matter before the House. He thought the men had been most unjustly treated, and that the contract made had been violated, and he thought no private employer would have done such a thing.

Mr. SEDDON thought that when the House heard the other side of this question it would come to the conclusion that the Government had gone much further than any private employer of labour would have gone in what they had done: in fact, they had gone further than had been done in other cases. The facts were these: These three men were in the Armed Constabulary up to a certain time; they left voluntarily to enter the Defence Stores Department; and in leaving the Constabulary they bettered their condition.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said it appeared so on the papers.

Sir R. STOUT said they were retired from the Constabulary.

Mr. SEDDON said, No; they left voluntarily, and the papers were there to prove it. It was optional to each of them whether he would leave or not. Had they been arbitrarily retired by the Government the papers would show it. They then entered the other service, the Defence Stores. In that service they had received higher salaries, and had bettered their position. That, of course, must be admitted, because if they took a computation that was made—that was, what they would receive as compensation if they had remained in the Armed Constabulary and what they would receive in the Defence Stores as Civil servants—the House would see the difference. As he had said, when they left the Armed Constabulary, that was the time for them to have made their claim; and the Government ought then to have paid them compensation if they were entitled to it. If the Government, at the time when they retired from the Armed Constabulary, had paid them compensation it would be the same amount as was now on the supplementary estimates. He had, as a matter of equity, taken the retirement as being compulsory, and he said no one could have gone further than that. The Auditor-General stated that they were not entitled to compensation. The officers whose duty it was to watch the public chest stated that they were not entitled at all to compensation. That was the position. He would read this memorandum:—

“Defence Office, Wellington, N.Z.,

“29th June, 1894.

“SIR,—In reply to your letter of 28th instant, forwarding Petitions Nos. 1 and 49, from Messrs. Robinson and Moore respectively, recently employed in the Defence Stores Department, I have the honour to report, for the information of your Committee, that these men, while belonging to the Militia or Armed Constabulary Force, were not entitled to compensation, for the following reasons: The members of the A.C. Force had no legal claim to compensation; vide clause 2, ‘Civil Service Reform Act, 1886.’ Both these men continued to be members of the Militia till after the passing of ‘The Civil Service Reform Act, 1886.’ It is therefore clear that they are not entitled to compensation after transfer to the Stores Department; but they should have been placed under the stoppage of 5 per cent.; vide clause 11 of that Act. This, however, does not appear to have been deducted.—I have, &c.,

“A. HUME, Lieut.-Colonel,

“Acting Under-Secretary for Defence.”

“The Chairman,

“Public Petitions M to Z Committee,

“House of Representatives.”

If they had been treated as Civil servants they would have had 5 per cent. deducted from their salaries, and when they left the 5 per cent. would be given to them as their compensation. Under those circumstances he would like to know what injustice the Government had done. He had asked that a computation should be made of what was due to them if they had been compulsorily retired from the Armed Constabulary, and that was the amount that now appeared on the supplementary estimates. The honourable gentleman had complained that the men had been kept hanging about. He did not know the position of all the men, but one individual, he was glad to say, was fairly well-to-do, and he did not suppose that he would keep hanging about much. He did not take that into consideration at all, and he did not find fault with the man who had been thrifty.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is that?

Mr. SEDDON thought it better not to mention names. The fact of the men waiting about had nothing to do with it. They received three months' salary, and if it had been a private individual who no longer required the services of these men they would not have got three months' salary. In addition to this, they—by what was proposed on the estimates—got whatever they were entitled to receive at the time they left the Armed Constabulary. Then there came another phase of the question. His honourable friend had said that they petitioned the House, and were kept waiting about; but there were others who had petitioned the House whose names did not appear at all, and who had got nothing placed on the estimates for them. If it was to be claimed that because people hung about and lobbied the members they should get what they applied for, all he could say was that they would have a good many petitions for compensation. In this case, where he could stretch a point he had done so, and he could go no further. If he were to admit that when they came into office in 1891 the officers of that department were entitled to claim compensation, they would have to place not £200 but £2,000 on the estimates.

Sir R. STOUT.—But you have admitted it already.

Mr. SEDDON said he had not admitted it.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable gentleman was unaware that it had been given in evidence before the Committee that one man had been paid.

Mr. SEDDON said he had not given any evidence before the Committee. There might have been some circumstances regarding a particular officer which required special consideration; but he had not admitted the principle. These men were practically labourers. One was an express-driver who drove the express to and from the Gaol; he could not be a Civil servant, and if he had remained in the Armed Constabulary he would have been entitled to compensation; but if they were to pay compensation to this class of men, and say they were Civil servants because they were doing Defence Stores work, all he could say was that there were scores of men who had been in the Defence Stores who were just as much entitled to claim their compensation as these men were. He would be most happy to meet the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), who was in charge of these petitions, if he could, but he could not. He had his duty to perform, and had to go by what he saw on the papers. He had put Robinson down for £100, when the recommendation of the Committee practically amounted to only £62.

Sir R. STOUT.—Nothing of the sort.

Mr. SEDDON.—Here is the recommendation of the Committee.

Sir R. STOUT.—Read it.

Mr. SEDDON said it was Moore's case. The report recommended—

"That the petitioner should receive compensation based, firstly, on the practice prevailing up to the date of letter minuted by the Hon. the Defence Minister on the 25th June, 1887 (£12 10s.); and, secondly, thereafter on the terms expressed in the said letter (£50)."

Mr. Seddon

Sir R. STOUT asked, who put in £50? There was no sum fixed.

Mr. SEDDON said this was what he found on the paper:—

"That your petitioner is justly and equitably entitled to compensation for loss of office upon compulsory retirement by the Hon. the Defence Minister; in support of which numbers of similar cases can be cited."

He simply said there was no compulsory retirement at all.

Sir R. STOUT.—What is there; then—dismissal?

Mr. SEDDON said, Certainly not. If it had been dismissal he would there and then be entitled to receive compensation in the ordinary way, and if he was retired compulsorily it would be the same; but he left voluntarily and changed his position in order to enter the Defence Stores. He would take a case in point, which was this: that Parliament, by the Railways Act of 1877, said to those who were in the Civil Service up to that date, "You have been Civil servants; from this date you can enter the railway service if you like. If you enter the railway service you get no compensation. If you like to leave now, we will pay compensation up to date." That was the Act of the Legislature. Now, they might just as well let the man who voluntarily entered the railway service, and who now returned, come again to the House and claim compensation for the time he was in the railway service. He was treating these petitioners just as Parliament had treated the railway servants. These men up to the time they entered the Defence Stores had a right to their compensation. From that time forward those who entered the Defence Stores had no right to it. To show he was right, if they had been intended to be treated as Civil servants they would have had, under the Civil Service Act, 5 per cent. deducted from their salaries; but it had not been deducted. As far as he was concerned, he found a large number of these men employed in these Defence Stores—more men than there was work for. To the men who had to be retired he gave a month's salary. Then, it was represented to him that they should be given three months' salary. He said he would look up the authorities; and finding these were against him he gave the men three months' salary. If they were to do as suggested there were a number of Constabulary men who had been put in other positions, in fact they were scattered all through the service, and a large number of men had left, and it meant a large sum of money. Members had expressed dissatisfaction with the Government as regarded the amount placed on the supplementary estimates, and as regarded the petitions presented. He simply said he had had the amount computed which the men would receive if compulsorily retired. Moore said in his petition he was compulsorily retired. He had taken the man at his word, and said to him, "I will pay you compensation as though you were compulsorily retired, although the documents do not show compulsory retirement." The Auditor-General, as the responsible officer in these matters, would have represented the matter if those men had been entitled to more, because, having to go to the Audit Department, the amount it found to be due would have to be paid. The Defence Stores were no part of the Civil Service. The men were put on there from time to time, casually and otherwise; and he had only done what had always been done. He trusted this explanation would be regarded as satisfactory. To show that different Committees had differed in their views on the question, he might say that in Hepburn's case, for instance, if they paid the full amount it would be over £147, but they thought they were making him a liberal allowance for compulsory retirement in giving him £40. There were very many cases for which the Government provided nothing at all in the estimates, and men who had better cases than these.

Mr. FRASER said that, as a member of the Petitions M to Z Committee, he remembered perfectly well the occasion when these men's claims came before that Committee. The anxiety of the Premier to protect the Treasury was very commendable, but he did not think it should be done at the expense of justice. These men certainly did not retire voluntarily from the Armed Constabulary. The evidence distinctly proved that the men were compelled to enter the Stores Department. To say that these men should have claimed the retiring allowance they were entitled to when they left the Constabulary was sheer nonsense. He (Mr. Fraser) asked Colonel Hume, If each of these men had taken that money would they not have had to repay it the next day when they entered the Stores? and the reply was, Yes. The thing was a mere quibble. It was a well-known fact that if a man claimed compensation when he was retired and then re-entered the Service he would have to repay that compensation.

Mr. SEDDON said, Certainly not.

Mr. FRASER said that was the evidence given by the officers of the department.

Mr. SEDDON asked the honourable gentleman to look at the Civil Service Act, and he would see that he was wrong.

Mr. FRASER said it was not the first time an Act had been evaded, and he knew another case in which it had been done. It was a case of Hobson's choice with the men. If they had not consented to be removed to the Stores Department they would simply have been told to leave. He thought these men had established their claim to payment on the scale recommended in the report. He knew the conclusion of the Committee was not to grant the full amount demanded by the petitioners, but an amount much larger than what appeared on the estimates.

Mr. MORRISON said in Robinson's case it was agreed to recommend a payment of about £100.

Mr. FRASER said, then, there was the case of Moore. He was quite clear that the facts elicited by the evidence of Colonel Hume were not such as told them by the Premier that night.

Mr. E. M. SMITH was sorry to disagree with his chief, but he was positively sure that the information laid before the M to Z Committee was just the opposite to what had been supplied to the Premier from the Audit Department. There was no doubt whatever that the man Robinson was entitled to compensation, because at one particular period his compensation was actually computed, and was a higher amount than was now put down on the supplementary estimates. The Committee did its "level best" to investigate the case, and he knew that a large number of the members of the Committee were dead against pensions or allowances in any shape or form, and, if it had not been established beyond the shadow of a doubt, they would not have recommended it in this case; and the evidence proved that this man did not move from one branch of the service to the other of his own free will. It was a mere matter of arrangement with a view to departmental reorganization, and it was only fair and just that, while they should not pay these men any amount they were not entitled to, yet any amount they were entitled by law to receive they should get. He was sure, if the evidence laid before the Committee were reviewed, it would be established beyond the shadow of a doubt it was an insignificant amount that was set down, and not sufficient to give the men the compensation they were entitled to. He had no personal interest in the matter, but as one of the Committee he felt bound, as he did in every case, to speak fairly and honestly, and give his views in the interests of justice. Every member of the Committee knew that the officers of the department did not give their evidence willingly; it was dragged out of them. It was clearly proved in evidence that these men were to get compensation on a system that was agreed to by the late Defence Minister, the late Mr. Ballance, and then after that it was left an open question with the department to compute what they were entitled to. If the men got what the Committee recommended they would only get what was right. The documents laid before the Committee would show that the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) had given the true version of the case. The Premier had simply been guided by the Audit Department.

Mr. CROWTHER said, so far as the Petitions A to L Committee were concerned, they were led to believe by the evidence that the men were promised, if they did retire, that their case would not be prejudiced thereby. Hence the Committee recommended their case for favourable consideration.

Mr. McNAB said his own recollection of the cases which came before the Petitions M to Z Committee bore out the statements of the honourable member for Wakatipu and the honourable member for New Plymouth. The honourable member for New Plymouth had stated something about the late Mr. Ballance. There was one point which he thought came out in evidence which had not been mentioned to-night. This was, that there was a memorandum from the late Mr. Ballance bearing out the contention which the petitioners put forward. That memorandum, it was stated in evidence, was actually read out to the men on parade; and he himself, and one or two other members who were on that Committee, based their decision purely on this memorandum. Had it not been for that they would not have voted as they did, but, having that memorandum before them, they could not possibly go back upon it without repudiating to a certain extent the wishes of one who was no longer among them.

Mr. MEREDITH, as Chairman of the Public Petitions M to Z Committee, remembered the petitions of Moore and Robinson coming before the Committee. Their petitions were carefully considered. The Committee had before them the heads of departments as well as petitioners. Both petitions received full consideration. The decision arrived at by the Committee was to this effect: that up to 1887 the petitioners were entitled to a month's salary for every year of service. For the time served after 1887, as per circular issued on the 25th June, 1887, the Committee recommended that they should receive at the rate of one month's salary for every three years' service. He (Mr. Meredith) was not in a position to say how many years Moore and Robinson had been in the public service previous to 1887. That information, no doubt, could be obtained by the Premier.

Mr. SEDDON did not object to a month's salary for every year of service. They were asked to vote what the men should receive if they were compulsorily retired. That was all they had been definitely asked to do.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable gentleman could obtain information from his own department if he had asked for it. But a general order was read out from the Defence Minister. That was the contract under which the men were working.

Mr. WILLIS said that, as a member of the Petitions Committee, he might state that this was considered to be a case of great hardship. It was thought that the men were fully entitled to the money the Committee recommended. And not only that, but the Committee were perfectly unanimous. There was no division of opinion. There was no case brought before the Committee which had occupied more time and attention than this one, for, although the Committee were anxious that justice should be done, still at the same time they took care that, before giving a decision, the Treasury should be protected, so that nothing should be given more than the men were entitled to. He fully concurred in what had been said by the other members of the Committee—that justice should be done.

Mr. BELL said he was not a member of either the A to L or the M to Z Committee, but had been present at some of their meetings on the hearing of the petitions in question. He desired to say that the reasons read were what the department had put before the Committee as the grounds of refusal to pay compensation. These reasons could not be read in the House as an authority, and the Premier should not pretend that this had induced the Committee to come to its determination. He was glad to hear that both Committees had come to a unanimous conclusion. It seemed to him—and he did not think he was at all prejudiced in the matter—that these men had a claim which employers could not very well resist, and if both these men were now granted more than they were absolutely entitled to, in consequence of the assurance received when they were transferred to the Stores Department, then the department would do no more than justice. It was not, perhaps, quite a legal right, as had been urged; but he did not see what reason there could be for giving them less than the Committee thought they were entitled to.

Mr. SEDDON said the Committee did not recommend that amount.

Mr. BELL argued that the Committee recommended that as a basis of calculation. He did not see why, when it had been referred to the Committee, the honourable gentleman should not be prepared to accept its decision as correct.

Sir R. STOUT said they only recommended an amount in one case.

Mr. SEDDON held that the Committee recommended that the petitioners should receive compensation as mentioned in the letter by the Minister of Defence in June, 1887. That was the recommendation in the case of two out of three of these petitioners. As far as Robinson was concerned, it should be recognised. He (Mr. Seddon) was quite prepared to take that as a basis. The Chairman said that would be a month's salary for every year's service for a limit of years. He understood that was the basis on which the Committee went. He was called on to negative the amendment, but he would give the additional amount as desired. He did not want to be harsh to the men; he was only looking at the principle.

Mr. O'REGAN, as a member of the A to L Committee, before which the case of Hepburn was brought, would like to indorse what his honourable friend the member for Auckland City (Mr. Crowther) had said. The Committee in that case were unanimous, and came to their decision after a great deal of deliberation. He would like to ask the Premier if what he had said applied also to Hepburn's case.

Mr. SEDDON said the man would receive the same as if he had been compulsorily retired—a month's salary for every year of service.

Sir R. STOUT would recall the terms of the Premier's circular. As far as Robinson's case was concerned, there had been a sum made up by the Audit Department, and if the Premier agreed to couple that with the basis laid down he would be satisfied.

Mr. SEDDON said he had stated to the House what he was prepared to give.

Sir R. STOUT said the Premier had got the papers, and surely the honourable gentleman could say if he would give Robinson the amount that the Audit Department had arrived at after this man's transfer.

Mr. McNab

Mr. SEDDON said he had already told the House what he was prepared to do after a perusal of the papers.

Amendment negatived.

SUPPLY.

On the question, That the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply,

Mr. T. MACKENZIE wished to bring under the notice of the House a matter of importance in connection with a particular petition, and he would ask the Premier to give his attention to it. The matter was brought up before the Railways Committee upon the petition of a man named Mr. H. Hansen. It was reported that Mr. H. Hansen had not received sufficient compensation for injury sustained, and the Committee strongly recommended this case. The man was injured through the train striking him. He had not had time to get out of the way, not receiving any notice of the approach of the train. This man was injured for life. In his letter the doctor stated,—

"I attended Mr. Hugh Hansen for a period extending from 29th April to 14th July, 1891, for injuries caused by a collision between his trolley and the engine attached to a special train, and that his injuries consisted of a fractured skull, fractured ribs, fracture of the lower end of the ulna bone of fore-arm, and other minor injuries; and that when I last saw him professionally he was still unable to follow his occupation."

In the evidence given by the Railway Department it was acknowledged that a special train was run that day upon very short notice. It was the practice to give notice when any special train was coming. Mr. Hansen had not received notice. This man had only received, on account of the injury he had suffered, an allowance for the doctor's charges and six months' salary. Clause 5 of the Employers' Liability Act provided that—

"The amount of compensation recoverable under this Act shall not exceed such sum as may be found to be equivalent to the estimated earnings, during the three years preceding the injury, of a person in the same grade employed during those years in the like employment and in the district in which the workman is employed at the time of the injury."

According to clause 4 of the same Act of 1892,—

"The said Commissioners, in case of having to pay compensation to any workman or workmen in their employ under the Employers' Liability Acts, may, under the authority of this Act, pay any amount, not exceeding five hundred pounds, in respect of each claim or judgment against them, out of any moneys in their hands applicable for contingent expenses of the railways under their control, but no larger amount shall be paid by them for such compensation except out of moneys to be appropriated by Parliament for the purpose."

All this man had received was something like £30. He (Mr. Mackenzie) held that the man was entitled to more compensation, because if the man came before a Court of law he would receive substantial damages. It was according to the spirit of their legislation that employees should receive compensation in proportion to the injury suffered. This man had been most unjustly treated, and he hoped the Minister for Public Works would consider his case during the recess, and grant him reasonable compensation.

Mr. DUNCAN had a matter to bring before the House: it was the petition of a woman named Dunn, whose section of land at Waicoua had been taken under the Public Works Act. She applied for the compensation specified in the Public Works Act. The department ad-

12.30. mitted all the facts of the case, but said they were debarred from paying fair compensation by a certain section of the Act. The matter had been referred to the Government for favourable consideration, and he would like to know from the Minister for Public Works if, during the recess, he would make inquiries, and grant to the petitioner the sum which had been recommended by the Committee, and which she was entitled to.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the honourable member for Mataura was to be congratulated upon getting the £1,000 for the bridge in his electoral district, and also the honourable member for Invercargill on getting the sum of £300 for his roads. Both these gentlemen were to be congratulated on the success that had attended their efforts, and their remarks on a previous occasion in the House. It seemed to him that the estimated net surplus for the current year would not amount to what the Colonial Treasurer had said. The net expenditure for the current year was estimated at £4,301,000, and the revenue was estimated at £4,352,000, leaving a balance on the year's transactions of £51,000. Out of that the Treasurer was now taking no less than £49,000, which would leave on the 31st of March next only a paltry balance of £2,000 as a surplus for the current year. The Customs revenue was £55,000 short of last year's, and the Railways were £26,000 short for the half-year, so that if they added the two items together they had a deficiency in the revenue of £81,000 for the six months. That seemed to him a very serious falling-off, and he would like to have the intentions of the Colonial Treasurer explained to the House. He was aware that in the Financial Statement the Treasurer estimated the falling-off at £136,000 for the year, but according to the half-year's returns the deficiency amounted to £81,000 on the two items only. In the other items there would be a large falling-off in the current year, and it was to be expected that Customs and Railways would continue to show a decrease in the second part of the year. Looking at the other side, they saw that the expenditure was going up, and, if they took the large amount of money the House was about to vote that night, he thought it would be quite clear that the net current revenue and the net current expenditure for the year ending on the 31st March next would not balance.

Mr. PIRANI wished to bring before the attention of the Government another case which had been before the Public Petitions Committee, and the vote for which he had expected to see on the supplementary estimates. That was the case of a man named Harper, who had been employed in the Telegraph Department, and who about ten years ago received an injury, the result of an accident, which had left him paralysed. The grant formerly made to him had been struck off the estimates, and the Committee had favourably recommended the case, as the man was simply a helpless cripple. This man had had a bare subsistence all these years, and he was now reduced to such a pitch that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done for him. The Public Petitions Committee had heard his case, and had recommended it to the Government for consideration, but, as he had not served the country perhaps so well as Captain Jackson Barry, there was no vote placed on the estimates for him. He was very sorry indeed to see that some consideration had not been given to this man. If the old vote for £20 a year had been renewed it would have given him a chance of dragging out the rest of his short life in a state a little less miserable than that he had been lately reduced to. He hoped the Government would take the matter into consideration, and do something at any rate for a man who was now in reduced circumstances, and who was injured in the service of the Government.

Mr. WARD said he was not aware of the case the honourable gentleman referred to, and if it had been brought under the notice of the Government he had not heard anything of it. It would receive consideration, and if circumstances justified the expenditure referred to he had no doubt the Government would favourably consider the matter. In reply to the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, that honourable gentleman, in dealing with the estimated surplus, had entirely overlooked something, and he would direct his attention to it.

Dr. NEWMAN said he had taken the results for the current year, and had not carried forward anything.

Mr. WARD said he was dealing with the results in the same way precisely. The estimated surplus on the 31st March next was £341,940; and, if they took from that £250,000, the sum which was to be transferred to the Public Works Fund, it left £91,000, and the £49,000 referred to by the honourable member as the amount of the supplementary estimates deducted from the £91,000 left £42,000. That was the position—quite different from what the honourable member had said. There was no such thing as the magician's wand being exercised on this occasion. That was not so. Then, again, he took the £51,702 excess of revenue, to which the honourable member also referred.

Dr. NEWMAN.—For the current year.

Dr. Newman

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman would admit that this was right—that at the end of the financial year there would be a balance over the expenditure of £42,000; for, if they took from the £341,940 the sum of £250,000 which was to be paid from the consolidated revenue into the Public Works Account, it left £91,000; and, if the £49,000 to which the honourable member referred was deducted, at the end of next March there would be a balance of £42,000 over and above. He thought he was quite justified in taking these figures, as it was upon them they had operated last year, and they had come out all right upon the same basis, notwithstanding the predictions to the contrary of honourable gentlemen opposite. That being the case, he thought they would come out right again this year, and he could only say he had every reason to hope that they would. The honourable gentleman was somewhat facetious in his remarks about the honourable member for Mataura and the £1,000 for the Gore Bridge, and also in his remarks regarding the sum of £200 referred to by the honourable member for Invercargill. But neither of those honourable members had the slightest necessity to air his eloquence upon these matters as they did on a former occasion, as the vote of £1,000 for the Gore Bridge was a contribution given provided the local body raised a certain sum of money locally. The amount was placed on the estimates last year, but the local body had been unable to obtain the sum of money required. The Government did not intend to withdraw the subsidy of £1,000 if they raised the money, and he hoped they would raise it during the present year. There was no necessity to put the amount on the general estimates, but it was put on the supplementary estimates now in order that it might be available for the local body if they raised the amount required. If they did not raise it they would not get the subsidy. With regard to the honourable member for Invercargill, he (Mr. Ward) was not in the House when the honourable gentleman spoke on a previous occasion; but he might say that the vote referred to was not dropped for the reason assigned. The vote referred to was provided for upon the road estimates up to the time the estimates were finally passed, but the estimates had to be reduced by an all-round sum, in order to bring them within the ways and means for the year. As a matter of fact, not only was the vote referred to by the honourable member for Invercargill reduced, but votes were taken off the estimates all round. There was no such thing in connection with the readjustment of the votes as singling out any honourable member on account of his views or votes in that House. There was nothing of the sort, and it was only right that he should say so. The chief consideration actuating the Government was that of meeting the most pressing requirements of the colony. The facetious remarks of the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs promised well, and he (Mr. Ward) felt sure that the honourable gentleman was going to vote for the estimates throughout.

Dr. NEWMAN said he had got only a little on the estimates.

Mr. WARD said if honourable members looked through the estimates they would probably find that the honourable gentleman had got three or four rosy little things all to himself hidden away somewhere.

Dr. NEWMAN said he had got a cemetery.

Mr. WARD said that was not so bad. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay had also stated that he was not fully satisfied.

Captain RUSSELL said he had got nothing.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman had got £3,000 in one vote. That was surely more than nothing. As to the member for Clutha, that honourable gentleman was never satisfied; but his district, he (Mr. Ward) felt quite sure, had received a fair share. Upon the whole, the remarks made upon the motion for going into the Committee of Supply augured well, he thought, for the free passage of the estimates through the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

IN COMMITTEE.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

CLASS IV.—ROADS.

Vote, Main roads, £40,000, agreed to.

Vote, Miscellaneous roads and bridges, £20,000, agreed to.

Vote, Roads on goldfields, £45,455, agreed to.

PART II.

CLASS III.—ROADS.

Vote, Roads to give access, £20,005, agreed to.

Vote, Local bodies, £600, agreed to.

LANDS IMPROVEMENT ACCOUNT.

Roads and bridges, £150,000.

Mr. PIRANI pointed out, in connection with the item "Pohangina Valley Forest Reserve, £325," that there was a totara reserve the Land Board wanted to sell, and £12,000 would go into the coffers of the Government if it were sold, and it would take £560, according to the Minister's own department, to enable it to be sold. A report had been sent in asking for this amount from the district department, but the amount on the estimates was just one-half, which would be useless, as it would only half-metal the roads, and if half-metalled it would be impossible to sell the reserve for another year.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said, if the amount the honourable gentleman stated would be realised by the sale, no doubt the department would find the money asked for.

Vote, £150,000, agreed to.

NATIVE LAND PURCHASE ACCOUNT.

Vote, Native Land Purchase Account, £150,000, agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

CLASS V.—DEVELOPMENT OF GOLDFIELDS.

Development of goldfields, £43,150.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the sum of £10,000 for water-races and works on goldfields was an extraordinary jump from the £5,000 of last year. There had been more waste of money in sludge-channels than in any other way. He would like to know how it was proposed to spend the £10,000 for deep levels, and on what conditions.

Mr. CADMAN said a Bill had been passed that evening to meet the question. What was proposed was that there should be three deep levels in the colony—one in Auckland, one in Westland, and one in Otago. These were the only three it was proposed to subsidise under this vote, and the subsidy would probably be at the rate of pound for pound.

Vote, £43,150, agreed to.

CLASS VI.—PURCHASE OF NATIVE LANDS.

Vote, Purchase of Native lands, £700, agreed to.

CLASS VII.—TELEGRAPH EXTENSION.

Vote, Telegraph extension, £31,000, agreed to.

CLASS VIII.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

General, £14,950.

Mr. PIRANI asked when the Courthouse at Palmerston North was to be gone on with.

Mr. SEDDON said they were desirous of getting the timber on the ground, so that once the work was started they could go on to a finish.

Mr. PIRANI said the timber was there, and a contract had been accepted for a part of the work. Numbers of carpenters were out of work who had been promised that it should be gone on with, but they were constantly put off.

Dr. NEWMAN drew the attention of the Minister to the miserable entrance to Parliament Buildings, and the poor accommodation for visitors to members.

Mr. SEDDON said he had done a good deal during the last recess, and something more would be done during the next recess.

Mr. DUNCAN drew attention to much-needed painting to the gaol and lock-up at Oamaru.

Mr. SEDDON would look into the matter.

Vote, £14,950, agreed to.

Vote, Judicial, £34,260, agreed to.

Vote, Postal and Telegraph, £10,000, agreed to.

Vote, Customs, £500, agreed to.

Vote, Lunatic asylums, £24,450, agreed to.

Vote, School-buildings, £15,000, agreed to.

Vote, Agricultural, £1,650, agreed to.

Vote, Hospitals and other charitable institutions, £2,400, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—LIGHTHOUSES AND HARBOUR-WORKS.

Harbour-works, £3,500.

Captain RUSSELL asked if the Minister would give some information in connection with the erection of a lighthouse at Cape Kidnappers.

Mr. WARD said there was a sum of £3,000 on the supplementary estimates for a new lighthouse on the East Coast. There was a doubt as to whether it should be erected at Cape Kidnappers or not. As soon as that point was decided the work would be proceeded with.

Captain RUSSELL presumed the vote referred to Cape Kidnappers, or that vicinity.

Mr. WARD.—Yes.

Mr. TANNER moved, That the item, "Wharf at Howick (subsidy, £1 for £1), £1,500," be struck out.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. W. KELLY would like to know what was going to be done with regard to the dredging of the Tauranga Harbour.

Mr. SEDDON said the report of the department was against this work, but he would make further inquiries.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said if it was the policy of the Government to give money for wharves he could mention several places in Akaroa Harbour where wharves should be erected.

Mr. PIRANI moved, That the item "Wharf at Howick (subsidy, £1 for £1), £1,500," be reduced by £1, as an indication that the vote be granted without the provision as to a subsidy.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BUICK would like to know if any sum was to be voted for the Picton wharf, seeing that £1,500 was to be granted for a place like Howick.

Mr. SEDDON said the difference between the two was this: that the wharf at Picton was controlled and held by the Railway Commissioners. The Railway Commissioners had asked for £46,000 as an addition to open lines, and £40,000 had been granted. If they had asked for a sum for this purpose the Government would have been prepared to give it consideration.

Mr. COLLINS would move, That the item, "Nelson (dredging harbour), £1,000," be struck out. He regarded this as a most unwarrantable waste of public money.

Mr. R. McKENZIE thought this was an important harbour, and that the money would be well spent. He did not think the colony would lose anything by spending it.

Amendment negatived.

Vote, £3,500, agreed to.

Vote, Harbour defences, £10,000, agreed to.

CLASS X.—RATES ON NATIVE LANDS.

Vote, Rates on Native lands—Recoverable from owners, £650, agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

CLASS I.—LEGISLATIVE.

Legislative Council—Salaries and other charges, £60.

Mr. PIRANI wished to know if it was correct that the Premier had reduced the remuneration for Committee reporters to one-half what they used to be.

Mr. SEDDON said he had nothing whatever to do with carrying out the details. It was true a reduction had been made in the scale of pay, which was at modern rates. He did not know whether the amount was one-half or two-thirds of what was paid before, but he knew these reporters were paid according to scale.

Mr. PIRANI would only say that, as the previous scale was the scale for all private work throughout the colony, it seemed to him that the Government that had reduced the scale had perpetrated an injustice. Before such a thing as this was done the matter should have been gone into. The men who did the Committee work deserved to be well paid. They paid all their other Legislative officers three times what they paid their Civil servants, and it seemed unfair to select the Committee reporters as those whose remuneration should be cut down.

Mr. SEDDON said he would make inquiries.

Vote, £60, agreed to.

House of Representatives, £658.

Sir R. STOUT wished to know if the item of £38 was compensation to Mr. Kinsella.

Mr. SEDDON.—Yes.

Sir R. STOUT thought the amount was very small. After so many years of service, it was a pity he was not kept on as a Committee reporter.

Vote, £658, agreed to.

CLASS II.—COLONIAL SECRETARY.

Miscellaneous services, £4,047.

Mr. EARNSHAW would like to have an explanation regarding the compassionate allowance to the widow of the Hon. Vincent Pyke. He did not raise any objection to it, but asked for information.

Mr. SEDDON said this was on petition, and it was intended that the petition should go before the Goldfields and Mines Committee, but it had gone before the Petitions Committee. This sum had been put on the estimates in recognition of the services of the late Hon. Vincent Pyke in connection with the goldfields and mining industry of the colony in the early days.

Mr. THOMPSON was afraid they were establishing a precedent, though he did not wish to raise any objection to this vote in particular.

Mr. SEDDON said there were special reasons in this case. They paid thousands of pounds to discoverers of goldfields, and he questioned very much if any man in New Zealand had done so much in connection with the goldfields as the late Hon. Vincent Pyke. He was the first Goldfields Commissioner, and had come over from Victoria with his goldfields experience, and had drafted the first complete set of goldfields rules and regulations. He thought it right that this recognition of his services should be made to the one he had left behind under circumstances which called for this recognition. It was a special case, and he would ask the House to pass it as some small recognition of the great services of the late Hon. Vincent Pyke to the colony.

Vote, £4,047, agreed to.

CLASS III.—COLONIAL TREASURER.

Office of Industries and Commerce, £120.

Mr. EARNSHAW asked for some explanation of the item, "Office of Industries and Commerce—Patterns of ornamental wood linoleum, £120."

Mr. WARD said it was thought desirable to send some of these patterns Home, as it would have the effect of bringing the New Zealand woods under the notice of the English markets.

Vote, £120, agreed to.

Vote, Colonial Treasurer's Department, £3,491, agreed to.

Miscellaneous services, £3,778.

Mr. EARNSHAW asked the Minister to explain the amounts put down to make good the defalcations of the various officers mentioned.

Mr. WARD said this ought to have been provided for in the estimates years ago, but for some reason it had not been done. Under the regulations the whole of the officers in all the services now had to make up deficiencies when there were any defalcations in any branch of the service. In the days when these defalcations were made this regulation was not applicable to the whole of the services.

Mr. R. McKENZIE called the attention of the Minister to the fact that he knew one officer of the service who had from time to time been called on to pay his share of defalcations, and he was afterwards dismissed from the service, and he could get no satisfaction.

Mr. WARD promised to look into the case if the honourable member would give him, privately, the name of the officer in question.

Mr. MEREDITH said the honourable member for Westland presented a petition in reference to this case, which came before the Public Petitions Committee, and it came out in evidence that all this man paid was something less than £1. That was his contribution in making good defalcations.

Mr. R. McKENZIE said it was the principle of the thing which he looked at.

Vote, £3,778, agreed to.

CLASS IV.—MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

District Magistrates' and Wardens' Courts, £400.

Dr. NEWMAN asked, in reference to the amount of £400 for "Extra Magistrate, North Island," where this Magistrate would be located.

Mr. CADMAN explained that in the Welling-ton, Hawke's Bay, and Taranaki Districts the Magistrates had lately been overworked, and it was therefore intended to create a new district in the North Island.

Vote, £400, agreed to.

Miscellaneous services, £1,065.

Mr. BELL asked who was to edit the new edition of "The New Zealand Justice of the Peace."

Mr. CADMAN said that had not yet been arranged.

Dr. NEWMAN desired to know what officer was to receive the salary of £700 set opposite the item, "Acting Law Adviser and Draftsman."

Mr. CADMAN said Dr. Fitchett, who was temporarily occupying the office of Solicitor-General.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked for what term Dr. Fitchett was appointed.

Mr. CADMAN said the Solicitor-General had received six months' leave of absence on account of serious ill-health. It was just possible the Government might have to extend that term, and Dr. Fitchett would no doubt occupy the position until the Solicitor-General's return to his office.

Vote, £1,065, agreed to.

CLASS IV.—COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS.

Customs: Miscellaneous services, £2,832.

Mr. WARD said the item "Refund of Customs duty, £2,700," was for a refund of duty chiefly on a class of machinery that was not made in the colony, and upon which duty had been paid in the ordinary way. Before a refund was authorised, those demanding it had to satisfy the department that it was due. The putting of the amount in one sum was merely a departmental matter of convenience.

Vote, £2,832, agreed to.

Vote, Marine Department, £2,451, agreed to.

CLASS VIII.—MINISTER OF EDUCATION.

Vote, Public schools, £5,626, agreed to.

Vote, Native schools, £500, agreed to.

Miscellaneous services, £350.

Mr. O'REGAN wished to know, with reference to the item, "Grant in aid of Thames High School, £200," why this school received exceptional treatment.

Mr. WARD said there was no exceptional treatment here. Inquiry had shown this grant to be necessary.

Sir R. STOUT thought the Minister of Education ought to explain why this special grant was made. He did not object to it, but it was exceedingly unfair that one high school should be selected out of the colony when others were being starved. The Government had not only struck out the high schools, but had failed to fulfil the contract they had made.

Mr. SEDDON said the income of this high school had fallen off owing to the depression in the mining industry in that part of the colony, and they could not make a corresponding reduction of the teachers, and consequently they were in arrears. It was a matter for consideration whether they should allow this school to break down, or should give it this special assistance.

Sir R. STOUT did not object to the amount, but would like to know if the Minister of Education would give similar votes to other high schools in like circumstances.

Mr. SEDDON said the Minister of Education was not well, and had gone home.

Mr. ALLEN asked whether other high schools that really required assistance of this kind would receive it. They had cut down salaries to the lowest ebb, and did not know how to go on unless assistance of this kind were given. He would like to have a promise that they would be treated in the same way.

Mr. SEDDON said there were other high schools which were in a bad condition, certainly, but not so bad as the Thames High School.

Mr. McGOWAN said that this was a very special case, and he had no doubt the House would grant assistance to any high school in the same condition. The governors of this school were quite prepared to hand over to the Government, for the amount it was valued at, the small endowment they had received, and would not ask for any assistance. The returns from the mines were now so small that they could not get on.

Mr. BUCHANAN objected to partial treatment of districts, although this seemed to be a deserving case.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE thought the demands of primary education should be met before those of higher education were attended to. In some back parts of the mining districts of the West Coast they could not get even a decent shed to serve as a school.

Mr. SEDDON said there was an additional allowance of £5,600 made for primary schools.

Vote, £356, agreed to.

Charitable, £2,100.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said a mistake had been made here. He saw that £100 was put down as a grant to Avon Refuge. He thought this should have been Herrick's Home, which had done very good work. He asked, would it be possible to get £100 under the heading of "Unauthorised," in place of this item?

Mr. WARD thought it would be quite sufficient to draw the attention of the Minister of Education to the matter.

Vote, £2,100, agreed to.

Vote, Department of Labour, £40, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—MINISTER OF MINES.

Minister of Mines, £789.

Mr. WILLIS asked whether the £60 set down for "Purchase of collection of birds for Museum" was to be available for the Wanganui Museum.

Mr. CADMAN said it was intended for Wellington.

Mr. MCGOWAN asked for an explanation of the item, "Aged Miners' Home, Westland, £800."

Mr. SEDDON said this was intended to provide a home for the indigent old miners on the West Coast. They ought to do something for the pioneers of the country. In some hospitals they could not take them in, and they were treated almost as vagrants when they were too old to work and too proud to beg. The hospital authorities would take them in if they could, but, as they could not, the police had been asked to act. That was not doing justice to old and deserving colonists whose necessities and infirmities demanded special attention.

Mr. ALLEN said that, with reference to the item, "Law-costs, Jutland Flat Gold-dredging Company, as recommended by Goldfields and Mines Committee," this Committee had recommended also that the rent should not be charged. Now, as the company had paid certain moneys for rent, they should be refunded.

Mr. CADMAN said it was intended to refund the rent on the recommendation of the Committee, but it was impossible to know the exact amount until matters had been properly settled, and for that reason no vote had been put on the estimates.

Mr. ALLEN asked if it would be refunded.

Mr. CADMAN.—Yes.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE moved, That the item,

Mr. McGowan

"Aged Miners' Home, Westland, £800," be struck out. It was an insult to the pioneer miners of Westland.

Amendment negatived.

Vote, £789, agreed to.

CLASS X.—MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.

Department of Agriculture, £10,999.

Mr. MEREDITH wished for information with regard to the item, "Expenses in connection with hemp bonus, £300."

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the House would recollect that last year they agreed to give a bonus for the invention of improved machinery. A good many applications had been received for the bonus, and they had appointed a man to inspect the claims.

Mr. HOGG wished to be informed as to the item, "Subsidy to liquidate late Awatere Rabbit Board's liabilities, £2,188."

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the Rabbit Board was entitled to a subsidy for wire netting, but the Board did not work satisfactorily, and after a considerable amount of money had been spent the Government had got the Board abolished, because the Board were not doing their duty; they were using the money for the fencing of their private properties, and the Government were putting an end to all that. The amount on the estimates was a liability.

Mr. BUCHANAN wished for an explanation with regard to the item, "Assistant Chief Inspector, £300."

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said that when the House met four months ago it was found impossible for Mr. Ritchie, the head of the department, to go round and inspect the other Inspectors. An intelligent man named Scaife had been appointed to keep the Inspectors up to their work, and he (Mr. McKenzie) could assure the House that he had done very good service. The appointment had put the other Inspectors on their mettle. Mr. Scaife had only received an advance of £50 on his salary.

Mr. PIRANI wished to know more about the bonus for flax. He would like to know if anything had been done practically. Had they got any test?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said they had not got any test. The experts who were looking into the matter at the present time had not finished their work.

Mr. MONTGOMERY wished for information with reference to the item, "Cool-storage for dairy-produce, £6,000."

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said they intended to perform this work free or at a nominal charge at first, and with this object in view they had put this money on the estimates. He believed the money would be well spent.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE would like to see the whole vote struck out. He did not think the farmers should be encouraged at the expense of the rest of the community. He did not see why they should have some £11,000 allowed to them when no encouragement was given to any other industry, and they opposed anything being given to the miners of the colony.

Vote, £10,999, agreed to.

CLASS XI.—WORKING RAILWAYS DEPARTMENT.
Vote, Gratuities, £285, agreed to.

CLASS XII.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.
Vote, Public buildings, £650, agreed to.

CLASS XIII.—DEFENCE DEPARTMENT.
Miscellaneous services, £5,438.
Mr. McNAB asked the Minister when the Martini-Henry rifles would arrive.
Mr. SEDDON said the first instalment was already in the colony. If the others were procurable they would be out by next summer. He was expecting to make arrangements for the whole of them to be out by that time. He would cable Home as soon as he got the vote passed.

Mr. DUNCAN wanted to know what proportion would be given to the Volunteers.
Mr. SEDDON said there were about fifty companies which had equal claims, and it was proposed to give them ten rifles each.

Mr. McNAB asked, if the Minister did not intend to give these rifles away, would he take into consideration the advisableness of taking off the duty? He was speaking with reference to Volunteer rifles, as opposed to sporting rifles.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government must look at it from another standpoint. If people wanted rifles they could buy them from the Government.

Mr. WILLIS asked if this £1,000 for rifles was in addition to what had already been procured.

Mr. SEDDON said Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the honourable gentleman had made a promise to the rifle-clubs with reference to these rifles, and he did not think the Minister was treating the clubs fairly, after the remarks which had been made at Trent-ham.

Mr. BELL asked from whom the rifles had been ordered.

Mr. SEDDON said the rifles were procured through the Agent-General from the War Department, and were obtained at schedule rates.

Mr. DUNCAN thought some concession should be made to rifle-clubs by the admission, duty-free, of rifles intended for those clubs.

Mr. SEDDON said that matter would be considered.

Vote, £5,438, agreed to.

CLASS XIV.—POLICE DEPARTMENT.
Vote, Miscellaneous services, £647, agreed to.

CLASS XV.—MINISTER OF LANDS.
Vote, Miscellaneous services, £1,885, agreed to.

FOR SERVICES CHARGEABLE TO THE PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—CHARGEABLE TO PART I.

CLASS II.—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.
Public Works Department, £200.

Mr. MEREDITH said that in 1893 Mr. C. Lock petitioned the House, and the Petitions Committee reported that he was entitled to a pension. The recommendation, however, had not been carried out on account of a technicality raised by the Audit Department. Mr. Lock had petitioned again this session, and his case had been recommended to the favourable consideration of the Government.

Vote, £200, agreed to.

CLASS IV.—ROADS.
Vote, Main roads, £3,200, agreed to.
Vote, Miscellaneous roads and bridges, £800, agreed to.

CLASS VIII.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.
Vote, Judicial, £350, agreed to.
Vote, Hospitals and other charitable institutions, £6,000, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—LIGHTHOUSES AND HARBOUR WORKS.
Vote, Lighthouses, £3,000, agreed to.

FOR SERVICES CHARGEABLE ON THE LANDS IMPROVEMENT ACCOUNT.

Vote, Roads and Bridges, £16,945, agreed to.

FOR SERVICES CHARGEABLE ON THE CHEVIOT ESTATE ACCOUNT.

CLASS XVIII.—MINISTER OF LANDS.
Vote, Cheviot Estate expenses, £28, agreed to.

FOR SERVICES CHARGEABLE ON THE PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE EXPENSES ACCOUNT.

Vote, Public Trust Office, £430, agreed to.

FOR SERVICES CHARGEABLE ON THE GOVERNMENT INSURANCE ACCOUNT.

Vote, Government Insurance Department, £15,000, agreed to.

SERVICES NOT PROVIDED FOR.

Vote, Services not provided for, £9,726 14s. 4d., agreed to.

Vote, Government Life Insurance Department, £206 17s. 7d., agreed to.

Vote, Public Trust Office, £315 14s. 7d., agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

Vote, Railways, £50, agreed to.

Vote, Services in excess of votes, £1,285 12s. 11d., agreed to.

Resolutions reported to the House.

The House adjourned at half-past two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Tuesday, 23rd October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Third Readings
Shipping and Seamen's Bill—Hikutala No. 1
Block Boundary Bill—Horowhenua Block Bill—Appropriation Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Mining Bill, Mining Districts Land Occupation Bill, Land Drainage Bill, Kirikiri Native School Site Bill, Income-tax Bill, Police Offences Bill, Horowhenua Block Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Mining Bill, Mining Districts Land Occupation Bill, Kirikiri Native School Site Bill, Income-tax Bill, Land Drainage Bill, Police Offences Bill, Horowhenua Block Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Police Offences Bill, Income-tax Bill, Land Drainage Bill, Kirikiri Native School Site Bill, Mining Bill, Mining Districts Land Occupation Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives disagreeing with certain amendments made by the Council in this Bill, and transmitting reasons for so disagreeing.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. McLEAN, the Hon. Mr. Swanson, the Hon. Mr. Richardson, the Hon. Mr. Bonar, and the mover were appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for insisting on the Council's amendments.

Subsequently, the following reason for insisting was brought up and agreed to: "That the amendments made are essential to the fair and reasonable carrying-out of the intention of the Bill."

Subsequently, a message was received from the House of Representatives, desiring a Conference on the subject of the Council's amendments.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. McLEAN, the Hon. Mr. Swanson, the Hon. Mr. Bonar, the Hon. Mr. Richardson, and the mover were appointed Managers for the Conference on behalf of the Council.

Subsequently,

The Hon. Mr. BONAR brought up the report of the Conference on this Bill, and, in moving its adoption, said the result of the Conference had been, practically, that the whole of the amendments of any importance had been agreed to by the other House.

Motion agreed to.

HIKUTAIA No. 1 BLOCK BOUNDARY BILL.

This Bill was read the first time.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said its object was to settle a long-standing dispute about boundaries—he supposed one of the oldest disputes in the colony. As the Bill was likely to go before the Native Affairs Committee, it would be desirable that any discussion on it should be taken when it came back.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS protested against this Bill being read a second time now. It had not been seen by any member of the Council. So far as he knew, it had not been circulated.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes, it has.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said, Well, no one had seen it. He asked why it was not introduced long ago. He intended to divide the Council, so as to enable it to understand the nature of the Bill before passing it; and to throw the responsibility for the non-passing of such measures as this in the closing hours of the session, when they could not have proper consideration, upon those on whom that responsibility rightly devolved. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time this day three months.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE wished the Colonial Secretary would offer them some explanation why the Bill should pass. He had no idea what it was, or what part of the colony it affected.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said it affected the North of Auckland.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said all he wanted to know was that there was some kind of justification for passing it.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question."

AYES, 7.

Buckley	McLean	Rigg
Feldwick	Montgomery	Stewart.
Mantell

NOES, 12.

Acland	MacGregor	Richardson
Baillie	Oliver	Walker, L.
Barnicoat	Pharazyn	Whitmore
Bonar	Reynolds	Whyte.

Majority against, 5.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill ordered to be read the second time this day three months.

HOROWHENUA BLOCK BILL.

On the question, That the Council go into Committee on this Bill,

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS asked leave of the Council to make a short statement explaining the reasons for this Bill. On the 10th day of April, 1873, an order was duly made by the Native Land Court, under the provisions of "The Native Lands Act, 1865," and "The Native Lands Act, 1867," for the issue of a certificate of title in favour of Meiha Keepa Rangihiwini—commonly known as Major Kemp—under the 17th section of "The Native Lands Act, 1867," for a block of land at Horowhenua, in the district of Manawatu, in the Provincial District of Wellington, containing 52,460 acres, more or less; and on the same day an order was made, pursuant to the provisions of the said 17th section of "The Native Lands Act, 1867," for the registration in the said Court of the names of 148 aboriginal natives of New Zealand as the owners of this land. The finding of the Court, on which these orders were based, was that the Muaupoko Tribe was entitled to this land, and the list of owners was intended to include all the members of the Muaupoko Tribe so entitled. In the month of November, 1886, the Native Land Court sat at Palmerston North for the purpose of partitioning the said block of land, upon the application of Major Kemp. On the 25th of November three division orders were made by the Land Court, with the unanimous consent of the owners then present in Court. On the 1st of December other division orders were made by general consent, the result being that all the persons named in the Native Land Court certificate of title as owners received on partition some portion of the said block of land in their own right. But all the portions so awarded in severalty were covered with bush, and had never been actually occupied or resided on by the Muaupoko Tribe. The effect of the partition among the owners, so far as it had now been carried, was to leave the residential portion of the block, called Horowhenua No. 11, containing 14,975 acres, and including the whole of the Horowhenua Lake, quite intact. The tribe, having determined to keep this portion of the estate unbroken as a permanent home for the people, declined to have the partition carried any further, and moved the Court to order the issue of a certificate of title for the same, as before, in the name of Major Kemp. At this stage of the proceedings Wirihana Hunia, one of the registered owners, came forward as representing the Hunia family, and objected to the order being in the name of Major Kemp alone. After a short retirement from the Court for consultation, Major Kemp agreed to admit the name of Warena Hunia—Wirihana's younger brother—as co-trustee with himself; and he then applied to the Court to join Warena Hunia with him in the order, which was done accordingly, there being no dissentient. In giving his consent to the introduction of Warena Hunia's name, Major Kemp understood that he was consenting to have a joint trustee with himself in the management of the estate for the benefit of the tribe to whom it of right belonged; and that was the universal belief among the owners then present in Court, who permitted the arrangement to be recorded unchallenged. After the division orders that he had mentioned had been made, a survey of the block was made, and a proper plan of the subdivision was prepared for the Court, after which certificates of title were ordered to be issued, in conformity with the provisions of the Land Transfer Act. The Muaupoko Tribe, who all along fully understood and believed that their interest in the said block of land was held by Major Kemp and Warena Hunia in trust, now discovered that, without any intentional consent on their part, the whole estate had passed in law to the two persons named in the order of the Court, and that their ancestral home, on which most of them had been born,—their houses, their cultivations, their burial-places, and their lake fishing-grounds,—had passed away from them for ever. No warning had been given to them in Court that the effect of the order to be made would be to divert the said lands from the acknowledged owners, or that it was necessary or desirable that the trusts under which the said lands were held should be in any way declared or protected. Indeed, there was reason to believe that the Court itself was unaware of the full effect of the order it had made; otherwise it was difficult to conceive how it could have allowed such an order to be entered up without a word of warning to those concerned. It the sitting in February, 1890, notwithstanding ing that the trust in these lands was insisted on by Major Kemp, and admitted by Warena Hunia, the Native Land Court proceeded to partition the said lands as though the same were held by them in their own right, and, after causing a valuation of the estate to be made, divided the block into two parcels, called Horowhenua No. 11A, valued at £13,392, and Horowhenua No. 11B, valued at £12,244, and awarded them to Major Kemp and Warena Hunia respectively. Major Kemp, being dissatisfied with the proceedings of the Native Land Court, appealed to the Chief Judge of the Court for a rehearing, and a rehearing was ordered accordingly. This rehearing took place in the month of May, 1891, before Judges Mair and Scannell, when Major Kemp again insisted upon the trust, and protested against the land being dealt with by the Court as if it were the private property of the two trustees. In this course he was supported by the general body of owners then present in Court. The said Judges declined to consider or inquire into the alleged trust, believing that they had no power to do so; and they made an order on the 10th day of April, 1891, confirming the previous order for partition.

The Hon. Mr. WHYTE.—What was the effect?

The Hon. Mr. WILLIAMS said the effect was that they did not consider it was a question which was referred to them. They had only to decide whether the portions awarded to each party were correct. But they went on to remark,—

“It is not within the province of the Court to inquire as to how or for what purpose the certificate for that piece, clearly the property of the bulk of the people of Muaupoko, was issued in the names of two persons only; but the Court feels that under the whole circumstances it is its duty to lay such facts as are within its knowledge before the Chief Judge, in order that, if any application is made on the subject, he may be in a position to advise as to whether it would be desirable to institute further inquiry into the whole matter, with a view to ultimate justice being done to all the parties.”

Then Warena Hunia, finding that the estate was vested in himself personally, proceeded at once to deal with the land, and he sold 1,500 acres to the Government at £4 an acre—that was, for £6,000—and the object of this Bill was to secure this £6,000 for the trust, and to prevent any further dealings with the estate until the question could be decided, which he thought was pending, in the Supreme Court.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said this was one of those Bills which it was difficult for those not accustomed to Native affairs to deal with. It appeared that the effect of the Bill was simply to keep matters as they were until the equitable rights were adjusted as between two or three parties, and he thought that was the utmost they could do. He did not pretend to follow the intricacies of the Native title, but it was evident there was a very material dispute between two parties, and, he supposed, their tribes as well, in connection with this land. He thought their duty was to see that these things were held in suspense until the matter could be finally and equitably adjusted. There seemed to be provision for this in the first proviso of clause 2, which said,—

"Provided that grants of rights to cut timber shall not be voided or affected by this section. All royalties payable under any such grant shall be paid to the Public Trustee, who shall retain the same until the final adjustment of the aforesaid disputes."

That was supplemented by a further proviso, which, as the Hon. Mr. Williams had stated, provided that the Bill should not apply to the 1,500 acres sold to the Crown by Warena te Hakeke. It appeared that those 1,500 acres were sold for £6,000, of which £2,000 had already been paid to Warena; but he thought the Council ought to make it their business to insure that the balance of £4,000 should be held in the same trust as the royalties provided for here, and he would propose, therefore, in the 6th clause to make a proviso to that effect. The 6th clause said,—

"This Act shall not apply to Her Majesty, or to any portion of the aforesaid lands that have been or may hereafter be acquired by Her Majesty."

He would also like to add a few words, in the form of a proviso, to the effect that the balance of the money which had not yet been paid to Warena te Hakeke should be held by the Public Trustee, in the same way as funds which might accrue from the royalty on the cutting of timber, pending a final settlement of the dispute, and then no wrong could be done to any one until finally the dispute would be settled, which he presumed would be in the ordinary course of law. With that he would be perfectly willing to support the passing of the Bill. Clause 3 referred to the same thing. It said that the estate and interest of Warena te Hakeke in the Horowhenua Block—

"... shall stand charged with whatever moneys may, on the final adjustment of the aforesaid disputes and the taking of all necessary accounts, be found owing by the said Warena te Hakeke to any of such claimants or to the said Te Keepa te Rangihiniwinui."

He thought, if they tied up the £4,000 in the same way as the other moneys which might come in, they would be pursuing a perfectly safe and judicious course.

Bill committed, reported, and read the third time.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

This Bill was read the first and the second time.

On the question, That the Bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said,—I think, before this Bill is read a third time, we ought to have a little consideration upon the matter. This is now the final act of the session, and, in my opinion, we ought to take advantage of the opportunity to consider what we have been doing during the session. I find, from a rough calculation, that we have passed something like a hundred Bills during the present session of Parliament. Of these, six may be termed, as they are now designated, labour Bills. Then, we have been introduced to a new phase of legislation, for six of these Bills appertain to banking. The new financial proposals are embodied in fourteen Bills; and then, of Native Bills there are six, of general Bills there are fifty-four, lands ten, and railways four: making altogether a hundred Bills. Now, I think we ought to consider what has been the general effect of our legislation. In connection with the labour Bills, I will simply say that the Council has, I think, with due deliberation acceded to a very large extent to what was the popular feeling expressed at the last elections in favour of certain of these Bills. These Bills did not altogether meet with our approval, but the Council, I think wisely, yielded to what it felt was public opinion upon these Bills. They are, I consider, to a very large extent restrictive in character. They have imposed upon us what, to my mind, is a most objectionable feature—that the whole of our labour, the whole of our works, and the whole of our earnings are to be subjected to an inspection which is at once repugnant to our nature. I think in a new colony like ours we should not be forced and coerced by inspectors in every possible direction, in every factory, in every industry we have got started in the country, so that we shall be liable to having an inspector coming to say, "You are to do this, that, or the other." I say that one of the charms of a new colony is that you are free from all these trammels and restraints. I have known gentlemen who have left this colony and gone to England, and have come back again. Why? Because they could not stand this sort of thing there. If you get a gun there you must also get a license, and have an inspector. If you have a carriage you have got to pay a tax, and there is an inspector for that; and for so many windows you have got to pay a tax. We are in a free colony, which has not by any means developed its resources, and should not be subjected to the vexatious restrictions which older countries require, and I therefore say it is with regret I see any proposal to saddle the colony with them, and find the whole of these restrictions placed upon capital and labour and everything else. I regret, although it is thought to be in the interest of the public, that so-called public opinion has to a certain extent forced this legislation. We yield to it. I think we are wise perhaps in yielding, because, while as a nominated Chamber it is our duty to put a check upon hasty legislation, yet it is not our duty to be restrictive when the public mind has been explicitly expressed, as it has been to a certain extent upon these Bills. I pass over that, because I do not want to dwell upon it, more especially as the matter has been fought out between both Houses. Then we come to the banking legislation. Now, we have been called upon to pass no less than six Bills on this question. It is an entirely new departure in the finances of the colony. I say it was only under the most extreme pressure that could possibly be put upon any Parliament that we sanctioned certain Bills going through which have committed the colony to a position that is not, at all events to my mind, altogether satisfactory. We have been committed to a course which has involved us in a liability of at least two millions of money to one bank, and without pledging ourselves to others. I think this is a very serious matter. Of course the Government, when they brought the matter down, told us it was a matter of urgency, and I question very much whether, with the knowledge we have since gained, we should be disposed to take the same view now that we did then. However, we have embarked upon that course, and I say it behoves us now to try as far as we possibly can to preserve the interests of the colony and the interests of the bank we have guaranteed, and, with that, the whole financial condition of the colony. At any rate, it has involved us in an entirely new departure, because we have now not only got to consider what are the colony's finances, but what are the banking finances of the colony. We have got to do that which I think the colony should never have been called upon to do. I think we should never have been called on to get Parliament to protect any local institution. The colony has quite enough to do to manage its own financial concerns without managing the financial matters of other bodies, or being committed to them, and I consider we shall have a good deal of trouble before we get out of it. I feel a difficulty, Sir, in speaking on this matter, because it involves so much delicate negotiation that one does not like to say much about it. Of course, we want to uphold the credit of the colony in every possible way. I feel that the Bank of New Zealand is intimately connected with the whole of our financial institutions, and therefore we do not want to do anything that would depreciate it. At the same time I say, without the slightest hesitation, that, having now faced the position, having appointed the President of the bank, we must put that institution on a thoroughly sound footing; else we must sacrifice the two millions that are already pledged. I think, in connection with that institution, "the old man of the sea" is the body which has been termed the Globo Assets Company. I say the bank itself, pure and simple, is, I believe, capable of doing a very excellent, good business, and the largest business in the colony; but as long as it is weighted with the Globo Assets Company upon its shoulders, so long will that be very much to its detriment, and I think, myself, the best plan would be to separate the bank's affairs altogether from those of the Assets Company. Let there be a separate manager for the bank to look after the concerns of that institution, and a distinct and separate manager to look after the "globo assets," and so realise these as the opportunity may offer. Any one who knows anything about business knows perfectly well this cannot be done in a moment, because the securities they hold cannot be realised at a moment's notice; and therefore I say we ought to separate the two institutions, have one manager for the bank, and have a separate manager to look after the "globo assets," and to realise them as opportunity offers and as circumstances permit. You must take reasonable time to do that. If we do that, I think things will go right. I say most emphatically, as far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that the globo assets of the Bank of New Zealand will realise the million and a half—the amount for which they are involved with the debenture-holders, and I should be quite pleased to let the rest go. Of course, these are things that no doubt the President of the bank will look thoroughly into, and probably deal with. But I think, further, that we should not hamper the hands of the man we have chosen to appoint as President of the bank—that we should allow him a reasonable time to thoroughly inquire into the position of affairs; but I consider, after the President has had the opportunity of going thoroughly into these things, that, seeing the colony is so much interested in the Bank of New Zealand, it would be a very wise and prudent thing, as far as he can reasonably do it, to withdraw its operations from outside places, and concentrate the business of the Bank of New Zealand in New Zealand, and not carry on operations in other colonies and countries. I think that, in view of the position of things now in England, that would be a very wise and very prudent course to pursue. I would give reasonable time to do that, and I should like the President of the bank to thoroughly investigate the securities it has in other colonies. By all means in the world avoid these things. The colony should not be hampered by the finances in outside places, such as Victoria, South Australia, New South Wales, and probably in London.

Hon. Mr. Bonar

An Hon. MEMBER.—And Fiji.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—Fiji I do not know anything about. I say we ought to concentrate our finances within our own colony, and then, I believe, we shall do a perfectly sound and satisfactory business, once we are clear of the incubus which lies upon the shoulders of the Bank of New Zealand in the form of the Globo Assets Company. That is all I have to say about that. I am quite confident that the bank itself, within the colony, is perfectly able to do a thoroughly satisfactory and good, paying business, if it keeps clear of outside countries. It is our special business to see that this is done. Then we come now to another class of legislation, which I am sure I face with—I do not know what to say—with dread and dismay. These are the new financial proposals of the Government. I have endeavoured, as far as I possibly could, to face the financial proposals of the Government with every desire to give them a fair trial, and to do that which I could to assist them. But, Sir, they are of a very gigantic character. I trust that they will come out right. They have been modified, I think, to a very large extent by the action of the Council. They have been modified, in my opinion, in the right direction, and I think the Government themselves will recognise that what has been done in the Council has been in the way of prudence as affecting the whole of the colony's finances. We have given them power to issue Consols, hoping thereby to give the people a sound means of investing their money at a moderate rate of interest. I think possibly the thing may be successful. But we have also issued a new policy entirely—that of lending money to those who are settling in our country, and who require a certain amount of monetary assistance; and the Council was disposed to limit this power of borrowing to the extent of one-half of the value of the security, but we ultimately gave way and allowed them to borrow to the extent of three-fifths. I think, if we are going to make this thing a practical matter at all, that three-fifths is about the lowest we could go to so as to assist men to come and settle in the country, and to help them along in their difficulties. Of course, we are always exposed to the risk of losing in these transactions, and particularly at the present moment, when a tremendous depression exists which affects all the productions of the colony, and I hope, for I can only say I hope, that this legislation will be productive of good results. I think, as far as the colony is concerned, we have got to the very utmost limit we possibly can go in the way of assisting settlement through this means, and I trust the result will be satisfactory. Then, Sir, we come to Native matters, and, of course, that is a subject that I do not pretend to know anything about, but, as far as I can see, I consider that the spirit of all our legislation on this point has been to try to assist in settling the matter. In connection with general matters, we have passed fifty-four Bills. I say this is perfectly monstrous and absurd. We have no right whatever to pass legislation from year to year which requires fifty-four Bills to amend—Bills practically to amend those Acts we have hitherto passed. I think that we ought to take more time, and give more consideration to the measures we do pass, so as to avoid the necessity of passing fifty-four Bills in one session mainly to amend those passed before; and I think if we passed six or seven Bills in a session after careful deliberation it would be far better than to pass Bills, as we now do, so freely, and then require to pass another fifty or so to amend them. I would strongly recommend that the Bills which are brought in should be those which were intended to last for a long time, and that they should not be amended simply to suit any particular case that may arise, as many cases do arise, necessitating this large number of alterations. I take it that that is a very great mistake. As far as land-legislation is concerned, we have only passed ten measures. Of course, dealing with the land in so many ways as we are, I suppose we could not help it. And as far as the railways are concerned we have only passed four Bills. These are not for making new railways, and they involve some very important questions, which it is hardly worth while for me to go into. Of course, we have altered the whole system of our railway management, and I think we have done so wrongly. I think we were right when we declared that our railways should not be in the hands, in any shape or form, of those exercising political control. They should be entirely under the control of trustworthy and capable men whose object it would be to work these things for the advantage of the colony, and so that they might not be used in any way for political purposes. I do not want to say much about this matter, but if you put into the hands of any Government—I am not referring to this Government particularly, but to all Governments—the political control of something like three or four thousand men who have all got votes in the country, I say it affords a great temptation to any Government to play into their hands and to do that which will please them, instead of doing that which they ought to do. That is absolutely wrong. Of course, there will be wrongs cropping up in connection with these things, and there must be wrongs, and they will lead to an amount of political pressure being put on any Government that may be in office which should not exist. On the whole, it would be very much better that these things should be kept entirely free from political control. I do not want to make a long talk about this sort of thing, and I shall now only refer to one or two other matters which I think the Council ought to consider. I want to refer more particularly to two Bills which were introduced here relating to legitimation and divorce respectively. The Legitimation Bill became law. The Divorce Bill did not become law. It was very ably introduced here; but I think, if you are going to shake the whole basis of our social system, nothing worse could possibly be done in a new colony, and I deprecate any attempt to shake that basis. We have quite enough to do in our social matters, and I say, if we are going to shake up the whole foundation of our social system, and of our family life, and everything else, by introducing measures like that, it is the very worst thing we could do. I trust the Council will be true to itself, and refuse absolutely to lend itself to anything of the kind. Now, Sir, I have endeavoured to put what few thoughts I have on the matter into as short a compass as possible. I feel assured that the Council will do in the future what it has always done in the past, and set its face steadily against any violent change in our laws, at the same time bearing in mind that it is their duty to yield to reasonable proposals coming from the representatives of the people. I consider the session which is just ending is one of the most important sessions which we have had in the colony. We have been asked to adopt a great many new principles and ideas; and, to give a chance to the new ideas which have been promulgated by the Government, we have adopted them with such safeguards as we considered absolutely necessary.

The Hon. Captain MORRIS.—Sir, I wish to say nothing on the legislation of the session, which legislation, however, I hope will be for he best. I am quite certain that every member of the Council has done his best to improve the measures that have come before the Council. I should like to call the attention of the Council to the manner in which the business of the country has been done in the last few days, in the hope that some one better qualified than myself will move some motion next session with a view of preventing the rush of business that we continually have at the end of a session. Sir, we have passed Bills to-day and yesterday that I for one know precious little about. I have been very careful not to vote on those measures, because I felt that I ought not to do so when I had no knowledge of any measure we were asked to pass. I think, myself, that Bills that come up to the Council within the last four or five days of the end of the session should not be passed at all by the Council, because it is quite impossible to give them proper attention. In one case that I know of, a Bill was considered in Committee here before the report of the Select Committee reached this Council, and we rely very much on reports of Select Committees. I think that kind of thing is very much against proper legislation. As I said before, I hope some one better qualified than myself will move in the direction of preventing this hurried legislation in the last days of the session in the future.

Hon. Mr. Bonar

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY. — Sir, I have listened, and I am sure we have all listened, to the very instructive and able speech of the Hon. Mr. Bonar with great pleasure. I can testify to the very great labour and pains that the honourable gentleman has taken during the session upon every Committee on which he has been engaged, and I entirely agree with a great deal of what he has said. I also agree in the undesirableness of bringing down measures to this Council such as we have passed from time to time hurriedly and towards the end of the session; but unfortunately that has been the Ministerial practice, and no matter what Government is in office the same thing will be done. It is not so much the fault of the Government as it is the fault of those in another place, who seem to think that they can hurry measures through their own place and then send them on here to be passed through as quickly as they like: and I think that is a bad practice. Of course, my great desire during the sitting of Parliament has always been to make the labour of the Council as light as possible by consulting the convenience of honourable members in every possible way. I have endeavoured to save them as much as I possibly could, and, excepting in one or two instances, we have invariably cleared our Order Paper, and, notwithstanding the immense amount of work we have gone through, I do not think we ever had fewer night-sittings than we have had during this long and tedious session. I am, of course, indebted to the Council to a great extent for that, and I take this opportunity of thanking the members of the Council for the indulgence with which they have during this session, and in former sessions, treated me. I find that the longer we know one another the more we seem to respect and trust one another, and I have invariably found that the Council has treated me in that way. I have always taken the Council into my confidence, and I never will cease to do so. To me the Council is paramount to any Government, and I would cease to be a member of any Government that did not treat the Council with proper respect. I do not think we have any reason to say that the present Government has been wanting in any respect to the Council, and I am bound to say I think the Council can always take its own part against any men or any Government. I wish to bear testimony to the good work done by the several Committees during the few years I have been in the Council, especially the work done by the Labour Bills Committee and the Statutes Revision Committee. I do not suppose there has been so much care and attention bestowed upon any Bills in this colony as has been bestowed on the Bills considered by those two Committees; and the measures of the most important character which have passed through those Committees reflect the greatest credit on those who took part in them.

Bill read the third time.

The Council adjourned at twenty-three minutes past eleven o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, 23rd October, 1894.

First Readings—Second Readings—Third Readings—New Plymouth Breakwater Railway—Horowhenua Block Bill—Shipping and Seamen's Bill—Horowhenua Block Bill—Supply—Government Advertising—Shipping and Seamen's Bill—Controller and Auditor-General—Charitable Aid—Heriot-Roxburgh Railway—Caitlin's River Railway—Reciprocal Customs Treaty—Heriot-Roxburgh Railway—J. Heron—Inebriate Asylums—Charitable Aid and Main Roads—Inangahua Mining—Native Expenditure, Civil List—Stoats and Weasels—Wood-working Machine—Parliamentary Officials—Railway Refreshment-bars—H. Pasara—Workmen's Fares on Railways—Fruit, &c., sent to Hospitals—E. Robertson—District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates—Pumice Insulation—School-teachers travelling—Licensing Additional Bars—Charitable Aid—Sunnyside Asylum—Appropriation Bill—Horowhenua Block Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Police Offences Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

SECOND READINGS.

Hikutia No. 1 Block Boundary Bill, Police Offences Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Police Offences Bill, Hikutia No. 1 Block Boundary Bill, Public Works Appropriation Bill.

NEW PLYMOUTH BREAKWATER RAILWAY.

On the motion of Mr. E. M. SMITH, it was ordered, That there be laid before this House a return showing—(1) What amount of money has been received by the Railway Commissioners for passengers on the New Plymouth line from and to the Breakwater for the last two years; (2) what amount has been received for goods, &c., for that period; (3) what is the cost of working the said line; and (4) statement showing the net profit for the two years.

HOROWHENUA BLOCK BILL.

Mr. SEDDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he had promised the Native Affairs Committee that he would pass the Bill. He might say there would be some amendment made in it in the direction indicated by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). He thought it necessary that they should prevent any further dealings with this block, and have the questions concerning the Horowhenua Block and the transaction between Major Kemp and Warena te Hakeke definitely settled. The Bill would, of course, prevent any further dealings pending the final settlement of the question.

Mr. WILSON said he had a good deal to say about this Bill, because he did not think its provisions at all met what was required. If the Minister was prepared to cut out clause 2, and to alter other clauses, he had no further objection; but if he insisted on clause 2 he (Mr. Wilson) should proceed with what he had to say.

Mr. SEDDON suggested that the honourable gentleman should wait until they saw what amendments were proposed in Committee. If there was objection to the Bill he should not press it at this stage of the session. He was only bringing it forward now in accordance with a promise which had been made.

Mr. WILSON said that was not sufficient for him, and, as the Premier would not give the assurance he asked for, he should therefore have to take considerable objection to the Bill, and he would have to oppose it as much as he could.

Captain RUSSELL.—What are the objections?

Mr. WILSON said he would have to take up a good deal of time to state them. He did not propose, however, to go into the history of the Horowhenua Block as a whole, though even its history was very interesting. But he believed the Bill, if it were passed, would do a very great injustice indeed to a large number of Natives. He proposed to deal with Horowhenua No. 11 and No. 6. No. 11 had been divided into two parts—one with Hakeke's name to the title and one with Major Kemp's. He did not propose to go into the question of the decision of the Land Court, but ever since then there had been a quarrel about the Horowhenua land. Warena Hunia, whose name had been placed in one of the subdivisions of this block, had given Donald Fraser, of Rangitikei, power of attorney to act for him, and since that there had been constant litigation in the Native Land Court, and at the present moment there was litigation in the Supreme Court. The case was adjourned from Wanganui to Wellington, and was to be heard on the 29th of the present month. Last year Mr. Fraser offered a piece of land to the Government on behalf of Hunia, and he (Mr. Wilson) assisted to sell the land to the Government. The land in dispute surrounded the Township of Levin. There was a large quantity of beautiful land hung up there, pending these quarrels. The land near the township was bush, which kept the roads in winter in a very bad state, owing to shading them from the sun. He was anxious that this land should be settled; so he assisted to sell the land to the Government. There was no dispute as to the sale, he understood, on either side. He might say that Mr. Fraser was rather astute, and, having the assistance of himself, who was on the opposition side, he also desired—

Mr. SEDDON.—Is that the gentleman who opposed the honourable gentleman at the last election?

Mr. WILSON said that was so. As he was saying, not only did Mr. Fraser have his assistance, but Mr. Stevens, the present member for Rangitikei, was also engaged for many weeks on the case. He would not have referred to this matter at all but that this Bill proposed to do a great injustice to a number of Natives, who apparently in the end would lose this land, and it would all go to lawyers and agents. In order to show the political significance this Bill had, he would have to relate a curious incident which took place in relation to the 1,500 acres sold to Government. He regretted having to do so, but it was necessary to show the political bearing the Bill had. Up to the last moment the purchase was in the hands of the Minister of Lands, and it was apparently going to be completed. The Minister inspected the land and thought it was suitable for settlement. But those who were in the House would remember that at the close of last session the Premier assumed control of the Native Office; and then at once there was a change. At that time Mr. Fraser was a strong supporter of the Opposition and an opponent of the Government, but the Premier was very anxious to get him to stand. The Premier and Mr. Carroll asked him to stand for the Otaki District, but Mr. Fraser refused to do so. However, the Premier had occasion to go to Feilding to speak. It was that celebrated occasion when he made the statement about Mr. Ballance desiring him to take the lead of the party; and his visit was on the 11th October. Before going there he telegraphed to Mr. Fraser asking him to meet him at Feilding. Mr. Fraser got into the Premier's carriage and travelled to Palmerston from Feilding;—the distance between Feilding and Palmerston was about eleven miles. At Palmerston Mr. Fraser left the Premier's carriage, and announced that he was going to stand for the Otaki seat. It was rather a quick conversion, but it was done, for it was not in the interests of the Opposition he was going to stand, but as a Government supporter. Then came the strangest coincidence possible. Before this the sale had been hung up by the Premier when he assumed control of the Native Office. But on the 15th of the month the sale was absolutely effected, and the records on the table of the House showed that the 1,500 acres was absolutely sold to the Government. He had omitted to say that Mr. Fraser was himself personally interested, as he had advanced a large sum of money to Warena Hunia on the strength of the sale.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member was aware that the owner was in communication with the late Mr. Ballance long before he died.

Mr. WILSON was quite aware of that, and had stated distinctly that when the Premier assumed office negotiations were stopped. After the journey from Feilding to Palmerston the hitch was got over; and on the 15th of the month—six days afterwards—the sale was completed. Now, the inference was quite clear to his mind—and it might be so to the minds of other members—that that journey and sale had a good deal to do with Mr. Fraser standing for the Otaki seat. But, although the sale had been effected, the money was not paid over, as there was a caveat lodged by Natives interested against any sum being paid to Warena, as he was said to be a trustee. The Minister of Lands had assured the House no payment would be made until the owners were ascertained. Yet an article appeared in the Evening Post on the 18th of this month, showing that, although a case in the Supreme Court was pending as to whether Warena Hunia was trustee or not, the Government had paid—only a week or two before the case came on—£2,000 to Warena Hunia out of the £6,000 due for the land. Warena might be entitled to the whole of the money; but, pending the settlement of the case in the Supreme Court, and especially after the promise of the Minister, the Government had committed an illegal act in paying over any money at all. Mr. Fraser was said to have received £500 of this; and yet clause 3, to which he (Mr. Wilson) took such exception, legalised this payment, and those interested could have no recourse at law. There had been a number of compromises attempted, one of which he had assisted in himself, because he felt that, if they went to law, what between lawyers' and other expenses the land belonging to the Muaupoko Tribe would all go to pay their expenses. The compromise he spoke of was that Warena should hand back to the tribe half the block held in his name—both in area and value. This fell through, because the tribe thought they were not getting a fair division. Then the tribe sent a deputation to the Premier, and Mr. Edwards appeared for them. After the Natives had stated that the piece of land they were offered was of poor quality, and they would only be left the sandhills, Mr. Edwards, on their behalf, offered another compromise. This was "that Warena should take or himself and his family the £6,000 due from Government, and leave the balance of the block to the tribe." This was not listened to, and also fell through. At this interview the Premier promised to have the land reported on, and a valuation made of the different shares—the one proposed to be taken by Warena, and the other share that was to be handed over to the tribe—and Mr. Kennedy Macdonald was accordingly sent up, and made his report, which was on the table of the House. The following was a summary taken from his report:—

Copy of Valuation of Shares in Block 11.—(From Mr. Kennedy Macdonald's Report.)

Land proposed to be ceded by Warena	£
Hunia	3,850
Land proposed to be retained by Warena
Hunia	4,150
Total value of land to be dealt with ...	£8,000
Valuation of lands as above	£
Purchase-money of land for Government farm	8,000
... ..	6,000
Total value of Hunia's original share in Block 11.	£14,000

Something like a hundred and twenty of these Natives were interested in the block, and yet they were to be given land valued at £3,850 according to that report, while one individual was to get land to the value of £4,150 as well as £6,000 in cash, £2,000 of which he had received—an altogether unfair division. If there had been a fair compromise, and the tribe had been given half the value, he was quite certain the Natives would have agreed to it. This Bill was intended to settle this Horowhenua case, but it seemed to him that it had done nothing of the kind. As far as he could see, the worst part of the Bill was contained in clause 2. As he had said, the Government had made a payment that was illegal. But this Bill seemed to legalise the payment to Warena. Moreover, if this Bill stepped in between the parties in the case that was at present going on in the Supreme Court, it would be an extremely wrong proceeding. One very curious point was this: that when Kemp's petition was before the Native Affairs Committee that session the Premier, because there was a Court case going on, brought in a motion, and it was passed, that, as there was a Supreme Court case pending, the Committee would not deal with the petition; and yet here at the end of the session, when half the members were going away, and when no one would take an interest in the matter, the Premier brought this Bill, which did precisely that same thing: if passed, it would interfere with a case now before the Supreme Court. If they were to set up a Commission to inquire into it and deal with it next session, he thought there would be no objection to that. There was another block—No. 6—which was dealt with in the Bill. This was also a very far-reaching and serious case, and he did not think there was any objection on the part of the Natives or Kemp, who was trustee, to go before the Native Land Court with a view of ascertaining the ownership. Clause 3 said,—

"For the purpose of protecting the rights of all claimants in respect of the Horowhenua Block as against the said Warena te Hakeke and Te Keapa te Rangihiniwini, it is hereby declared that, notwithstanding anything in any Act to the contrary, all dealings, whether by way of sale, lease, charge, or otherwise howsoever, with the following lands and interests in lands, shall, until otherwise directed by the Governor in Council, be absolutely void."

Now, he wished to bring another matter forward which this clause affected. Mr. Peter Bartholomew, as most people on the West Coast knew, was a very good and useful settler, who had spent a large amount of money in sawmilling and had employed a large number of men. He erected one of the finest mills in the colony, and was depending upon getting timber from this block under a cutting-right he held. He had made some arrangements with the State farm to cut timber, of which, however, there was only a small quantity. There was a dispute also as to who were the owners of this land, and Mr. Bartholomew had agreed to pay the royalty into the hands of a receiver pending the settlement of the ownership. That 12.0. was an extremely fair proposal, and, indeed, a very good one for the Natives themselves, because, when they came to get the land into their own hands, they would also get a considerable sum of money as well, and the value of their land would be enhanced. Mr. Bartholomew had put a tramway through the block, and altogether had gone to an expenditure of some £2,000. Clause 3 in the Bill would absolutely stop all the cutting-rights, and the lease would be void; and, as far as he could see, the mill would probably be stopped. He would ask, in the interests of this gentleman, and of the district, and of a number of men who were employed at the mill, that something should be done in connection with this matter. If the Minister would do as the Native Affairs Committee had recommended—namely, simply set up a Commission for the purpose of inquiring into this question—he would have no objection. He thought that the circumstances should be inquired into; and he might say that, whatever the decision arrived at was, he would be perfectly prepared to abide by it and to support it.

Mr. CARROLL desired to make a personal explanation. He never knew that Mr. Fraser was going to contest that electorate until he saw the announcement in the papers.

Mr. STEVENS was not at all surprised at the honourable member for Otaki making the one-sided statement which he had done for the purpose of gaining sympathy for the party that supported him. It was well known that Mr. Donald Fraser was one of the strongest supporters of the honourable gentleman, and had been so ever since his advent to politics. But because Mr. Donald Fraser chose to advance with the times his erstwhile friend immediately turned round upon him and said he could no longer give him any support. He had supported him from the inception of this trouble down to the commencement of the election; and because Mr. Donald Fraser had chosen to think and act for himself politically he was all wrong; his so-called friend had turned round and assisted in maintaining the great injustice which had been done. The facts were that in 1872 a block of land called the Horowhenua Block, comprising 52,000 acres, were passed through the Native Land Court entirely at the expense of Warana Hunia's father. Subsequently a subdivision of that block took place, and various portions of the land were awarded to the various hapus of the Muaupoko tribe. After having dealt with these subdivisions there remained a balance of fourteen thousand odd acres. The Native Land Court awarded that land to Major Kemp and Warana Hunia; they held the lands jointly under the Land Transfer Act. There was dissatisfaction on the part of some Natives who had little or no claim to the land, and a rehearing was asked for and granted. The rehearing confirmed what had been done by the first Court. A subdivision took place; the subdividing Court awarded half to Warana and half to Major Kemp. Warana, from the time he received his half, offered for sale to the Government 1,500 acres, wishing to retain a portion for himself and his family, numbering sixteen persons of the highest rank among the whole of the owners of the 52,000 acres. What he wished to retain for himself and the family to which he belonged was 2,000 acres, and he returned to the Natives not 3,000 acres, as had been stated, but 3,500 acres. He (Mr. Stevens) had a letter in his possession in which the writer said that if the land were for sale he was prepared to give £8,000 cash for it. The honourable member for Otaki wished the House to believe that the land was worth only £3,800.

Mr. Wilson

Mr. WILSON said he had read from Mr. Kennedy Macdonald's report.

Mr. STEVENS could assure the honourable gentleman that he had a letter in his possession in which an offer of £8,000 was made.

Mr. WILSON.—Who is he?

Mr. STEVENS.—The writer was a bonâ fide purchaser. He might point out that there was a difference of 500 acres between the acreage given and that spoken of by the honourable member for Otaki. It was alleged by the party whom the honourable gentleman was supporting that Warana's intention was to deprive the whole of these people of their homes. He had never attempted to do anything of the kind. It was also alleged that Warana was exercising control over the whole 14,000 acres, from which it was said he was going to drive the people off. Such was anything but his intention. Kemp, who owned the other half of the block, had, ever since it went through the Court in 1876 to the present time, received rent from it. He received over £5,000 rent in one case.

Mr. WILSON said he was not supporting Kemp.

Mr. STEVENS asked, if the honourable gentleman was not supporting Kemp, whom was he supporting?

Mr. WILSON said he was supporting the Natives of the tribe.

Mr. STEVENS said Kemp was chief, and had received £5,000 odd in rent. Kemp had also received cash for 800 acres of land which was sold to Mr. Sievwright. All this money went into Kemp's own pocket.

Mr. WILSON said Kemp would have to account for this money.

Mr. STEVENS said probably he would have to account for it when he was made to do so, but not before. Kemp had not only done that, but at Levin proper there was an area of land sold for a specific purpose. That land was sold in order that funds might be obtained for subdivisional surveys. While honourable gentlemen on the opposite benches were in office, and when the Hon. Mr. Mitchelson was Native Minister he paid over the £3,000 in a lump sum to Major Kemp alone, instead of devoting that £3,000 towards the release of the land from the survey lien. Now, honourable members would see the great injustice which had been done to Muaupoko.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is only as to Block 11.

Mr. STEVENS said it had to do with part of the whole block. He was endeavouring to show that a person who was in Block 11 was rightfully in Block 11. At a meeting of the Native Land Court the Natives agreed amongst themselves that they would say as they would have said had Warena Hunia's father been alive—they would have said, "You own the land and you own the people." That was Native custom. It would be an absurdity according to European law, but according to Maori law that was a fact. It was a fact that the chief owned the land and owned the people. Such being the case, according to Native custom, the Natives did exactly what they might be expected to do. They had this land awarded to Warena Hunia, so that he might deal fairly with the people. What would be the result if he did not deal fairly with them? He would no longer be that which his family had been from time immemorial—a chief and leader of the tribe. The case was now pending in the Supreme Court. The whole of the evidence had been taken, and the law-points would be argued on the 29th of the present month. It was not fair, therefore, to bring the matter up and ask the House to express an opinion upon it.

Mr. BELL.—Who is bringing the matter up? It is this Bill.

Mr. STEVENS said the matter was brought up by Mr. Mitchelson before there was any thought of the present Bill. It was he who pressed for the Bill, and now, having got the Bill, he, through his agent, expressed dissatisfaction. It amused him very much to hear the honourable member for Otaki objecting to one clause. If he (Mr. Stevens) were to suggest the striking-out of another clause it would result in the Bill becoming as useless as a piece of blank paper. He could assure the honourable gentleman that nothing but justice had been proposed in regard to the petitioners. Warena afterwards made a fair, honest proposal, and said, "That is the way in which I propose to deal with that half of the land awarded to me; and how does Kemp propose to deal with it?" Kemp made no offer whatever; and because of a family feud between Kemp's people that was to be the reason why the Muaupoko Tribe, or Warena's section of the tribe, were to be persecuted. For years they had been persecuted because there had been some Europeans at the back of Major Kemp. That was the reason why all this trouble had arisen, and he hoped the Minister in charge of the Bill would pass it in the form in which it was printed. It would do fair justice, and certainly not an injustice, to the Natives. He did not think the Bill went far enough, because it ought to compel Kemp to account for the whole of the money that he had received from the beginning, and from the time the land was passed through the Native Land Court. He wished to move in that direction, and, as the question was confined to the title to No. 11, he had made these remarks in order to show that injustice was being done to Warena and not to Kemp.

Mr. BELL said, at this late period of the session, he did not wish to enter into the rights or wrongs of the dispute concerning the Horowhenua Block, but a very brief statement would show what was the meaning of the Bill. It was recorded in Hansard of last year that the Minister of Lands had promised the House that he would not pay any money over until the dispute was settled; yet the 2nd section of the Bill provided that the Government might pay over to Warena £6,000; and the Bill went on to admit practically that Warena was a trustee, and tied up his lands in order that there might be security for moneys that might be found to belong to the real Native owners. They had already paid £2,000, of which Mr. Fraser had got his £500. The honourable member for Rangitikei had misrepresented this matter as gravely as ever he had heard any question misrepresented in the House—possibly because he did not know the facts. The Judge of the Native Land Court, in giving evidence the other day in Wanganui, stated that when the two names were put in the title to No. 11 it was openly stated in the Court, within his hearing, that these two men would hold the land in trust for the Muaupoko Tribe, and the certificate of title was issued because the order of the Court had failed to declare the trust. Every member of the Native Affairs Committee knew that this was correct, and he would appeal to the Chairman of that Committee, who he hoped before the discussion closed would say whether or not it was a fact that the Muaupoko Tribe were the owners of the land. The certificate was issued to Warena Hunia and Kemp in trust, and Kemp admitted the trust, while Hunia denied it. If he denied the trust, why did he now propose to surrender 3,500 acres?

Mr. STEVENS said he had already explained.

Mr. BELL said the honourable gentleman's explanation was too thin, and he knew very well that Hunia was a trustee, and had never ventured to deny the fact except on paper in the Supreme Court. He (Mr. Bell) had had the pleasure on one occasion of being present in the Native Land Court when this matter was investigated, and when witnesses called by Hunia to deny the trust had been compelled to admit it. He believed it might be decided in the Supreme Court in the course of a few days that the trust was legally established; yet the honourable gentleman had entered into some engagement with Mr. Fraser, who had nothing to do with the matter, and he was going to pay over the £6,000 to Warena, simply for the purpose of giving him a sum of money to go and squander. There could be no other object in paying the money to Warena, because the money did not belong to him, and it ought not to be paid to him. There was no question that if paid to him the whole of the money would disappear. He (Mr. Bell) had been acting for Warena at one time, until he found that the only people who had any real interest in the block were the Muaupoko Tribe, and he had then refused to act any longer for a man who was simply robbing the other owners.

Mr. SEDDON.—What has Kemp done with the £20,000 he has disposed of?

Mr. BELL said that what the honourable gentleman said of Kemp might be perfectly true, and he quite agreed with him that Kemp should be made to account for the money, but he (Mr. Bell) had nothing whatever to do with him. Kemp had admitted the right of the Native tribe. He knew Warena well enough to know that he would not do this wrong—that he would not be guilty of it—unless pressed to do so by those who were giving him this advice. He was kept out of the Court and prevented from giving his evidence because certain men knew that when he gave his evidence he would tell the truth. That was the reason for the 2nd clause of the Bill. But whether this was passed or not, the Government would pay the balance of £4,000 just as they paid the £2,000. He objected to Parliament indorsing such a transaction after the Native Affairs Committee had reported a trust—

Mr. STEVENS said they had not done so.

Mr. BELL said they had, and he was very much astonished to hear the honourable gentleman say that. He would look up the report of the Native Affairs Committee, and, if wrong, would withdraw his statement, but he was pretty sure he was right. The Native Land Court had reported that it was bound in law to hold the two to be the sole owners of the block, but the Court was of opinion that the other Natives had been wronged by that legal position. There was no remedy if the Supreme Court action failed. He agreed with the latter clauses of the Bill, which tied up the rest of the block so that it should not be disposed of; but the Bill had been introduced merely to gratify one or two supporters of the honourable members on the Government benches, although a Minister had promised the House faithfully last year that it should not be done. He did not think the House should pass the Bill, especially in the last hours of the session.

Mr. Bell

Dr. NEWMAN desired to draw the attention of the Minister of Lands to the promise he gave last year to Mr. Parata, who asked that the money for the purchase of the State farm at Levin should not be paid away. The Minister then very definitely promised as follows:—

“He did not know that the department had any right now to go beyond the title, but he could promise the honourable gentleman this: that, if the Government did negotiate for the purchase of that block, they would take very good care, before a purchase was made, or before any money was paid over, that the interests of the beneficiaries should be respected, and that they should get the proper value for the land.”

About a month ago the Minister had paid a cheque for £2,000 to Warena Hunia: and Warena, when cross-examined on the 15th of the present month in regard to it, was asked what had become of that money, and in his sworn reply he stated that the £2,000 was now spent, and that he did not give any of it to the tribe. No doubt the Minister had overlooked the promise he had made to the House. There was now another sum of £4,000 to be paid, and he would ask the Minister if he was going to give away this £4,000 to Warena Hunia to spend.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he would get nothing.

Dr. NEWMAN said Major Kemp and Warena Hunia were trustees for this property, and not the owners, and it was high time the matter, which had been before the House from time to time, was settled. He hoped the Government would not pay the money until it was decided who was to get it. He desired also to draw the attention of the Premier to this fact: that Mr. Donald Fraser, in Court the other day, had stated,—

“... I have assisted to carry on the negotiations from the commencement. The Natives may perhaps owe me £800 or £1,000. They have paid me £500 recently. Warena paid this to me about a month or six weeks ago. I had become security to the bank for £500. Warena paid this off out of the proceeds of this block. He has discharged £500 to me also out of these proceeds. I have had an immensity of trouble. I charge them a guinea a day and my expenses. This has been going on since 1889. . . . I arranged the sale with the Hon. Mr. McKenzie—1,500 acres at £4 an acre. I procured the payment of £2,000 to Warena Hunia. I made the arrangement with Mr. McKenzie at the beginning of the session. I asked for the money. The Government said they would look into it and let me know. The transfer was executed over twelve months ago. On the 21st October the transfer was executed. I was present. The consideration was not paid then. There were two or three caveats. I believe that the incomplete state of the survey was the chief reason for not paying over the money.”

On the Premier's famous railway journey from Feilding to Palmerston Mr. Fraser accompanied him, and what evidently occurred reminded him of an incident in the life of the late Sir John Macdonald, of Canada. A newspaper hotly opposed Sir John, who was however victorious. The Premier threatened to withhold the Government advertisements, and the editor wired back, "It's a deuced sharp curve, but I'll take it." So on this train-journey Mr. Fraser made the sharp curve, from being a red-hot Conservative on the Feilding platform, to a full-blown Liberal candidate for Otaki on getting out at Palmerston. Warena was asked what he did with this £2,000; and did the Premier know that Mr. Donald Fraser got £500 out of this £2,000? Warena Hunia swore in his evidence that he gave £500 to Donald Fraser, and Donald Fraser admitted it. When the Premier bought this land from Warena Hunia, for whom Donald Fraser was acting as agent, it was caveated three deep, and in spite of these caveats the money was paid. Mr. Fraser said,—

"I spoke first to Mr. Seddon, who referred me to Mr. McKenzie. I said that the man who had sold the land was hard-pressed for the money. Yes, I spoke a little Gaelic to him. The money came down about a month ago. I had applied for it at the beginning of the session. . . . I got £500 out of the £2,000. I have a very considerable sum yet to receive."

So that after a little Gaelic was talked between these gentlemen the whole matter was settled up, and the £2,000 was paid, while £4,000 was still owing. He thought, before the money was given to Warena Hunia, the beneficiaries should be consulted. He would agree to an amendment that none of the remaining £4,000 should go until the title was ascertained. He would then have no objection to its being paid over. He had nothing to say as to the price, or anything else in reference to the purchase. He believed this matter had been a scandal and a discredit to all previous Governments. He thought the Premier should take the matter up this year, and set up a final Court of Appeal to settle it. The history of this block was a most painful one. A number of unfortunate Natives had in 1886, he thought, allowed their claims to be put in under a chief, and the chief had taken the money. The Government should take this matter in hand, as a number of these Natives had no money at all.

Mr. PERE was very anxious to see this Bill become law, and in passing it he trusted the House would not confine itself to tying the hands of private European buyers only, but would also prevent the Government Native Land Purchase officers from making further purchases in the Horowhenua Block. A large number of petitions in reference to this block had been presented to the House, but in spite of these numerous petitions the Government had lately bought a portion of this block; and therefore he now contended, and repeated, that not only should private purchases be barred by the Bill now before the House, but also that the Crown should cease making further purchases in the block until the rightful owners thereof were ascertained by the Native Land Court or by some other competent tribunal. He took no particular side in this matter, for, as honourable members knew, there were three sides to this question—namely, Keepa te Rangihiwini, Warena Hunia, and the Muaupoko Tribe—and the best way of settling the difficulty was to allow the matter to go before the Native Land Court, in order to have it decided who were the persons of the Muaupoko Tribe that should be included in the title; and afterwards their respective interests in the block could be defined, and then the position of Te Keepa te Rangihiwini and Warena Hunia in the title would be placed beyond doubt. If the matter was again delayed in the same manner as year by year had hitherto been the case, the final result would be disastrous to the Muaupoko people, and they would get no benefit from the block. His desire was to see the Bill read a second time, and when the House went into Committee upon it he would have an amendment to propose, which he hoped would be passed, and which would empower the Native Land Court to reopen the title and have a rehearing of it, and, on its having ascertained who were the persons who should be declared the owners of the land, enable it to add their names to the names of the two persons already in the title, and thus grant redress to the members of the Muaupoko Tribe, who had repeatedly petitioned the House in connection with the Horowhenua Block.

Sir R. STOUT said, in his opinion the Bill was not necessary at all, for this reason: that the new Act now passed prevented the Natives from selling their land except to the Government or the Land Board. The Horowhenua Blocks could not be sold, and, as the Natives were protected, there was no need for the Bill. As for the money paid, he thought he spoke for the Committee, with the exception of one or two, when he said that they were under the impression that none of this money for the Horowhenua Block had been paid; and he understood the Premier to say that none would be paid until he was assured that the people were the beneficiaries. The Government could do all that was required without any Bill. The Bill was of no value to the Natives whatever. The land could not be sold without the consent of the Crown, and the money could not be given without the consent of the Crown. The Bill seemed to him to be unnecessary, and it was a waste of time at this period of the session to discuss it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said this was a very interesting question. The Hon. the Minister of Lands had been quoted from Hansard by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs as having said in the House, "that if the Government did negotiate for the purchase of that block they would take very good care, before the purchase was made, or before any money was paid over, that the interests of the beneficiaries would be respected." Here were two points. One was that the honourable gentleman promised that no purchase would be made, and the second was that no money would be paid over until the interests of the beneficiaries were respected. The Minister of Lands had the matter in charge at that date, and no doubt would have stood to his promise made to the House and to the Natives; but there was a greater king than he in the person of the Premier, and the elections were at hand, so that the promise made to the House was to be sacrificed, and the interests of the Natives were to be sacrificed, in order that the honourable gentleman might be returned to power. They knew what happened in various parts of the country, where the Premier was careering about like a comet, attended by a dozen satellites at his tail. The Hon. the Minister of Lands was got to windward of once more, and falsified his promise at the instance of the Premier, who now sat beside him. Reference had been made to the journey from Wellington to Palmerston, when the Premier and Mr. Fraser foregathered, and when this Horowhenua Block formed, no doubt, a very interesting subject of discussion. Perhaps they talked Gaelic, although he did not know that speaking Gaelic was within the very wide scope of the Premier's powers, so perhaps they did without it. A few days before this notable journey Mr. Fraser had related to a confidential friend that pressure had been put upon him by the Premier to come out as a Government candidate, but Mr. Fraser had assured his friend in a most earnest manner that he would remain true to his colours—would be opposed to the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He was not a good canvasser.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—No, he was not a good canvasser, but the Premier was, and Mr. Fraser stepped from that train a convert, and straightway turned round upon the honourable member for Otaki. He belied all the professions of his political life, and became a roaring Government supporter. The Premier had succeeded in many of his schemes; but that was a scheme in which he did not succeed. Then, let them see what happened. Mr. Fraser stood for the electorate of Otaki, and was very busy in the electorate now represented by his honourable friend Mr. Wilson. He was prospecting with reference to the Horowhenua Block, which was not only in Otaki but outside. It was a common belief that this was so. Mr. Fraser was not returned for Otaki, and then trouble came. The money was not forthcoming, and the Minister of Lands said it would not be forthcoming until certain eventualities happened. His honourable friend had said that £2,000 was paid over of this money, and that the caveats to the title were three deep. These caveats stood in the way, and he challenged the Government to show a single instance where they had acted in any other matter like that before. There were special considerations in this transaction, and therefore the caveats were driven through as the Government had driven through many other things this session, for public morality went for nothing.

Mr. Buchanan

That was enough to make him oppose this Bill to the utmost. Now a word or two as to the honourable member for Rangitikei. What was his position with regard to this transaction? Last year he was not a member of the House as he now was, but he was the paid agent of Mr. Fraser. He did not seek to cast any reproach upon the honourable gentleman; he was legitimately Mr. Fraser's paid agent; but surely they could not accept his representations on the matter as being of great weight when that was the position he had held, and he had been closely connected with the transaction.

Mr. STEVENS.—Why do you not make the same reference to your honourable friend on your left?

Mr. BUCHANAN said his honourable friend on his left was perfectly well able to speak for himself; no one in the Chamber, or outside it, could reproach him with having allowed private interest to interfere with public duty.

Mr. STEVENS.—There may be no reproach, but we are in the same category.

Mr. BUCHANAN said all he had to say was that this was a very interesting little chapter in the political history of New Zealand, and it shed a very curious light upon the manner in which the government was carried on by the gentlemen on the Treasury benches.

Mr. BELL desired to make a personal explanation. The Chairman of the Native Affairs Committee had said he was wrong in stating that any Committee had reported in favour of the trust. The time for investigation was short, and he would refer to one report only, which appeared in I-3 of the Appendices to the Journals of the House of Representatives, 1890, and which proved his statement to be correct.

Mr. HEKE said clause 2 of this Bill was not for the benefit of the members of the Muaupoko Tribe. He wished to inform the House that there was not the slightest doubt that when the Horowhenua Block was awarded to these two Native chiefs—Warena Hunia and Major Kemp—it was intended that they should hold this land in trust for the members of that hapu. He believed that statement was given in evidence by the Judge who first investigated the case, and he had said clearly that when the land was awarded to Major Kemp he was appointed by the members of the Muaupoko Tribe to act as one of the trustees for them. Now, they had the statement of Major Kemp himself before a Committee of the House re a certain portion of the Horowhenua Block, that he and Warena Hunia were appointed as trustees; but, unfortunately for the members of the Muaupoko, the title which was issued to them was issued under the Land Transfer Act, and therefore when the application was made for a rehearing it could not be granted. They were informed by the honourable member for Rangitikei that under Native custom the chief was the owner of the land and also the owner of the people. He agreed that that to a certain extent, in olden days, was the case, but the chief was then held by the members of his hapu as a most reliable person. In those days that was so, but unfortunately no hapu or tribe in New Zealand was able to foresee the difficulties that would arise in the future. In later days, when European civilisation was brought to bear upon the Natives, the Natives came to understand the technicalities of law, and this had been the cause of the whole trouble. If the Premier had clauses to introduce in the Bill that would hold back the remaining portion of the money that was to be paid over to Warena Hunia until such time as the Muaupoko Tribe were allowed the opportunity of establishing their rights to the block, then that would be right, and would do a great deal of good to the members of that tribe, relieving them from the wrongs they had been suffering under for many years past. There was one thing he did not like in the Bill, and that was, that there was provision in it allowing the Crown to purchase areas out of the block mentioned. Now, it would be very unfair to the members of the Muaupoko Tribe to allow any sale, whether to the Crown or to private individuals. To do justice to that tribe they must prevent all dealings until such time as the tribe had had an opportunity of substantiating their title. When he spoke in the House it was the custom of the Premier to always cry, "Question, question!" but that did not interfere with him. He meant to express his opinion on the Bill, and if time was lost it was because the Government brought down ridiculous Bills of this nature, and Bills that were not intended to do justice to the members of the Native race. He should always oppose any measure which he believed would be found injurious to his people. He would also like to make the statement that no threats whatever coming from the Minister of the Crown in reference to doing away with special representation of the Natives in the House would stay his action. It was a mistake to suppose that such threats would have any effect upon him.

Mr. SPEAKER said the representation of the Maori race in this House was not the question now before the House.

Mr. HEKE said No, but he had mentioned it because of the interruptions made by the Premier when he was addressing the House. There was not the slightest doubt that the members of the Muaupoko Tribe had suffered a great deal in years past, and that was shown by the reports drawn up by the Native Affairs Committee. There was not the slightest doubt that in the first place, when the land was handed over to Major Kemp and Warena Hunia, it was given to them in trust. He hoped the amendments of the Premier would be in accordance with opinions members had expressed in the House, and that the Muaupoko Tribe would have their rights established to the block.

Mr. SEDDON, in reply, desired to say that he had not brought forward this Bill on his own motion at all. He had brought it down on the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee. If members would look at Supplementary Order Paper No. 93 they would find,—

"Part of the moneys in the hands of the Government, being the purchase-money of other parts of the Horowhenua Block, may be retained until the end of next session, and none be paid unless the Government is certain that there is sufficient land belonging to Warena Hunia which can be used, in case of judgment against him, to satisfy the claims of the tribe. That a Royal Commission be appointed as soon after this session as possible to investigate and ascertain who are the Maoris entitled to the disputed land in the Horowhenua Block."

It was on the motion of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that they were asked to deal with this, and yet the honourable gentleman said there was no necessity for this legislation. When the Native Affairs Committee had absolutely passed the resolution the Government did what they were asked to do by the Committee, and then members of that Committee condemned them absolutely for doing it. He told honourable members now—for the honourable member for the Northern Maori District had also taken up the same stand—that if such conduct was persisted in he would take no notice whatever of recommendations of the Committee, because it was impossible to govern and to deal with matters if they were to be treated in this way, when, though this legislation was brought forward in deference to the wishes of the Committee, they were met with opposition by the members of the Committee. He did not himself feel interested in the Bill, and when he moved the second reading he told the House that if there was any objection to it when it got into Committee, and if the amendments he proposed were not accepted, then he would not go on with the Bill. That was what he had told the House. He had good reason to complain, and he did complain, when members of a Committee that recommended the Government to do a thing in exact terms acted as the honourable member for the Northern Maori District had done. The honourable member was equally to blame with the honourable member for Wellington City in this matter, for he also voted for this resolution, and pressed the Government to deal with the matter. That was his attitude on the Committee; but the moment a Bill came down which placed Major Kemp in the same position as Warena Hunia, then it was not acceptable. There were certain members who would do all they could to put Warena Hunia in a wrong position; but the moment Major Kemp was touched, then they did not want any legislation. The same thing applied to the honourable member for Otaki. There was no doubt whatever that he had been the agent—that he had been acting on behalf of Major Kemp and his party in connection with this matter. There was absolute proof of that. Here they had advocates on the one side, yet because the honourable member for Rangitikei had carried on his ordinary business they blamed him for it.

1.0. They did not hear any complaint as regarded the action taken by the members of the legal profession in the House. What inference did the honourable member for Otaki desire to draw when he referred to some occasion upon which he (Mr. Seddon) had met Mr. Donald Fraser at Feilding and travelled in a railway-carriage with him? It simply meant that when a gentleman rode with the Premier of the colony in a railway-carriage there was at once some corrupt transaction to transpire out of it. And it also meant that when a member of Parliament or a candidate for parliamentary honours came near his carriage in future, he would have to say, "Keep clear."

An Hon. MEMBER.—Was he a member of Parliament?

Mr. SEDDON.—That would also apply to intending members of Parliament. He was not aware before that day that his influence was such that he could convert a real red-hot Tory and make him a Liberal in the time it took to travel about eleven miles in a railway-carriage. He was not to be drawn by the honourable member for Otaki; and he was not going to divulge what transpired while he was in conversation with the gentleman referred to. He might tell honourable members that long before the election took place, and long before Mr. Donald Fraser had declared that he could no longer support the present member for Otaki, this purchase was contemplated, and negotiations had been entered into. It was through the honourable member for Otaki's "Jim Crow" policy in the House, and because he had done so little for his district, and gone against almost every election pledge that he had made, that he was opposed by Mr. Donald Fraser. Mr. Fraser told Mr. Wilson that he was going to oppose him, as one honourable gentleman would tell another. The honourable member in twelve months seemed to forget the past support he had received at the hands of Mr. Donald Fraser, and now he brought this charge against him, probably looking to a time when Mr. Fraser would again run him at an election. The honourable member for Otaki had also said that Mr. Fraser had been guilty of corrupt conduct in reference to that transaction. All he (Mr. Seddon) could say was that if an honourable member had got nothing better than that to do—namely, to attempt to injure a late opponent, and one who would again be an opponent in all probability—then his position must be very shaky indeed. He thought the honourable member was going a long way out of the straight path of rectitude when he attacked a man in that way. As regarded this transaction, again he could give honourable gentlemen information which positively negated the assertion that it was owing to this meeting with Mr. Donald Fraser that this transaction was brought about; because he knew practically nothing about the transaction, and it was not mentioned between Mr. Donald Fraser and himself when at Feilding, or when riding together in the railway-carriage to Palmerston, or from the time they met until they parted. This would show the honourable member the gross injury he was doing to Mr. Fraser in the matter. Then they came to the question of the necessity for this legislation. For the last five or six years this matter had been brought forward by different Governments, and had been left standing over session after session. It had been adjourned from time to time without justice being done to it. The present Government had therefore to step in two years ago and put a Proclamation upon the land so as to stop dealings with it. This was done in the interests of the Natives, until such time as opportunity was given to ascertain who were the real owners. Notwithstanding this, that land had been dealt with, and they had the honourable member for Otaki now endeavouring to make a friend of a man who had strong political influence. Honourable members knew that Mr. Bartholomew had sawmills, and employed a large number of men. Mr. Wilson, the member for Otaki, took the opportunity of doing this for the purpose of making political capital for himself. On the other hand, he had deceived Mr. Fraser, and made indirect charges which he would little have thought could come from the honourable gentleman. In Major Kemp's case the honourable gentleman wanted the lease to go on, and the land to become denuded of timber. Major Kemp had received over £20,000 for the sale and leasing of land in the Horowhenua Block, one way and another, and when any steps were taken against him they found the honourable member would not agree, because he had certain friends in a certain quarter. He (Mr. Seddon) brought in this Bill, which included Major Kemp, and made all such lands as these chargeable: if he had brought in a Bill that did not include Major Kemp's lands there would not have been a single word said against it. This was no new matter. In the parliamentary papers of 1890 the following memorandum by Colonel Trimble would be found in reference to Horowhenua No. 11:—

"HOROWHENUA No. 11.

"Allegation No. 1.—That Hunia and Kemp were named as owners 'for and on behalf of the Natives settled upon the block, and not for themselves personally.'

"Answer.—At the Court held in 1873 Major Kemp was named as owner of the whole block, on behalf of the persons indorsed on the order of the Court. After much trouble and delay, the block was divided by the Court in November and December, 1886. At this time No. 11 was awarded to Hunia and Kemp. There is no word in the order of the Court to show that the land was to be held in trust; there is nothing in the minutes of the Court, either in evidence or by way of declaration, to show it. The question of trust never came up until Hunia prosecuted Kemp in 1889 in the Supreme Court, to render an account of the rents the latter had received for portions of the land.

"Please note that No. 11 is only one of fourteen sections awarded in 1886, and to most of these sections the minutes show that there were conditions implied. Thus, No. 1, 76 acres, was awarded to Kemp to be conveyed to the Railway Department. He conveyed it, and holds the payment.

Mr. Seddon

"No. 2, 4,000 acres, was for a township, as arranged with the Government. (See evidence of Mr. T. W. Lewis, Under-Secretary, in file.) This was to be for the good of the whole estate. Major Kemp has sold it to the Government for £6,000, of which he has received £4,000, the balance remaining at interest. He has not accounted for this money.

"Nos. 9 and 14, each for 1,200 acres, were awarded to Major Kemp. It had been arranged with the late Sir Donald McLean in 1874 that 1,200 acres should be awarded to Kemp, simply to pass it to the people of Whatanui (Ngatiraukawa), to stop animosities between them and the Muaupoko, mainly the adherents of Hunia. (See printed papers put in evidence.) The Court allotted 1,200 acres, as agreed upon; but the Whatanui claimants were dissatisfied with the situation of the land. The Court then awarded a second 1,200 acres. Up till the time of the Court sitting this year nothing whatever was done by Kemp to pass either block. If he has since passed one, he holds the other. He has given no intimation whatever that he regards this second block as a trust.

"Nos. 3, 4 and 5, 7 and 8, were awarded to persons by name in certain definite proportions.

"No. 6 was awarded to Kemp for persons not in the certificate of title (1873). It was understood that forty-four persons were to get each 105 acres; not one step has been taken by Kemp to ascertain to whom this should be given, though there is a trust clearly implied.

"No. 10, 800 acres, was awarded to Kemp's lawyers for a bill of costs understood to have been incurred in relation to Kemp's lands as a Wanganui.

"No. 12 was awarded to Ihaia Taueki (13,137 acres of rough land).

"No. 13 is only a square foot.

"It will thus be seen that even in those cases where Kemp clearly only held the land on trust he has not acted as a trustee. To the persons named in Nos. 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8 Kemp said that if they chose to sell their land they would get no more. How could a trustee say that, if the land in No. 11 was theirs?

"Allegation No. 2 is based on No. 1, and has same answer.

"Allegation No. 3.—'Original intention' cannot be shown by what an assessor says, but by the order and by the minutes. I do not know, either, what assessor he refers to.

"Allegation No. 4.—The trust was not proved, and therefore it would have been absurd to award to Hunia an 'insignificant portion of the block' and 'grant the rest to Kemp.' In the belief of the Court Hunia proved his title, as between him and Kemp, to the land awarded to him. In the Court of 1873 Major Kemp stated throughout his evidence that he and Hunia were jointly interested in all that was done to secure the land for the Muaupoko, and, when Mr. Baker tried hard to lead him to say that he was misreported, he angrily replied that he was not misreported, and explained that he was then strengthening his case against the Ngatiraukawa by admitting the Hunia claims, though they were false. He added that he was in 1890 telling the truth. Hunia also gave evidence in 1873 as to his descent and occupation, and was uncontradicted by either Kemp or the other Muaupoko.

"Allegation No. 5 (reference to the Supreme Court).—To be sure in all cases of doubt on the part of the Native Land Court it may state a case and get directions, but Mr. Baker raised no doubt whatever in my mind.

"Allegation No. 6: 'That the award should not have been influenced by the present European value of land,' &c.—It was not influenced by this. The Land Court was ordered by the Supreme Court to state relative interests, on account of disputes about the apportionment of rent received by Kemp. It became therefore necessary to have the land valued. This was done before the judgment was given. Before the valuers came back from their mission the Court decided the places which Kemp and Hunia were to occupy. The valuations were arrived at without the knowledge of the valuers as to the owners. The land was awarded in accordance with the Native evidence and custom. The valuation was only got to answer an order of the Supreme Court. The valuers were chosen by both parties, and simply appointed by the Court.

"Allegation No. 7 (minutes of evidence in former Courts).—What was written in 1873 and in 1886 was written without the possibility of foreseeing what was to be said or done in 1890, and was by far the most trustworthy evidence we could get. Mr. Baker tried hard to get his own witness to say that the minutes of 1873 were inaccurate, and Mr. Baker will probably long remember the contemptuous wrath of the witness that he brought upon himself by his conduct on that occasion.

"Allegation No. 8: 'That the judgment was greatly against the weight of evidence.'—This is the always-implied legal objection, and need not have been stated.

"Allegation No. 9: 'The incompetency of the Interpreter.'—I never saw or heard of the Interpreter until I went to Palmerston. I therefore could have no partiality for him. He is licensed by the department, not chosen by the Judge. Whenever evidence did not seem to suit Mr. Baker he vented his wrath on the Interpreter. Mr. Baker's questions were so needlessly involved that it was impossible to help thinking often that they were so framed on purpose to get a special answer. I had at last to interfere, and stop the brutal conduct of Mr. Baker towards the Interpreter. It was only with Mr. Baker that there was any difficulty. I asked acknowledgedly-competent Maori adepts what they thought of the Interpreter's qualifications, and was told he was as accurate as could be expected; and I can myself vouch that he was most painstaking.

"ROBERT TRIMBLE.

"16th June, 1890."

Now, that was the whole sum-total of this argument. Warena Hunia prosecuted Major

Kemp for some sums of money received by him : then trouble rose between them. Had Warana Hunia not claimed a share of the moneys received by Major Kemp the House would have heard very little about the matter. But there was the opinion of the Native Land Court duly recorded : the result was that all they had to do was to make all the lands these chiefs held chargeable ; to have an investigation, and justice done. Then, there were other reasons. There was a certain firm of solicitors who had received 800 acres, valued at not less than £4 an acre, for services in connection with litigation relating to some lands up the Wanganui River and not connected with this land at all. So there was £3,000 gone in law-costs paid by Major Kemp ; and if this land, which Major Kemp now said he held in trust, was going to a firm of solicitors for litigation in reference to it, it was time that action should be taken. Then, with regard to what the Government intended to do in reference to this matter, they did not mean simply to deal with the residue of the land, but they would take it from its initiation, and treat it all alike, so that all concerned should have their just due. If the House was not disposed to agree to the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee, or if there was anything like a stonewall or opposition, the Government were, of course, at this stage of the session almost powerless, and the responsibility must rest on those who objected. But the Bill was brought in on the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee. The Native Affairs Committee had desired that that should be done, and the honourable member who actually moved the motion now opposed it ; and all he (Mr. Seddon) could say was that the responsibility must rest on the honourable member, and on other members who raised opposition. For his part, he would be no party to legislation that did not place Major Kemp and the other chief on the same footing in respect to their dealings in connection with this land. Major Kemp was strongly supported by the honourable member for Otaki, and also by the member for Wairarapa and the member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell).

Mr. BELL.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said it was absolutely a fact.

Mr. BELL rose to a point of order. He had stated that he was not supporting Major Kemp, and the Premier repeated his statement.

Mr. SPEAKER said he could not regard the interruption as a point of order. The correction was a matter of personal explanation.

Mr. BUCHANAN explained that he was not an advocate of Major Kemp. He had not mentioned his name, and he had never raised the question.

Mr. SEDDON said it was quite clear that those honourable members had misunderstood what he said. He said that Major Kemp's side of the question had been argued and supported by the honourable gentlemen opposite, and he named them. If he was wrong he regretted it. He had found, however, that Major Kemp had very powerful friends, and they heard very few words in favour of Warana Hunia. All he could say was that their late chief, Mr. Ballance, was much pleased to have an opportunity of acquiring this State Farm at Levin. Mr. Donald Fraser had, in connection with that, rendered signal service to the colony in assisting the Government to obtain that land. So far as Mr. Fraser was known by repute his transactions and dealings were strictly honourable. He did not know anything against him in that respect. He also had the confidence of the Natives. The Government had given an assurance that if a purchase was made a fair price would be paid. He might say a fair price would be paid. By this Bill the interests of the whole of the Natives concerned would be secured.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. WILSON might explain that he had no desire to see Major Kemp or any one else escape from his proper responsibility in connection with this matter. He simply wished to see the tribe get their fair share of the land.

Mr. HEKE said he was not advocating the case of Major Kemp, as had been stated by the Premier, but he desired to protect the interests of the whole of the tribe.

The House divided.

AYES, 29.

Buick	Lawry	Pere
Cadman	Mackintosh	Reeves
Carroll	McGowan	Seddon
Duncan	McKenzie, J.	Smith, E. M.
Graham	McLachlan	Stevens
Harris	McNab	Ward
Heke	Meredith	Willis.
Hogg	Millar	Tellers.
Houston	Mills	Collins
Kelly, W.	Montgomery	O'Regan.

NOES, 8.

Bell	Stout	Tellers.
Fraser	Tanner	Buchanan
Russell, W. R.	Wilson.	Mackenzie, T.

PAIRS.

For.	Against.
Flatman	Hall-Jones
Joyce	Duthie
Kelly, J. W.	Hutchison, G.
Massey	Allen
Pinkerton	Mitchelson
Russell, G. W.	Green.

Majority for, 21.

Bill read a second time.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

On the motion of Mr. REEVES, Captain Russell, Mr. Houston, Mr. Millar, and Mr. Reeves were appointed Managers at the Conference with the Managers for the Legislative Council on this Bill.

HOROWHENUA BLOCK BILL.

This Bill was committed and reported.

On the question, That the Bill be now read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT said he regretted that there was no provision in the Bill for the preservation of the moneys in the hands of the Crown. He had stated, on the second reading, that it was not necessary to pass the Bill at all, because the rights of the Natives would not be preserved. He thought there should be a clause in the Bill compelling the Crown to hold the moneys until such time as a rehearing was given. The Premier, however, had given a promise that the moneys would be stopped, and he would therefore offer no further objection.

Mr. WILSON said the Premier had in Committee greatly altered clause 2, and met his objection fairly in other respects, and the objection he had to the Bill was therefore removed to a great extent.

Mr. BELL objected to the Bill even as amended, because it tied up lands not the subject of any dispute. However, the Government were determined to adopt that form, and it was better in that form than if no security were provided.

Mr. SEDDON would take that opportunity of putting himself right; otherwise he would be told by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that he had prevented the Government from paying over these moneys. The honourable gentleman stated that the Premier had given his assurance that the money would not be paid; and next session, when he found that the money was paid over,—

Sir R. STOUT said he meant, until the trust was secure.

Mr. SEDDON said what the honourable gentleman said was that the Premier had given his assurance that the money would not be paid, and he would therefore offer no further objection to the Bill. That, of course, would appear in Hansard, and it was necessary that it should be contradicted. Then, as regarded the Bill: It was the Native Affairs Committee that asked for it; otherwise he should not have brought it forward at all. It was on account of a resolution of the Native Affairs Committee on a motion moved by the honourable gentleman himself; and he knew at the time that the Native Land Court Bill had passed that Committee, and was almost certain to be placed on the statute-book. The honourable gentleman seemed to forget that—in fact, he seemed to forget what transpired from day to day. With regard to clause 2, that was struck out of the Bill at the request of the honourable member for Otaki. He had tried to meet honourable gentlemen in every way possible, but found it impossible to please them. He believed himself, from what he could learn, that this land that Major Kemp and Warana Hunia held was originally intended for the benefit of the tribe. There were 800 acres of that land, amounting in value to between £3,000 and £4,000, given to a firm of solicitors, and the litigation for which that firm of solicitors was paid was in connection with some land up the Wanganui River, and yet a part of the Horowhenua Block was given as payment for these legal services. What the honourable gentleman opposite intended was that a Bill should be brought down dealing only with Warana Hunia: but the Government were not going to have any half-measures. They wished to know what had become of the whole of the proceeds, and who were entitled to them.

3.30. He was told on very good authority that Major Kemp had dealt with over twenty thousand pounds' worth of land in the original Horowhenua Block. He did not see why Major Kemp's land should not be charged, and that was why he had had to go outside the Horowhenua Block and charge land which he held outside that block, because, if it was proved that it was trust property from the commencement, then he did not think that Major Kemp had sufficient interest in what was left of the Horowhenua Block to repay what he might be called upon to repay. Litigation was going on at the present time in the Supreme Court in reference to this matter. In asking the House to pass the Bill, he made its provisions tentative, and refused to fix an order for the Native Land Court to inquire into the question, because if he had done that it would have been clashing with the proceedings in the Supreme Court, which was undesirable and should not obtain. He intended, if this Bill became law, to have a proper inquiry made from the commencement, in order to ascertain to whom the land belonged, who had dealt with it, to whom it had been disposed of, what proceeds had been received from its disposal, and to make the parties, if it were found they were only trustees, account for what they had received. The Bill was brought down at the instigation of the Native Affairs Committee. He believed as the Bill now stood it was a very good measure, and that justice would be done to those beneficially interested in the land in question.

Sir R. STOUT wished to make a personal explanation. Why was the resolution moved in the Native Affairs Committee that this Bill should be introduced? The honourable member ought to know that at the time that resolution was passed the Native Land Court Bill had not become law, and until it became law it was necessary to have a special Bill dealing with this block.

Bill read a third time.

SUPPLY.

Resolutions were reported from Committee of Supply.

On the question, That the House agree with the resolutions,

Sir R. STOUT said,—I wish just to say one word, as I do not intend to speak on the Appropriation Bill. I have not taken any part in the discussion on the public-works estimates, because I think the House is incompetent to do so. In fact, I think there ought to have been a special Committee set up to consider the number of main roads for which votes have been passed—not only roads to open up land, but main roads. I see some votes have been granted for roads which have been open for thirty years, running through wealthy counties, and yet grants are being made out of the public purse for this purpose. I only wish to say that I think the whole system is entirely wrong, and that the colony cannot stand the strain of the expenditure of borrowed money, as our expenditure on public works shows that it now exceeds a million for this year. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think that the Government are entitled to claim credit for having brought down a set of estimates this year such as have never been equalled before in the New Zealand Parliament. In fact, I may say they have given general, and indeed almost unanimous, satisfaction. The statement made by the honourable member is quite correct that there are votes there for roads which have been made a long time, and the same roads have been made to Crown lands, and those Crown lands have never been disposed of.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—I do not know what particular road the honourable member refers to, but we found what I say to be the case—that this expenditure was just as much a part of what was intended by Parliament in passing the Lands Improvement Act—that it was as much the intention of Parliament to construct a bridge upon that road as it was to make the roads absolutely through the land. I know this: that there are fords, and that those fords have been used by a few settlers for years. It was necessary to put bridges across these rivers in order to give access to lands bought from the Crown, and so increase settlement. That was the intention when we passed these estimates; and I say that if you take the year's estimates and deduct from them the amount appropriated under the heading of "Lands Improvement Account" our estimates are less than they were last year, and last year the expenditure was less than we have had for some years. This year it cannot be the same, because there are so many men out of employment, and it was our bounden duty to provide means for reproductive works in order to provide these men with work, because if we had not done so the distress would have become something appalling. I think we ought to compliment ourselves on the fact that we have tidied over the winter so well, and have been able to find work for those in distress. I hope what the Government have done will not be found fault with in the provision that has been made to meet cases of this kind.

Resolutions agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING.

Mr. SEDDON laid on the table a return of the expenditure on Government advertising, and moved, That the return be printed. He desired to inform the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, who had that morning inquired for this return, that a careful analysis would show that during the two years only of the Stout-Vogel Government the amount spent on Government advertising was £20,748, exclusive of the Post and Telegraph advertisements; during the three years of the Atkinson Government, £22,899; and during the three years ending on the 31st March, 1894, of the Balance-Seddon Government, £23,604. The return showed that during the past three years the expenditure had been—omitting the railway advertisements, over which the Government had no control—£585 less than in any three years since 1887; and, further, that, owing to the increased demand for land, the advertising under the head of "Land and Survey" showed an increase of £786. Deducting this and the increase on railway advertisements, and there was a reduction of £1,871.

Sir R. Stout

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING AND SEAMEN'S BILL.

Mr. REEVES brought up the following report of the Conference on this Bill:—

"Clause 14 is reinstated, except the words 'owned in or' in the first line, and with the addition of the words 'or within seven days after' after the word 'month' in the third line.

"Clause 17, subsection (1). The word 'or' is substituted for 'and' in the second line.

"Clause 34, subsection (6). The word 'now' is inserted in line 15 after the word 'steamers.'

"The House accepts the other amendments made by the Council."

He moved, That the report of the Conference be agreed to. The difficulty in regard to the question which was causing so much anxiety had been removed by a compromise. He thought the compromise was a very fair and reasonable one.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROLLER AND AUDITOR-GENERAL.

Mr. SPEAKER said he had received a letter from the Controller and Auditor-General, which he would read to the House and then lay on the table:—

"Mr. FitzGerald will become entitled to a pension of £500 if he shall resign the office of Controller and Auditor-General on or after the 28th day of February next, which pension will be increased by the sum of £16 13s. 4d. for each and every year that he shall remain in office after the above-mentioned day.

"J. E. FITZGERALD.

"Audit Office, 23rd October, 1894,"

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the letter be referred to the Government.

Dr. NEWMAN asked what attitude the Government intended to take up in regard to the relations between the Audit Department and the Public Trust Office. Was it expected that the Auditor-General would continue to audit the accounts of the Public Trust Office?

Mr. WARD said he felt sure the Auditor-General would continue to audit the accounts of the Public Trust Office.

Motion agreed to.

CHARITABLE AID.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether the Government will during the recess consider exhaustively the question of charitable aid; and, if so, will they endeavour to more equitably adjust the moiety now raised from land, by requiring all forms of property to bear their fair share towards that moiety? This was a very important question.

As the Act at present stood half the money which was spent on charitable aid was provided from rates on land. He thought it was only right that the Treasurer in readjusting the question of charitable aid should consider the propriety of making all forms of property contribute their fair share towards charitable aid.

Mr. WARD said the matter was engaging the attention of the Minister in charge of that department.

HERIOT-ROXBURGH RAILWAY.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will issue instructions to the Engineers to proceed with the survey of the Heriot-Roxburgh Railway at the earliest possible date? He hoped, as the Minister had been good enough to say in the Public Works Statement that he intended to have the surveys made of this extension, that he would as soon as possible put the work in hand. This railway extension was of very great importance to a large number of settlers, some of whom had been induced to take up land in that locality on the promise of a railway. The line would also tap a very large extent of country suitable for settlement, which the Government might consider the propriety of acquiring reasonably.

Mr. WARD said this was a matter which would also receive the serious consideration of the Minister during the recess.

CATLIN'S RIVER RAILWAY.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Minister for Public Works, When the Catlin's River Railway will be opened for traffic to Hunt's Road? It was very important that a station should now be opened at the place named in the question. There were a large number of settlers there who were engaged in timber-cutting and at the sawmills, and these settlers were anxiously waiting for the opening of this part of the line. Were the station opened at once, a lot of valuable timber would be brought to market which was now being wasted, and many men could be profitably employed timber-cutting.

Mr. SEDDON said no time would be lost in giving the residents of this part of the colony the advantages which they were justly entitled to in connection with the expenditure of public money.

RECIPROCAL CUSTOMS TREATY.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will take steps to ascertain the views of the Governments of the neighbouring colonies with regard to the creation of a reciprocal Customs treaty between this and the other colonies? He would be glad if the Treasurer, when he went over to the Postal Conference in Australia, would use his influence to ascertain the feelings of the neighbouring Governments upon the question of an exchange of products.

Mr. WARD said the Government thoroughly recognised the great importance of this subject. They were desirous of arranging a reciprocal tariff with the Australian Colonies. Anything they could do to promote this end he could assure the honourable member would be done.

HERIOT-ROXBURGH RAILWAY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether, as he has already indicated his intention of proceeding with the survey of the Heriot Railway to Roxburgh, he will undertake that the survey shall be pushed on without any unnecessary delay?

Mr. SEDDON said he gave a reply to this question earlier in the session. He would consider the matter during the recess, and see whether it was necessary that this should be done.

J. HERON.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister of Justice, Whether, seeing that the Grey River Hospital Trustees court inquiry, the Government will appoint the Stipendiary Magistrate at Greymouth a Commissioner to inquire into the charges made by John Heron, in his petition to this House, against Wardsman Bell? He wished to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that a Committee of the House made a report upon this petition. Since the report was made the trustees of the Grey River Hospital considered that the matter referred to in the petition had not been properly inquired into by the Inspector of Hospitals, Dr. MacGregor. The Trustees courted inquiry, and it had been suggested that the Stipendiary Magistrate at Greymouth should take evidence on both sides.

Mr. CADMAN said this was not a matter for the Minister of Justice to deal with; it was a matter for the Minister in charge of charitable aid. His colleague had not had time, owing to his other duties, during this session to deal with this question.

INEBRIATE ASYLUMS.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether, during the coming recess, they will cause inquiries to be made in respect to providing suitable sites, convenient to the four chief cities of the colony, for the establishment of inebriate asylums?

Mr. SEDDON said this matter had been brought under the notice of the Government during the session, and there was no doubt we were behindhand with reference to this question, and he thought something was necessary to be done. Inquiries would be made, and the honourable member would no doubt be told next session what the Government intended to do with respect to it.

CHARITABLE AID AND MAIN ROADS.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, Whether, during the coming recess, they will consider the necessity of having a comprehensive measure prepared, having for its basis a large and sufficient endowment of Crown lands, by which a lasting provision may be made towards providing satisfactorily for charitable aid requirements, as well as for the maintenance of the main roads of the colony?

Mr. SEDDON said the Government had promised to deal with the question of local government next session, and the question of local government would embrace charitable aid.

INANGAHUA MINING.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Minister of Mines, if, in view of the indignation caused in Reefton by the reference in Mr. H. Gordon's Mines Report of this year regarding the Inangahua district, he will cause inquiry to be made into that gentleman's allegations; and, in the event of their being proved either wholly or partially incorrect, will he cause reparation to be made by an official correction? The question arose out of a demonstration that was lately held at Reefton in consequence of some remarks made in Mr. Gordon's annual report upon the manner in which mining business was carried on at Reefton. This was the second time in which Mr. Gordon had given umbrage to the people of Reefton in regard to the same matter. The people there considered that Mr. Gordon's remarks reflected upon the commercial morality of the people of the district, and were calculated to do great harm to the industry on which it chiefly depended. He did not wish to enter into any debatable matter, because he knew that the rules of the House debarred him from doing so; but it seemed to him a matter for regret that the remarks should have been made. As grave injury appeared to have been inflicted upon the district, he trusted that due reparation would be made to those who had been injured.

Mr. CADMAN said, with all due respect to the people of Reefton, he thought they had acted very foolishly, and he thought the remarks passed at the public meeting did not redound to the credit of the district. If they had any cause of complaint it was their duty to have written to the Minister in charge of the department, specifying the charges, when action would have been taken by the Government. He had heard nothing of the matter till he received a copy of the resolution which was passed at the public meeting. Mr. Gordon, as was well known, was one of the most painstaking, careful, efficient, and hard-working officers in the public service, and he could have no particular reason, as far as he (Mr. Cadman) knew, for saying anything detrimental to the people of the Reefton district. He might also mention that, so far as votes and moneys required for the Reefton district were concerned, he (Mr. Cadman) had often to curtail Mr. Gordon's recommendations. If the people there would send him specific charges of inaccuracies in Mr. Gordon's report, he would have the matter inquired into.

NATIVE EXPENDITURE, CIVIL LIST.

Mr. HEKE asked the Native Minister, Whether the Government will, during the recess, prepare a return showing how the moneys set apart for Native purposes in the Civil List (£7,000) have been expended during the last four years, showing all items, and at whose request the moneys were expended?

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member was a little late in asking such a question on the last day of the session. He ought to have moved in the matter during the session and asked for this return.

Mr. HEKE said the return was not for this session.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government could not give any promise in respect to this matter. Many things might occur prior to next session.

STOATS AND WEASELS.

Mr. BUDDO asked the Minister of Agriculture, Whether, considering the damage to stock and poultry in the agricultural districts by stoats and weasels, he will take steps to remove the protection, and allow them to be destroyed by farmers, except in declared rabbit-infested country? He had no doubt that the Minister of Agriculture fully recognised the importance of this question. Stoats and weasels had now become a greater trouble to the farmers in many districts than the rabbits were.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said this was a difficult subject to deal with. He understood that in the outlying districts and in the back-country these natural enemies of the rabbit were doing excellent work. The department had not heard up to the present time of stock having been destroyed by these animals, although they knew the stoats and weasels attacked the fowl-yards. However, at the present time the Government were considering a scheme of offering a reward for the capture of these animals in districts where they were not required, so that they might be sent up to the back-country.

WOOD-WORKING MACHINE.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked the Government, Whether they will give effect to the petition of Joe Ward, of New Plymouth, that a wood-working machine should be admitted duty-free, as it is to be used in the dairy industry—i.e., making butter-boxes and kegs for the dairy-farmers—seeing that an important Committee did, after full and careful consideration, recommend the Government to admit the said machine to New Zealand duty-free? He knew that the forms of the House prevented his making a speech in asking this question. The Tariff Committee went fully into this matter, and they found that this machine could not be made in the colony, and, as it was to be used in the dairy industry, they recommended that it be admitted duty-free. He hoped the Minister would comply with the recommendation of the Committee.

Mr. WARD would like to point out to the honourable member that there was no power by which the Commissioner of Customs could remit this duty. The only way by which it could be done would be by taking a vote on the estimates for the amount. There was also this difficulty: There were coopers in other parts of the colony who would be entitled to similar concessions if a concession was granted in this case. For instance, before this application was received he had to decline a similar request from a Mr. Young, of Invercargill. He held, on looking into the matter, that it would be impossible to limit coopers, as proposed, to the business of carrying on the manufacture of dairy utensils only, because the Customs Department could not say to a man that he must confine himself to a particular branch of his trade. That would not be fair to the other coopers doing a general business, who were not allowed to have goods admitted free though engaged in manufacturing for dairying purposes.

PARLIAMENTARY OFFICIALS.

Mr. MILLS asked the Premier, If he will place a small sum of money on the supplementary estimates to remunerate those who have been engaged in the Parliament Buildings during the extra-long hours of this very lengthy session? He assumed that it would be unnecessary for him to ask this question, as a sum of £100 appeared on the supplementary estimates. He hoped that in the distribution of this amount among the messengers and clerks the Government would take into consideration the services of all those who had sessional work to do at a fixed salary.

Mr. SEDDON said there had been some complaints last year as to the division of this money, and he would himself go into the matter prior to the division.

RAILWAY REFRESHMENT-CARS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Premier, If, when Ministers take over the railways, he will consider the advisability of adding refreshment-cars to all long-distance trains, as is done on the Manawatu Railway? He hoped that when the railways were taken over this matter would be considered by the new Minister of Railways. Perhaps the Premier could tell the House now who he was to be. On the Manawatu Railway a refreshment-car was run, which had proved a great convenience to the travelling public; and he hoped that the matter would be brought under the notice of the Railway Department.

Mr. SEDDON said he had no objection to consult with the honourable member after the prorogation as to who the Minister of Railways should be. The matter he had referred to in respect to refreshment-cars would be attended to, and the Government would be guided by what they believed to be the true interests of the railways and those using them; and inquiry would be made.

H. PAEARA.

Mr. HEKE asked the Native Minister, Whether the Government, when making inquiry into the petition of Hemi Paeara, (1) called for the petitioner to give evidence; (2) did they cause the inquiry on the report of the Native Affairs Committee of last year; and (3) where did the inquiry take place? He had been urged to ask this question again, as he understood from the Minister representing the Native race that the Government had made an inquiry and had come to the conclusion that the Native had no right at all, because the land to which the petition sent to the House by this Native referred had been granted to the Crown by a special Act. He wished to say that the report of the Native Affairs Committee urged the Government to allow an inquiry to be made by the Stipendiary Magistrate at the Bay of Islands; and, as far as he could see, in common fairness to this Native that inquiry should be allowed, so as to enable him to place the matters referred to in the petition before the Court.

Mr. SEDDON said he had gone very carefully into this matter, and did not think it was necessary at the present stage to reopen it.

WORKMEN'S FARES ON RAILWAYS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Premier, If he will arrange that, when Ministers take control of the railways, cheap workmen's fares shall be issued from the big cities to the suburbs?

Mr. SEDDON said this was a matter which required careful consideration. He had stated to the House that he thought something should be done in this direction. He had not the details at command. Later on—probably next session—he would be in a better position to enlighten the House on the subject.

FRUIT, ETC., SENT TO HOSPITALS.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Premier, Will he concede to persons desirous of sending gifts of fruits, flowers, and vegetables to the various hospitals of the colony the privilege of forwarding same by railway free of cost, thus materially assisting these institutions and encouraging a livelier interest in them? In Canterbury quite a number of people would send fruit and vegetables to the hospital if allowed free carriage on the railways, and he thought there was no reason why the Minister should not give a favourable answer to the question.

Mr. SEDDON said, probably it would lead to an abuse of the privilege asked for. On one occasion it was a notorious fact that two bags of cabbages were sent down by railway to a hospital, and the railway charge was paid by the hospital authorities; but they found that they could buy cabbages from the Chinamen at 2s. 6d. a bag less than the cost of those made a present to them.

E. ROBERTSON.

Mr. W. KELLY asked the Native Minister, If the petition of Edwin Robertson, reported upon by the Public Petitions M to Z Committee on the 7th October, 1892, has been considered? If so, what does the Government propose to do in the matter? The petitioner had petitioned the House in 1892, and the matter was referred to the Government for consideration. He was anxious to know what consideration the Government had given it.

Mr. CARROLL said Mr. Robertson of his own accord had rushed into a lawsuit, which had entailed considerable inconvenience and expense on the Government in defending the case. He lost his case, and was cast in costs.

-of which he now asked the Government to relieve him. That was a sufficient reason why the Government could not take the unusual course of giving him any relief.

DISTRICT COURT JUDGES AND STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister of Justice, Whether he has had communicated to him the following resolution passed by the Legislative Council: "(1.) That, in the opinion of this Council, it is essential to the impartial and fearless administration of justice that (a) the tenure of office of District Court Judges and Stipendiary Magistrates exercising extended jurisdiction should be 'during ability and good behaviour,' and not, as at present, during the pleasure of the Executive; (b) the salaries of such Judges and Magistrates should be adequate, and should not be liable to be reduced during the term of office of the Judge or Magistrate receiving the same. (2.) That, in the opinion of the Council, the salaries at present paid to District Judges and such Magistrates, and especially the former, are wholly inadequate"; and, if so, will the Government give effect to this resolution? He hoped the Government had considered the matter.

Mr. CADMAN said the Government had considered the matter. They had received the resolution passed by the Council, but he might say that the Government had no intention of burdening the taxpayers of the colony with any more life-appointments than absolutely necessary, or of making the tenure of the officers referred to to be other than at present. The Government considered the present salaries adequate, and the House was evidently of the same opinion, as it had just passed the estimates.

PUMICE INSULATION.

Mr. LAWRY asked the Minister of Agriculture, If his attention has been directed to the following telegram, which appeared in the New Zealand Times of the 17th instant, namely: "At the Auckland Freezing Company's works a practical and successful test has been made of a new pumice insulation recently patented by Mr. J. C. Firth. Mr. Firth intends urging on the British Admiralty the desirability of adopting pumice as an insulator for naval powder-magazines in hot climates, so as to prevent the deterioration of the powder by heat. The pumice insulation was subjected to a very severe test at the freezing-works, at Mr. Firth's desire, the object being to prove the absolute efficacy of pumice as a non-conductor of heat under all circumstances"? And, if so, will he render any assistance in the accomplishment of Mr. Firth's purpose, more especially so far as it applies to dairy and other industries in the colony to which the "pumice insulator" can be applied? He was impressed with the idea that this was a matter of very great importance, and, in his opinion, pumice was going to take the place at present held by charcoal as an insulator. He hoped the Minister would bring it into general use.

Mr. Carroll

Mr. J. McKENZIE said his attention had been drawn to this matter, and if the Government could in any way assist Mr. Firth in bringing his idea in regard to pumice into operation in connection with cooling-chambers and the dairy industry they would do so.

SCHOOL-TEACHERS TRAVELLING.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Minister of Education, If he will arrange that school-teachers who have to travel by rail to perform their duties shall be allowed free passes?

Mr. REEVES said if the honourable gentleman would tell him of any school-teachers who had to travel by rail he would be very glad to see what he could do for them, but the inquiries he had made did not show that there were any.

LICENSING ADDITIONAL BARS.

Mr. O'REGAN, for Mr. G. J. Smith, asked the Minister of Defence, Whether, in view of the fact that section 37 of "The Licensing Act, 1881," which provides for the licensing of additional bars, has been repealed by "The Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act, 1893," he will instruct the police to see that the law in this respect is enforced?

Mr. SEDDON said it was believed that the police authorities enforced the law in most respects, but their special attention would be at once called to the matter mentioned.

CHARITABLE AID.

Mr. TANNER, for Mr. G. W. Russell, asked the Government, Whether they will, next session, introduce a comprehensive measure to reform the present charitable-aid law, and circulate the same in time to enable it to be considered by the local bodies?

Mr. REEVES said he had made very plain and unmistakable statements on the subject more than once this session.

SUNNYSIDE ASYLUM.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Minister for Public Works, How many tenders were received for the supply of bricks for the additions to the Sunnyside Asylum, and what was the net price per thousand in the tender accepted?

Mr. SEDDON said that tenders had been received by the Public Works Department, and the same had been dealt with. He believed only one tender had been sent in.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

This Bill was read a first and a second time, and committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 3. — Appropriation of £2,251,325 out of Consolidated Fund.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to add the following proviso:—

"Provided that, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in 'The Public Revenues Act, 1891,' and until an Imprest Supply Act shall be passed in the next session of the General Assembly, the authority of the Coloial Treasurer to issue and pay moneys in respect of any service shall not exceed the amount of the unexpended balance of the vote or such service provided by this Act, together with an amount equal to one-fifth part of the total of all salaries, pay, wages, allowances, rail contracts, rent, and other recurrent charges, and of all ordinary contingencies of any office or department provided for by such vote, and set forth in the estimates relating hereto. And no payment shall be made for any services other than those for which provision is made in this Act and in the estimates for the year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five, or in excess of the scale herein set forth."

The Committee divided.

AYES, 23.

Bell	Maelin	Russell, W. R.
Buchanan	McGuire	Saunders
Buddo	McLachlan	Smith, G. J.
Jollins	McNab	Tanner
Duthie	Meredith	Wilson.
Green	Montgomery	Tellers.
Hall-Jones	Newman	MacKenzie, T.
Hutchison, W.	Pirani	Stout.

NOES, 31.

Buick	Kelly, W.	Reeves
Jadman	Larnach	Seddon
Jarnocross	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Jarnell	Mackintosh	Stevens
Jarroll	McGowan	Steward
Jrowther	McKenzie, J.	Thompson
Duncan	McKenzie, R.	Ward.
Hall	Morrison
Harris	O'Regan	Tellers.
Hogg	Parata	Joyce
Houston	Pinkerton	Mills.

Majority against, 8.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. WARD said,—Sir, in moving the third reading of this Bill, I desire to point out that the only changes in the Bill are in clause 5, which provides for the sum of £13,555 for expenses in connection with the Cheviot Estate Account. In clause 10 there is a slight alteration to provide that the 75 per cent. advance shall not be made on rates to be collected in respect of Native lands. Section 14 provides that 2½ per cent., the cost of collecting the goldfields revenue, hitherto charged against the county revenue, is not in future to be detracted in that way.

Captain RUSSELL.—

That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness and mere oblivion;
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste—sans everything.

Sir, unfortunately this quotation from Shakespeare is only too true and representative of the session of Parliament that is just now about to close. I hope there may be much oblivion as to what we have done during this session of Parliament, for we have been a Parliament "sans teeth"—an Opposition, courteous, I hope, always, but in this case hampered by the fewness of its numbers, and unaided by any criticism of the measures from the supporters of the Government, and we have been unable to use a wholesome and necessary power in restraining the Government from running in improper directions. So, Sir, I again say we have been "sans eyes," because Bills have been brought down in such hot haste to this Parliament from time to time that our eyes have not had the opportunity even of perusing them once, and by reason of which circumstance we have been on this side of the House constantly struggling against time to endeavour to understand the Bills that have been brought before us: but for purposes of criticism the House has been blind. With few exceptions we have received no assistance from honourable members on the Government side. The Government brought down Bills in a state which I have never known before—in such a shape that they are not understood in any degree by members of this House, not excluding the Government, or even the Minister who has brought the Bill down. Never during all the time I have sat in Parliament have I seen Bills brought down night after night—unthought out, unprepared, not understood, not even read—as by this Parliament of the colony. And yet, when we have endeavoured to struggle night after night against such a condition of things as that, we have been taunted with obstruction, because we have been unable to properly prosecute our duty owing to the impossibility of understanding, owing to lack of time, measures proposed to be passed into laws of vital importance to the community—measures not understood by any members of Parliament. Members have not had teeth to restrain the Government, and have not had eyes to see and understand the work put before them. Then, Sir, as to "sans taste," I do not allude to that delicate question of good or bad taste. But the House has not had that keen taste, that exquisite perception, to appreciate the character of what was placed before it for its digestion and assimilation. If it had, I say that half the Bills which have been brought before this session of Parliament would have been cast out into the dust-bin. Then, Sir, to come to my last words—"sans everything." This Parliament has not had any power whatsoever. In that respect it has been "sans everything." Never before has a House of Representatives in this colony so entirely abrogated its functions, and been so compelled by overpowering conditions to swallow Bills which it could not have understood even if it had been given time to endeavour to understand them. Never have there been such circumstances before. We have been forced by the Ministry to do that; and not only that, but the House has allowed itself to be forced by one man—forced by the Premier—to do exactly what he chose. His colleagues have been as ciphers, not endeavouring to control him, though many of the youngest members in this House have strongly endeavoured to restrain the Government; but some also have understood nothing and cared for nothing but to come to the end of the session. What has the policy of the Government been? Have they had any policy? Upon my word, it is difficult to answer the question whether they have had any policy. Before the session they were a self-reliant, non-borrowing Government. What are they now? Are they a self-reliant, non-borrowing Government? Are they not a spend-thrift, profligate, self-seeking Government? Everybody must know they are. They say they are a self-reliant, non-borrowing Government. Have we had a single illustration of that? I am not desiring to abuse them, but I think if they have a policy it is one merely of bounce, bluster, borrow, bribe, and abuse. That is about the way to summarise the whole position. Borrowing! good heavens! we have been borrowing to an unlimited extent, and the bouncing has been to an extent that honourable members could not have conceived of. Bluster! does not every honourable member remember how the very foundations of the House shook when the Premier was aroused and roared until we feared the bulls of Bashan were let loose upon us? Bribery can also be added to the policy, for when the public-works estimates were brought down did not everybody rush frantically to his pigeon-hole to see if the wants of his constituents had been satisfied?

MR. SPEAKER.—The honourable member must not use the word "bribery" in reference to members of this House.

Captain RUSSELL.—Well, it may not be a proper word to use, and I will exonerate the Minister from the charge of bribing any individual. We know there was no bribery. But there was not a sum placed on the estimates for Seaward Bush. The honourable member who represents the district in which that place is situated is a painstaking member, and a supporter of the Ministry. That honourable member gave the Government his view, in very plain language, of their public-works policy, and, although I must not use the word "bribery," I may state that £300 was put on the supplementary estimates for the roads in that very neighbourhood.

AN HON. MEMBER.—That is not a high price.

Captain RUSSELL.—I do not say that it is a high price. I do not allege that was bribery. I do not say nor think that the honourable member who represents Seaward Bush could be bribed at all; but there was a sum put on the supplementary estimates for that place. We cannot, however, go into that now. The Hon. the Premier said that when we left the House we should all remain personal friends though political antagonists. We on this side of the House think that we can claim for ourselves from first to last that we have been studiously anxious to avoid anything like obstruction. We have striven by every means in our power to assist the Government in every way that it was thought desirable to assist them. It was our duty to criticize their measures in every way that we thought to be for the good of the colony. But of obstruction there has been none—not even the slightest attempt at it on this side of the House; nor any attempt to stonewall a Government measure. The only time that anything like obstruction has been used was when there was a kind of obstruction which the country, when it knows of it, will appreciate. We declined to go on working at three and four o'clock in the morning, when honourable members were physically, mentally, and even morally exhausted. We have, during the whole of this session, endeavoured to conduct the business of an Opposition in a manner becoming the great responsibility thrown upon our shoulders. We believe that the country, when it remembers the long hours we have sat here, and the work we have done, will give us credit for the unremitting attention we have endeavoured to bestow on the measures that have come before us. We think, whether rightly or wrongly, that the people of this country will do us the credit of saying that we have discharged our duty faithfully—a duty which has been disagreeable, onerous, and arduous to the last degree. What, then, have we done? We commenced the session of Parliament with a debate on the appointment of the Serjeant-at-Arms, and have had to wind it up with a debate on the Pomahaka purchase. Probably, when years go by—and, unfortunately, time does roll on—many of the measures which we have put on the statute-book this session will be repealed, and others will be forgotten; but I venture to assert that this country will never forget the gross impropriety of the appointment of the Serjeant-at-Arms and the peculiarity of the Pomahaka purchase. This Parliament will be celebrated in years to come as the Parliament which, in spite of all the provisions and intentions of the Disqualification Act, deliberately supported the Government in the wrongful position they took up in the appointment of the Serjeant-at-Arms in defiance of the principle of the Disqualification Act. And it will be remembered also for this: that a property scarcely valued at £3,000 was purchased by the Government for more than double that sum—to be exact, £18,656—with practically no inquiry whatsoever into its real value. These will be the important features remembered in connection with the present Parliament as time goes on. It will be found that these two questions will stand out in prominence, and platforms from one end of New Zealand to the other will ring with these two matters. People will then be allowed to judge whether in opposing such proceedings we were wasting time, or whether, a great principle being at stake, we did our duty. Where is the policy of the Government that was brought down in the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Excellency at the opening of the session? We know that much of it has not even been attempted to be introduced. Many questions then deemed by the Government to be of vital importance—where are they? Where is the Licensing

Captain Russell

Bill? Does any honourable member believe that the Government intended to pass the Licensing Bill? We know they did not: not that I am prepared to blame them for that.

do not think it was desirable for the Government to introduce that Bill. But I have a thorough dislike to Bills being put on the Order Paper, after they have been alluded to in the Governor's Speech as if they were of the greatest importance, and to treating them in such a way as to keep members on tenterhooks, and then not bringing on the Bills at all. That is why the session has been of such interminable length. We have not known on his side of the House on any day what business was coming on for discussion. We have seen, day after day, that when there were on the Order Paper numbers 1, 2, and 8—Bills which we were led to imagine were going to be discussed, and which we had read and endeavoured to understand—they were almost invariably not brought on for discussion, but that some other kind of business was brought down, for which we were unprepared. Sir, I should have imagined that the principle in the policy of public works introduced this year is perfectly unique in the history of Australasia. It is true that we had a large borrowing policy in 1870, but it was introduced by a man who was a past master in finance, and it was surrounded by all sorts of restrictions. It was not possible to use the loans then authorised in a manner which might suit the Minister for Public Works and the Government, uncontrolled by any one else. Yet we have this year been invited to make, and the House has passed, appropriations for money amounting to millions sterling, a large proportion of which can be scattered in any way desired, without check by members of this House. I do not wish to impute bribery to anybody, but I ask every member amongst us, can there be any better opportunity for bribery than this?—for there is scarcely a district in the colony in which the Minister cannot spend money without the control of the people, except, perhaps, in Canterbury and my own unfortunate electoral district.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You were not bribed, then?

Captain RUSSELL.—I do not think I can be bribed.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Be as charitable to other people, then.

Captain RUSSELL.—I have not accused anybody of being bribed. I have not spoken of any individual, or of any attempt to bribe anybody. I am speaking of the policy now inaugurated, in which large sums of money are granted to Ministers to spend in whatever way they like. And, if I am told that they are not to spend the money, it makes the matter worse, because then they can spend the money in what way they choose. If they choose to spend the money in any particular district they have power to do so; whilst, on the other hand, if they think it advisable not to spend large sums of money in any particular district, they can avoid spending it.

Sir, I do not wish at this late hour to touch on many more points, but there is this one point: I allude to the correspondence which took place between the proprietor—or, rather, manager—of the Benmore Station and the Minister of Defence. I do not for one instant enter into the dispute, and, while I admit that the manager of the Benmore Station acted most injudiciously in writing to the Government three months before there was any possibility of disturbance in the neighbourhood, and, while I do not wish to express any opinion as to whether there would or would not have been a squabble, I am quite sure of this: that if there had been a sensible man on the station there was no necessity for any squabble at all. I want to point out that it is the first duty of an administrator to maintain and administer the law, and I think it was, I might almost say, a diabolically wrong thing on the part of the Minister to have ever addressed a letter of the description written, evidently at the dictation of the Premier, in connection with a labour dispute. Nothing could be worse than the attitude taken up by the Minister. Although the letter was sent by his Under-Secretary, the Minister cannot dissociate his conduct from that of the Under-Secretary of his department, and I wish to enter the strongest protest against the principle of refusing to maintain an impartial observance of law and order.

Mr. SEDDON.—I accept the responsibility.

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, the honourable gentleman knows he cannot put that responsibility off his shoulders.

Mr. SEDDON.—It was done by my direction, and I accept the responsibility.

Captain RUSSELL.—The condition of the country is now a very serious one. Never before, I suppose, during the memory of any of us has there been so much distress from one end of New Zealand to the other as there is at the present moment. Who is responsible for that? I wish to be as lenient as I can on an occasion like this, and I do not wish to attribute the whole of the blame for the misery and distress that is now prevalent in the country to the Government. In fact, I should be wrong if I did so, because I do not think that we can do so. But what I do say is that to a very considerable extent the distress and misery has been aggravated by the conduct of the Government. Have the Government in any way endeavoured to grapple with the "unemployed" difficulty? Not a bit of it. They have used it, it seems to me, for their own political purposes, and they have not endeavoured in a comprehensive way to solve the question of the unemployed. No evidence has been put before this House, no evidence has suggested itself to my mind, that the Government has endeavoured to do anything of the sort. But when we come to review the position it seems to me that this Government has based its claim to popularity and public favour to a large extent on the land-tax. They have told us that the substitution of the land-tax for the property-tax would bring prosperity back to the country. Has such been the case? The Government has placed reliance on the nostrum of the land-tax and its power to bring about prosperity—and I do not want to now discuss the question of the land-tax versus the property-tax, but I say merely that the Government has based its claim to public favour on imposing drastic taxation upon the landed interest. And what has been the result to the country? Has it been satisfactory? Has the prosperity of the country improved in any way since the Government has adopted this policy? I will tell you. The Government have done—what? They imposed a graduated tax upon the larger estates, which they said would bring about prosperity. It was to have the effect of bursting up large estates, and was going to place the people on the land. Has this distress and the “unemployed” difficulty been the result? What has been the result of the graduated land-tax and of the absentee-tax? The Government may have possibly raised a sum of £150,000 by the graduated taxation; but what has been the practical result of that? It has been this: that the landowner, right or wrong, from one end of the colony to the other, has been frightened as to his future. Confidence has been shaken; and, instead of the large landowner spending money on improvements, there is nothing but fear on the part of the landed interest, with this result: that never since I can remember have the people entered upon new improvements on their properties with such faint hearts as they are doing at the present time. And that fear to embark capital in the improvement of lands has been aggravated by this: that the monetary institutions have also been frightened, and many of the landowners have been unable to get further supplies of money for the improvement of their properties; and the consequent effect of that is, the number of unemployed in the country districts has never been greater than it is at the present moment, though it may yet increase. Sir, it is to a very large extent the policy of the present Government that has induced that fear. Has the Government encouraged the manufacturing industries? Have there been any further developments of manufacturing industries in the colony since the Government took office? On the contrary, manufactures are languishing.

Mr. SEDDON.—What about the dairy industry?

Captain RUSSELL.—The industry the Government have been unable to kill is the dairy industry. It is an industry which the Premier himself has been unable to kill, though I believe myself that by the policy of Protection which in all probability he will bring down next year he will crush that industry. I say that the manufacturing industries—I do not call butter-making a manufacturing industry in the proper sense of the word—have rather decreased than increased during the term the honourable gentlemen have been in office, with the result that artisans are now working fewer hours. They cannot get full employment, and therefore have to work for less wages than when the honourable gentlemen took office, and there has been more depression and more distress in the towns among the artisan class than there has ever been before. Generally, from one end of the colony to the other there is that feeling of suppressed fear which is shaking enterprises in every possible direction. I venture to say that never before in the history of the colony have there been so many unemployed in the country. Every financial institution has been frightened by the policy of the Government, and they will advance no money at all for the industrial enterprises of the colony. Not only have a desirable class of people with capital been prevented from coming to this colony, but others have been frightened out of it. If we want any evidence of that, we have only to place Mr. Glyn, the Chairman of the Bank of New Zealand, in the witness-box, and if any one would be likely to give evidence in favour of a Government which has backed that institution it would be Mr. Glyn. He tells us that the policy of the Government has been such that they have been unable to deal with their landed estates, and that the result of the policy of the Government has caused the unsatisfactory position of the Globe Assets Company. Though the Government has bolstered up the Bank of New Zealand with an amount of two millions of money, capital has been scared from investment, most desirable settlers have flown to Mashonaland or elsewhere, and stagnation stares us in the face; and that, to my mind, has been the result of the policy of the Government. Sir, I say there is not one single statesman on the Government benches. They have never understood even the meaning of the word “provision” at all. They live only from day to day, and from hand to mouth. They have never thought of the morrow. They are of the type of the village politician,—if they are even worthy of the name of politician. When I say “village politician” I mean the man who likes to stroll down the street to the local publichouse in the evening, and read the paper, and gossip about the political topics of the hour. There is no statesmanship whatever in their policy: they never look ahead. They came in, Sir, on a wave of almost prosperity, because the colony had emerged from some years of depression, and had been progressing steadily year by year while the Atkinson Government were in power. But since then the colony has been going on from bad to worse. They saw hundreds of our young colonists floating away to Australia, not only attracted by Coolgardie, but actually driven out, because there is a propelling force from behind. There are one or two other matters I should like to address myself to, and I hope I do not weary the House, for it is only a sense of duty that impels me to speak. There is no doubt of this: The policy that the Government put before the House in connection with the Midland Railway was of a most extraordinary character. By way of aiding a private company the Government proposed that this colony should give them £618,250 in money, which meant, practically, a charge on the people of the colony of over £21,000 annually for all time; and that was for a railway which the colony might some day have to purchase to complete the railway system of the colony. And when an overwhelming majority declined in a full House to tolerate such a monstrous proposal, then the Government by a side-wind endeavoured to bring the question up again. They tried a system of compulsion on their followers which certainly is not creditable to the Government, and which certainly does not evince a very fine appreciation of the intelligence of their followers. They tried to make them recant the vote they had given after careful deliberation, and defeat the expressed wish of Parliament by a side-wind. And this was done by the Government that profess themselves to have an overwhelming trust of the people, and who express a wish to be guided on all occasions by majorities. There are one or two other points I should like to touch on. I come to the grievance which we all feel as farmers in the compulsory levying of twenty-four months' land-tax on the farmers within a period of eight months. Never before was such unjust taxation imposed on the farmers; and at a time, too, when frozen mutton, grain, and wool are down to their lowest values—they are the staples of the farmer's income—the Government come down ruthlessly, though boasting a large surplus, and ask us to find a large sum of money when it is impossible to raise a lien upon the crops and the wool, and when the farmer has completed all his arrangements for the year, and when the institutions from which they borrow money are becoming harder and stricter. I am afraid the supplementary estimates which were introduced lately will reduce the probable surplus next year to a very narrow limit. We shall find this difficulty: that, instead of having £250,000 to pass over to the Public Works Fund as Ministers have been doing for two years, and as they led the country to expect they would do in the future, the balance will be very small that they will be able to hand over to that fund. I hope I may be wrong. But, at any rate, I prophesy this: Whatever the revenue may really prove on paper, we shall again have a surplus shown. Whether it will be an actual surplus, or whether, again, the land-tax will have to be collected very shortly after declaring a large surplus, are very different things; but on paper there will be a surplus. I am glad to think the country is waking up to the fact that our finance is in a very bad way. I believe the country is coming to its senses. We on this side of the House do not want the country to turn against the Government, yet we are anxious that the country should learn to appreciate what the Government really is, and, when they have learned that, in all probability they will turn away from them with horror, and call upon other men to provide a remedy; and a very drastic and unpleasant medicine they will have to provide. The duty which will be forced on this side of the House whenever it comes into power is one that must prove most distressing to every person of a feeling heart or sensitive mind. I look forward to the probability that whenever this side comes into power again it will have such an unpleasant duty to perform that it will nearly break our hearts in doing it; and in all probability, at the end of three years, after we have restored the finances and restored a feeling of confidence to the country once more, demagogues will parade and overpersuade the country, with the result that we, having done our duty, shall be ignominiously ejected from office for having done it. We shall eventually lose our individual seats for having had the courage to tell the people what fools they have been in believing that by reliance on wordy promises and the platitudes of demagogues prosperity can be assured to everybody. That is the fate I expect myself if I am ever compelled to take office again. I realise this: Persons who endeavour to do their duty, and tell the country they cannot by nostrums be brought into a state of prosperity, that men must depend on their own right hand and brave heart, must work honestly and be self-denying—those are not the men that are wanted. Perhaps the honourable member for New Plymouth would say they are not "the real Mackay." But still I look forward to a day when again prudence will prevail in New Zealand; when the prudent man, who has the courage of his convictions and does not endeavour to humbug the people, will again be asked to take a share in the government of the country. But we all realise that the preaching of common-sense is an ungrateful task, and that the world will be ungrateful to us for having performed it. I may be told this is a pessimistic view to take. But I thank Goodness I am not a pessimist. Fairly robust in health, with a good constitution and an easy-going disposition, pessimism is quite unknown to me. But when I have two and two placed before me and am told they make eight, common-sense convinces me they make only four. The world has been recently assured that two and two make more than four, and it has come to believe it. But the day of awakening is not far from us, and what will be the result? That those who have been humbugged previously by charlatans, quacks, and empirics, and chicanery of all kinds will wake up to the fact that they must come back to persons who will tell the truth, and who speak plainly, and say truthfully that nothing but hard work and cessation from relying on the foreign money-lender will bring back prosperity to the country. There is no doubt, for some time past the feeling which placed those honourable gentlemen opposite in the position they are occupying has changed, and may be summarised in a few words from Shakespeare:—

Captain Russell

"It is ten o'clock.

Thus may we see," quoth he, "how the world wags.
'Tis but an hour ago since it was nine,
And after an hour more 'twill be eleven;
And so from hour to hour we ripe and ripe,
And then from hour to hour we rot and rot.
And thereby hangs a tale."

They have come to their time of ripeness, and it will not be very long before, over-ripe, they will rot and rot, and fall to the ground.

7.30. Mr. REEVES.—It is not easy to deliver a set speech in the dying hours of the session, and I shall not take up more time than I can possibly help. I would much rather take a five-barred gate than address a set speech to honourable members who must be thoroughly sick and tired of speeches. In fact, I should not have ventured to detain my brother members during the dying hours of the session if it had not been that the very excellent speech of the leader of the Opposition seemed to us to demand an immediate reply. My chief considered that I ought to do my best to meet that speech, and, as I believe in there being only one general, and in that general's orders being obeyed, I shall try to make a speech which I would very much rather not have been called upon to deliver. The speech of the honourable gentleman was a very excellent one, and to have expected a better under the circumstances would, I think, have been unreasonable. A brighter, pluckier, and more gentlemanly speech, under the circumstances, I think, one could hardly have listened to. I say that, although the honourable gentleman began his speech "sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything," and ended it with "rot." There are very few speakers who could venture on such a remarkable coincidence without suffering for it, but luckily my honourable friend is one of the few speakers who can. We like him so much, and we like his speeches so much, that it is almost a pleasure to be "dressed down" by the honourable gentleman. It reminds one of a character in one of Dumas's novels who was killed in a duel, and who, when he was dying, congratulated himself on the fact that he had been run through by the best swordsman in France. My honourable friend made an exceedingly nice speech, and he made an exceedingly plucky speech. When one thinks of the circumstances of the Opposition one cannot help thinking that it must take a considerable amount of courage for the leader of that party to make such a bright and lively speech. My honourable friend has done his best at the end of the session to cover the retreat of his party. It was just like the end of a stubbornly-contested battle, when a brave colonel of cavalry, drawing his sword, makes his regiment charge once more, not with the hope of victory, but in order to cover a retreat. I believe if the member for Hawke's Bay had remained a soldier he would have exhibited fine soldierly qualities. But my honourable friend carries his soldierly qualities into the way in which he leads his party in this House. I think that is the explanation of the very excellent, very lively, and very courageous speech to which we have listened. He bravely endeavoured to cover a retreat. As to the Opposition, I do not blame them for being beaten. When I came into this House some seven or eight years ago, I had the pleasure of always being beaten for the first three years. And very excellent discipline it was. In the same way I have no doubt that the discipline which the party opposite have undergone, and are undergoing, will do them good, and that if—as my honourable friend predicts—they come into office some day, they will not, when they do come in, make quite such a mess of things as they did when they were here before. Having said so much, I may be permitted to point out one or two things in regard to which I think that speech was not altogether so excellent or quite so convincing. My honourable friend said some very hard things of us. As I have said, he said them very nicely, but the things were so hard that had they come from any other honourable member we should probably have resented them, and resented them rather hotly. "Bribery" is a hard and ugly word, and I do not think it ought to be heard here. Then, I do think this: that the Minister in charge of the department responsible for the Polhill Gully purchase might have been more generous to the Minister who is responsible for the Pomahaka purchase. As regards that purchase, what has been said about it? First of all, that a gentleman who is in a Government department—but not in the Lands Department—is a nephew of the seller of the land. If every man who has a relative in some branch of the Civil Service is to be tabooed in reference to dealing with the Government of the country there would be a very large section of the population of New Zealand who would not be permitted to have anything to do with the State. It has been said that we gave too much for the land, that the purchase was completed rashly, and that proper valuations were not taken. The evidence shows that the land was valued and revalued, and the evidence shows that the purchase was spread over a period of time which would have been called unreasonable delay on the part of honourable gentlemen opposite if one of their friends had entered into negotiations to sell his land and if the purchase had broken down. In fact, it was spread over a period of time which was considered to be extravagant in the case of a Mr. Gray, who wanted to sell the Government some land, and who is a gentleman not of "the right colour." The evidence shows that the Pomahaka land was valued and revalued; and, as for proof of the success of the purchase, I think the prompt manner in which the land has been taken up shows that. However, I will not dwell upon that topic. It has been thoroughly threshed out, and everybody is sick of the whole question. Nobody now alleges that the charges made against the Minister of Lands were founded upon fact. Just the same charges as to the excessive price paid were levelled at the Cheviot purchase, and they will be levelled against every other purchase which we make. The leader of the Opposition launched out into a kind of panegyric—or shall I call it a funeral oration?—over his party and their conduct during this session.

Captain RUSSELL.—Resurgam.

Mr. REEVES.—"Resurgam!" I hope so. According to the honourable gentleman there was never such an Opposition for businesslike attention to the work of the House, for moderation, for useful criticism, for regular attendance in their places, and above all for a strict refraining from obstruction. Of course there are two ways to look at that. There have been occasions on which the Opposition have been actively attentive to the business, and there have been occasions on which they have been conspicuous by their absence. I have sometimes looked on those seats and have seen a beggarly array of empty benches. On other occasions we have seen one or two of those honourable members coming into the House, and one or two going out, and those who came in repeating the remarks of those who went out. Very often nothing was said which had not been said before; speakers repeated each other, and then proceeded to repeat themselves. That, I regret to say, has not unfrequently been the manner in which Her Majesty's Opposition have conducted business this session. When I say that, let it be distinctly understood that I am not levelling that accusation against the leader of the party. He has been conspicuously free from those faults. Then, my honourable friend proceeded to attack us. He lays down a long list of our crimes. It is, he says, a Government of bounce, bunkum, bluster, banquets, and abuse. It is almost a pity that "abuse" came in, thus spoiling the alliteration. The honourable gentleman should have tried to conjure up one more "b," so as to make the list artistically complete. He complained that we were doing all these things, and, in addition to that, he insinuated that there had been bribery. The word "bribery" is a word which I do not think ought to be used in this House. It is not allowed to be used by way of a direct charge, and I do not think it ought to be allowed to be used by way of insinuation. Yet my honourable friend unquestionably used it so tonight. He said, "I do not accuse the Ministers of bribing, or honourable members of being bribed, but I do say the Government policy of spending money in the various districts as it is spent was a policy of bribery." In other words, we were not bribing, and the honourable members were not bribed, but we spend the money in their districts in such a way as to bribe them, and we do it intentionally. Just so one might say, "I do not accuse Smith of being a thief, but I saw him put his hand into my pocket, and I saw his hand withdrawn from my pocket with a pocket-handkerchief between his fingers." That is what I call accusing us by insinuation of bribery, and I do not think the accusation was at all worthy of the honourable gentleman. If anything in the way of our expenditure of public funds gave colour to that, there might be some justification. But I say, Go all through the colony, examine and scrutinise the expenditure as closely as you can, and I do not think you will see there is the least pretension for saying that we only spend money in the districts of our supporters, and do not spend it in the districts of our opponents. Take, for example, the province in which we are strongest—a large province, in which every district returns a Government supporter, where the least enthusiastic of our supporters has but one grievance, and that is that we have said he does not support us. I am referring to the Province of Canterbury. Has the greater part of the money been spent there? On the contrary, that is just the one district where there is no expenditure at all. Take the districts, for example, of some of our opponents. Take the district of the honourable member for Egmont, or the district of the honourable member for Patea, or the district of the honourable member for Clutha, and I venture to say each one of these has far more money expended in it than the whole of the Province of Canterbury.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. REEVES.—I say, Yes. Take the figures. There is more money laid out in the Clutha district and in the district adjoining it than there is in the whole Province of Canterbury. There is far more money laid out in the Patea district than in the Province of Canterbury; and more money laid out in the Egmont district—at any rate, in that little district there is just about as much spent as in the whole of Canterbury. That, I take it, is a fair argument to be used, and what it means is that we have not looked at supporters, that we have not looked at opponents, but that we have looked at districts which required money to be spent in pushing on the work of settlement, and where money could be spent best and most reproductively, and in those districts we have spent the money. Sir, the honourable member for Wellington City interrupts me, and says we have not spent money in Canterbury because no settlement was going on there.

Sir R. STOUT.—I never said anything of the sort. I said Canterbury got the Land for Settlements Bill and the Advances to Settlers Bill.

Mr. REEVES.—Well, is there no other province which can get advances to its settlers? Is Canterbury the only province where farmers have mortgages? Is Canterbury the only place where money is borrowed? I scarcely think that. As regards the land for settlements, we have a Bill, but we have no purchase yet, though I hope we shall. But the point is not that. I think and believe that Canterbury will not be the only province in which the Land for Settlements Bill will be brought into operation. If we get our fair share of the land-purchases undertaken and carried out in Canterbury, that will not in the least alter what I say, and that is that, under this large public-works expenditure out of the estimates, which amounts to about a million, the number of thousands spent in Canterbury can, I think, be counted on the fingers of one hand. Yet in the Province of Canterbury all the electoral districts have declared for the present Government. The Province of Wellington, where our opponents, relatively speaking, number the largest, where they show the strongest front—that is the province which comes about best out of the scramble. At any rate, out of the scramble it does tolerably well. That is our answer to the charge that we have simply used the public-works expenditure as a means of bribing our supporters and their constituencies. Then, my honourable friend went on to say that we had no policy;—that we had brought down Bills in shoals, flung them on the table of the House, did not attend to the drawing of them, did not know anything about them, did not understand them—

Captain RUSSELL.—I except you.

Mr. REEVES.——had no arguments to give for them, no explanation to make of them, no defence of them; that the Premier was the Government, spoke for the Government, acted for the Government; that his colleagues kept no check upon him, and did not attempt to check him; that they did not even sit in the House here to watch him, but were, in fact, the merest ciphers—the merest dummies. Now, with regard to the last accusation—that the members of the Government are mere dummies—I think my honourable friend ought to know enough about Cabinet work not to have made that statement. At any rate, it should not come from a member of the Cabinet to which he had the honour of belonging, because if ever there was a Cabinet against which the accusation was levelled with a certain amount of colour that it was a one-man Government, I think it was the Cabinet of the late Sir Harry Atkinson.

Captain RUSSELL.—That was before my time.

Mr. REEVES.—The honourable member was a member of the Atkinson Cabinet, and, although we perfectly well remember he was there when Sir Harry Atkinson was almost prostrated with severe illness, yet I do not think the dominating mind of Sir Harry Atkinson ceased to dominate that Government. But the chances are that what was said of that Government was exaggerated, just as what is said of the present Government is very much exaggerated. How can honourable gentlemen possibly know that subordinate Ministers have no opinions of their own, or whether they differ from the Premier or not?—because, if the Ministers are worth their salt, if they are loyal to their chief, they do not discuss and quarrel and argue in public. They wash their dirty linen behind the scenes. They argue the points in Cabinet, but when face to face with the foe they show a united front, just as any Ministers worth their salt always have done and always will do. Now, without betraying Cabinet secrets, I venture to say the subordinate Ministers of this Cabinet have opinions of their own, and that my honourable friend and chief here, who is reposing in happy contentment in his seat, would be, if he were awake, the first man to indorse what I say when I say that frequently the opinions of other members of the Cabinet are delivered to him in the very plainest language.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He is not asleep.

Mr. REEVES.—Well, Sir, I am not the only man who has sometimes thought my honourable friend was asleep and found him very much awake. It is a little mistake frequently made by Her Majesty's Opposition. Then, the leader of the Opposition said we did not understand our Bills. Well, it is for the House and the country to judge. For myself, listening frequently as I have listened here to my colleagues passing Bills through the House, I must say they appeared to me to have a grasp of them, and to understand them quite as well as any Ministers who ever sat on these benches before; and, speaking for myself, I can honestly claim that I have studied my measures with due care, and that I have as a rule appeared, at any rate, to be able to give reasons for the measures which I brought and got passed.

Captain RUSSELL.—I made an exception of the honourable gentleman.

Mr. REEVES.—I am much obliged to the honourable gentleman, but I should have valued the compliment even more highly if it had not been a compliment paid to me at the expense of my colleagues. I think his accusation is as unjust in their case as it would have been if it had been made against me. Then, Sir, there is the cry about the shoal of Bills, the avalanche of Bills, which descended on the House, and which were never meant to pass, and did not pass. Very well, let me go into that for a few minutes. It is so easy to pick out one, two, three, or four Bills from the programme of a session, and to say this Bill was mentioned in the Governor's Speech, this other was printed and circulated, another was read the second time, another the Ministers mentioned on the platform that they would like to pass. It is so easy to urge that none of these measures passed,—saying nothing whatever of the Bills we have passed,—and so try to make the House and the country believe that the labours of the session have been wasted, and that we have a barren record at the end of it. Surely it would have been much fairer not to look at what has not passed, but to look at what has. There never was a session, I think, in which Bills were not brought down that were not proceeded with; there never was a session in which Bills were not introduced and blocked half-way; and there always have been sessions in which more than one or two Bills have run the gauntlet of this House and come to an untimely end in the other place. But, to judge the fruits of the session, take the solid work done, take the Bills that have been passed, weigh them, consider their importance and probable value, and then ask yourselves whether this has been a barren session, or whether it has not been one of the most fruitful sessions that the Parliament of New Zealand has seen. It is possible that we did make a mistake in drawing out too large a programme; it is possible we overestimated our power to get legislation through this House; it is possible that we did think we should pass more Bills than we have passed; and I think that charge, or, rather, the complaint that has been made that we are trying to do a little too much, has some foundation. I admit that. But is it not much better that a Government should err on this side than that a Government should err upon the side of apathy, idleness, and want of energy? Which do the people of New Zealand prefer, a Government that tries to do too much or a Government that tries to do too little? At any rate, whatever faults may be alleged against us, I do not think we can be accused of not having tried to do our best to carry out our policy, whole and entire, as we considered for the benefit of the country. We, at any rate, have not been content to be a "do-nothing" Government. We have not come here crying out for "political rest," and satisfied if we could get it. It cannot be said of us, as it was once said of a Liberal Government, that our only wish is—

Mr. Reeves

To promise, pause, prepare, postpone,
And end by letting things alone;
In short, to take the people's pay
For doing nothing every day.

Now, it may be fair for those honourable gentlemen to say that we have done a great deal of mischief in this colony. That may be their opinion, but it is not right for them or for their leader to get up and suggest that we have done nothing at all. From their point of view we have done a great deal of mischief, and they are quite justified in saying so, but to say we have shown want of enterprise and want of energy is something which, I think, they cannot fairly say. Personally, it has always been the pride and wish of Ministers to be a Government that did not shirk its duty. When we first took office we took it with the distinct understanding that we were to carry out a certain policy—that is, a scheme of reform that would revolutionise the system of taxation; that we were to reform the land-laws and entirely change the methods of land-settlement; and that we were to carry out and complete the labour legislation which had been indicated and begun, but not pushed home, by our predecessors. Now, no sooner had we taken office than the Opposition papers said boldly in leader after leader that, once we were in, nothing more would be heard of the policy; that no Government could live twenty-four hours which dared to abolish the property-tax and tried its hand at imposing a progressive land- and income-tax; and, as to labour Bills, that was magnificent clap-trap talk for the hustings, but that men would not hear about them any more, once we got into office. Finally, they said that, as for settling the land, of course the Minister of Lands would make a little talk about dummies, and would introduce a Bill that would not be passed, and that settlement would go on just about as fast as it had done before, under the same conditions, and in no different way. These were the predictions, and I venture to say that, whether we have done right or wrong, we have falsified those predictions. We have reformed the system of direct taxation; we have, I believe, pretty well abolished dummyism; and we have passed not only the labour Bills that were before the public, but a number of others. We have done more in the way of labour legislation than any party in the colonies or in England, or even in any State in progressive America itself. Very well, I say we have gone on these lines, and that we shall continue to take our fences boldly, and when we fail it will be rather in trying to do too much, and in being too bold, than in trying to do nothing at all and showing a craven fear of consequences.

8.0. Speaking as a cricketer, I would always much sooner see a man lose his wicket by being caught in the endeavour to make a big hit than see him fiddled out by a "slow" because he feared to take his bat out of the block-hole. I trust that will never be our fate. Then, it is said by the leader of the Opposition that we have no policy, and that we have not carried out a policy or done anything in the direction of a policy this session. What have we endeavoured to do this session, and what have we done? It is perfectly true we have not passed the Licensing Bill, and one or two other measures that the honourable gentleman referred to as not having been passed; but what have we passed? Looking to the legislation of any country, I ask the House, where have there been three bolder, more daring, and more experimental measures passed in one session than the Land for Settlements Bill, the Advances to Settlers Bill, and the Industrial Conciliation Bill? I venture to say that had the House of Commons itself, the great Parliament of the Empire, in one session passed three such Bills, that session would be memorable for many years in the annals of British legislation. The Advances to Settlers Bill is a Bill which we can point to as a substantial item of legislation, and I think that as passed every one must admit that it is a safe experiment to make, and a most important and momentous experiment. And I do not think anybody will deny that the Land for Settlements Bill—a Bill which gives the State a right for the first time to compulsorily take land for settlement—is as daring and novel a measure as the Advances to Settlers Bill. As to the Industrial Conciliation Bill, though it scarcely lies in my mouth to dwell upon my action in connection with that Bill, I would point out that we are the only country which has dared really to look that experiment in the face and to deliberately try it. Country after country has taken it up, but, after looking at it, has shirked it. Students and legislators in America, England, and Australia have looked for a remedy for industrial war, and they have seen that if this experiment in compulsory arbitration can be carried out successfully it will be a complete and final remedy for evils that are constantly occurring. And I am certain, of the experiment that this Parliament has ventured to try, that if we had done little else this session than to pass that measure, this session would have been weighty and noteworthy in the annals of our legislation. I have spoken of these three Bills; but have we done nothing else this session? What do the colonists of the North Island think of our Native-land legislation? During many years have we not seen an outcry for the resumption of the pre-emptive right, and for a bold forward policy in the acquisition of Native lands? It has taken years to do it, but this session at last has seen it done, and I think the settlers of the North Island will think that the session, so far as these results are concerned, has been good; that the session which has seen these measures passed will be one which will bring certain progress in the northern part of the Island. Then, let me look at one or two other matters. There is the revision of the Standing Orders, which probably has not been all that its best friends hoped, but that it was an important and useful reform I think we shall admit when we come, during the recess, to look over the events of the session. Although all of those changes have not expedited public business, I must say, in spite of the inordinate length to which the session has been dragged out, that the reforms and changes of the Standing Orders have given general satisfaction, and that what failure there has been has been on account of the narrow interpretation put upon the scope of some of these new rules by the gentlemen who have occupied the position of Chairmen of Committees. It is not for me to reflect in any way upon the Chairmen of Committees, but it appears to me that the interpretation of the rules given by them was not the correct interpretation. I refer to the rules relating to discussions on motions to report progress and motions that the Chairman leave the chair. These rules may not have been worded as carefully as they might be, though they seemed to me to have been worded plainly, but it was understood when they were passed that they would be interpreted in a very different sense from that in which they have been interpreted; and had the intention of the framers been carried out, as was expected, and as I think every one had a right to expect, I think we should have seen very much less of that elaborate waste of time, temper, and labour for which the session has been so conspicuous on certain days and at certain times. If there is a blot in these Standing Orders that blot should be removed next session. Let us look at the matter like men, and I say distinctly that experience will show where further reforms of our Standing Orders are required, and we ought not to hesitate to make these further reforms. There is a growing desire, and, I think, a legitimate desire, on the part of honourable members that the business should be done in the day and not in the night, in the larger hours of the morning and not in the smaller hours, and I think the Ministry fully sympathize with that desire, and, I feel sure, will be glad to assist to realise it. But the point is this: If we wish to get the business of the House done in the morning, afternoon, and early evening, I think we shall have to even further reform our Standing Orders to such an extent as to enable Ministers and the House to put through a certain and reasonable amount of business, and to say that a reasonable amount of business shall be transacted every day, although a small handful of members wish to see no business done at all. If we manage to do that I think we shall be able to sit within reasonable hours, and if we try I think we shall be able to do it. Not to weary the House, let me not dwell upon the Government Railways Bill, and the agricultural Bills—the Dairy Industry Bill, the Land Drainage Bill, and other measures. I think those are measures of importance, and also of usefulness; and surely, amongst our legal Bills, the Indictable Offences Bill, which has carried on the work done by the Criminal Code Act of last year, is not a measure of no value and no use. Surely the other measures we have passed this session are of use; surely the Post and Telegraph Classification Bill is a good Bill, though it is a departmental Bill; and I happen to know of the School Attendance Bill that, although it is not a great measure, friends of education all over the colony think that it is a good one, and look to see substantial good result from its passing. I am not going to delay the House, seeing it is past eight o'clock; but let us look at the accumulated measures which we have passed this session. I have touched upon a few. I might, for example, refer to the labour measures—to the Shop-hours Bill, the Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, the Shipping and Seamen's Bill, the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Bill; and more especially to the Factories Act, which I say, without fear of contradiction, is the best Factories Act on the statute-book in the colonies, England, or America. Certainly, we only as yet know the probable effect of these measures, but I may simply say that they are measures which the working-classes of this colony, if not the whole of the people of New Zealand, believe will be for their interest and benefit, and for the good of the people as a whole. I say that no other colony, nor England, has been able at present to show any such record of reform as we have been able to show for the last four years. We have passed those measures, right or wrong. At any rate, there is a record of what we have managed to do, what we were asked to do, and what we believe the Liberal party sent us here to do, and what we believe no other Government has been able to do in any English-speaking country in the world. But it is not for me to dwell generally upon the success of the labour policy. The leader of the Opposition himself should not criticize our measures too severely, seeing he gave in plenty of instances a fair support to them, and a support that was honourable and creditable to him. If then, Sir, we have, as he says, done nothing for the working-classes, it is a little odd that we passed measure after measure which has had the support and adhesion of the honourable member. However, he has attempted to score a point by talking of the number of the unemployed in the country. This, of course, is a very old argument, which is always brought to bear against labour laws and trade-unions. In days of depression, and when times are bad in England, there is always an outcry against the trade-unions, and against all attempts to restrict the conditions of labour. One can understand the cry of sympathy with employers who are making very little profit. "Poor fellows!" people say, "why hamper and restrict their business, when they are carrying it on with very little profit—possibly at a loss?" The answer of the Government is, of course, that labour-laws are for the benefit of the people, and for the good of the community as a whole. In my opinion, if wisely carried out and properly administered, it will be shown that they do not interfere, have not interfered, and will not interfere with legitimate profit and industry. Again, I must say that the unemployed, although they are, unfortunately, here to-day, are not here because of the labour legislation of the past four years.

Mr. Reeves

Captain RUSSELL.—I did not argue that way.

Mr. REEVES.—But the honourable member said distinctly that we had done nothing for the working-classes, and that our policy was responsible for the large numbers of unemployed. Now, the labour legislation is part of our policy, and against that labour legislation I considered the honourable gentleman's remarks chiefly pointed. Our critics, when they ask what it is that causes the depression in New Zealand, what it is that swells the number of unemployed, that drives capital out of the country, and kills confidence and trust in our settlers,—make answer 1, the labour legislation; answer 2, the taxation legislation; answer 3, the land legislation. That is the cry of that party. I say they have never proved nor endeavoured to prove that one single Act on the statute-book has really hampered one single employer or deprived him of fair profits that he was making. Have they done so? Then, as to the question of our land legislation and taxation legislation, which, it is said, have killed confidence and created a sense of insecurity amongst landowners—rubbish! Our taxation legislation has lifted the burdens off the shoulders of three landed proprietors for every one upon whose shoulders it has increased the burden. Our land legislation has not interfered with the security of tenure where the land is held for occupation and produces all it can; but I repeat that our land legislation has accelerated settlement in every respect, and has shown how to keep up the hope of the people and the producing-power of the country. But the honourable gentleman says, and says quite truly, that there is depression, and that there are unemployed. I admit it. But I say that we can prove positively beyond the fear of contradiction that the existence of the unemployed and the existence of the depression are not due to our policy. I say the proof is this: If this colony, which is the one colony in which a Liberal Government has held office for four years, and in which there has been a Radical taxation and labour policy, were the only depressed colony, and were far more depressed than the other colonies, then I should say there was something in the argument. But we have only to look at the other colonies, where there has been no labour policy and no taxation reform, to see many more unemployed than there are in New Zealand. Instead of New Zealand being the most depressed colony it is the least depressed. If our policy is responsible for anything at all, it is responsible for our being better off than our neighbours. It is folly to say that worldwide causes, which are almost ruining producing-countries in all parts of the globe, have not affected New Zealand, and that what is affecting New Zealand is our policy. I am told that in Greece, when they have an earthquake, it is brought as a charge against the Government. Although that is ridiculous, it is not more ridiculous than to say that the low price of wheat or of gum, or the depressed state of the Canterbury farmers, is due to our policy. Surely, to say that a Government is responsible for an earthquake is not more ridiculous than to say that a Government is responsible for a drought, or a bad harvest, or the low prices of wool, meat, and gum. As to wheat, the fact is that the large production in America and India has knocked the bottom out of the wheat-market. That is our answer to the charges, and I say it is a complete one. We are not going to be frightened or deterred from pushing forward our Liberal policy by the fact that the colony is not at the present time so prosperous as we could wish. In every country, when there is discontent the people blame the Government, and every opponent tries to place the responsibility on the Ministry of the day. If any man thinks that the Opposition will not lay the cause at the door of the Government he has not read history. In dull times people always grumble at the Government. We expect that: but we know that we have not caused the dullness of the times in New Zealand. We are satisfied that the policy we are carrying out now, and mean to push forward, so far from making the times worse will turn things into brightness. We share that opinion with a majority in the House and the country. We are not going to remain still, we are not going to flinch or hesitate, but we are going to face the position and carry on our policy until it is absolutely carried out. We are going to reform the conditions of labour so that the hard toiler shall have a fair share in the fruits of his industry. If industries cannot be carried on without sweating women and children and men, and without importing evils from older parts of the world, we shall be better without them. I would rather that New Zealand had a million of happy, prosperous, contented people than two millions partly living in dirty alleys and black slums, in the midst of poverty and darkness—foul-mouthed, destitute, drunken. I would rather see New Zealand a small country than that our agricultural labourers should sink to the condition that their fellows in older countries have sunk to. And I say, through evil or good report, in dull times or prosperous times, do not let us flinch from carrying out this policy—a policy which is good for the country, a policy which will do the greatest good to the greatest number. The honourable gentleman complained that we had no policy. I say our policy is written in our works. I think I know the trend of my legislation. I know the goal I wish to get to, and I think I see my way to get to it.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The Agent-Generalship.

Mr. REEVES.—I think that is a very sorry sneer, and I am sorry that my friend the senior member for Wellington City thinks enough of it to laugh at it. But, as the Agent-Generalship has been mentioned throughout the country and here, and as until now I have been perfectly silent under all sorts of imputations, I would simply say that what has been said and written is devoid of truth, as it is of generosity. I have never expressed a desire or hinted to my colleagues that I wanted that position, although I do not think it would be a disgrace either to the country or to me if I took the position. But I am perfectly content to go on doing my work here as a Liberal minister or as a private member as long as my constituents send me here. I say that our policy is written in what we have done. Our policy is written large on the records of the laws and administration of New Zealand for the last four years; our policy is written in the way in which we have placed the people on the soil, in the reforms we have effected in the various departments of labour, and in the measures grouped under the further heads to which I have referred, and which we have succeeded in placing on the statute-book during the last four years. Our supporters have been charged with not having criticized or understood our legislation. Never, I think, was a taunt less deserved. I think anybody who has listened to the debates this session will admit that there never has been a party in this House which has had greater liberty of discussion or greater liberty of action than the Liberal party has had this session. I have wished sometimes, when friends of mine proposed to make amendments in our Bills, that they would consult us, and give us an opportunity of arguing the point with them, and telling them why we believed our course was the better and theirs the least desirable. If we had notice of amendments to be proposed instead of their being sprung upon us I think there would be less misunderstanding and friction between us and our friends. But I have never doubted the loyalty of our party. I believe that they have tried to be as loyal to the Ministry they support as to their constituencies and to the country. I think we shall work together in the best way possible during next session, and the session after, as we have done during the present session. The better we know each other the better friends we shall be. I do not blame the followers of the Government for anything, and I say the taunt made that they have not followed and understood our measures is an empty and baseless taunt. I thank the House for the patient hearing it has accorded me, and in conclusion would say that I think the session, though an onerous, wearisome, and protracted one, has been the most fruitful session New Zealand has seen. It is true that there has been no one such brilliant measure passed as the female franchise, or the Land-tax and Income-tax Act; but we have passed a number of useful measures, which have been long waited for, and which I trust in the days to come will prove useful to the country. We have done all that with the loyal assistance of our followers. We intend to rely upon our supporters' loyalty and sensible conduct in the future as in the past, and to keep our triple policy before us: a policy of aid to settlers; of reform in the land-laws, until we give to New Zealand the best land-laws in the world; a policy of improving the conditions under which labour works until we can say that there is no country in the world where labourers are so well off. With the indorsement of the people in the past and their support in the future, I believe that our measures will do good to the country in the years to come, and I maintain that they are doing good to the country now.

Sir R. STOUT.—I did not intend to say a word in this debate, because I thought the usual etiquette would have been followed, which is that on the third reading of the Appropriation Bill the leader of the Opposition makes a speech and the Treasurer replies. And it is surprising to me that that course has not been followed this session. Instead of that, we have had a speech from the Minister of Education in self-laudation as to the work done this year. I wish to point out what has happened this session, and I say the session began very badly when what I may term the whole conscience of the community was shocked by what the Ministry did. The law was violated, and everyone in the House and outside the House felt that it was violated. The Ministry, by the aid of their party Whips, forced their supporters to vote in a direction which every man's conscience condemned. That will have its effect, and I am afraid it will also have its effect on the Liberal party. I want to know if there has been a single measure passed, outside of the labour Bills—which I give credit to the Minister of Education for introducing, and agree with—but, outside of those Bills, what has been done for the social life of the people? Has there been a single Bill passed of a social character? The Bill which members were sent to Parliament pledged to support, and pledged for nothing more strongly, has never been attempted to be put through. I mean the Licensing Bill. The honourable member the senior Whip stated what was absolutely correct, and I said at the time the consolidation Bill was introduced, that it was never intended to pass it, and it only showed that there was no sincerity in bringing forward such a measure, as the House would not have time to deal with it. What we wanted was a measure with six or eight clauses altering the existing law. The Bill brought down was only two nights in Committee, and then it was blocked by the aid of the senior Whip. The temperance party remained silent, and was accused of all sorts of things, and then the Bill was simply talked out to help the Premier to get rid of a troublesome measure. What has been done for the social life of the people?

8.30.

Mr. Reeves

Mr. REEVES.—What about the Advances to Settlers Bill?

Sir R. STOUT.—The honourable gentleman is an educated man; and does he mean to say that that touches the social life of the people? The Advances to Settlers Bill, the borrowing of money to lend! He knows better than that. There has been no Bill introduced into the House, I say, dealing with the social life of the people—I mean, introduced and carried through—except the labour Bills, and I give the honourable gentleman every credit for the labour Bills. But will he allow me to tell him an anecdote illustrating this very question? There was in the town in which I was born a very pious lady, and a wealthy lady, who was fond of going amongst the people and distributing tracts to them. She was very persistent in distributing these tracts: but the poor got nothing but tracts. She went once to a man and asked him how he was getting on, and she offered him an additional tract. He said, "Madam, we have tried these tracts in every way; we have boiled them, we have fried them, and my children won't have one of them." And so when the labour people are in trouble they get a new tract. The honourable gentleman says to the labouring-classes of the colony—I do not mean the artisan classes, I mean the labouring-people—when they come to him, "Here is a tract—a Bill—for you;" but I say that none of the Bills passed this session dealt with the labouring-classes at all. I venture to say that the labouring-people who are not artisans and mechanics will say, "You may keep your tracts; they are of no value to us." The honourable member admitted that one of the things which affect the social life of the people is drunkenness. What makes the slums? Why, drunkenness. And what has the honourable gentleman done to deal with that? Nothing. And when you want to deal with any question touching on that, what do you get from the Government? Nothing. That, I say, strikes at the social life of the people of every country more than any other question, and it is left untouched by the Government even with their little finger. And now I want to say a few words on the amendment of the conduct of the business of this House. We have heard a great deal of prolix discussion in the House. Now, the honourable member who has just spoken has taken up a solid hour in talking about—what? Can any member going out of this House remember even one phrase he used? How has the business been conducted? Sir, the Standing Orders have been of no service to the House. On the contrary, the time-limit, so far as discussing large questions is concerned, has been a perfect curse. Members have been prevented from giving utterance to their ideas and bringing them before the House and the country. And as for the limit of four speeches in Committee, that is of no value whatever. I venture to say that, so far as that is concerned, there has been more time wasted in Committee than before this time-limit was introduced. Of what value, then, have been these Standing Orders? They have been of none. The only value that has been gained has been to prevent discussion on Bills on going into Committee. That has been of service. As to the time-limit in Committee, it has been of no value whatever. I want to say one or two words more. I have to complain that on two important matters the Government have denied information. They have denied information with regard to clause 21 of the Licensing Bill, and they have allowed judgment to go by default against them. I have a right to say that. They did not explain that, and they would not let it go to a Committee to inquire how that iniquitous clause became law. The honourable gentleman could have chosen any Committee he liked: all I wanted was the evidence. And, then, on the conduct of the Railway Commissioners since they took office, that was also denied investigation, and judgment by default again went against them. I am not going to deal with the measures; another time will be given for that. But let us see what this session has done as a session. The Government have been heaping up the liabilities of the colony. Every one has been clamouring for roads and bridges for himself and his district; members have thought nothing about the liabilities they were incurring; and, instead of this House being an economical House, a non-borrowing House, or a self-reliant House, there never has been a Parliament sitting in New Zealand which has talked about borrowed money and millions more lightly than this House has. And I say this: that we cannot pass the next session without increasing the taxation, or borrowing, unless there is some great increase in the price of our products. I do not blame the Government for the fall in the price of products. I cannot say they are to blame for the depression, as some honourable members say they are. But they themselves used the same weapons against their opponents; and I think it is always wrong to blame a Government for the fall in price of our staple products. And when there is this fall in process the revenue must necessarily fall, so that I am not blaming the Government for that. But I say that with this fall in the prices of our products the surplus of £250,000 at the beginning of this year will be reduced to £100,000, even if things go well; and if you do not have a surplus of something like a quarter of a million of money at the end of the year to transfer to the Public Works Fund the result will be that you must have more borrowing or additional taxation, and it seems to me that, from the way things are going, you may have to have both. This House has not been cautious, prudent, or self-reliant, nor has it been a non-borrowing House, and in that respect it has thrown the pledges given to the constituents to the winds. I say the Ministers themselves declared their policy was to be a self-reliant and a non-borrowing policy. Sir, the whole of that has been abandoned; and what is their policy to be? Is it to be one of borrowing or not? They are face to face with that financial question, which they cannot shirk. The House has declined to look to the future, but they have gone on borrowing, and have imposed additional taxation on the people. It is all very well to talk about roads and bridges, but let me apply the illustration of the honourable member. I tell him that it is better to remain a small colony, and that its development should be slow, than that we should be a burdened colony with our people ground down by debt and heavy taxation, with all the things that follow in its train. I shall say no more on that, Sir, because I am going to keep within my quarter of an hour, to show that, even in criticizing an Appropriation Bill, speech can be limited to that time. Sir, I give the Premier credit for the Bills he has brought down, in the manner they were drafted; but the Government would not accept amendments. They did not seem to understand the Bills they brought down. There was amongst Ministers a sort of trepidation and hesitancy in accepting the slightest verbal alteration. They seemed to think it was simply for them to say they were against the amendment and their party was to vote against it. Towards the end of the session, I grant, a disposition on the part of members to exercise a little independence was displayed. The Premier said at the beginning of the session he would show them how to conduct the business: they were not going to allow themselves to put up with defeat; he was not going to stand that. But that was at the beginning of the session, when he was boastful. If honourable members refer to Hansard they will see the passage I refer to. He referred to what occurred in 1885. He was not going to stand any of his policy measures being kicked about. Sir, a greater indignity has been put on him than I have ever seen put on any Ministry. Had I been in the House I should have voted with him out of courtesy, reserving my right to oppose the Bill at a later stage, but, unfortunately, I was away when the bell was rung for the division. This was on one of the policy measures of his Budget, and he was not even allowed to introduce the Bill providing for a coal bonus. No such indignity was ever before put upon any Ministry that I have ever heard of. He was not even allowed to get the introduction of his Bill. It is true this came at a later stage of the session, when members had risen to some idea of their responsibility. If the Bill had been introduced at the beginning of the session, or even when four weeks or six weeks or ten weeks of the session had elapsed, it would have been impossible. But the country has been aroused by the action of this House, and the constituencies, being aroused, have demanded some little independence from their representatives. Then, again, was not the Midland Railway Bill a policy measure?

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—You kicked it out.

Sir R. STOUT.—I kicked it out? Sir, I am only giving that as an illustration to show that, although the Premier was so boastful he was not going to allow any of his policy measures to be touched, we saw that measure in connection with the Midland Railway thrown out by a large majority. He is not going to rule as he pleases again next session, I venture to assert that, whether I am here or not; and honourable members will use more independence, and the Ministry will have to put up with more defeats. And now my time is nearly up, though I have not yet been my quarter of an hour. Still, I do not wish to detain the House. I wish to say one word more, and that is with regard to dealing with our roads. I admit roads must be made to open lands for settlement. I say that is absolutely necessary, and that is the sort of thing the Government ought to do in a young country, and they will have to make the lands pay for the making of those roads. But I say that this borrowing for the making of roads, which are to be a sort of benefaction to this district or a benefaction to please the members of a constituency, is a discredit to Parliament. It has been done this session. I know roads myself that appear in the public-works appropriation estimates, and which do not open up any land for settlement at all. They are not within twenty miles of Crown lands; they do not come within the Crown-lands demesne. They are simply benefactions given to the districts some of them are passing through—counties which could keep up their roads and bridges without any aid from the Central Government if they would only carry out their own taxing-powers. I ask honourable members in this House, where is all this to end? Where does this policy lead you? How can the colony stand it? I venture, moreover, to say that outside one or two Ministers, except the roads in their own district or the adjoining district, the members of this House are entirely ignorant whether the vote should be given or not, and that explains why the estimates have not been touched. It simply means this: that it is impossible for the House to be a board of works to vote money for roads. They cannot do it, and I say our local government is an absolute failure if this House is to be called upon to be the body to dispense money for public roads. And I say that is the reform that will have to be taken up next year. We must have our local government recast, and, so far as the public-works estimates are concerned, we must not have the General Government performing local-government functions in providing for roads and bridges. If we do, our finance is doomed, our taxation will increase, our loans will be increased, and there will be no end to them. This is the main subject that should be attended to, and, so far as the presenting of Bills of all sorts and colours and shapes is concerned, it is not what the country at present requires. We want to have our political machinery sorted and our social life looked after; and, while our economic life, so to speak, should not be neglected, that is not all in all. We cannot live on loans, we cannot thrive on loans, and the Government that attempts to go on as we are going, and to raise loans in aid of this, that, and the other, is bound to end in failure; it may not be the first year, it may not be the second year, but it must be so in the long-run. I regret that I have taken up so much time, and I thank the House for its patience.

Sir R. Stout

Mr. SEDDON.—Mr. Speaker, the other evening I advised that we should all part good friends—that we might perhaps never all meet here again in this House. I said that we had, I hoped, though from different standpoints, endeavoured to put before our fellow-members that which we believed to be in the interests of the country. So, Sir, I shall follow the example shown so far in this debate. I will say the speech delivered by the last speaker was the most moderate he has made during the session; and had the honourable member been as moderate in his remarks during the session the business of the country and the House would have proceeded much better. But let me inform the honourable member that there was no self-laudation so far as my colleague was concerned. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) was not here when the leader of the Opposition made his speech. He was, as it was his part to do, making a party speech,—holding up that, with the small following he had,—few in number,—they had, under considerable difficulty, defended the position, and he claimed that most of the good done during the session was achieved by his party. Very well; I think under the circumstances I and my colleague are quite justified in putting the other side of the question. I say the legislation we have passed and the administration we have had in the colony for the last three or four years have been both under considerable difficulties with which the colony has laboured; and had it not been for that legislation and administration we should have had New Zealand in the same sad plight as the other colonies. And the credit for keeping New Zealand clear of what has happened in the other colonies is due to the Liberal party, and to the last and present Governments. It is to the Liberal party that the credit is mainly due, and to those in this colony who have supported them,—to the Liberal Press of the colony, which, despite the attempts of the Opposition Press to destroy our credit, has upheld the party. I say every credit is due to the Liberal party, who have been true to the people and to themselves. Then, the honourable gentleman told us I had finished the session—and he touched it very lightly—just as I had begun it. He said the law had been violated. The honourable member knows full well that there was no violation of the law, there was not even an evasion of the law, in the case he was alluding to. He knows full well that the party were not forced. There was no violation of the law; neither was there an evasion of the law. The law has not been broken either in letter or in spirit. I have before challenged and I again challenge honourable members, or any man in the House or the country, to prove that there was a violation of either the letter or the spirit of the law, or an evasion of the law. I have said, if we were wrong, it would not make it better to quote what has been done previously; but it is a well-known fact we have had in the past the leader of the Opposition on the Opposition benches and next day present on the Supreme Court bench, having been appointed to be a Judge. Then, I say, if the legal profession are exempt, if they can be appointed to lucrative positions, if they can accept fees to any amount without bringing themselves under the Disqualification Act, and this can be done legally, compare it with what we have said and done in respect to the matter referred to. We said, "Wait until the law is vindicated." And when the time allowed by law will permit the appointment to be given, why should one who has done good service to the country, who has made sacrifices to the country, be debarred under such circumstances? I say there was not an evasion of the law either in letter or in spirit. And I say here now, if the same thing was to happen again, and I knew of the criticism that has taken place, I would do the same. I have nothing to regret, and I feel sure the party has nothing to regret. Then, the honourable gentleman asked this question: What had there been done to improve the social position of the people? I might put a question to the honourable gentleman. He has been here in the House, and, if the Government were not promoting such legislation as he believed was necessary for the social salvation of the people and the country, why has he not promoted it? The only thing the honourable member has done, and that he can put his finger on this session, is that he has come forward and made a speech in favour of the amending of our licensing-laws.

Sir R. STOUT.—I did not.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable gentleman made a speech to-night on the subject. But what did he do? If I am correctly informed, he promoted a select committee of those favourable to the temperance cause.

Sir R. STOUT.—I never did.

Mr. SEDDON.—All I know is that I have seen the invitation-cards sent to certain members. A card was shown to me on which a certain member was invited to attend some meeting for the purpose.

Sir R. STOUT.—It was not sent by me.

Mr. SEDDON.—No, not by you; but there was a committee formed, and I think the honourable gentleman was chairman of this inner-circle temperance committee. We had a certain Bill before the committee, and that Bill was to be amended not by a Select Committee appointed by the House, nor by the Statutes Revision Committee, but by a self-appointed committee whose members were entirely one-sided—those who favoured the temperance cause—those who would go to extremes to promote this cause. I say, therefore, the responsibility of the measure meeting with the objections it met with in the House is to a great extent with them. The objections it met with arose from the fact that a very large number of members resented this mode of dealing with a Bill that was before the House. I have not finished on this point. What next.

happened? When the Bill came before the House, what appeared on the Order Paper? Amendments—many of them of a technical character; but they were so numerous that very many members who took the other side of the question were afraid; they saw this vast number of amendments, numbering over one hundred, on the Order Paper, and it almost frightened them. Of course, they scarcely understood the nature of these amendments, and, with just cause, they were afraid; and we know the result. I am not responsible for that. Now, shall I say who was responsible for a considerable amount of the delay that took place with regard to the Licensing Bill?

An Hon. MEMBER.—The Government Whip.

Mr. SEDDON.—No; in the first place it was the senior member for Wellington City.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. SEDDON.—I will prove it. I proposed to remit this Bill to the Statutes Revision Committee, and the senior member for Wellington City objected to my doing so. Now, if this Bill had gone to that Committee, two-thirds—nay, three-fourths—of the technical amendments that were made and appeared on the Order Paper, and which frightened members so much, would have been made by the Statutes Revision Committee, and the terror struck into the very soul of the senior Whip would never have been caused at all. I say, if the Licensing Bill had been referred to the Statutes Revision Committee, as I proposed to the House, I believe a great many of these amendments—in fact, three-fourths of those proposed by this Committee—would have been made by the Statutes Revision Committee, the Bill would have come down in the ordinary way, and it would have proceeded further. But I was thwarted in my original intention, and I am not responsible for the result.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why did you not put it to the vote?

Mr. SEDDON.—I had to take exception to so many things in connection with the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) during the session that when he objected in respect to this matter, knowing the great and sincere interest he took in the movement, I did not like to force the matter in opposition to the wishes of the honourable gentleman. I gave way to him because I knew he was in earnest, and desirous of getting the Bill passed. I am sorry now that I did so, because if I had taken my own way and put the Bill before the Statutes Revision Committee there would have been only three or four principal amendments in the policy principle of the Bill, and they would have been fought out in a couple of nights, and the Bill would have been now on the statute-book. Now, I will ask the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), has he not had the same liberties every other honourable member had here during the session in promoting the legislation necessary for the social well-being of the people?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—I say he has. Can he show me, among the rejected Bills that could not come on, any that he has brought forward to promote the social well-being of the people? All the honourable gentleman has brought forward may be summed up in closing "tote" shops and preventing boys from investing on the totalisator. That is the whole amount of the legislation promoted this session by the honourable gentleman for the amelioration and improvement of the social condition of the people of this country. I do not think, myself, they require much amelioration if all that he can bring forward or say is necessary for them is the shutting-up of "tote" shops, or preventing youths from having a few shillings on the totalisator. That, at all events, is his record for the session.

Mr. Seddon

Sir R. STOUT.—Oh, no, it is not.

Mr. SEDDON.—I had forgotten for the moment that the honourable gentleman brought in a Middle District University Bill. But what was the use of bringing in a dummy Bill saying there shall be a university, unless the means of establishing or maintaining it were also provided?

Sir R. STOUT.—I had no power to do so.

9.0. Mr. SEDDON.—I think the honourable gentleman stands self-convicted in that respect. Now, coming back to the statement made that nothing had been done to improve the social condition of the people: Surely the honourable member will admit that there was something done, seeing this session we have restored the railways to the people of this country. That is a struggle which has lasted for many years, and the honourable gentleman ought to give the Liberal party credit for having succeeded at last.

Sir R. STOUT.—Some of the Liberal party voted in 1887 for divesting the Government of the control of the railways, and some of your colleagues.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Every one of them.

Mr. SEDDON.—I certainly did not. If I were to go into ancient history—I do not intend to do so on this occasion—I might recall to honourable members many things which the honourable gentleman has done which, viewed in the light of to-day, could not be said to be in the interests of the Liberal party. He told us that we had done something as regards the artisans, because we had passed the labour legislation, but that we had done nothing for the labouring-classes. On the contrary, I claim that with the means at our disposal a great deal has been done for the labouring-men. But how was it possible to provide work for the people unless we had the means? I say that the labourers of this colony have gone through a winter such as I hope they may never experience again. I hope we may never have here again the same condition of affairs which we have had during the past winter. And it behoves me, in my place, before Parliament prorogues, to say this: that the toilers of New Zealand, both in the towns and in the country, deserve every credit. Many of them have had to come to the Government, and have had to ask the State to provide work for them. Employment has been provided for them on reproductive works; but there are many who have suffered silently and patiently, who have not paraded their suffering or distress before their fellows, or even to the Government. Honourable members should remember that we had our lands which required to be settled upon, and that our people were willing to go upon them; but if you say that you are to put people in the bush without a road or a track to get to the land, or that no help is to be given to them by way of work or assistance from the State, I say, practically, you can never get the country settled unless the Government takes some action. Under these circumstances, I say we have done a great deal for the labourers by promoting legislation which will tend to bring about settlement, and place people upon the land. I do not want to see hundreds of men, sometimes, in the summer season, working in the country, and making but little perhaps over and above that which they require for their immediate wants. I want to have that stopped effectually, and the only way to do that is to employ these people in making roads into the bush, and in clearing the bush, and thus insure their settling ultimately on the land. Thus you will have their wives and families settled there. It is only in that way that you will make an end of the "unemployed" difficulty. The honourable member told us that the Standing Orders had proved a perfect curse. I must say at once that the honourable member is entirely wrong in that respect. I say that the Standing Orders, as was proved in the debate on the Financial Statement and in other debates on Bills, are an improvement upon the old Standing Orders. That they are still defective I admit, but the defects can be much more easily remedied now than they could be before. Government after Government and Parliament after Parliament has attempted to improve the Standing Orders; but the Liberal party this session is the only party that has successfully coped with the difficulty. The honourable member referred to the licensing question. I should have thought we had heard the last of clause 21 of the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Act. Then, the honourable member, in the next breath, told the House that he regretted very much that the Government would not permit amendments to be made in the Government Bills. I have never yet told honourable members, because I am not sure of it, but there is a doubt in my mind whether, when clause 21 of the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Bill was in Committee, a member of the legal profession did not move the insertion of certain words, and I believe it was the insertion of those very words which gave the clause its retrospective action; but, not being able to obtain the necessary proof of this, I have taken the responsibility right through. But I say here, as for knowing that there was anything wrong or corrupt in respect to that clause, I most positively again assert, as I stated at the commencement of the session, I did not know it. The honourable member said, "Why not have a Committee of inquiry?" To show the fallacy of such a contention I might refer to his own condemnation of Committee investigations. Let me now show how these amendments are sometimes made in Bills. When the Native Land Court Bill was under consideration a certain honourable member asked me if I would admit a certain amendment. He informed me that the amendment was in accordance with the law as it previously existed. I said, Yes. During the discussion another honourable member came to me and said, "Here is a clause. What about Mr. Bell's clause?" I understood him to say, "This is Mr. Bell's clause." Two clauses were inserted in the Bill. But after the Bill was agreed to Mr. Bell said to me, "That is not my clause." I went to Mr. Button, who gave me the clause, and I said, "Where did you get that clause from?" and he said, "I believe I got it from Mr. Mitchelson." On being appealed to Mr. Mitchelson denied the soft impeachment. The clause was not Mr. Bell's clause. Having a great deal of business on hand, those two clauses were accepted by me. Next session some one may get up and move for a Committee of inquiry as to how one of these clauses got into the Bill. If the Government refused to grant the request in regard to amendments it might then be said that there was something wrong behind it. If we are to grant inquiries into how certain clauses have been introduced into Bills I say no Government is safe. I say that to-morrow I should refuse an inquiry into such circumstances. Then, as regards the black list which the honourable member said existed in relation to the Railway Commissioners. The honourable member has suggested that the Government should make inquiries from the Railway Commissioners. I asked the Commissioners to meet me. They did so, and I took the honourable member's speech, and what may be termed the charges in that speech, and I had from each of the Commissioners a decided and emphatic denial of what was stated by the honourable member. I stated in the House that the charges should assume some definite shape before I asked the House to set up a Committee of inquiry. In view of the denials of the Commissioners, I say it would have been casting an indignity upon them to set up a Committee of inquiry. The honourable member did not say that the statements were absolutely correct—he did not say that he had proof that the statements were correct. To set up a Committee, in view of what I have stated, would have been casting a grave reflection on the Commissioners which the circumstances did not warrant. That is why I refused. I believe the colony and the House will support me in saying I was not justified in granting that inquiry. If the same thing were to occur again, the same course would be followed. If I wanted anything to support me in the position which we took up on this point in refusing to appoint a Select Committee to inquire and report, I need only refer to the position which the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) took up in reference to the Pomahaka inquiry. The honourable member himself condemned the proceedings; he condemned the Committee; he said the Committee was such that it would only be guided by party motives. I say, under these circumstances, to have dragged the Commissioners before a Committee on the statement made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) would have been, to my mind, a grave mistake, and one worthy of censure. I simply repeat that if the same thing occurred again the Government would take the same course. Now, the honourable member cast a very grave reflection upon the people when he said that their representatives here in Parliament assembled care not for heaping up liabilities upon the country and upon the people. Sir, I undertake to say that there should be good grounds before such a reflection is made. I say the men who are here representing their fellows have weighed carefully the proposals that have been made. It is true we may be increasing the liabilities; but the increased amount to be paid in respect of the moneys raised will be paid by the persons receiving the advances, and the taxpayers generally will not be called upon to pay anything extra whatever. If you take to-day the indebtedness per head of the population of New Zealand as compared with the indebtedness per head when we took office, it is nearly £3 per head less than when we took office.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No, no.

Mr. SEDDON.—Well, the honourable member may laugh; but I say, if they will look at the Statement, they will find that is correct. Then, the honourable member for Hawke's Bay forgot this fact. He told us this afternoon that when the present Government took office we found the country was prosperous, and that, comparing the condition of the people then and the condition of the people now, they were in a much better position than they are now. Sir, the honourable member simply cannot deny the fact that during the three years the Atkinson Government—of which he was a member—was in office, over fourteen thousand people left New Zealand.

Captain RUSSELL.—When you took office they were coming back again.

Mr. SEDDON.—Certainly not. The only thing that brought them back was the fact that the honourable gentleman and the Conservative Government were hurled from office—that the Continuous Ministry, which had misgoverned the country, was defeated. The moment they knew there was a Liberal Government on the benches—independent men, determined to do justice to all classes and conditions—those who had lost heart and had left came back to their country.

Dr. NEWMAN.—They are going away now.

Mr. SEDDON.—There is a special reason that is taking them away at the present time, and I believe it would take away my honourable friend the member for Wellington Suburbs. I should not be surprised that, supposing somewhere about the Eketahuna gorges there was gold found in such quantities as it is being found in Coolgardie, we should find my little friend with a swag on his back going to the Eketahuna Coolgardie. I say that there are two things at the present time that account for people leaving the colony. One is the very cheap fares. A number of people are going simply for pleasure-trips: in fact, they can live more cheaply on the steamer than they can ashore. Then, there are large numbers who are going to Coolgardie, and nothing will stop them. The only thing we can do is this: We know that when people begin to feel uneasy it does not ease them when they find a number of men out of work, or when they find there is very little industry in the country, or very little money available in the country. These are matters which cause people to be on the move. Well, I say, by the present Government policy—a progressive policy, which the House has indorsed this session—we shall, by placing people on the land, and by putting these men to work upon reproductive works—on road-making and in the construction of railways—be bound to stop the exodus; and the sooner it is stopped the better for all concerned. Sir, it is said that nothing has been done for the labouring-men. I say that the system of co-operative works has been a blessing to labouring-men, and I am sorry we have not had more means, so as to be able to find more work for the men upon this system. I say that the workers from one end of the country to the other deserve very great credit. They have every confidence in the Government; they know who are their true friends. There have been very few complaints. Go from one end of the colony to the other, where the men are working, and ask them what they think of the Government, ask them what they think of the party here in power, and they will tell you they have been treated fairly; and I say we have the confidence of the toilers of the country. I tell the honourable member, too, that there are no more intelligent people in the country than the very same class of men. You will get very much more intelligence from them, they will tell you more of the politics of the country and of the condition of the country in any aspect you like to name than will the class of men that have no opportunities of mixing with their fellows, or of reading current literature, and who are found on the cattle-ranches. Of course, that is only natural, for they are more in the towns, and more in touch with other people and with passing events than those living in the scattered districts; and the result is, they become self-educated. I say, so long as any Government has the good wishes of the people in any country you will find that Government is doing its duty. That is my experience. Whenever any Government fails to have the confidence of the masses, then, I say, that Government is simply governing in the interests of a select few and to the detriment of the people generally. Sir, the honourable member for Wellington City concluded by saying that he would prefer to have New Zealand a small colony. When I heard that expression I wondered to myself whether or not I had heard him aright. Is it to be said that we are not to advance at all—that our population is not to increase? Is it to be said that as our sturdy young sons and daughters grow up they are to leave the home of their birth? Are we to admit there is to be no natural expansion? Would it be preferable that New Zealand should remain a small colony, and that we should not advance? Why, Sir, that is the saying of an old Tory, of an obsolete politician, and not a remark we should expect from a statesman—one who has held a very high position, a position such as the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) has held in this country. I say, Away with such nonsense! We cannot suffer such a state of things to exist. I say that when a young colony stands still it recedes. We must advance, our population must go on increasing, and, as our population increases, as we settle our population upon the land, as our exports increase, so will our people come to be more contented, more prosperous, and more happy. But to stand still—to keep this colony just for a select few—I say that is what the “Continuous party” in this country almost brought about. I say the day for that has gone by. We cannot stand still, we must progress, we must have the means to bring about progress, and we must work for that means as we are doing at the present time by giving cheap money to settlers, and in doing this we are doing what is right. It was claimed some time since that by our proposals we should lower the rate of interest. I say it has been lowered, and I say also that by this means money will become available for industries, money will become available for promoting settlement, money will become available for commerce; and I say that, owing to the want of necessary and legitimate advances, for months past our commerce was stifled, and that that was the reason for the falling-off in the Customs revenue. Merchants did not know what to do regarding orders. But now I simply say this: We have turned the corner. What we want to do is to put heart into the people. We should tell them that what we have worked for, and what Parliament has granted, has been for the purpose of promoting settlement, so as to make the country progress, so that reproductive work should be found for the toilers, and at the same time that they should be carving homes for themselves in the bush, so that they may become permanent settlers, never again to be amongst the unemployed, or have to go to the State to find them work. They will look back with gratitude to this progressive policy which has been inaugurated by the Government, supported by the people, and which we have carried against an opposition such as no Government ever previously experienced. The work of the session has been such as will lead to the promotion of the well-being of the people. I do not now desire to prolong the debate; but let any member of the House take the Governor's Speech, and glance through it, and, with one exception, he will find that everything the Government said they intended to propose is now law. Then, let him take the Financial Statement, and I think, with two exceptions, every Bill there referred to has been passed. No Government ever brought forward a policy such as we have brought forward and have been so successful in passing. Speaking for the Government, we do not claim the whole credit ourselves; we simply have done our part. I give the credit to those who have so nobly stood by the Government in our difficulties, and who have assisted in passing these measures into law. Then, we were twitted with the Government having suffered a defeat because we were not allowed to introduce a Bill providing for the bounty on coal. Sir, two months ago a debate took place in the House, and the Government were practically told that a large majority of the members of the House did not favour that proposal. But the Colonial Treasurer said that, despite that, the matter would be brought forward. That Bill was brought forward at the same time as the Beet-root Sugar Bill, which was also mentioned in our programme. If we had not brought this Bill forward, what would have been said? We should have been criticized as having mentioned it in the Financial Statement, but it would be said we were afraid to bring it before the House. Well, Sir, we are a Government that are not afraid. We discuss very carefully what we believe to be to the interest of the people, and then we promote it. The rejection of that Bill on its introduction was a pure accident. If the Government had explained it, or had had the opportunity of explaining it, there would have been a different result. Those members who are found generally supporting the Government did not know for the moment that it might be considered as it was considered by the honourable member for Wellington City to-night. And if the Treasurer had had the opportunity of explaining the position the Government took up in respect to the matter, the Government would not have been refused leave to introduce the Bill. Had it been explained I feel satisfied it would have been dealt with as the Beet-root Sugar Bill was dealt with. That was introduced in the same way, but with an explanation given by the Colonial Treasurer, and it was carried by, I think, forty-seven to eleven. I know that members voted on the Coal Bonus Bill not knowing that it might be taken that by so doing they were slighting the Government, and I may say that more than one gentleman expressed regret for not having supported the Government. The Government could, if it had so desired, have brought the matter forward again, and I am satisfied myself that there was no slight intended. It was an accident, and that was proved by the voting on the very next Government Bill which was brought forward, which, when challenged, on going to a division, was carried by forty-six to fifteen. I say that whenever the Government have asked their party to pass any party measure the party has stood loyally by them. We did not make the coal bonus a party question; but the Opposition have never missed an opportunity to vote against the Government, and they have gone unanimously into the Governmental lobby with those of the Government supporters who for the time being were not prepared to give their support to the Ministry. But there have been other things behind, and I will tell the House what happened. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) coupled with this the Midland Railway Bill, because during the session the Government have had to ask the House to indorse their policy embodied in the Advances to Settlers Bill, and in the other measures under which we are proposing to raise three-quarters of a million for the purchase of private and Native lands and for the roading of Government lands. The honourable member, I say, knows very well what caused this, but he has never missed an opportunity to point out that already there were certain liabilities incurred this session—he called it loans and borrowing; and it was urged that in addition to this there was to be a further burden in the shape of the £618,000 for the Midland Railway. The honourable gentleman said that was borrowing to a large extent, and that militated against the Midland Railway; but that was not wholly what militated against that measure, for there is no disguising the fact that there are a large number of the members of this House who are determined that the North Island Main Trunk Railway shall be completed, the Manawatu Railway purchased, and the Otago Central completed, and this combination, I say, went together, and that was chiefly why the Midland Railway Bill was rejected. That Bill was not made a party measure, as the Government refused to make it one, because we could not be justified in making it a party question. The honourable gentleman has said so. Very well, that being the case, and the passing of the Bill not having been made a party question, I do not think it comes with very good grace now for the honourable gentleman to tell the Government that we were defeated, simply because the House this session refused to pass the second reading of the Midland Railway Bill. The Midland Railway Bill, I say, ought to have been passed, and I say that those honourable members who voted against it have not done themselves justice, and have not shown a due sense of the responsibility which must devolve upon them in reference to this matter. I say it would have been much better for those who were against borrowing, and who desired to see the colony relieved from responsibility in this matter, if they had not rejected the Bill, for, in my opinion, even though we succeed, it will cost the colony a considerable sum of money to be spent in litigation. Of that I am quite positive; and in the meantime we shall have five million acres of land locked up from settlement, without the slightest prospect of being opened, and settlement will be retarded. I think I have now met point by point the arguments used by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), and in so doing I hope I have not made use of any unkind words. I think I have not, nor did I wish to do so. I may say that I have been here now for something like 'eighteen or nineteen sessions, and have seen many Appropriation Bills during that time, but I do not agree with what the honourable member said yesterday—that it was the general custom for the leader of the Opposition to make a speech, and to be followed only by the Colonial Treasurer or other Minister. I have known the debate on the Appropriation Bill to occupy a whole day, and to be an acrimonious debate; but on this occasion there is nothing but good-will and good-feeling. Nothing, so far, has been said during the debate that will tend to create any ill-feeling. The Government have honestly and conscientiously tried to do their duty to the country and the people, and I believe the result of our efforts will prove beneficial; and, whilst there are many here who may differ as to what has been done by the majority, they should now accept the position and tell the people to take heart. I see already the silver lining to the cloud; the prices of most of our staple products are going up, and our people are rapidly going upon our lands, and our lands are being rapidly opened up and roaded. Seeing that this is the case, let us not be cast down, and, though we may not altogether have done what we wished, at all events what we have done has been done conscientiously and in the true interests of the colony.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. Seddon

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Sir, the honourable gentleman has said that this was the last speech he would make in the House during the present session, and I think it would have been well for the honourable gentleman if he had not delivered it, for a more ineffective speech I have seldom heard delivered from the Government benches. Is it that the defeats and slights he has suffered during the last few days at the hands of his own followers indicate to him what is awaiting him in the country,—that no more during the recess will the honourable gentleman have banquet after banquet, laudation after laudation,—and tell him, in words unmistakable, that he is utterly unworthy of a majority never before at the command of any Premier in the history of the colony? The honourable gentleman commenced very badly, and so, I predict, will he end, for he employed his time during the elections in corrupting the constituencies. Up and down the country he went, using the most unworthy means to influence the elections up to the polling-day. He let it be understood that the polling-day would be on or about a certain date, and then anticipated that date by about a fortnight to suit his own friends. In the case of the Tuapeka, he endeavoured to influence the election in the same way by hurrying on the polling-day, so that the candidate opposed to the Government was placed at a disadvantage. What did he do at the general election in the case of the Native Minister, Mr. Carroll? Instead of following the usual practice of holding the election for the Native members prior to the general election, he fixed a day so that in case Mr. Carroll happened to be defeated for the Waiapu seat he would still have a chance of contesting a Native electorate. Then, the honourable gentleman has the assurance to tell this House that there are few unemployed in the country, though during this winter the miseries of the unemployed under this great Liberal Government have been greater than during the term of office of any previous Government. I well remember the attitude of the honourable gentleman hurling denunciations at the Atkinson Government because the population was leaving the colony, and assurances that when his party came into office we should very soon have a change in the state of affairs. Sir, the honourable gentleman and his Government have to a large extent created the "unemployed" difficulty by destroying the confidence of the industrial classes in the Government and colony.

AN HON. MEMBER.—I beg to call attention to the state of the House.

MR. BUCHANAN.—I notice the discreditable tactics of the Premier. He has asked his followers to walk out of the House.

MR. SEDDON.—I called attention to the state of the House.

MR. BUCHANAN.—I was going on to say that the honourable gentleman could not deny—I am sorry to see that he is still asking his followers to walk out of the House.

MR. SEDDON.—I assure the honourable gentleman that I have done nothing of the kind. What I did was to draw attention to the state of the House.

MR. BUCHANAN.—I am bound by the rules of the House to accept the honourable gentleman's statement.

MR. E. M. SMITH.—That is the truth.

MR. BUCHANAN.—I was going on to say that the Government have destroyed confidence in the colony, destroyed the wages fund, and they have now had to abandon their non-borrowing election pledges, and the new era of borrowing which they have now inaugurated will inevitably be followed by greatly-increased taxation. The honourable gentleman and his Government were asked again and again during the session whether they intended further taxation for protective purposes, and they answered these questions evasively; but I think this House is justified in assuming that next session we shall have Bills brought in to impose increased taxation upon the taxpayers of the colony. This is what the honourable gentleman's Government is rapidly bringing the colony to, and little wonder is it that the population of New Zealand is leaving the colony for Australia, despite the distress which we know to be prevalent there. In 1887-88, when the honourable gentleman denounced the Atkinson Government for allowing the population of the colony to go away, millions of money, borrowed publicly and privately, were being expended in the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, as is well known, lost thousands of its population. But what attraction exists in the Australian Colonies at the present moment? None whatever. They have there large numbers of unemployed, but still the population of New Zealand is leaving her shores. Is this the prosperity predicted from the Liberal measures of his Government when he came into office? It is possible that we might have a fictitious prosperity from the honourable gentleman's borrowing proposals, but it will not last very long. The inevitable taxation will have to be imposed, and, as stated by the leader of the Opposition, those on this side of the House will have to step in, as they did in 1879, when they had to restore the confidence destroyed by the Government of which the honourable gentleman was a follower in that year.

MR. SEDDON.—By raising a big loan.

MR. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman talks about big loans! Can he, a thick-and-thin supporter of the Stout-Vogel and Grey Governments, cast a stone at this side of the House? Why, the honourable gentleman, after that, should have audacity enough to face anything. I am sorry the Minister of Labour has left his seat, as I should like to compliment him upon a speech so much in contrast, for its moderation in tone, with that given by the Premier. He said it was a pleasure to be run through by so pleasant a swordsman as the leader of the Opposition. Sir, the Minister of Labour is hastening fast to his own political funeral, and it would be a mercy to send him there as painlessly as possible. He referred to the Pomahaka purchase, and asserted that the leader of the Opposition would not have been so severe upon it had he not forgotten the Polhill Gully transaction. I remember well the whole of the features of the Polhill Gully purchase, and I say at once that the honourable member for Hawke's Bay had nothing whatever to be ashamed of in that. Well would it have been for the colony's interest if they had on all occasions been guarded as they were in the Polhill Gully purchase. Then, we had a great deal from the Premier as to the railways and the "black list." Why, Sir, there never has been such a scandal connected with the railways for years past. When challenged to set up a Committee of inquiry on the "black list," he told us he had questioned the Railway Commissioners, and that they absolutely denied all the charges of the honourable member for Wellington City. Sir, what would the honourable gentleman's attitude have been if the action of the former Railway Commissioners had been in question? Would he have accepted their denial?

MR. SEDDON.—Yes.

MR. BUCHANAN.—He would! after the charges of corruption he had made against those gentlemen, including the present Chairman.

MR. SEDDON.—No.

MR. BUCHANAN.—Charges of misconduct, charges of corruption, charges of the most damaging character, which he never had the grace to withdraw. Why, Sir, we should have had a Royal Commission appointed instantly, and every power brought to bear to hound them down if he possibly could. But now we have the Commissioners appointed by the honourable gentleman himself, and, despite the speeffic charges of the honourable member for Wellington City, he has absolutely refused to grant a Commission of inquiry to see that justice was done to railway officers on the one hand and to the Commissioners on the other. The honourable gentleman has never been able to give one sound reason for his refusal to grant a Commission, and the public can only come to the conclusion that the charges of the honourable member for Wellington City are substantially true, and that the men who were true and loyal to the colony have now been hounded down at the instance of the men who were traitors to the service. What will be the case when the honourable gentleman gets into power on the 1st of January? Creatures of his own will be pitchforked into the service in all directions, and its independence destroyed to a very large extent. Then, Sir, as to the finance of the Government: We had a surplus last year which enabled them to place £250,000 to the credit of the Public Works Fund; but, taking the last Financial Statement delivered by the honourable gentleman opposite, where do we find any hope of a surplus at the end of the current financial year? We are not only losing our population, but our Customs and railway revenues are going down, and, instead of being able to carry on public works out of the surplus of the Consolidated Fund, we have commenced a profligate era of borrowing. Then, take the conduct of the Government regarding questions of large public policy. The honourable member for Wellington City introduced and passed an important measure called the Middle District University College Bill; and, instead of willingly handing over a disused Government residence as a site, they opposed it in every way possible. In contrast to this, what do we find them doing for their supporters? We had a spectacle like the Lake Forsyth Drainage Bill being fought through the House at six o'clock in the morning, after being in Committee all night. Then, we have a sum on the estimates for a wharf at Howick—a bare-faced robbery of the colony—and the bonus of £50,000 on the export of coal. Everything for Government supporters, and not a shilling for any constituency which is opposed to the Government. It has also become quite clear that no reliance can be placed on returns laid on the table. The Government put a return upon the table the other day purporting to show that in the three years ending on the 31st March, 1894, they had placed over six hundred more people upon the land than had been placed in the three years ending the 31st March, 1891. Then, if we turn to the Crown Lands Report—the annual official document furnished for the information of the House—we find the large surplus stated in the return laid lately on the table dwindling down to 371. What are we to say of figures such as these supplied by the present Government? We cannot rely upon any statements supplied to the House. Sir, at this late time of the session, and members being anxious to go, I have no wish to detain the House. I only wish to say that I feel satisfied that when we come to the close of next session, the present Government will be in a very different position from that which they occupy to-day; that the country will insist upon a complete change of the unfortunate policy which has been followed by those honourable gentlemen, and they will be succeeded by men having the interest of the colony at heart, and anxious to pursue a very different policy.

Mr. Buchanan

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I rather regret that I require at this late stage of the session to make some remarks upon a few very important questions which have been before the House this session. In order not to waste the time of Parliament, during the second readings of some measures I have refrained from speaking; and, as my actions have been misunderstood, I take this opportunity of making a few remarks. I also wish to refer to the history of the Licensing Bill in Committee. I exceedingly deprecate the tactics the Government are now following. Sir, they have instructed their followers to leave the chamber; they have given deliberate instructions to their followers to leave this chamber—let the Treasurer contradict it if he can—in order that they shall not hear the damaging arguments which we have to use.

Mr. WARD.—I deny that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Sir, the rules of Parliament compel me to accept the statement made by the Treasurer, but if it were made outside the House I should take a different course. The honourable gentleman's colleagues, of two and a half hours—between half-past seven and ten o'clock—have occupied two hours of that time, and have not the courage to occupy their position on the Ministerial benches to hear what this side might have to say. I am glad to see the Premier has returned to his place, because, whatever may be his faults, cowardice is not one of them. I am glad he is in his place to hear the statements which we have to make against him.

10.0. In reply to what the Minister of Labour has said, I say that the present Government came into office just when the Atkinson administration had brought this colony into a sound and secure financial position; and I assert that the surplus which enabled this Government to successfully carry on the public works of the colony is already coming to an end. And now, with regard to the taxation proposals, the Government are taking the taxation off the shoulders of those best able to bear it and placing it on those least able to bear it. The honourable gentleman talks about the toilers of this country, and about labour legislation. Sir, his and his Government's pernicious labour legislation has actually kept from and destroyed within this fine country the very employment that would give work to the workers. Take his Masters and Apprentices Bill, his Workmen's Wages Bill, and his Industrial Conciliation Bill: I ask, have these been in the interests of labour? I say they have had the effect of paralysing the arm of industry, and of preventing employment from coming to the workers. Who will start a new industry now? As we have been told already to-night, he gives them another tract. He gives them paper instead of bread: he gives them Bills. Then, there is the question of the Standing Orders. We have only succeeded in amending the Standing Orders in the direction of destroying wholesome debate in this House. They have encouraged wretched speeches, and have destroyed really good speeches. That has been the whole effect of the new Standing Orders, and as a result we have had the latest sittings and longest session on record. I do not think at this late hour of the night I need go into these failures any further. I simply say that the policy of the Government has been one of "shunt." They have shunted the Licensing Bill; and the Charitable Aid Bill, which the Hon. the Premier stated at New Plymouth was one of the most important things that could engage the attention of this Parliament. Then, there is the question of local government. Has he brought forward that in the manner it should be brought forward? I say, Sir, the only thing they have not shunted is the double taxation this year on the landholders of this country. It has been said truly that the Government did not intend this year to pass the Licensing Bill, and it is largely the question of the Licensing Bill that has brought me to my feet to-night. The question was one of the most important factors of the last general election, and it was due to that being unsettled that some of our ablest men were not returned to the House, and were driven from Parliament. In the Governor's Speech from the Throne use was made of that measure. It was said that ample opportunity would be given to the House to consider this measure. These are the words: "You will be afforded full opportunity of considering the liquor question"—and upon this question the Government graciously permitted their followers to vote according to their consciences;—and it went on to say that a Bill would be brought down to amend the Licensing Act, and so on. Sir, what was the full opportunity? But, before going into that, I would say that a small amending Act was all that was required,—the country had discovered by experience the flaws in the present Act,—and then when the country was in a more tranquil state the Government might have introduced a consolidation measure. What we wanted was a Bill with a few clauses dealing with the licensing law. There was the question of deleting the half proportion, the half having been used to defeat the spirit of the Act. There was the question of the fees going to the Government. There was also the question of whether the bare majority should carry prohibition in the different districts; and there was the question of the railway refreshment-rooms and clubs. Now, this Bill, containing 228 clauses and 150 amendments, which we were supposed to have an ample opportunity of discussing, was not brought down until twelve weeks after the session commenced, and was not in Committee until sixteen weeks after the session opened. And then what occurred? It was introduced at the end of the session, at the close of a weary week, at twenty minutes past one o'clock on a Saturday morning, in an exhausted House—the majority of us had been up every night that week until daylight; and a whole night was spent over that Bill, sitting until eleven o'clock on Saturday; and I venture to say no greater farce and no greater want of sincerity ever characterized a measure in this House than occurred on the first opportunity we were given of discussing that Bill. I will not follow it through beyond saying that another opportunity was given when clauses 11 and 12 were dealt with. In connection with clause 11, the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins) moved that paid advocates should not be eligible for a seat on the Licensing Committee, I opposed his motion, when some one asked, "Why should paid temperance advocates be excluded?" and there was a discussion in connection with that, and I wish to refer to what occurred in Committee in this connection. Now, with regard to paid advocates of either side, I am of opinion that they are not a very desirable class of men,—perhaps the honourable member (Mr. Collins) may not agree with that; and whilst there are, no doubt, a number of genuine men who are paid to advocate temperance, the fact still remains that the existence of paid advocates depends upon a state of unrest, not at all times of the healthiest, and they thus frequently menace the country. The real work of reform is done by those who never receive any fees or any gain for their work; and that is the case in the district I represent. Not one man in connection with the movement there received one farthing for his labours. Sir, in this colony there have been agitators in connection with labour or other movements, whose absolute existence has been dependent upon keeping up a fever of excitement, inducing men to leave situations, thereby depriving families of bread, and becoming a positive curse to the community. What did the paid labour agitators wish during that great strike? They did not wish to see that strike settled, any more than some members in the British Parliament wish to see certain questions settled, or the rabbit wants to see the rabbits exterminated. No; a state of unrest means their political existence. There are one or two other questions I wish to refer to, and one is in connection with the action of Parliament in closing Bellamy's. That, to my mind, is merely a move on the part of a number of persons to obtain kudos for a virtue they do not possess. It is true that a number of temperance reformers were in favour of it, because they thought it was a step in the right direction; but the fact remains that the supporters of the liquor interest were seen conspicuous in supporting the closing of Bellamy's, and it was because—according to the man in the street—the liquor interest in Wellington wanted to see Bellamy's closed in order that they might get a share of the trade of Bellamy's. I am now going to point out a curious anomaly between the vote taken on the closing of Bellamy's for all time and the vote that was taken a little time afterwards on the question that a half-holiday should be insisted upon in connection with all hotels—that the publichouses in Wellington, for instance, should close half a day in the week. And whom do we find voting on that? Why, the first man on the list who voted not to close publichouses for one half-day in the week was the man who moved to close Bellamy's—Major Harris. Then we have Mr. R. McKenzie, Mr. McLachlan, and several others who voted for the closing of Bellamy's, and yet voted against the closing of publichouses for half a day in the week. Now, in connection with the temperance movement there is only one logical position that can be taken up if we are going by majority rule. If that is to be accepted in the country, then you should pass a national prohibition Act, and not have sectional prohibition only. It seems to me a most peculiar thing that you should prohibit some little place at one end of New Zealand from selling liquor while you legalise the introduction of liquor into the country. That is an anomaly which requires some explanation. Now, that brings me to another point, in reference to my own district. I represent a prohibition district.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh! do you?

MR. T. MACKENZIE.—Yes; but you could not exist there, because there is no whiskey to be legally had. But, in spite of whiskey being barred there, would you believe it, whiskey is being sold in Clutha now! The effect is that we are making law-breakers, and I say that has a demoralising influence on the people of the district, and it is time that the people, if they are logical at all, and if majority-rule is to be accepted, should go in for absolute State prohibition if they are to have prohibition at all. Now, I have discovered that there are a number of temperance advocates of a class who, I believe, only wish to make a living by the movement—some of them, we know, change sides as things suit—and when I come to approach them on this question and ask them if they are prepared to have prohibition on that logical basis they are not prepared to do so. We had this session an opportunity given to every member to give his opinion upon whether it was right or not to have State prohibition; and how did that vote go? Only twelve members in this House voted that spirits should not be manufactured in New Zealand or imported into New Zealand. It was a Bill introduced by the honourable member for Egmont. This Bill provides for State prohibition. There are only three clauses—"Short Title," "Prohibition," and "Penalty." Now, of the members of the House who voted on that Bill we have a most peculiar mixture. We find, first of all, among the twelve men who voted that it should become law, some of the most genuine reformers, but we find a number of the temperance people uniting with the publican party for the purpose of defeating that Bill. We find Mr. Hall-Jones and Mr. Roderick McKenzie voting on the same side. We find Sir Robert Stout voting with Mr. Seddon, Mr. Earnshaw with Mr. Reeves, Mr. Collins with Mr. G. J. Smith, Mr. Pirani with Mr. Lawry; and several other honourable members who hold different views voted on the same side. I do not, Sir, wish to be unjust to some of those honourable gentlemen. I should like to point out that they maintained that this Bill did not contain the principle of referring the question to the people of New Zealand, and for that reason they opposed it. But that was a mere question of machinery, for I consulted with my honourable friend the member for Egmont, and he told me he was perfectly prepared in Committee to accept any amendment that would bring the principle of referring the matter to the people into effect. My honourable friend the member for Franklin, when he wanted to deprive us unfortunates who happen to dine at Bellamy's of an occasional glass of wine, was not consistent, for when he had a chance of practising a little self-denial by keeping liquor out of the colony altogether he would not have that on any consideration. That really looked too much like stopping the grog-supply. What I wish to do, Sir, is to expose cant and humbug, and to show the electors of the colony some of the types they have returned. Men have been elected to this House on the temperance ticket whose qualifications would not secure them election for the smallest Municipal Council in New Zealand—men who care no more for genuine temperance reform than my big toe does; but they cunningly saw in this movement an opportunity of gaining a seat, and seized it; and they have taken the places of men—high-minded men—who could not conscientiously bow the knee to every demand that was made, and this Parliament has in consequence been deprived of some of the best men that ever sat in any Legislature in the world. And we can ill spare these men. Therefore we say that the Government ought to have brought this matter in at an earlier period of the session, and to have had it settled, in order that we may not have large questions of State determined not on their merits, but on the influence they may have on some licensing election. We want to see this question settled, we want to see parties settled in this House, and until that is done there will be serious difficulties arising through the maladministration of the affairs of this colony. I met some time ago with a person who takes a prominent interest in these matters. He said, "I helped to put So-and-so in the House, as he is sound on the temperance question." I asked, "Are you satisfied with him?" He replied, "No, I am not, exactly; because he is too much like clay in the hand of the potter; the all-powerful and overwhelming Premier can do what he likes with him." And were is a great amount of truth in that, because, if it is not true, would certain members representing the country electorates in this House have voted as they did upon the land- and income-tax amendments which I moved a few nights ago? If they had the capacity to grasp the far-reaching influence of these questions, would they have voted as they did vote?

Mr. T. Mackenzie

I do not think so; and therefore I take the charitable view that they were incapable of understanding the questions, and, in their blindness, voted against those measures which were in the interests of farmers. Fancy members representing farming constituencies voting against partners in a farm having a right to individualise their interests, to secure their own exemption! Suppose two men took up a rough bush-farm together. Let them pay £2 10s. an acre, making a total of £2,500. Those members voted the other day that these two men were not to be allowed to divide their interests for the purpose of each securing his own exemption, such as he would be entitled to if he had taken up 500 acres; voting that there could be only one exemption in any circumstances, and as applied to valuation in this case there would be no exemption at all. But these same members were prepared to support the Government in carrying out taxation to permit persons to put their money into any other business and divide their interest, and claim exemption to the extent of £300 of income each before paying any taxation at all. Imagine farmers' representatives saying that money borrowed for the purpose of improving a farm should not be exempt from taxation; that a person improving his farm with borrowed money should not be put on the same footing as a person taking money from his own pocket for improvements! My motion aimed at placing them both on the same footing, free. Fancy a man representing agricultural interests and voting against my motion, which provided that two years' land-tax should not be collected on one year! Contemplate farmers' representatives opposing my motion to prevent yearly assessments being required from farmers, and many other questions to which time will not permit me to refer. The fact is, the majority of these men were returned solely on one question; and when great questions affecting the future interests of the colony are to be considered we find them incapable of dealing with them. I do not intend to delay the House much further, beyond saying that I look with the very gravest apprehension at some of the financial Bills introduced by the Treasurer, and, feeling that, I realise how much we now require the aid in Parliament of New Zealand's ablest men. I regret very much that we have gone in for this guarantee of two millions to the bank. I opposed it at the time. We had no right to pass that measure with the meagre information that we had to hand. I entirely disapprove of the Consols Bill. I am glad to think that such modifications have been carried in the Advances to Settlers Bill as to insure a degree of safety. There was not that degree of safety in the Bill as introduced by the Government. To me it is simply preposterous to say that a measure was in the interest of the small people of New Zealand when it permitted money to be advanced on property of the value of £10,000—that is to say, to the extent of £5,000 on town property. There is just one thing I should like to say in connection with the Pomahaka purchase: I would ask the Minister of Lands to consider the question of the charges made in connection with fixing the price of sections in that property. I believe that if the honourable gentleman goes into the matter carefully he will find that too high a rate has been fixed upon the sections. When the matter was before the Waste Lands Committee the Chief Surveyor failed to show why he required to charge £3 7s. 6d. as an average basis for rental all over the land. At any rate, I hope the Minister will look into the matter, and adjust it equitably. As my time is about up, and in consideration for the feelings of Ministers, I will not touch further on the weakness of their policy.

Mr. PIRANI.—I want to spend a couple of minutes, before the Treasurer replies, with my honourable friend the member for Clutha. He asked the reason why several of us opposed the honourable member for Egmont's Prohibition Bill and yet supported the proposal in the Licensing Bill to give the people power to have prohibition. The distinction is this: I, in common with other honourable members, object to prohibition by legislation, but I am in favour of prohibition by local option.

Mr. WARD.—I do not intend to take up the time of the House long. I want to say one or two words to the last speaker. He touched on two or three points, and he wanted to know how farming representatives could come and support measures that were not favourable to farmers. What did the honourable gentleman do in connection with the Advances to Settlers Bill? Being a farmers' representative, while he twits the supporters of the Government with supporting measures not favourable to farmers, what did he do? When it comes to a measure which, I venture to say, the majority of farmers regard as being of great consequence to their industry, with all his talk about humbug and cant, he votes against it like a man. When the honourable gentleman talks about exposing humbug and cant, I call it trying to expose humbug—and can't. Speaking generally on the debate that has taken place on the Appropriation Bill, I wish to refer to the speech of the leader of the Opposition, who, I presume, was intended to give voice to the general opinions of the Opposition, and the voice of the Opposition so far as the policy measures of the Government are concerned. What did he do? He made not one attack on the measures of the Government that there is any need to reply to in the slightest degree. And it was the same with the senior member for Wellington City. All he said was that by roading and carrying on public works we were burdening the country with debt. That is a sort of generalisation in regard to which it is only necessary to say that we could not carry on necessary works in the country unless we had the necessary funds to do it. The three points in the speech of the leader of the Opposition were these: After a session of four months, aided by his intelligent supporters on that side, what were the three points he took exception to in the Government policy? One of his serious complaints was that the corrected Order Paper usually arrived in the House late. Another was that the Pomahaka purchase was at too high a value. Without going into the whole question of the investigation, evidence is on record that the majority of witnesses upheld what was done by the Minister and by the department, and even his foes acquit him absolutely of having done anything improper. The other charge which the leader of the Opposition, on behalf of the Opposition, levels against the Government is on the score of the appointment of the Serjeant-at-Arms. I think the leader of the Opposition and those supporting him ought to be a little more generous in matters of this sort in connection with a gentleman who has held a public position for many years, and who had been a member of the House. It does not redound to their credit; and I think every fair-minded person outside will agree with me that if they took such exception to him as Serjeant-at-Arms for political purposes they ought to have taken the same exception when he was on the same level with themselves as a member of the House. Those same honourable members know that they associated with him, and regarded him as being their equal in the House; and yet, when he is unable to answer, they take this attitude—and with what purpose? For the mere purpose of party tactics, and in the endeavour to get at the Government, they drag a man's name through the mud quite regardless of any injury they may do him. I say it is not fairplay. And if this appointment is one of the misdeeds that honourable members have to charge against the policy of the Government, all I can say is that such tactics are not creditable. Now, Sir, there is one other point I want to refer to which was mentioned by the leader of the Opposition, and to which he attached a great deal of importance, showing to what straits they are driven in order to find some charge to make against the Government. I want to refer to the charge of having collected two taxes in one year. The honourable member for Clutha said, Are the representatives of farmers coming here to vote for the collection of two taxes in one year? Are they the farmers' friends? Does he know the history of the property-tax collection? I will just tell him; and I will ask him how he came to support a Ministry which not once, but on more than one occasion, collected the property-tax twice in one year. In 1881-82 the tax was collected on a date less than twelve months after the 1880-81 collection; in 1882-83 it was collected on a date less than twelve months after the 1881-82 collection; in 1883-84 it was collected on a date less than twelve months after the 1882-83 collection; in 1885-86 it was collected on a date less than twelve months after the 1884-85 collection; and in 1888-89 it was collected on a date less than twelve months after the 1887-88 collection. And yet we have the honourable member for Clutha giving a prohibition speech in which he mixes Sir Robert Stout and Mr. Seddon, Mr. Pirani and Mr. Lawry—whiskey and water are said to always mix well, as the honourable gentleman ought to know—and appealing to the farmers, trying to put himself right for having done some very unfair things to the farmers in this country. I ask him, how can they get over these facts?

Mr. Ward

Mr. BELL.—They are not facts.

Mr. WARD.—I say they are facts. 10.30. I say I have in my hand an official record of the facts. I think the honourable member will agree that such a record would not be given to me unless it contained facts. We must keep the machinery oiled; if at times the machinery runs dry, it must have a further supply of oil. I do not wonder at the deplorable fact that honourable members on that side of the House regret the facts which I have stated. They have for years past been trying to raise a financial critic, but they have not even succeeded in raising a junior in the financial world. Then, again, as to all this talk about the land-tax being collected twice in one year, do honourable members know that we have only received two complaints from farmers from one end of the country to the other against the tax being collected? And yet during the recess we shall find the honourable member for Clutha and others going before their constituents with such statements as we have heard him deliver to-night. I never before saw the honourable gentleman looking as he looks to-night. The honourable member is always jaunty and happy, but to-night he has excelled himself. I suppose the speech of the leader of the Opposition is to be accepted as the typical speech criticizing the actions and policy of the Government during the session. But what is the sum and substance of that speech? There were only four points in regard to which exception was taken to the policy of the Government. Those honourable members were anxious to let the civilised world know that the country would gallop to a deficit when the present Government came into office: but we have never got there. Seeing how all their predictions have been falsified, they take care now when prophesying to guard themselves with certain conditions. I think the country has had enough of this everlasting preaching that the country is going to the dogs. The honourable member for Wairarapa, for instance, told us the old story, that everything is going wrong. But the honourable member knows perfectly well that there is elasticity in the revenue of this country—that it rises and falls from time to time. The honourable member, who was going out, has now returned to the Opposition benches and has taken the seat of the leader of the Opposition. I never felt so happy in this House before. It is a treat to see the honourable member in that seat. How admirably he fills it! I thought he was aiming at something this session, and now we see what it is. On the last day of the session we see that the honourable gentleman has got into the seat of the leader of the Opposition. I congratulate him. Next session, if he can only get a few of our friends to go with him he may be more successful.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. WARD.—I was trying to pay the honourable member a compliment. What I should perhaps say is, I hope he may be less successful; and that is saying a good deal. At last the leader of the Opposition has come back. He cannot permit his rival to jump his hardly-won claim. The honourable member for Wairarapa has become convinced that the utterances of the leader of the Opposition have got so much off the track, so far as the Opposition is concerned, that he has taken his place; but the honourable member has not occupied that place five minutes before a messenger or some one has gone out in search of the leader of the Opposition, who has returned and found that the honourable member for Wairarapa has jumped into his shoes. Well, Sir, I can only say that I do not think the proposals of the Government have suffered at the hands of the critics of the Government this evening. We have not had any arguments adduced upon the facts—or, rather, we have not had facts adduced in support of the arguments or criticisms of my honourable friends opposite—for their criticisms on the whole were altogether favourable; and I think I have said nothing offensive in the few remarks I have deemed it necessary to make. I hope that during the recess we shall be able to remove some of the prejudice of honourable members opposite; but I am bound to say that we have been engaged in advocating a progressive policy, but the people of this colony know that the honourable gentlemen opposite have done their best to detract from the efforts of the Government, and no doubt they will continue to do so. Our business during the recess will be to enlighten the people, and, if necessary, to keep them in the right track so far as our proposals are concerned, in order that the Government supporters in different parts of the colony may not be misled by misrepresentation; and I venture to say, on behalf of the Government, that it will not be idle, if action is required in that respect. As for depending in the ordinary way upon a large section of the Press of this colony, I say that, so far as the present Government are concerned, we are not at all likely to do that. We know exactly where our support comes from, and it does not come from the honourable members opposite, but from the people. In conclusion, I can only say, speaking for myself—and I dare say I am uttering the sentiments of my colleagues—that we are all exceedingly delighted to see the last of you honourable gentlemen, and I feel quite sure that you will also be exceedingly glad to see the last of us. I can only hope that, when we meet again, the whole of us will come back in good health and spirits, and in as good a humour as we part on the evening of the last day of the session. I move the third reading of the Bill.

Bill read a third time.

HOROWHENUA BLOCK BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council, transmitting this Bill, with amendments, and requesting the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the same.

Mr. SEDDON said that, notwithstanding the agreement which had been come to, the Council had inserted a provision which the Government could not accept, and he therefore moved, That the amendments be considered this day three months.

Motion agreed to, and amendments ordered to be considered this day three months.

The House adjourned at twenty-five minutes to twelve o'clock.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 24th October, 1894.

Adjournment.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at twelve o'clock noon.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT.

On the motion of the Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, the Council adjourned at three minutes past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, 24th October, 1894.

Appropriation Bills—Business of the Session—South Sea Islands—Adjournment.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at twelve o'clock noon.

PRAYERS.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that he had waited upon His Excellency the Governor and presented to him the Appropriation Bill and the Public Works Appropriation Bill, to which His Excellency, on behalf of Her Majesty, had been pleased to assent.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SPEAKER laid on the table the following schedule of the business transacted during the session:—

1. SELECT COMMITTEES—
On public matters	...	...	25
On private Bills	...	...	9
			27
2. PUBLIC BILLS—
Received the Royal assent	...	...	100
Reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure	...	...	0
Dropped or otherwise disposed of	...	...	93
			193
3. PRIVATE BILLS—
Received the Royal assent	...	...	0
Dropped	...	...	0
			0
4. PETITIONS PRESENTED—
From Europeans	...	...	658
From Maoris	...	...	106
			763
5. DIVISIONS—
In the whole House	...	...	95
In Committee	...	...	235
			330

6. SITTINGS—
Days of meeting...	...	...	...	81
Hours of sitting—
Before midnight	578h. 55m.
After midnight	118h. 13m.
Daily average ...	...	...	607h. 8m. 8h. 36m.
7. VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS—
Questions asked of Ministers	...	...	852
Entries in Journals	...	...	1,520
Daily average ...	...	...	—2,372	29
8. ORDERS FOR PAPERS				79
9. PAPERS LAID UPON THE TABLE—
By command	...	...	...	51
In return to orders	...	...	...	75
In return to addresses	...	...	...	0
By message	...	...	...	1
By Act	...	...	...	89
By leave	...	...	...	* 43
Papers ordered to be printed	...	...	174
Papers not ordered to be printed...	...	...	85
			— 259
10. REPORTS FROM SELECT COMMITTEES—
From the Public Petitions A to L Committee	...	...	105
From the Public Petitions M to Z Committee	...	...	263
From the Native Affairs Committee	...	...	76
From the Waste Lands Committee	...	...	130
From the Goldfields and Mines Committee	...	...	29
From the Local Bills Committee	...	...	34
From other Committees	...	...	110
			— 8

SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

Mr. SEDDON desired, by leave of the House, to lay upon the table a paper relating to Samoa and the Pacific Islands. It had been compiled by Mr. Coleman Phillips. He would move, That the paper lie upon the table and be printed. Accompanying the paper was a well-executed map which had been prepared by the Lands Department. The map showed nearly the whole of the Pacific Islands, and particularly those islands which were adjacent to New Zealand, and the paper gave a history pretty well of each of these islands. It was a very interesting paper, and one which he thought honourable members should make themselves acquainted with. It was only doing justice to New Zealand to know who were our neighbours and what in the future should be our policy in respect to them. He thought the paper would be a very good paper to have in every school throughout the colony, so that our children might be taught the history of the islands adjacent to New Zealand—so that they might know who were our neighbours, who possessed these islands, and might know something more about them than they did at the present time. He proposed to get an extra number of copies of the paper printed off. The Minister of Education concurred with him in thinking that copies of the paper might be sent to every school in New Zealand, and to the Education Boards. He had no doubt that the Education Boards would fall in with the views which he had just expressed. But little was known regarding the islands by many persons, and as regarded their important bearing on the future of New Zealand. Some years ago a valuable paper on this subject was prepared, and it was ignored. For his part, he cared not from what source they got valuable information or what "colour" the party might be who gave it, when he believed that information to be of benefit to the colony he thought they were only doing what was just and right in taking advantage of that knowledge. Whilst, of course, not agreeing with many of the opinions expressed in the paper, still he looked upon the paper as a most valuable document, and he had very great pleasure in laying it on the table of the House, and by that means giving the colony the benefit of the information.

Mr. GREEN asked if the paper had been supervised by the Education Department. He quite agreed with the Premier that it was a very important document.

Mr. REEVES said that, if the honourable member meant that before having it sent all round to the schools he should go through it and see that in its present form it was suitable, he agreed with that. He agreed with what the Premier had said.

Dr. NEWMAN would take that opportunity of asking the Premier whether, during the recess, the Government proposed to do anything more with regard to the acquisition of Samoa.

Mr. THOMPSON would like to ask the Premier if he would take into consideration the advisability of preparing the local-government measures which he intended to carry through next session, and distribute copies of the measures among the local bodies previous to the meeting of next session of Parliament. He thought it was well that measures of that kind should be prepared early in the recess and sent round to the local bodies.

Mr. WARD would be glad, when the Premier replied, if he would indicate to the House whether it was not desirable that an opportunity should be given during the recess of visiting Samoa in the "Hinemoa." It would be advantageous to New Zealand if such were done, similarly to the visits that were made by this steamer to other islands of the Pacific, as much interest had arisen in connection therewith, while really little or nothing was known of that group. Honourable members would, he thought, do well to make themselves more acquainted with the affairs of those islands. Although he would not be able to go himself, he would like to see responsible people from this country visit Samoa.

Mr. TANNER heartily approved of the suggestion which had just been made, for New Zealand could not afford to be totally indifferent to the fate of Samoa, any more than she could have viewed with equanimity a different destiny for Fiji or Rarotonga. There was no doubt that this colony would play an important part in the future in the affairs of the islands of the Pacific. Sooner or later these islands would be greatly influenced by what took place in New Zealand, and in all probability the Anglo-Saxon race, which had gained a footing in these islands, would become the dominant race in the Pacific. He approved of Ministers carrying on negotiations with the view of extending our influence in these islands without incurring undue responsibilities, and always safeguarding the interests of the colony. In that way we might ultimately, by the peaceful conquest of commerce, and common interests, be able to establish a chain of posts which would put us in communication with the people of our own blood on the American continent, and so in course of time English-speaking people would engirdle the earth.

Mr. DUTHIE hoped the question raised by the honourable member for Marsden would receive the attention of the Government. The Premier had during the session intimated that he would deal with the question of local government next session, and he hoped he would deal with it in an adequate manner. The question of hospital and charitable aid especially required attention, and the working of the County Councils and Road Boards required simplification. He thought that before the House met next session the proposed Bills dealing with the question of local government should be in the hands of local bodies, so affording opportunity to those engaged in the work for the expression of their experience. This was desirable in the interests of good local government.

Mr. STEVENS quite agreed with the idea that they should place themselves in close touch with the whole of the Pacific Islands, and not stand aloof from other Powers and other countries; because the day was not far distant when they must have universal federation, especially in commercial matters. He hoped the Government of this colony would not step so far over the mark as to be carried away by mere sentiment, or to forget that true practicability which was necessary in the interests of this country. It had been a fact, and would always remain a fact, that many hundreds of thousands of pounds were spent for mere sentimental purposes; and, whatever the Government might do in the future in connection with the annexation of Samoa and any of the Pacific Islands, he hoped they would look at the practical side of the matter before taking any steps whatever towards annexation, so that no increase of taxation should be placed on the taxpayers of the colony for mere sentiment. He believed he had given his heartiest support to the Government during this session, and he hoped they would not forget the suggestion he had expressed.

Mr. DUNCAN thought that the dying hours of the session was a very inopportune time to deal with this large question, and he thought it would be better to adjourn the discussion of it until next session. He did not wish to disparage by any means the idea of New Zealand becoming acquainted with its surroundings, because that was a very important matter; only he did think this was an inopportune time to bring it up. He had in his mind a great prospect for New Zealand and its surroundings, and, keeping that in view, he thought the Government should not lose sight of the islands adjacent to New Zealand. With regard to local matters, it would be necessary that the question of hospital and charitable aid should receive the attention of the Government early next session, and there was no better way of doing that effectually than by distributing their proposals at an early date, so that the local bodies might have time to consider them.

Mr. HOGG had no wish to say one word against the proposed trip to Samoa, as picnics of that kind were generally very desirable; but he hoped that, in the event of the "Hinemoa" being despatched to Samoa with members of the Government or members of Parliament, too much importance would not be attached to the circumstance. He thought the Government should remember that a vast amount of responsibility was attached to any effort in that particular direction. As they all knew, Samoa was under a joint protectorate, and they should avoid doing anything to create anything like international jealousy. While we were an arm of the British Empire it was not our duty to do anything that might bring Great Britain into conflict with foreign Powers. We had a fine colony of our own, and had our own work to carry on in connection with it, without bringing upon ourselves an undue responsibility, which might be somewhat difficult to handle in the future. With regard to the suggestion to send copies of Bills, et cetera, to local bodies for their consideration, he thought that that would be a very desirable course. He understood it was intended during next session to bring forward some amendment to the present system of local government in New Zealand, and he thought it was absolutely necessary that something of that kind should be done; but the local bodies in New Zealand should be consulted in advance.

Mr. O'REGAN hoped the question of local government would be borne in mind. It was a question of far more importance to the people than the annexation of Samoa. The talk about the annexation of Samoa reminded him of those well-meaning people who gave money to send missionaries to savages while there was more important work to do at Home. The people in the colony were far more concerned about local affairs than about the annexation of Samoa. He fully indorsed all that had been said about spreading our influence in the Pacific Islands, but it was a thing that should not be forced. The Anglo-Saxon race would take its place without artificial forcing. The intention of acquainting our young people with the history and geographical position of the islands might be all very well, but very few of them knew anything about the history of their own colony. There was a good deal of sentiment about the matter, but he hoped they would not allow themselves to be induced through sentiment to spend money for useless purposes.

Mr. WILLIS said, with regard to the suggestion that measures should be put in the hands of the local bodies, he would suggest that the Government should look carefully over their measures, so that they might not be brought forward only to be rejected.

Mr. LAWRY said he made his first speech in the House in 1887, and it was a singular coincidence that at that time he advocated the very principle the Premier said he was going to inculcate next session in regard to local government. The suggestion that the measures should be circulated beforehand was the best he had ever heard made during the session. The sooner they brought in a comprehensive measure dealing with local government the sooner they would raise the House from the status of a board of works, and have the confidence of the country. This was the last time he would address the House as Government Whip, and he would like to say that he had had in his colleague one of the most loyal and true members ever God made. He would also like to say that during the whole session neither the Premier nor any of his colleagues had asked him to do anything that he would not like to proclaim to the whole of New Zealand. The senior member for Wellington City had talked about the Whips going round and whipping up the party. He would appeal for the last time in his official capacity to every member of the party as to whether he had ever appealed to them to do one thing during the session. Whilst treated in the most generous way by the leaders of the party, he had not been treated generously by some members belonging to that side. With regard to the question of local government, it must take precedence during the recess, and he hoped the Premier would do as suggested in regard to getting the measure prepared early, so that every local body might have time to consider it. And next year, if the Premier brought down a measure that gave them local government, not under old provincial lines, he would have the whole country at his back, and a tenure of office such as no Premier ever had.

Mr. SEDDON complimented the House on the last debate of the session. He felt very great pleasure in bidding adieu to all honourable members, much as he liked them.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Oh, you will shortly be visiting every one of us.

Mr. SEDDON said, no doubt the honourable member's district and he himself did require looking after. With regard to the paper dealing with Samoa, and the point raised by the honourable member for Waikouaiti as to its being revised by the Education Department, he would not for a moment think of sending it to the Boards without its going through 12.30. the proper channel. If the paper was to be used for school purposes it would necessarily require revision, and probably curtailment, to place it in such a form as would be advantageous to our schools; and he had no doubt that the Minister of Education, who had heard this expression of opinion as to the desirability of our children being taught more about our own colony and the adjacent islands, and less about the historical wars of foreign countries, which were of no practical benefit to them, would consider the suggestion. In the public schools too little was taught with regard to New Zealand, and very little attention was bestowed on the adjacent islands. This colony was geographically the centre, and must ultimately prove to be the mother colony, of the islands adjacent. It was our duty to look ahead, and provide for what would inevitably occur in years to come. With regard to what had been said respecting members having the opportunity of visiting the adjacent islands, there were times when Ministers would be only too pleased for members to take a trip. He felt that what the Americans, the Germans, and the Mother-country had failed to do in regard to Samoa the Colony of New Zealand could accomplish; and if the "Hinemoa," with members representing both sides of the House, were despatched to Samoa a solution might be evolved, and, no doubt, once and for all this difficult question would be settled. Something required to be done. He was sure every member of the House and every colonist must have been extremely pained to see the use one of Her Majesty's men-of-war had been recently put to in connection with the trouble at Samoa. No doubt, what had been done was the result of a conference of the various Consuls, but it had been very painful to him to see the course that had been followed; and that incident proved very clearly that some action was necessary. Representations had been made from the other colonies and New Zealand touching the matters brought under the notice of the Government prior to the commencement of the session, and the House had indorsed the course the Government had taken. They had no desire to do more than this: to have peace with our neighbours, to see that those inhabiting these islands were not hostile, or in any way inimical to the social or physical well-being of the people of New Zealand; and, in respect to the aboriginal races inhabiting those islands, we could do as much for their protection as we had done for the protection of the Native race of New Zealand. He saw no more difficulty in settling the difficulties there than there was in settling the difficulties of the Native race in this colony. The islanders were a race that should be preserved, but it would not be in the direction of preserving them if the course were adopted that had been followed in many of the islands during the last three or four years, and accounts of which appeared in the papers before the House. Honourable members knew that many valuable lives and much valuable property had been sacrificed in the manner indicated. With regard to the introduction next session of a Local Government Bill, did those honourable members who advised the Government to introduce such a Bill know that by advising the Government to circulate the Bill during the recess they were, more than likely, advising a course that would lead to the absolute rejection of such a measure? That was what would probably happen. It had been said that we had too much government, and that the number of local authorities must be reduced; but when a local body found itself threatened with extinction by an amendment of the law, the members and officials thereof would bring pressure upon the member of Parliament for the district to oppose the measure. There were nearly twice as many local bodies as were necessary, but, if a measure were brought in to reduce the number by one-half, there would be sufficient opposition on that score alone almost, to insure its defeat and rejection.

Mr. Lawry

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. SEDDON said that members were very strong to-day, but if they went back and told their constituents that such a measure was absolutely necessary, and that the Government intended to introduce it at the commencement of next session, they would probably subsequently admit that he was right. That was his view, and he did not think that he was far wrong, as, immediately it was announced, the secretaries, clerks, and engineers of the local bodies—the noble army connected with the local bodies—would be transformed into canvassers against the Bill, and so by these means secure the rejection of the measure. However, he might say he had some knowledge of local government, having served a very fair apprenticeship in it, and whether he would be able to submit a measure that would be met with general approval time would prove. He assured the House that he would do his best, and, if he failed, he could not help it. He was pleased to see that what had been done so far by his colleagues and himself had met with the approval of the very large majority of the House, and he thought it would meet with the general approval of the country. He had been rather pained to hear the remarks of the honourable member for Parnell, who stated that his speech on that debate would probably be his last speech in the House. He hoped, however, that would not be so. There were probably some honourable members who held different views on the liquor question from that honourable gentleman's, and who would probably not object to his retiring for next session; but he had always thought that it was well to have both sides fairly given on all questions coming before the House. In respect to such matters as the liquor traffic there must be a give and take, as it was impossible for any one to carry his own views. The matter referred to—the Licensing Bill—had been the only matter this session upon which there had been any feeling, and he would say to his honourable friend the member for Parnell, and to those members of the House who were regretting the non-passing of that measure, that he himself deeply regretted the Bill not being allowed to pass, that had they passed it this session it would have cleared the way for the Local Government and other important Bills next session, and those who had heard the question discussed would clearly understand that the responsibility for the failure to pass the Bill was not upon his shoulders. It had during this debate been said that the settlers should not be given roads and bridges, and that it was undignified for Parliament to discuss such questions; but all he could say was that the views of the thinking men of the colony were against that contention, and that roads and bridges were the lifeblood of settlement, and the withdrawal of the lifeblood of settlement was detrimental to the whole colony. It would perhaps be much better that Parliament should give the money to the local authorities, but for them to see that the money taken from the taxpayers generally—from the consolidated revenue—for this purpose should through this channel be well and wisely expended. But what had been the case in the past? It had been that, whilst Parliament had sometimes intrusted moneys for expenditure to local authorities, the representatives of those local authorities were looking more after themselves and their personal interests than after the general welfare of the district and the larger question of promoting settlement. And these were all dangers they had got to face. In Parliament they had representatives from all parts of the colony and from the districts generally, and hence, in the distribution of public moneys, he thought it had been, generally speaking, shared more fairly than it would have been had the moneys been given to the local bodies.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said, at all events that was one of those matters upon which they would have a difference of opinion. He unhesitatingly said that what had been done and what had been provided in the way of promoting settlement had been well and wisely done, and he did not think any member of the House, no matter what his opinions might be, no matter what party he belonged to, had need to be ashamed of the fact that he had had to do with the providing of money for roads and bridges, and the promotion of settlement in New Zealand. He would finish his address by saying a few words on the same subject as that with which he commenced his first speech this session, and that was with reference to Mr. Speaker. He desired to tender him, on behalf of the House, the assurance of their very great confidence in him. What had been claimed in nominating him for the position he held had been fully verified, and he was sure it would be recognised on both sides of the House that he was expressing the opinion of all when he said that Mr. Speaker had performed his duties impartially and satisfactorily to all, and in such a way that every member had the utmost confidence in and most kindly feeling towards him. He would further compliment the House on this fact: that, although there might perhaps be a little adverse criticism with regard to the proceedings on the Licensing Bill, still there had been nothing done that any member of the House need be ashamed of, or on account of which he need be afraid to face his constituents. That was very pleasing to every member of the House; and he was sure it must also be pleasing to Mr. Speaker, to the Chairman of Committees, and to all concerned. He moved that this paper do lie on the table of the House and be printed; and he took that opportunity of wishing one and all Good-bye, hoping that when they met again it would be in the same kindly spirit as that in which they were parting. As far as enjoyments would go, he hoped all would be spared so as to enjoy them. He would also further take the opportunity of saying that if anything had occurred in connection with the business of the session, and which as leader of the House he had felt bound to press, and in so doing there had been any soreness or feeling engendered, or if any member felt aggrieved, he could only express regret that it should be so. He had endeavoured to do his duty to the House and to the country faithfully. He probably had asked members to do work at a time when they resented it, and would have preferred to seek rest; but they were there to do the business of the country, and, now it was done, none would regret the extra time devoted thereto. But his colleagues and himself had in view very necessary work, which they believed to be in the interests of the colony. The House had responded; and, in saying Good-bye for the session to members on both sides of the House, he at the same time tendered them hearty good wishes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER must express his gratification at the manner in which the House had received the remarks which the Premier had been good enough to make concerning himself. It was very pleasant and agreeable to receive that expression of approbation, and he had this one hope: that the feeling expressed towards him to-day might accompany him for the term of his Speakership. It was equally creditable to the members of the House and agreeable to its presiding member in the chair that no occasion had arisen which rendered it necessary that the powers recently conferred on the Speaker should be invoked for the quelling of disorder; and he hoped that there would always be such a proper feeling on both sides that the rules to which the old members had been so long accustomed would be sufficient to preserve the honour and dignity and the decorum of the House. He thanked them all for the reception they had given to the remarks which fell from the Premier with regard to his conduct in the Speaker's chair during the session now closing. In taking leave of members to-day he desired to express his sincere hope of meeting all his brother members in this House in 1895.

Mr. Seddon

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the House do now adjourn until this day week.

The House divided.

AYES, 24.

Buchanan	Hogg	Seddon
Cadman	Houston	Tanner
Carnecross	Mackintosh	Thompson
Carroll	McKenzie, J.	Ward
Collins	Mills	Willis.
Guinness	Newman	Tellers.
Hall	Pinkerton	Morrison
Harris	Reeves	Stevens.
Heke

NOES, 14.

Duncan	Lawry	Smith, E. M.
Green	McGowan	Steward.
Hall-Jones	McKenzie, R.	Tellers.
Kelly, W.	O'Regan	Buick
Larnach	Pirani	Mackenzie, T.

Majority for, 10.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at seven minutes to one o'clock p.m.

END OF EIGHTY-SIXTH VOLUME.

